THE HISTORY OF ENGLAND,

FROM

The REVOLUTION to the Acceſſion of the Illuſtrious Family of BRUNSWICK-HANOVER, now reigning, containing the Tranſactions of Twenty-five Years.

PART XII.

WILLIAM III. and MARY II. King and Queen of ENGLAND. A. D. 1689.

DURING the greateſt part of the preceding reign, the Engliſh had, with unſpeakable grief, beheld their religion brought to the brink of ruin, and the papal ſee on the point of re-aſſuming her antient tyrannic ſway over both church and ſtate in theſe kingdoms. The Reformation, which had been ſealed with the blood of ſo many martyrs for the true faith, was about to be overturned, and the rights and privileges of the people annihilated. The land of liberty was going to be reduced to an iſland of ſlaves. Deſpotic rule was to lord it over the laws of the country, and the lives and properties of thouſands were to be at the mercy of arbitrary power, ſupported by the unnatural and execrable doctrine of paſſive obedience and non-reſiſtance. Such was the ſituation of the Engliſh nation, when James II. unable to withſtand the juſt reſentments of an injured people, and loſt to all ſpirit but that of enthuſiaſtic bigotry, abdicated a throne he had ſo unworthily filled.

The Revolution then may, with juſtice, be termed the epocha of true Engliſh liberty. The nation, repreſented by its parliament (or what is the ſame, a free convention of its eſtates) fixed the long conteſted limits of royal prerogative, and the rights of the ſubject; and having preſcribed to the prince of Orange the conditions on which he was to reign, choſe him for their ſovereign, jointly with his conſort Mary, the daughter of their late king. From that time this prince was acknowleged by the greateſt part of Europe as the lawful king of England, by the name of William III. and the Deliverer of this nation.

There were, however, a party in the nation, who viewed things in a different light, and could by no means be brought to approve the new ſettlement: theſe exerted their utmoſt endeavours from the beginning to overturn it. The reader will readily ſuppoſe that the papiſts made the bulk of this party. They had indeed very ſubſtantial reaſons to diſlike the Revolution; but to theſe alſo were joined ſeveral proteſtants, who, either from the ſtrong impreſſions of the late doctrine of paſſive obedience and non-reſiſtance, could not bring themſelves to think it lawful to reſiſt James, or who, though they acknowleged the neceſſity and expediency of an interpoſition to preſerve them a free people, and gladly accepted the prince of Orange in the quality of a mediator, or even as regent in the name of king James, would by no means hear of his being made king, to the prejudice of hereditary indefeaſible right, and the direct lineal ſucceſſion. The more violent of theſe were named Jacobites, the others Nonjurors, from their refuſing to take the oaths to the preſent government. Thus the Revolution, notwithſtanding it had been the means of happily preſerving the proteſtant religion, and the laws and liberties of the kingdom, had from its beginning many enemies to encounter, who were engaged in continual plots to annoy and ſubvert it.

King William began his reign by a proclamation, confirming all proteſtants in the offices which they enjoyed, on the firſt day of December. His next ſtep was to ſettle his privy-council *; after which, on the twenty-third of February, he gave the royal aſſent to a bill to "remove and prevent all queſtions and diſputes concerning the aſſembling and ſitting of this preſent parliament:" by which act the convention, which had ſettled the crown on the prince and princeſs of Orange, was changed into a parliament. His majeſty opened their ſeſſion with a ſpeech, in which he thanked them for the great confidence they had repoſed in him by chuſing him to be their ſovereign, aſſuring them it ſhould be his ſtudy to preſerve the good opinion they had conceived of his integrity. He laid before them the critical ſituation of affairs in Europe, and in theſe kingdoms in particular; and concluded with earneſtly requeſting them to concur in the moſt ſpeedy and effectual meaſures for the welfare of the nation. Soon after the king ſent a meſſage to the houſe, informing them that he had received certain advice of James having ſet ſail from Breſt with an armament to invade Ireland: whereupon both houſes came to a reſolution to aſſiſt his majeſty with their lives and fortunes: they voted a temporary aid of four hundred and twenty thouſand pounds, to be levied by monthly aſſeſſment, and both houſes waited on the king to ſignify this their reſolution. This complacency however was far from being unanimous in the parliament; for ſeveral of the lords, both ſpiritual and temporal, had abſented themſelves from the aſſembly, rather than take the oaths of allegiance and ſupremacy required. The nonjurors among the prelates were, Sancroft, archbiſhop of Canterbury; Turner, biſhop of Ely; Ken, of Bath and Wells; White, of Peterborough; Lake, of Chicheſter; Lloyd, of Norwich; Thomas, of Worceſter; and Frampton, of Glouceſter: of whom the four firſt had been impriſoned in the Tower by king James. The temporal peers who refuſed the oaths were, the duke of Newcaſtle, the earl of Clarendon, Litchfield, Exeter, Yarmouth, and Stafford, with the lords Griffin and Stawel.

The friends of the late king began alſo to ſtir already againſt the new government; and ſeveral gentlemen of condition of the Scottiſh nation in England were apprehended for treaſonable practices, and ſent to the Tower. The commons, informed of theſe commotions, as likewiſe that the Scottiſh regiment of Dumbarton had mutinied, and declared for James (though preſently after quelled) impowered the king to diſpenſe with the Habeas Corpus act till the ſeventeenth of April following This was done with a view for the more effectual ſecuring all diſturbers of the public peace; but was certainly a great ſtretch of confidence, and gave ſuch a power few princes ought to be truſted with. They alſo brought in a bill for puniſhing mutiny and deſertion, which in a little time paſſed both houſes, and received the royal aſſent.

On the eleventh of April 1689, the king and queen were ſolemnly crowned by the biſhop of London, who officiated, at the king's deſire, in the room of the archbiſhop of Canterbury, a declared malcontent. The king now made a thorough change about court. Several who had been driven from their poſts by the late adminiſtration, were now reſtored with ſignal marks of honour and favour. The papiſts, who had ſo lately carried all before them, were now forced to give way to their more ſucceſsful adverſaries: the laws againſt the former were renewed and ſtrengthened, while all ſuch who had been in any manner inſtrumental in effecting the Revolution, were rewarded in proportion to their ſervices. Among the reſt, Charles Paulet, marquis of Wincheſter, was made duke of Bolton; William Bentinck, eſq. earl of Portland; Ralph lord Montagu, earl of Montagu; and John lord Churchill, earl of Marlborough. The earls of Nottingham and Shrewſbury were appointed ſecretaries of ſtate; the marquis of Halifax, privy-ſeal; the earl of Danby, preſident of the council; D'Auverquerque, a Dutch gentleman, who with Bentinck and Zuyleſtein had accompanied the king from Holland, was made maſter of the horſe, Zuyleſtein of the robes, and Schomberg of the ordnance: this latter was, not long after, made a duke, as was the earl of Danby marquis of Carmarthen, and admiral Herbert earl of Torrington. Laſtly, Dr. Gilbert Burnet, who came over with his majeſty as his chaplain when prince, was, upon the death of Dr. Seth Ward, advanced to the biſhopric of Saliſbury. In fine, not one of the king's friends found themſelves forgotten or neglected in this diſtribution of royal favour: and that even the meaneſt of his ſubjects might receive a benefit from his acceſſion, and be thereby the more attached to his perſon and government, he about this time recommended to the parliament (who readily acquieſced in his deſire) the abolition of the hearth money tax, which he underſtood was a grievous impoſition upon the people. This was certainly a very politic meaſure, and contributed more than any thing to gain the affections of the populace to their new ſovereign.

The king was naturally biaſſed to Calviniſm, and a declared enemy to perſecution. He had been conſiderably cooled in his regard for the church of England, by the oppoſition he had met with from ſome of the members, eſpecially the biſhops, who had, by their refuſal to take the oaths, and withdrawing from the parliament, openly diſowned his authority, and ſhewn their averſion to his government. He therefore reſolved to mortify the church, by admitting the proteſtant diſſenters to a ſhare in poſts under the government; by which means he could at the ſame time oblige many of his friends. With this view he propoſed to his parliament the abrogating the old, and appointing new oaths; by which the ſacramental teſt might be declared unneceſſary in rendering any perſon, being a proteſtant, capable of enjoying any office or employ. The commons were complaiſant enough to frame a bill agreeable to his majeſty's intentions, but it was rejected by a great majority in the houſe of lords. Another bill for the ſame purpoſe, but expreſſed in different terms, was propoſed by the king's direction, and met with the ſame fate, tho' in both caſes about ſix or ſeven lords proteſted againſt the reſolution of the houſe.

*. The council was compoſed of the following perſons: the prince of Denmark, the archbiſhop of Canterbury, the biſhop of London, the duke of Norfolk, the marquiſſes of Halifax and Wincheſter; the earls of Danby, Lindſey, Oxford, Shrewſbury, Dorſet and Middleſex, Bedford, Bath, Macclesfield, Nottingham; the viſcounts Falconbridge, Mordaunt, Newport, Lumley; the lords Wharton, Montagu, Delamere, Churchill; ſir Robert Howard, ſir Henry Capel, ſir John Lowther; Mr. Bentinck, Mr. Sidney, Mr. Powle, Mr. Ruſſel, Mr. Boſcawen, and Mr. Hambden.

The warmth the king diſcovered in favour of the diſſenters on this occaſion, greatly excited the jealouſy of the churchmen. William would gladly have compromiſed the matter, by excuſing the nonjuring clergy from taking the oaths to the government, provided the churchmen would have agreed to diſpenſe with the ſacramental teſt in favour of the preſbyterians; but this propoſal was rejected with ſome warmth by the high-flying clergy; and they reſolved that all nonjuring clergy ſhould be obliged to take the oaths, or ſuffer ſuſpenſion. After a long and warm debate in parliament, this point was carried, and all the indulgence that could be obtained was a clauſe, empowering the king to grant to any twelve clergymen who ſhould be deprived in virtue of this act, a third part of their benefices during pleaſure.

Thus the antient oaths of allegiance and ſupremacy were abrogated, the declaration of paſſive obedience and non-reſiſtance, in the act of uniformity, was repealed, and the new oath reduced to its former ſimplicity, of ſwearing to bear faith and true allegiance to the ſovereign. The clergy were required to take the oaths before the firſt day of Auguſt, on pain of being ſuſpended for ſix months, and of being entirely deprived of all their eccleſiaſtical promotions, in caſe they did not take them before the expiration of that term. Several complied with the times; as the earl of Nottingham, who was made ſecretary of ſtate, and Dr. Sherlock, who after the victory of the Boyne acknowledged their majeſties title, and was made dean of St. Paul's: but many adhered to their old principles, which chriſtian charity and candour would have obliged us to have excuſed, had they not inſtigated them to continual plots and conſpiracies againſt the government. Thoſe indeed who did comply, made uſe of ſuch reſervations and diſtinctions as left them open to much cenſure, as if they had made their conſciences ſubſervient to their temporal intereſts.

Though the king had been diſappointed in his deſign of repealing the ſacramental teſt, yet he reſolved to indulge the diſſenters with a toleration; and a bill for this purpoſe being preſented by the earl of Nottingham, was with ſome difficulty paſſed into a law, under the title of An Act for exempting their Majeſties Proteſtant Subjects diſſenting from the Church of England, from the Penalties of certain Laws; which is commonly called the Act of Toleration to this day.

Theſe matters ſettled, the legiſlature next took under their conſideration the ſettlement of a revenue for the ſupport of the government. It muſt be obſerved, that before the Revolution, the whole ſtanding income of the ſtate was in the power and diſpoſal of the king, and was called the revenue of the crown. This had given occaſion to many notorious embezzlements; and it was found, upon inquiſition into this affair, that ſince the toleration, prodigious ſums had been ſunk, without being applied to the uſes for which they were granted. Effectually to prevent ſuch ſhameful miſapplications in future, the parliament now wiſely reſolved to allot a ſeparate income for the maintenance of the king's houſhold, and the ſupport of his dignity, which is now called the Civil Liſt, and to put the reſt of the public revenues entirely under the command of the parliament. It was alſo determined that theſe ſums ſhould be granted only from year to year, or at moſt for a very ſhort term. This was an expedient of the Whigs, who thought it the moſt effectual way to render the king dependent upon his parliament, and engage him to merit their affection and compliance, by every act of a juſt or popular adminiſtration. It muſt be confeſſed, that this appropriation of the revenue was of infinite advantage to the public, and the greateſt bulwark imaginable to the liberties of the people, who were now no longer under apprehenſion of ſeeing the aids they granted laviſhed at the will of their ſovereign, in articles of profuſion, or applied to the nefarious purpoſe of ſupporting armies, to wreſt from the generous donors their invaluable privileges *.

The civil liſt was now ſettled at ſix hundred thouſand pounds, chargeable with the appointments of the queen-dowager, the prince and princeſs of Denmark, the judges, and marechal duke Schomberg, to whom the parliament, as a reward

* The annual revenue, clear of all charges in the collection, at the time of king James II's abdication, was as follows:

1. Tonnage and poundage, with the wood-farm, coal-farm, and ſalt-farm	600,000
2. The hereditary and temporary exciſe, with the additional nine-pence for the year, ending June 24, 1689	666,383
3. Hearth-money	245,000
4. Poſt-office	65,000
5. Wine-licences	10,000
6. Impoſition on wine and vinegar, granted for eight years, ending June 24, 1693	172,901
7. The impoſition on tobacco and ſugar	148,861
8. The impoſition on French linen, brandy, and ſilk	93,710
9. The ſmall branches (which before the crown-lands were ſold, amounted to 130,000 l.)	60,000
Total neat revenue of the crown	2,061,855

Annual diſburſements for the public ſervices, during king James II's reign.

1. Maintenance of ſeamen, and proviſion of naval ſtores	300,000
2. Ordinary of the navy and ordnance	50,000
3. Guards and other diſciplined troops	200,000
4. Garriſons, contingencies, &c.	50,000
Total expence	600,000

This being deducted out of the whole revenue, there remained for the civil liſt 1,461,885 l. a ſum which rendered him independent of his parliament, enabled him to maintain a numerous army, and might have been ſufficient, had he conducted his ſcheme with common prudence, to effect his wicked deſign of enſlaving the nation. Hence appears the neceſſity of limiting the grant of the public revenue to a ſhort term, of appropriating certain ſums to particular purpoſes, and of ſubmitting the application of thoſe ſums to the inſpection and diſcuſſion of parliament. See Tindal's Contin. of Rapin.

for his eminent ſervices, had already granted one hundred thouſand pounds *. The commons alſo voted that one thouſand pounds ſhould be eſtabliſhed for the ſupport of the crown in the time of peace †.

The king was not a little piqued at the Whigs for this meaſure, which he conſidered as a mark of their diffidence, by which he was diſtinguiſhed from his predeceſſors, and thought it an ungrateful return for the ſervices he had done to the nation. An incident followed upon this, which contributed not a little to increaſe his jealouſy of that party. They introduced a bill into the houſe for regulating the militia in ſuch a manner as would have rendered it in a great meaſure independent of the king, and of the lieutenants of counties appointed by him. The bill however was thrown out by the peers, but the king deeply reſented the attempt. The Tories failed not to take the advantage of this diſpoſition in their ſovereign, and by the mouth of the earl of Nottingham, made his majeſty warm tenders of their ſervices; but took occaſion at the ſame time to inſinuate, that as they were in danger of being proſecuted for their meaſures during the late reign, they found their hands tied, and durſt not exert themſelves ſo vigorouſly as they could wiſh, and intended for the preſervation and dignity of the prerogatives of the crown, through the fear of calling down upon themſelves the reſentment of their avowed enemies. William ſwallowed the bait thus artfully thrown out for him; he reſolved to put theſe new friends in a condition to make head againſt the Whig party, from whom he began to think himſelf in danger of being enſlaved, or at beſt reduced only to the ſhadow of a monarch. Accordingly, he ſent a meſſage to the houſe by Mr. Hampden, expreſſing "his earneſt deſire that they would prepare a bill of indemnity, with ſuch exceptions only as to them ſhould ſeem neceſſary, for the vindication of public juſtice, the ſafety of him and his conſort, and the ſettlement and welfare of the nation." The two houſes thought fit to preſent an addreſs of thanks to his majeſty for this inſtance of his lenity and humanity. But the Whigs, who ſaw plainly that the Tories wanted to introduce themſelves again into the management of affairs, reſolved to baffle their deſign, and ſtill keep them in ſubjection. Accordingly, they threw ſo many obſtacles in the way of this bill during its dependence, that it could not be brought to a concluſion before the end of the ſeſſion ‡.

The next object which engroſſed the attention of the parliament, was an act for ſettling the ſucceſſion of the crown, agreeable to a former reſolution of the houſe, when only a convention. A bill for this purpoſe was brought into the houſe, with a clauſe diſabling papiſts from ſucceeding to the crown. When this bill was carried up to the lords, they added the words, "or ſuch as ſhould marry papiſts," abſolving the ſubject in that caſe from allegiance. At the ſame time the biſhop of Saliſbury (Burnet) by his majeſty's directions, moved that the princeſs Sophia, ducheſs of Hanover, and her poſterity, might be named next in the ſucceſſion, failing iſſue to the king and Anne princeſs of Denmark. The bill thus amended, was ſent down again to the commons, where it occaſioned great debates, the latter refuſing to aſſent to the lords proviſo. The Tories were remarkably ſtrenuous in their oppoſition, and, what may ſeem ſomewhat extraordinary, were joined by ſeveral who paſſed for Whigs, but who were, in ſecret, of republican principles, and hoped, that in caſe of the death of the king and queen, and the princeſs Anne, the monarchy of England might be eaſily extinguiſhed, and a commonwealth eſtabliſhed. The Tories were actuated by motives that would be impertinent to mention, from their obviouſneſs.

The king, who had greatly at heart the effectual ſettling the ſucceſſion in the proteſtant line, left no endeavours untried to induce the lower houſe to agree with the lords. He declared in council that the queen, and both the prince and princeſs of Denmark, wiſhed the ſucceſſion to be ſettled after the manner propoſed: but all his efforts for the preſent proved ineffectual, and the bill was dropped. Indeed it ſeemed to be in ſome manner rendered leſs neceſſary, by the delivery of the princeſs Anne, on the twenty-ſeventh day of July, of a ſon, who was chriſtened by the name of William, and was ſoon after created duke of Glouceſter. After this there were debates in the houſe of commons about ſettling a revenue on the princeſs Anne; it was propoſed that her income might be advanced from thirty thouſand pounds (which was what the king allowed her) to ſeventy thouſand pounds. The court ſeemed inclined to have this matter left to his majeſty's diſcretion; but the princeſs and her friends were for a fixed ſettlement, which was carried in the houſe; and this affair is thought to have been the occaſion of the difference between the queen and the princeſs her ſiſter, which continued till the death of the former ‖.

On the ſixteenth of December the king paſſed the bill of rights and ſucceſſion, agreeable to the declaration of rights when their majeſties accepted the crown, with the addition of a remarkable clauſe § for excluding papiſts, and perſons marrying papiſts, for ever from the crown of England.

William, who yielded to few princes in political abilities, and who was well acquainted with the genius of the people he had been called to govern, knew that the moſt effectual way to preſerve peace at home, was to find his ſubjects employment abroad. The great ſcheme which he had formed, when only Stadtholder, of a confederacy againſt France, began about this time to take effect. The princes of the empire aſſembled at the diet of Ratiſbon earneſtly importuned the emperor Leopold to declare war againſt the French king, who had in numberleſs inſtances broke the ſeveral treaties he had made with the German potentates, and had, without any provocation, invaded their countries, and ſhewn a ſettled deſign of making himſelf the maſter, or rather the tyrant, of all Chriſtendom. The States-General iſſued a declaration againſt Lewis as the common enemy, as did alſo the elector of Brandenburg; and the marquis de Caſtanaga, governor of the Spaniſh Netherlands, in anſwer to Lewis, who had declared war againſt his maſter the emperor, entered into an alliance offenſive and defenſive with the States-general, binding the contracting parties to co-operate with their whole powers againſt France and her allies. William, who was ſtrongly preſſed to join this confederacy in the quality of king of England, and who wiſhed for nothing more heartily, found no great difficulty in perſuading the Engliſh to unſheath the ſword againſt their old enemies and rivals; and after the proper ſteps taken for that purpoſe by both houſes, who joined in a dutiful addreſs to his majeſty, deſiring him to take ſuch meaſures as would be ſufficient to reduce the French king to ſuch a condition, that it ſhould not be in his power to violate the peace of Chriſtendom, nor prejudice the trade and proſperity of England; and aſſuring his majeſty, that he might depend on the aſſiſtance of his parliament therein; the king, on the ſeventh of May this year (1689) declared war againſt the French monarch. This declaration was drawn up by the maſterly pen of Somers, afterwards lord-chancellor. Lewis is therein charged "with having unjuſtly invaded the territories of the emperor, and denounced war againſt the allies of England, in violation of the treaties concluded under the guaranty of the Engliſh crown; of having encroached upon the fiſhery of Newfoundland, invaded the Caribbee iſlands, forcibly ſeized the province of New-York and Hudſon's-bay, countenanced the ſeizure of Engliſh ſhips by French privateers, prohibited the importation of Engliſh manufactures, diſputed the right of the flag, perſecuted many Engliſh ſubjects on pretence of religion, contrary to expreſs treaties and the law of nations, and ſent an armament to Ireland, in ſupport of the rebels in that kingdom."

§ It may not be amiſs to tranſcribe this clauſe for the information of the reader. It enacts, "That the kings and queens of England ſhould be obliged, at their coming to the crown, to take the teſt in the firſt parliament that ſhould be called at the beginning of their reign; and that if any king or queen of England ſhould embrace the Roman catholic religion, or marry with a Roman catholic prince or princeſs, their ſubjects ſhould be abſolved of their allegiance, and that the crown and government of theſe realms ſhould from time to time deſcend to, and be enjoyed by ſuch perſons, being proteſtants, as ſhould have inherited the ſame, in caſe the ſaid perſons ſo reconciled to the church of Rome, or marrying a papiſt as aforeſaid, were naturally dead."

Having thus deſcribed the progreſs of the revolution in England, I ſhall now briefly relate the ſteps taken in Scotland, in conſequence of this intereſting event. When we reflect upon the miſerable ſtate under which the Scots had groaned during the two laſt reigns, it will afford no matter of ſurprize to ſee that people eagerly concurring in the meaſures of their ſiſter nation to throw off the yoke of tyranny and ſuperſtition, and exerting all their efforts towards the eſtabliſhment of William on the throne of their kingdom.

William, on his being acknowleged king of England, had written a letter to the eſtates of Scotland ſuitable to the ſubject; in conſequence of which they aſſembled in convention on the fourteenth day of March, 1689, and ſpeedily agreed in voting, "That king James VII. * by having aſſumed an arbitrary and deſpotic power, and exerciſing it to the ſubverſion of the proteſtant religion, and the laws and liberties of the nation, had forfeited the right of the crown (of Scotland) and the throne was become vacant." This vote was inſtantly paſſed into a law, by the title of An Act for ſettling the Crown of Scotland upon the King and Queen of England; purſuant to which their majeſties were ſolemnly proclaimed king and queen of Scotland, on the eleventh day of April, the day of their coronation in England †.

Soon after the earl of Argyle, and three other members of the convention, were ſent as commiſſioners from the Scottiſh nation, to make a ſolemn tender of the crown of that realm, which was done on May 11, their majeſties being ſeated on a throne under a rich canopy, in the Banqueting-houſe, Whitehall. In the mean time, the eſtates publiſhed a proclamation, "forbidding all perſons to acknowlege, obey, aſſiſt, or correſpond with the late king James; or by word, writing, or ſermon, to diſpute or diſown the royal authority of king William and queen Mary, or to miſconſtrue the proceedings of the eſtates, with regard to the tranſactions of the government, on pain of the ſevereſt penalties." Then having ſettled other matters, they appointed a committee to take care of the public peace, and adjourned for a ſhort time.

It muſt be obſerved, that the Scottiſh biſhops had publiſhed an abhorrence of the prince of Orange's expedition; and the epiſcopal party in general in that kingdom, who had been mere creatures of the court, and violent oppoſers of the preſbyterian faction, adhered firmly to king James: but immediately on the ſucceſs of William, and his declaration in favour of Scotland, the preſbyterians had begun to lift up their heads, and to inſult their late perſecutors in their turn: and now the meeting of the eſtates was, by a commiſſion from their majeſties to the duke of Hamilton, as preſident, turned into a parliament, whoſe firſt ſtep was to aboliſh prelacy once more, as contrary to the inclinations of the generality of the people, to which the king aſſented: but ſeveral violent diſputes ariſing in the Scottiſh parliament (which more properly belong to the hiſtory of that country than the preſent work) their church was left without any ſettled form of government; for though hierarchy was aboliſhed, the preſbyterian diſcipline was not yet eſtabliſhed, and eccleſiaſtical affairs were occaſionally regulated by the privy-council, which, by a ſtrange contradiction, acted in virtue of the act of ſupremacy, which, according to the claim of rights, was thought to have been repealed ‡.

It muſt not be underſtood, however, as if the Revolution took place in Scotland without any oppoſition. The duke of Gordon maintained the caſtle of Edinburgh for his old maſter; but as he had neglected to lay in a proper ſtore of proviſions, he depended entirely on the citizens for ſubſiſtence. The partizans of James were headed by the earl of Balcarras, and Graham viſcount of Dundee, a brave and gallant officer, who aſſembled a body of Highlanders, and declared for the expelled monarch. Theſe efforts however proved ſhort-lived and unſucceſsful. The duke of Gordon, after ſuſtaining a vigorous ſiege from the citizens of Edinburgh, and the troops in the intereſt of king William, was obliged to ſurrender the caſtle of Edinburgh on the thirteenth of June, upon condition that he and the garriſon ſhould have their lives, liberties, and fortunes ſecured. The lord Dundee, after having been a ſhort time in arms, was defeated by lieutenant-general Mackay, who commanded their majeſties forces in Scotland, in an engagement at Killicranky, ſome few miles above Dunkeld, and loſt his life by a random ſhot. His death put an end to the whole enterprize; and the whole iſland of Great Britain was, before the end of this ſummer, reduced to the obedience of its new ſovereign, and ſubmitted to his government. Diſmiſſing therefore the affairs of Scotland, let us next take a ſhort view of what paſſed in Ireland, which will naturally induce a relation of the proceedings of the unfortunate James, after his abdication.

Ireland was far from following the example of Scotland; and it was more than two years before that kingdom was entirely reduced to obedience. The earl of Tyrconnel, inviolably attached, both by gratitude and a parity of religious ſentiments, to the prince to whom he was indebted for his dignity and fortune, exerted himſelf in the moſt indefatigable manner for his ſervice. From the firſt news of James's flight from England, he had ſecured the moſt important places in the kingdom, of which he had the government; and joining his natural hatred of the proteſtants to what he thought motives of policy and prudence, he had treated them in ſo rigorous a manner, that they were forced to retire to their brethren in the north, who ſeizing on Kilmore, Coleraine, Inniſkilling, and Londonderry, declared for William and Mary. Tyrconnel, finding the ill effects of his cruelty, thought proper to temporize with king William; and ſeveral letters were, by his knowlege and procurement, ſent over to the Engliſh court, giving aſſurances that the earl was inclinable to treat and ſubmit.

In the mean time, however, he ceaſed not to ſollicit James by letter, in the moſt earneſt manner, to tranſport himſelf over to Ireland with a powerful body of troops, aſſuring him that ſuch a ſtep would effectually ſecure his intereſts in that kingdom, whereas a neglect or delay in following this advice muſt utterly ruin his affairs. James, on receiving theſe notices from his lieutenant, imparted them to his good friend Lewis, and preſſed him for his aſſiſtance. Neither Lewis nor his miniſters had any great opinion of the ſucceſs of this expedition; but as his honour was concerned in ſupporting his unfortunate gueſt, it was reſolved to furniſh him with five thouſand forces, under the command of M. de Lauſun, who were embarked in the fleet then lying at Breſt, conſiſting of fourteen ſhips of the line, ſix frigates, three fire-ſhips, and a proper number of tranſports. Lewis likewiſe ſupplied him with arms for forty thouſand men more upon his arrival in Ireland, preſented him with a large ſum of money, ſuperb equipages, ſtore of plate, and every thing neceſſary for the camp and houſhold. At parting, he embraced him with great affection, making uſe of this remarkable expreſſion: "Farewel, brother; the beſt thing I can wiſh you is, that I may never ſee you again."

Every neceſſary preparation being completed, James ſet ſail from Breſt on the fourteenth of March, 1689, attended by the count d'Avaux, in quality of ambaſſador, and ſeveral other perſons of diſtinction, as well Engliſh as French. On the twenty-ſecond of the ſame month he arrived at Kinſale in Ireland, from whence he repaired in a few days to Cork, where he was received by the earl of Tyrconnel, who had collected an army of thirty thouſand foot and eight thouſand horſe for his ſervice. James now acted with as little prudence and precaution as if he had no oppoſition to encounter, or as if, becauſe he had landed in Ireland, he was abſolute maſter of all the reſt of his dominions. So far was he from keeping well with, or endeavouring to conciliate the affections of the proteſtants, which in common reaſon and policy he ought to have done, that he gave continual proofs of his averſion to their ſect, and frequently puniſhed them with death on the moſt trifling occaſions. One of the magiſtrates of Cork was executed by his orders, for having declared for the prince of Orange. In fine, inſtead of ſeeking to win over his adverſaries by mildneſs and popularity, he only exaſperated them more deeply by his cruelty and arrogance; and thus by his own conduct effectually ruined his affairs, at the very time he flattered himſelf with their being in the moſt proſperous ſituation.

From Cork James marched to Dublin; into which city he made a triumphal entry, being met at the caſtle-gate by a proceſſion of popiſh biſhops and prieſts in their pontificals, bearing the hoſt, before which he kneeled down in public. Having aſſembled a council, he diſmiſſed the earl of Granard, the lord chief-juſtice Keating, and other proteſtants, who had adviſed Tyrconnel to acknowlege the new government, and in their room placed Cartwright biſhop of Cheſter, lieutenant-colonel Dorrington, and count d'Avaux the French ambaſſador, and by degrees all the principal papiſts who had attended him in the expedition. He publiſhed indeed ſome proclamations, promiſing protection to all his proteſtant ſubjects who ſhould preſerve their loyalty: but theſe had ſo little faith in his promiſes, that they univerſally reſolved to ſtand on their defence. Another proclamation was iſſued by James for the meeting of the parliament on the ſeventh day of May at Dublin: at the ſame time, he created Tyrconnel a duke, and beſtowed the royal regiment on Dorrington, in the room of the duke of Ormond.

The diſpoſition which the proteſtant natives of Ireland ſhewed to oppoſe the progreſs of James, who, after ſome reſiſtance, made himſelf maſter of Coleraine and Kilmore, made him reſolve to uſe thoſe in his power with redoubled ſeverity; in which he was warmly ſeconded by the duke of Tyrconnel, who ſeemed to have a more than ſavage thirſt after the blood of thoſe poor wretches; numbers of whom, terrified with this uſage, and alarmed by the report of a general maſſacre, intended to be perpetrated on all of their faith on a certain day ſaid to be already fixed, ſhut themſelves up in Londonderry, the capital of the county of the ſame name, in the north of Ireland, and ſent over to the government of England, imploring immediate aſſiſtance. They were accordingly ſupplied with ſome arms and ammunition, but did not receive any conſiderable reinforcements till the middle of April, when two regiments arrived in Loughfoyle, under the command of the colonels Cunningham and Richards. By this time James was come almoſt in ſight of the town, with an army of about twenty thouſand men, reſolved to force the rebels, as he called them, out of their ſtrong hold; but he met with an oppoſition he little dreamt of, and which was chiefly owing to the reſolution and bravery of one man, a proteſtant clergyman of Donaghmore, who had raiſed a regiment for the defence of himſelf and brethren. This man gave Lundy, the governor of Londonderry, notice of the approach of James; upon which Lundy ſummoned a council of war, at which Cunningham and Richards, the two commanders lately arrived from England, aſſiſted; and they, either from diſaffection to the ſervice they were ſent upon, or ignorance of the condition of the town, or the diſpoſition of the inhabitants, came to a reſolution that the place was not tenable; that it would be imprudent to land the regiments; and that the principal officers ſhould retire from the town, the inhabitants of which would receive the more favourable conditions on account of their departure. They next diſpatched a letter to James, with propoſals of a negotiation; and lieutenant-general Hamilton, who commanded in that prince's ſervice, undertook that the army ſhould not, during the time of the treaty, advance within four miles of the city. Mr. Walker, the clergyman already mentioned, had in vain uſed all his rhetoric to perſuade the governor to take the field, and come to a general engagement. He was deaf to all his arguments, and liſtened only to his own puſillanimous apprehenſions, which were greatly heightened when he found that James, diſregarding the promiſe that his general had made, was advancing at the head of his troops to the wall of the town. The inhabitants and ſoldiery in the place were ſo exaſperated at the cowardice of their governor and the two colonels, that they flew to arms, and would have made their lives pay the forfeit of their perfidy, had not the former kept himſelf concealed in his chamber, and the other two found means to make their eſcape on board their ſhips. In the mean time, however, major Baker, the deputy-governor, fired ſo warmly from the garriſon upon James and his troops, that the latter were obliged to retreat to St. John's town in ſome diſorder. Walker and Baker made uſe of this reſpite to preſs Lundy to exert himſelf as became a loyal ſubject and a good ſoldier, and to undertake the defence of the place: but ſuch was the governor's cowardice or treachery, that he abſolutely refuſed to have any thing to do with the government, and ſoon after made his eſcape in diſguiſe. He was afterwards ſeized in Scotland, from whence he was brought to London to anſwer for his conduct, together with Cunningham and Richards, and were all three diſmiſſed from the ſervice: too ſlight a puniſhment for their treachery!

After their departure, or rather deſertion, from the town, the inhabitants with one conſent beſtowed the government of the place on Mr. Walker and major Baker, who immediately prepared for a vigorous defence, determined to bury themſelves beneath the ruins of the place rather than ſurrender it to the enemy, in caſe the aſſiſtance they hoped from England ſhould fail them. They formed the townſmen, amounting in all to ſeven thouſand men, into different regiments: they taught them the proper management of arms, the firing of cannon, and all the other manœuvres requiſite for their own defence, or the annoyance of the enemy.

On the twentieth of April the trenches were opened by king James's army, whoſe batteries began to play upon the town, which in itſelf was but poorly fortified, having not above twenty pieces of cannon, and thoſe wretchedly mounted. Nevertheleſs the beſieged, animated by the example and ſpirited harangues of Mr. Walker in particular, held out with ſurpriſing reſolution, againſt ſo much ſuperior a force employed to reduce them. King James having returned to Dublin, to be preſent at the opening of the parliament he had convened, left the command of the army to the marquis de Roſene, the French general, a man of a more than ſavage haughtineſs and cruelty of diſpoſition. Incenſed at the oppoſition he had met with from an handful of half-ſtarved peaſants, as he ſtiled them in contempt, he vented his rage in the moſt unmanly manner; and ſent to acquaint the beſieged, that unleſs they inſtantly ſubmitted themſelves to their lawful ſovereign, he would not leave one ſtone upon another in the town, nor even an infant alive to carry the news of their deſtruction. True courage always bears with contempt the empty bluſterings of arrogance and vanity: the governors and the garriſon anſwered his threats only by redoubling their noble reſiſtance, though their proviſions were now all expended, and they were reduced to the dreadful neceſſity of ſupporting life by eating the fleſh of horſes, dogs, cats, rats, mice, ſalted hides, and every other kind of moſt loathſome food; yet they kept up their courage, and a proclamation was publiſhed, that no perſon, under pain of death, ſhould talk of ſurrendering.

The French general, finding that his menaces had no effect on them, bethought himſelf of a ſcheme to enforce their compliance, that ſeemed rather the conception of an infernal fiend than of one inveſted with the character of a man. He ſent detachments of his ſoldiers throughout the adjacent country, with orders to ſeize on all the proteſtants they could find, without diſtinction of age or ſex, to ſtrip them naked, and drive them in that condition under the walls of Londonderry. This order was executed with a brutality equal to that of the giver of it: upwards of four thouſand of theſe miſerable objects were thus expoſed naked to the view of the beſieged, who from their ramparts beheld, with an horror not to be deſcribed, the forlorn ſituation of their miſerable fellow-proteſtants, many of whom were expiring every moment with fatigue, cold, hunger, and the ill uſage they had ſuſtained from their bloody perſecutors. This ſight however had a very different effect upon the garriſon to what Roſene had hoped: they felt deep compaſſion for the diſtreſſes of their brethren; but this compaſſion was mingled with ſuch an indignation againſt the authors of this inhumanity, ſuch an apprehenſion of what would be their own fate, if they ſhould fall within his power, that they reſolved to periſh rather than ſubmit to the barbarian. Thinking themſelves no longer bound to obſerve the nicer rules of war, which had been ſo flagitiouſly violated by the foe, they erected a gibbet on their walls, and ſent to acquaint the French general, that unleſs he immediately ſet at liberty the proteſtants whom he had driven under their walls, they would hang all the priſoners they had taken in their ſallies during the ſiege. Roſene, convinced by the whole of their behaviour that they would not fail to make good their threats, ordered the proteſtants to be releaſed, after they had been detained three days without taſting food. Numbers of them died of famine and fatigue in their return to their habitations; and thoſe who ſurvived had the additional misfortune to find their houſes and effects moſtly plundered and deſtroyed by the roving parties about the country, ſo that the greater part of thoſe unfortunate people fell victims to the bloody malice of the popiſh foe. It is aſſerted that James was applied to by the biſhop of Meath to countermand this order given by Roſene, but without effect. Such, and others that we ſhall hereafter ſee, were the expedients that infatuated prince made uſe of to regain the affection of his old ſubjects.

The garriſon of Londonderry was now reduced from ſeven thouſand men to five thouſand ſeven hundred; and theſe were driven to ſuch extremity of diſtreſs, that they began to talk of preying upon each other. At length, however, they received the wiſhed-for ſuccour: major-general Kirk, the ſame who made himſelf ſo infamous under the late reign, and who had abandoned his former maſter to be employed in the ſervice of king William, arrived in the Lough with a reinforcement of nine thouſand men; and being ordered to relieve the garriſon at all events, he ſent three ſhips up the river laden with proviſions, under protection of the Dartmouth frigate. The enemy, to prevent any ſhips from ſailing up to the town, had erected ſtrong batteries on both ſides the ſtream, and had thrown a ſtrong boom acroſs its channel: one of the ſhips, however, taking advantage of a ſtrong gale of wind in her favour, advanced with full ſail, broke the enemy's boom; and with them the other veſſels anchored in ſafety off the town, after having paſſed a moſt ſevere fire from the enemy's batteries.

Inexpreſſible was the joy of the beſieged on this occaſion, and as great the diſcouragement of James's army, who now deſpairing of their ſucceeding in their enterprize, abandoned the ſiege that very night (the thirty-firſt of July) and retired with the utmoſt precipitation, after having loſt about nine thouſand men in this fruitleſs attempt. Kirk next took poſſeſſion of the town, when Walker was perſuaded by the inhabitants to paſs over to England with an addreſs of thanks to their majeſties for their generous ſuccour. He was received by the king and queen with that honour and reſpect which was ſo juſtly due to his diſtinguiſhed valour *.

Inniſkilling, another town in the north of Ireland, ſignalized itſelf no leſs than Londonderry in the proteſtant cauſe: for, upon notice that this latter had denied entrance to the Iriſh troops in James's ſervice, they reſolved not to admit any garriſon of his party; and having raiſed a regiment of twelve companies, they ſhut their gates, and gave the command of their town to Guſtavus Hamilton, a proteſtant officer of approved courage and conduct; after which they proclaimed king William and queen Mary: and the lord Gilmoy, who had declared for James, and came with a ſtrong force to ſummon them to ſurrender, was, by the noble reſiſtance they made, obliged to quit the ſiege of the place, which he had formed: nor was this all: for the day before Londonderry was relieved, the brave Inniſkilliners advanced with their handful of forces againſt ſix thouſand Iriſh, whom they defeated at a place called Newton-Butler, killing and drowning near three thouſand, with the loſs of only about twenty killed, and fifty wounded, on their ſide †.

The Iriſh parliament having met at Dublin on the day appointed by king James's proclamation, that monarch opened it by a ſpeech from the throne, in which he cordially thanked them for their zeal and loyalty; laviſhed the higheſt encomiums on the humanity and generoſity of his good brother and ally the king of France, manifeſted towards himſelf, his queen, and his ſon, in affording them an aſylum, after being expelled their lawful dominions, and having now enabled him to viſit that part of them in perſon; declared his fixed reſolve to eſtabliſh liberty of conſcience, as the only certain method of ſecuring the welfare and happineſs of his people, of all denominations, whoſe common parent, he ſaid, he conſidered himſelf to be; and concluded with aſſuring both houſes of his hearty concurrence with them, in enacting ſuch laws as might tend to the tranquillity and good ſettlement of the kingdom.

It may eaſily be conjectured what a kind of parliament this was, and what the nature of its tranſactions was likely to be. Every method had been uſed to fill the houſe of lords with popiſh peers, ſo that there were only four or five proteſtants of the temporal, and four of the ſpiritual lords among them: and the houſe of commons was ſo modelled, that there was hardly a member who deſerved the name of proteſtant. The reader therefore will not be ſurprized to find the parliament openly profeſſing itſelf a ſlave to the king's will, ſince that man was ſure to be looked on as factious, or rebelliouſly inclined, who ſhould dare to move any thing, after any favourite in the houſe had affirmed that it was contrary to the king's pleaſure. Accordingly, James had no ſooner left the houſe, than the commons came to a reſolution to preſent an addreſs of thanks to his majeſty, and that the count d'Avaux ſhould be deſired to offer their grateful acknowlegements to the moſt Chriſtian king, for the friendly aſſiſtance he had given to their ſovereign. A bill was next introduced to recognize James's title, and to expreſs their abhorrence of the prince of Orange's uſurpation, as well as of the diſloyalty and treaſonable conduct of the Engliſh.

Next day, May 10, James publiſhed a declaration, addreſſed to all his loving ſubjects in his kingdom of England. He there complained of the many falſe and invidious reports which had been raiſed againſt his perſon and government; inſiſted on his own impartiality in preferring his proteſtant ſubjects to places of truſt and profit; his care in protecting them from their enemies, in redreſſing their grievances, and indulging them with liberty of conſcience; promiſing that he would take no ſtep without the conſent and concurrence of parliament; offering a free and full pardon to all perſons who ſhould abandon his enemies, and join him in twenty-four days after his landing in Ireland; and charging all the blood that might be ſpilt, upon thoſe who ſhould continue to perſevere in rebellion.

But ſcarce was the ink dry on this paper, when James gave the world a convincing proof of the degree of dependence to be placed on his promiſes and aſſurances, however ſolemnly urged; for two days only after the publiſhing of this declaration, a bill was brought into the houſe of commons by Nugent, lord chief-juſtice of the King's-bench in Ireland, for repealing the act of ſettlement, which went through three readings, without the leaſt oppoſition from the houſe. By this bill two thirds of the proteſtants of the kingdom, who held their eſtates by virtue of the aforeſaid act *, were diſpoſſeſſed of them, and turned out to want and miſery, while papiſts were put into the enjoyment of their fortunes. In the upper houſe this bill met with ſome oppoſition, eſpecially from the biſhop of Meath, who, in a moſt pathetic and eloquent ſpeech, expoſed the abſurdity and injuſtice of it; and endeavoured to ſhew, that it was neither to the advantage of the king nor the public; that it tended not only to ruin the kingdom, and deſtroy the public faith, but was both impolitic and inconvenient in point of time. Such was the ſpirit of this parliament, however, and ſo determined did it appear to ruin the proteſtants in the moſt effectual manner, that the bill paſſed into a law, which received the royal aſſent.

Yet, as if all theſe meaſures were not ſufficient to convince James's proteſtant ſubjects of the lenity and juſtice they were to expect from him, if he ſhould be reſtored by their joint endeavours to the ſovereign ſway, an act of attainder was paſſed this ſeſſion againſt all perſons of that perſuaſion, of what ſex or degree ſoever, who were abſent from the kingdom, as well as againſt thoſe who entered into any part of the three kingdoms which did not own the authority of king James; or who held correſpondence with the rebels, as king William's friends were all termed; or who were anywiſe aiding or aſſiſting to them, from the firſt day of Auguſt in the preceding year. No leſs than three thouſand proteſtants were attainted by name in this act; among whom were two archbiſhops, one duke, ſeventeen earls, ſeven counteſſes, as many biſhops, eighteen barons, thirty-three baronets, fifty-one knights, and eighty-three clergymen; all of whom were declared puniſhable by death and forfeiture: a bloody proſcription, which has not its parallel in the records of the moſt tyrannic governments; eſpecially if we conſider that the proſcribed were all excluded from the hope of pardon, and all benefit of appeal, unleſs enrolled by the king's order before the firſt day of December next following. By another act, the parliament of Ireland was declared independent of that of England.

It would be endleſs to enumerate the many other inſtances of James's fooliſh, tyrannical, and impolitic conduct, during his abode in Ireland. We ſhall therefore turn our eyes from this unpleaſing ſcene, and attend to the meaſures taken by William and the Engliſh government to oppoſe the deſigns of his competitor, to reduce his Iriſh dominions to due ſubjection, and relieve his ſuffering proteſtant ſubjects there.

King William being informed of the landing of James, as alſo that the fleet which brought him over being returned to France was to be replaced by another ſtrong ſquadron, commanded by admiral Chateau Renaud, as a convoy to ſome tranſports laden with arms, ammunition, &c. detached admiral Herbert from Spithead with twelve ſhips of the line, one fire-ſhip, and four tenders, in order to intercept the enemy. The Engliſh admiral having been driven about for ſome time by hard and contrary gales of wind, at length got upon the Iriſh coaſt; and on the firſt of May diſcovered the French fleet; conſiſting of no leſs than twenty eight ſhips of the line, moſt of them from ſixty to ſeventy guns; and five fire ſhips, lying in Bantry-bay, who immediately, upon deſcrying him, weighed anchor, and ſailed out of the harbour to give him battle, fluſhed with their ſuperior force and the advantage of the wind over our fleet. Admiral Herbert having tried for ſome time, without ſucceſs, to get the weather-gage † of the French, and finding it impoſſible, did not chuſe to run the hazard of fighting under ſo great a diſadvantage: he therefore ſtood off to ſea, and for ſome time maintained a running fight, when, evening beginning to approach, Chateau Renaud tacked about, and returned to the Bay. The French, according to their uſual cuſtom, repreſented this paltry ſkirmiſh as a ſignal victory, though with all their ſuperiority and ſtrength they neither took nor ſunk a ſingle veſſel. It is ſo ſeldom indeed that they have had the leaſt ſhadow of advantage over us at ſea, that we may forgive them this piece of vanity. King William was ſo ſatisfied with Herbert's conduct on this occaſion, that when the latter returned to Portſmouth, his majeſty, in an excurſion he made thither, to haſten the naval preparations then carrying on in that port, dined on board the admiral's ſhip the Elizabeth, and declared his intention to create him an earl in conſideration of his ſervices: at the ſame time he conferred the honour of knighthood on captain Cloudeſly Shovel, and another ſea-officer who had ſerved in this expedition, and beſtowed a gratuity of ten ſhillings per man on every private ſailor.

By ſome unaccountable delay, ariſing either from the diſputes among the miniſters, or the neglect of thoſe who had the management of military affairs, James had been ſix months in Ireland before the army was embarked for that kingdom. At length, eighteen regiments of foot, and five of dragoons, being ready for that ſervice, with a ſuitable train of artillery, the king was pleaſed to appoint marechal (now duke of) Schomberg to the chief command, who on the thirteenth of Auguſt landed in the neighbourhood of Carrickfergus, with about ten thouſand foot and dragoons, and took poſſeſſion of Belfaſt, from whence the enemy retired at his approach to Carrickfergus, where they reſolved to make a ſtand; but the duke advancing with intrepidity, made himſelf maſter of Carrickfergus in four days. This was followed by other ſucceſſes: Newry, Dundalk, and other places, yielded to his ſummons; and he would have made a much greater progreſs had he not met with diſappointments from delays in tranſporting part of his forces and train of artillery that he had left behind him in England, which were owing to negligence, or ſomething worſe, in the perſons who had the management of affairs at home, or the ſlowneſs in raiſing ſupplies. King James having aſſembled all his forces, advanced towards Schomberg, who lay near Drogheda, and on the twenty-third of September approached within two miles of his intrenchments; but the duke, finding his army every day diminiſhing through ſickneſs, which had ſwept off many brave officers, as well as a great number of ſoldiers, while the enemy, who outnumbered him almoſt two to one, were in perfect health, and their troops much better diſciplined than his, prudently declined an engagement; and James on his ſide, not caring to attack the duke in his intrenchments, drew off his army. Schomberg was greatly cenſured by ſome perſons for this inactivity of his, as they termed it; but, all circumſtances conſidered, he ſeems to have acted according to the dictates of ſound policy: the loſs of a battle at that juncture might have been followed with the loſs of all Ireland. Winter approaching, both armies went into quarters.

* During the Iriſh rebellion in 1641, many eſtates had been granted to proteſtants, upon condition of their giving aſſiſtance towards the ſuppreſſion of that inſurrection; and it was chiefly owing to the vigorous efforts of thoſe adventurers, that the rebellion was at laſt ſuppreſſed. At the ſame time as all the rebels were deprived of their lands, ſome of them were ſold by the crown to proteſtants at very reaſonable, and ſometimes at very high, rates. Soon after a bill was paſſed in the Engliſh parliament, entitled, The Act of Settlement, ſecuring the proteſtants in the poſſeſſion of the eſtates which they had thus acquired, and their right to which was univerſally held to be good and valid.

Our ſea affairs were attended with as little ſucceſs as thoſe by land, owing to the ſame cauſes. Admiral Herbert, now created earl of Torrington, having again ſailed for Ireland, at the head of the combined fleets of England and Holland, made an attempt to ſurprize the city of Cork; but upon a falſe intelligence, that James with his whole army was in the neighbourhood, he did not dare to land his men; and, after ſome ſhort ſtay upon the coaſt, returned to England, and put into Torbay, his men being for the moſt part diſabled by ſickneſs. There was the greateſt reaſon to aſcribe this misfortune to the villainy of thoſe who had the victualling of the navy, for the Dutch ſeamen were in perfect health during the whole cruize. The French, though they no longer dared to ſend out a fleet, did infinite damage to our trade by means of their privateers, which ſwarmed in the Channel: the Dartmouth ſhip of war had the misfortune to fall into their hands. This appearance of ſupineneſs in our government gave great diſguſt to the nation, and occaſioned ſome ſtrict enquiries, as will be ſeen in the account of parliamentary affairs, to which we ſhall now proceed.

To ſhew the ſenſe of the nation concerning ſome of the ſanguinary and arbitrary proceedings in the late reigns, the attainders of ſeveral perſons who had ſuffered capital puniſhments, were, by acts of parliament, at ſeveral times, annulled and made void; as thoſe of William lord Ruſſel, Algernon Sidney, eſq; the lady Liſle, and alderman Corniſh. The judgment againſt Mr. Samuel Johnſon, chaplain to lord Ruſſel, was reverſed; and tho' there were very long and great debates about Titus Oates, whoſe evidence in general, concerning the popiſh plot, was held to be ſatisfactory only in ſome particulars relating to time and place; yet the parliament addreſſed the king to take off the remaining part of his puniſhment, namely, his impriſonment for life, and annual pillorying, which his majeſty readily complied with, and moreover allowed him an annual penſion. The judgment upon the Quo Warranto againſt the city of London was alſo reverſed, and the city reſtored to its privileges; and an act of oblivion at length paſſed, out of which were excepted ſome few of the many late inſtruments of popery and arbitrary power. The earl of Sunderland was excepted only for form's ſake, he having, by ſhifting ſides, in time obtained king William's favour *.

As the illegal proceedings of the two laſt reigns and their authors were enquired into, ſo the miſcarriages of the preſent were alſo diſcuſſed. The lords having addreſſed the king to put the Iſle of Wight, Jerſey, Guernſey, Scilly, Dover Caſtle, and the other fortreſſes of the kingdom, into a proper poſture of defence, and to diſarm the papiſts, began to make enquiry into the cauſe of the miſcarriages in Ireland; in the courſe of which enquiry great blame was imputed to the marquis of Caermarthen (late earl of Danby) and the marquis of Halifax †: it was even moved to addreſs his majeſty againſt the latter of thoſe miniſters, but a negative was put to the motion by a ſmall majority. In fine, an alarming ſpirit of rancour and diſcord began to ſhew itſelf between the two parties of Whigs and Tories, which might have been attended with diſagreeable conſequences, had not ſome of the warmeſt on each ſide ſuddenly cooled in the courſe of the diſpute.

A bill being introduced into the houſe of lords for enjoining the wearing the woollen manufacture of this kingdom at certain times of the year, the ſilk-weavers of London and Canterbury aſſembled in a tumultuous manner at Weſtminſter, to oppoſe the paſſing the ſaid bill. The lords refuſed to read their petition againſt it, on account of the manner in which it was delivered; and proper meaſures being at the ſame time taken to guard againſt the conſequences of their inſolence, the weavers returned home. The bill, however, was rejected by the lords by a very great majority. A bill was brought in for attainting ſeveral perſons in rebellion againſt their majeſties; but it was not finiſhed this ſeſſion. One of the laſt acts of this ſeſſion was that for raiſing the ſum of 600,000l. for the Dutch. The king, thinking it highly reaſonable that the States ſhould be repaid as ſoon as poſſible what they had laid out to further his expedition, and aſſiſt him in preſerving the religion and liberties of England, took all occaſions to put the commons in mind of it: an account of the charges were accordingly taken, and the above ſum voted for that purpoſe; but it was not till the cloſe of this ſeſſion that a fund was ſettled for raiſing the money. This and ſome other acts, of which the reader will find an account in the notes, having received the royal aſſent on the 21ſt of Auguſt, the two houſes were adjourned to the 20th of September, and afterwards to the 19th of October.

King William having acceded to the grand alliance, did in Auguſt this year conclude a new league with the ſtates-general, in which former treaties of peace and commerce were confirmed. It was agreed, that in caſe the king of Great-Britain ſhould be attacked, the Dutch ſhould aſſiſt him with 6000 infantry and twenty ſhips of war; and if the territories of the ſtate ſhould be invaded, England ſhould ſupply them with 10,000 infantry and twenty ſhips of war. About the ſame time the king entered into an alliance with Chriſtian V. king of Denmark, by virtue of which the Engliſh army in Ireland under D. Schomberg were this winter reinforced by 7000 Daniſh auxiliaries, viz. 6000 foot and 1000 horſe. Notwithſtanding theſe confederacies againſt him, Lewis XIV. abated nought in the proſecution of his ambitious deſigns: he had ſuddenly fallen upon Germany, and made himſelf almoſt entire maſter of the three eccleſiaſtical electorates: he had reduced Mentz, Triers, Bonne, Keiſerſwaert, Philipſburgh, and Landau; deſtroyed Manheim by fire and ſword, and made the Palatinate a deſart. His generals had burnt the cities of Worms and Spires, and demoliſhed Frankendahl; but his ſucceſſes were ſomewhat checked by this year's campaign in Flanders. The marſhal d'Humieres commanded an army of French there amounting to 80,000 men, whilſt the prince of Waldeck, with a body of 60,000 men, had fixed his rendezvous in the county of Liege. The lord Churchill, lately created earl of Marlborough, had been ſent over with 10,000 Britiſh auxiliaries to join the Dutch army, which he effected. The two armies paſſed the ſummer without any remarkable action till the middle of Auguſt, when the city of Liege renounced the neutrality it had aſſumed, declared for the allies, and put into their hands a large convoy of military ſtores and money belonging to the enemy. Soon after marſhal d'Humieres, thinking to ſurprize a party of Dutch horſe, who were gone out to forage, made a motion with his whole army for that purpoſe. Prince Waldeck, having notice of this, made the proper diſpoſitions for ſupporting his men; each ſide advancing, a ſharp engagement enſued, in which the French, after an obſtinate reſiſtance, were put to the rout with the loſs of 2000 men and ſeveral pieces of artillery. Mean while a little army of obſervation, commanded by the prince de Vaudemont, levelled part of the French lines on the ſide of Cambray, and raiſed contributions in the territories of France. This was all that paſſed worthy notice in Flanders during this campaign.

The arms of the allies were much more ſucceſsful in Germany. The French had covered their conqueſts on this ſide with a numerous army under marſhal duke de Duras, aſſiſted by ſome of the ableſt generals and officers in the ſervice of France; but the marſhal could with difficulty ſtand his ground; the different princes of the empire, united by one common intereſt, and burning with indignation at the cruelties the French had committed in their territories, were determined to leave nothing undone to expel the inhuman invader, and revenge the ſufferings of their people on his head. The duke of Bavaria brought an army of 50,000 men into the field; the elector of Saxony appeared at the head of another of 40,000; and a third of 51,000 was formed under the elector of Brandenbourg. The duke of Lorrain, at the head of the imperial troops, laid ſiege to Mentz, which was defended by the marſhal d'Uxelles, who, after having held out for two months, ſurrendered the place on capitulation. The French, by their own confeſſion, had above 900 men ſlain, and 1900 wounded. The marſhal d'Uxelles, at his return to France, was vilified by the populace; but he treated them with the contempt that every wiſe man muſt do a populace, who are always bad judges of merit, and whoſe praiſe nevertheleſs is ſo greedily ſought after. His rival, the duke of Lorrain, was ſo ſenſible of the bravery and merit of the marquis, that he left him maſter of the articles of the capitulation. By the taking of Mentz, Franconia, which before lay expoſed, was now covered. The elector of Brandenbourg laid ſiege to Keiſerſwaert, which, after a vigorous attack, and as obſtinate a defence, ſurrendered about the middle of June. He next attacked Bonne, which baron d'Asfeldt commanded. The ſiege was tedious, and the garriſon did not ſurrender till after fifty-five days blockade, and twenty-ſix days cloſe ſiege. The taking of Bonne laid the Rhine open as far as Mentz; the elector of Brandenbourg was indebted for his ſucceſs chiefly to the duke of Lorrain, who, after the ſurrender of Mentz, marched with his army to the elector's aſſiſtance. With this ſiege ended the campaign on the Rhine. The French had ſome little ſucceſs in Catalonia under the duke of Noailles, who had reduced Campredon in the month of May; but he was ſo hard puſhed by the Spaniards, that he was obliged to withdraw the garriſon, diſmantle the place, and retreat to the frontiers of France with great precipitation *. To return to the affairs of England during the receſs of the parliament——

The moſt remarkable acts paſſed this ſeſſion, beſides thoſe already mentioned, were theſe:

An act to veſt in the two univerſities the preſentations belonging to the papiſts. The univerſity of Oxford is to preſent all popiſh livings in the ſouthern counties; and the univerſity of Cambridge, to thoſe of the northern: and if any truſtee, mortgagee, or grantee of ſuch advowſon preſent without notice to the reſpective univerſity, he forfeits five hundred pounds to the univerſity. No popiſh benefice is to be granted to any perſon having another; and ſuch benefice is to be void by abſence of ſixy days in one year.

Acts for erecting courts of conſcience in Briſtol, Glouceſter, and Newcaſtle, which have been much to the benefit and eaſe of the inhabitants.

An act for aboliſhing the court of the Marches of Wales, which had been continued by Henry VIII. the preſident and council whereof had power to determine by their diſcretion all matters belonging to the court. This had proved an intolerable burden to Wales and the borders at all times, and a means to introduce an arbitrary power, eſpecially in the late reigns, when a new convert family were at the head of it: nor could the earl of Macclesfield, the laſt preſident, who kept his court at Ludlow, reduce it to ſuch order as to ceaſe to be a grievance, and therefore it was diſſolved.

An act for the relief of the proteſtant Iriſh clergy; by which act, thoſe that had been forced from their country, and had benefices there, were enabled to hold any benefice in England, without forfeiting their promotions in Ireland; but were obliged to reſign their eccleſiaſtical preferments in England, when reſtored to thoſe they had been forced to relinquiſh.

An act to repeal the ſtatute of Henry IV. againſt multiplying gold and ſilver. By this act, the melting and refining of metals, improving them and their ores, and extracting gold and ſilver from thence (which had been forbidden) are allowed, on condition that all the gold and ſilver thus extracted, be brought to the Mint in the Tower, to be converted into money: at which place the extractors are to receive the full value of their gold or ſilver, according to the fineneſs thereof.

* Vol. I. Age of Lewis XIV.—Contin. of Rapin.

The day appointed for the two houſes to reaſſemble drawing near, and the king propoſing to call a convocation, in order to make another effort to eſtabliſh his favourite plan of comprehenſion, he thought fit to fill up the vacant ſees of Worceſter, Chicheſter, and Briſtol, which were beſtowed the firſt on Dr. Stillingfleet, the ſecond on Dr. Patrick, and the third on Dr. Ironſide; ſir Jonathan Trelawney having been tranſlated from thence to Exeter. In the next place, his majeſty, in order that the ſubject of a general comprehenſion of his Proteſtant ſubjects might be duly digeſted, granted a commiſſion under the great ſeal to ten biſhops and the ſame number of dignitaries of the church, authorizing them "to meet, from time to time, to prepare ſuch alterations of the liturgy and the canons, and ſuch reformations of the eccleſiaſtical courts as might conduce to the good order, edification, and unity of the church, and tend to compromiſe all differences among the Proteſtant ſubjects of this kingdom *." It ſoon appeared, however, that there were very little hopes of ſucceſs from this project. Many of the commiſſioners were ſo far from approving of a comprehenſion, that they would hardly own the reformed churches abroad to be true churches, much leſs the Diſſenters; and at the very firſt meeting of the committee, the biſhop of Roche ſter (Sprat) ſtarted a diſpute concerning the authority and legality of the court; alledging the obligations the clergy lay under by an act of parliament of king Henry VIII. not to enter into debates about making any alterations in church-affairs, without the king's ſpecial and immediate privacy, and directions firſt given for ſuch alterations; but the biſhop's argument being over-ruled, he retired in diſguſt from the committee, and was followed by ſome others of the more rigid ones; namely, Mew, biſhop of Wincheſter, and the doctors Jane, Aldrich, Beaumont, Montagu, Goodman, Beveridge, and Alſton. The commiſſioners, notwithſtanding this ſeceſſion, proceeded with great moderation in the buſineſs for which they had aſſembled.

They began with reviewing the liturgy; and firſt they examined the calendar, in which, in the room of apocryphal leſſons, they ordered certain chapters of canonical ſcripture to be read that were to the people's advantage. Athanaſius's Creed being diſliked by many, becauſe of the damnatory clauſe, it was left to the miniſter's choice to uſe it or change it for the Apoſtles Creed; new collects were drawn up more agreeable to the epiſtles and goſpels for the whole courſe of the year; and theſe were compoſed with that elegance and propriety of expreſſion, and ſuch a flame of devotion, that nothing could more affect the hearts of the hearers, and elevate their minds towards God. They were firſt drawn up by Dr. Patrick, who was reckoned to have great ſkill in liturgical compoſures; biſhop Burnet added to them yet further force and ſpirit; Dr. Stillingfleet afterwards examined them with great judgment, carefully weighing every word in them; and Dr. Tillotſon had the laſt hand in giving them ſome free and maſterly ſtrokes of his eaſy and flowing eloquence. Dr. Kidder, who was well verſed in the oriental tongues, made a new verſion of the Pſalms, more agreeable to the original. Dr. Tenniſon made a collection of the words and expreſſions throughout the liturgy, which had been objected to, and propoſed others in their room, that were clear and plain, and leſs liable to objection. Other things alſo were propoſed, that were left to be determined by the convocation, as, 1. That the croſs in baptiſm might be either uſed or omitted at the choice of the parents: 2. That a Non-conformiſt miniſter going over to the church, ſhould not be ordained according to the common form, but conditionally, much in the ſame manner as the baptizing of infants is ordered in the church, if there be not evidence of their being baptized before, with the addition of the epiſcopal benediction, as was cuſtomary in the antient church, when clerks were received who had been ordained by heretics †.

In the mean time the enemies of the government did not fail to embrace the favourable opportunity of the diſpute between the commiſſioners and the late ſeceſſion of a part of their members, to inflame the minds of the people, who already began to entertain ſuſpicions of William's religious principles: they repreſented him as an enemy to the church of England, and attached to the doctrine of Calvin: they inſinuated that this commiſſion, to which they affixed the odious and alarming epithet of "a new eccleſiaſtical high court," was intended to eſtabliſh preſbytery at the expence of epiſcopacy, which would, in conſequence of the intended alterations in the church-government, become a mere cypher, and ſoon be aboliſhed.

The populace gave into the deception, the church was generally declared to be in danger, and, what is very extraordinary, the two univerſities greedily ſwallowed the ridiculous and malicious reports of the incendiaries, and ſolemnly declared againſt all alterations, as well as againſt thoſe who preſumed to promote them. Much the ſame ſpirit manifeſted itſelf in the convocation on its meeting; the rigid churchmen oppoſed the friends of the comprehenſion in the choice of a prolocutor for the lower houſe; and rejecting Dr. Tillotſon, who had been propoſed by the king, elected Dr. Jane, who was eſteemed the moſt violent churchman in the whole aſſembly. The biſhop of London, who ſat as preſident in the upper houſe, in vain recommended candour, unanimity, and concord, and ſuch a reaſonable conceſſion as might open the door of ſalvation to ſuch numbers of ſtraying Chriſtians. His advice had very little effect; the lower houſe, far from ſhewing any inclination to make even the neceſſary conceſſions, would not conſent to the ſmalleſt alteration in the liturgy or canons; aſſerting, that they could not be amended. In fine, the preſident, finding there was nothing to be expected from the compliance of the houſe, which on all occaſions expreſſed a ſettled diſlike to any union with the Diſſenters, prorogued the ſeſſion after the convocation had ſat about ſix weeks, and the king ſuffered it to be adjourned for ten years by repeated prorogations.

The parliament meeting on the nineteenth of October, the king, in a ſpeech of his own compoſing, explained the neceſſity of a preſent ſupply to carry on the war; deſired that they would be ſpeedy in their determinations on that ſubject, as theſe would greatly influence the deliberations of the princes and ſtates concerned in the alliance againſt France, as a general meeting of them, he ſaid, was appointed to be held next month at the Hague. The houſes were then prorogued for four days, when they aſſembled; and the commons taking the king's ſpeech into conſideration, unanimouſly reſolved to aſſiſt his majeſty in reducing Ireland, and in joining his allies abroad for a vigorous proſecution of the war againſt France: for which purpoſe they voted a ſupply of two millions, to be raiſed by a land tax of three ſhillings in the pound, and additional duties upon coffee, tea, and chocolate *.

Several motions relating to grievances having been made in both houſes, the marquis of Halifax, who thought himſelf particularly aimed at, reſolved to retire from court, and quit the adminiſtration. He therefore reſigned the privy-ſeal †, and reconciled himſelf to the Tories, of whoſe party he thenceforth became the chief patron and protector: while the Whigs, between whom and the king there daily grew greater coldneſs, not to ſay diſguſt, on his majeſty's ſide in particular, employed all their efforts to oppoſe the favour ſhewn to their adverſaries, and thwart their preferment in the ſtate. The miſcarriages in the Iriſh affairs continuing ſtill to be the ſubject of great complaint, the commons took the ſame into their conſideration, and preſented an addreſs, humbly intreating his majeſty that he would be pleaſed to appoint commiſſioners to go over and enquire into the conduct of the army in that kingdom ‡. In the courſe of their enquiries, it appearing that the miſcarriages in queſtion were wholly owing to the treachery and avarice of John Shales, purveyor-general of the army, an addreſs was preſented to the king, intreating his majeſty to order Shales into cuſtody, and to empower duke Schomberg to fill his place with a more able and truſty purveyor. The king informed them he had already ſent orders to the general for that purpoſe; and at the ſame time ſent a meſſage to the houſe, deſiring them to recommend a certain number of commiſſioners, not exceeding ſeven, to be ſent over to Ireland to take care of the proviſions, and ſuch other preparations as ſhould be found neceſſary for that ſervice. About the ſame time, the commons took into conſideration the ſtate of the nation, and ſeveral members made great complaints of the late ill conduct of affairs. On this occaſion Mr. Hambden made a violent attack upon the miniſtry, eſpecially the earl of Nottingham, but was as violently oppoſed by his own father. In the month of December a queſtion was put in the houſe of commons, "Whether a perſon having a place in court, or any dependence on the king, ſhould be a member of that houſe?" This, as may be ſuppoſed, occaſioned a very warm and obſtinate debate; but the placemen carried the day, it being alleged that the excluſion aimed at in the queſtion would debar the ableſt men in the nation of an opportunity to ſerve at the ſame time their king and their country.

The Whigs, purſuant to their ſcheme of thwarting the king, made ſuch a party in the parliament this ſeſſion, that in ſpite of his majeſty's earneſt deſire to have a revenue ſettled upon him for life, alleging he could not look upon himſelf as a king till it was done; the civil liſt was nevertheleſs granted but for one year. By this oppoſition the Whigs loſt themſelves entirely in the king's favour, who every day ſhewed a ſtronger inclination to join himſelf with the Tories, who made him the moſt pompous promiſes of ſupplies, and an attention to all his inclinations, if he would only diſſolve the parliament and call a new one. The Whigs ſoon diſcovered that their adverſaries were tampering with the king; and to fruſtrate their deſigns, they introduced a bill into the lower-houſe for reſtoring corporations to their antient rights and privileges; in which they inſerted a clauſe that they hoped would make themſelves maſters of all future elections, by denouncing great penalties againſt thoſe who had been any way concerned in delivering up the charters. This clauſe, the ſubſtance of which tht reader will find in the note ‖, was oppoſed by the Tories with their utmoſt force, and was at length rejected; but the Whigs prevailed ſo far, that the bill paſſed the commons in its original form by a great majority: the houſe of lords was ſo equally divided on this occaſion, that the bill paſſed there by one voice only. Both parties now made the warmeſt court to the king to bring him over to their ſeveral intereſts. King William was under the greateſt perplexity how to determine: the behaviour of the Whigs had made him look upon them as a ſet of people infected with republican principles, continually jealous of the kingly power. He thought, that by giving his aſſent to the bill, he ſhould in a manner make himſelf entirely dependent on them, and live only the pageant of a ſovereign. On the other hand, to repoſe too unlimited a confidence in the Tories, appeared to him replete with the moſt alarming conſequences, as he knew their attachment to the principles of the divine indefeaſible right of kings. If we may believe Burnet, and ſome other hiſtorians, he was in this dilemma on the point of taking a deſperate reſolution, no leſs than that of leaving the government in the hands of the queen, to whom he thought the Tories would be true, and withdrawing himſelf into Holland. He was however perſuaded from the execution of this raſh purpoſe by the marquis of Caermarthen, the earl of Shrewſbury, and ſome other noblemen moſt in his confidence; and

An additional poll-tax was alſo paſſed, by which 20s. per head was laid upon every ſhopkeeper, tradeſman, and artificer, worth 300l. perſonal eſtate; a tax of 100,000l. was moved (it is ſaid by ſir Edward Seymour) to be laid on the Jews, but the motion came to nothing. ‡ Proceedings of the Houſe of Commons, ii. 358. November 11.

‖ This clauſe was as follows; "That every mayor, recorder, ſheriff, common-councilman, town clerk, magiſtrate, or officer, who did take upon him to conſent to or join in the ſurrender of any charter or inſtrument, importing ſuch ſurrender, did ſollicit, procure, proſecute, or did pay or contribute to the charge of proſecuting any Scire facias, Quo warranto, or information in the nature of a Quo warranto, by this act declared unlawful, ſhall be, and is declared, adjudged, and diſabled to all intents and purpoſes, to bear or execute any office, employment, or place of truſt, as a member of ſuch reſpective body corporate, or in or for ſuch reſpective city, town, borough, or cinque-port, wherein he was member at or before the time of his making ſuch ſurrender, or inſtrument importing ſuch ſurrender, or the ſuing out or proſecuting ſuch Scire facias, Quo warranto, any thing in this act contained, or in any other caſe, ſtatute, or any ordinance, charter, cuſtom or any thing contrary in anywiſe notwithſtanding."

he reſolved to change this fatal deſign for another of more ſervice to the nation, that of going over in perſon to Ireland to finiſh the war there.

As ſoon as this intention of his majeſty came to be known, by the preparations ordered for his voyage, a ſtrong party was formed to oppoſe it. The friends of the Revolution were againſt it, from the apprehenſion that the fatigues of a campaign, and the bad climate of the country, might, excluſive of the chance of war, have a fatal effect on the king's weak and tender conſtitution, whoſe death muſt unavoidably involve the nation in all the horrors of a civil war. The Jacobites, on the other hand, dreaded William's taking the field in perſon againſt their old maſter; and thus both houſes reſolved to addreſs againſt the intended expedition. William was apprized of their deſign; and to prevent the execution of it, came to the parliament-houſe on the ſeventeenth of January, 1690, and in a ſpeech formally notified his reſolution of going in perſon to Ireland, telling them, that as he had already ventured his life for the preſervation of the laws and liberties of the nation, he was willing again to expoſe it, to ſecure them the great enjoyment of theſe bleſſings. Having ended his ſpeech, the lord-chancellor prorogued the parliament to the twenty-ſecond of April; but on the ſixth of February the king diſſolved it, and writs were iſſued for a new one to meet on the twentieth of March.

In this ſeſſion was paſſed the declaration of rights and the act of ſettlement, of which we have already ſpoken. The affair likewiſe of the princeſs of Denmark's revenue was now compleated, which had been left unfiniſhed the laſt ſeſſion. While the two houſes were ſitting, a conſpiracy, real or pretended, againſt the government, and a deſign to invite over king James, was diſcovered by biſhop Burnet; the particulars of which are not ſufficiently intereſting, nor were the conſequences of importance enough to induce us to detain our readers with a detail thereof: indeed this diſcovery was in general laughed at, being looked upon as a fiction of the court, and the city of London entertained a very ill opinion of the king upon this occaſion.

Towards the cloſe of the year, general Ludlow, who at the Reſtoration had been excepted out of the act of indemnity, as one of thoſe who ſat in judgment upon king Charles I. arrived in England, and offered his ſervice in reducing Ireland, where he had formerly commanded under Cromwell. He was however ſoon obliged to retire; for ſir Edward Seymour, who was in poſſeſſion of a ſeat and eſtate at Maiden-Bradley in Wiltſhire, which had belonged to Ludlow, and on its being forfeited came to ſir Edward by a grant, repreſented to the houſe of commons in very warm terms, "the infamy that would be fixed on the character of the nation, ſhould any of the murderers of that king, whom the church of England had ſo juſtly dignified with the title of Martyr, be allowed to live in the kingdom:" whereupon the houſe addreſſed the king to iſſue a proclamation for apprehending general Ludlow. This was accordingly publiſhed, but not till it was known for certain the general was ſafe landed in Holland, from whence he afterwards retired to Vevay in Switzerland, where he ended his days, after an exile of thirty years.

While theſe things paſſed in England, a ſtrong party was forming againſt king William in Scotland. The Scots, who had come up to London to give an account of their proceedings in their parliament, had been diſguſted by the reſerved behaviour of the king, and thought themſelves and their brethren the preſbyterians neglected and ill treated. On their return to their own kingdom, they repreſented thoſe matters in ſuch a manner as ſoon to kindle diſtruſt and animoſity againſt the new government. In ſhort, a coalition was formed between the diſcontented preſbyterians and the original Jacobite party. Colonel Cannon, who ſucceeded the viſcount Dundee in command, after having made ſeveral unſucceſsful efforts in favour of king James's intereſt, retired into Ireland, and the Highlanders choſe ſir Hugh Cameron for their leader; who taking advantage of the abſence of a great number of the regular troops, which had been ſent over to Ireland to reinforce duke Schomberg, renewed their incurſions with ſucceſs for ſome time; but at length a party of fifteen hundred of them, headed by colonel Buchan, being ſurprized and routed by ſir Thomas Livingſtone, the Highlanders were obliged to retire, and conceal themſelves amongſt their hills and inacceſſible faſtneſſes. Experience having ſhewn the friends of James the little ſucceſs to be hoped from any ſervices they could do him in the field, it was reſolved to direct all their attention to the proceedings in parliament, where they imagined their intereſt to be much ſtronger than it turned out upon trial. The Jacobites hoped, by the aſſiſtance of their new allies the preſbyterians, to be able to embroil the government in ſuch a manner, that the majority of the people would declare for a reſtoration. They accordingly took the oaths neceſſary for qualifying them to ſeats in the parliament without the leaſt heſitation, and hugged themſelves in the proſpect of certain ſucceſs; but it ſoon appeared that the views of theſe two lately connected parties were totally incompatible. Notwithſtanding their concurrence in parliament, the earl of Melvil, high-commiſſioner from William, procured a ſmall majority. The oppoſition was immediately diſcouraged: ſome individuals retracted, from apprehenſion of ill ſucceſs to their cauſe, and mutual jealouſies began to prevail. The leaders of the coalition treated ſeparately with king James, made inconſiſtent demands, reciprocally concealed their negotiations; in a word, they diſtruſted and hated one another with the moſt implacable reſentment.

The earls of Argyle, Annandale, and Braidalbin, withdrew from them. The earl of Annandale came up to Bath, on pretence of ill health; and Argyle and Braidalbin went to Cheſter, with an intent, as they afterwards declared, to diſcover the whole matter to the king. Sir James Montgomery, who was at the head of the diſcontented preſbyterians, looked upon their deſign as ruined by this deſertion, and therefore reconciled himſelf to the earl of Melvil, to whom he hinted ſomething of the plot, and ſollicited a paſs to the king, which was refuſed. Annandale having received information that Montgomery had diſcloſed all the particulars of the negotiation, threw himſelf upon the king's mercy, and diſcovered all he knew of the conſpiracy. Montgomery lurked for ſome time about London, ſolliciting a pardon; but finding he could not obtain it unleſs he made a full diſcovery, he choſe to quit his country and die in exile, rather than betray his confederates. By this diſunion of the conſpirators, and the diſcovery of the plot, the court intereſt at length triumphed over all oppoſition in Scotland; though, to effect this, the high-commiſſioner was obliged to make ſeveral great conceſſions to the fanatic preſbyterians in parliament, particularly in the articles of patronage, and the ſupremacy of the crown, which he agreed to give up, in lieu of which the parliament indulged the king with the tax of chimney-money; and an act, obliging all perſons in office and parliament to take a teſt oath, declaring William and Mary their lawful ſovereigns, and renouncing the pretended title of James. There was at that time a prevailing faction in Scotland, called the Cameronian party, from one Cameron, formerly their leader, and who was ſlain in rebellion: they were a ſort of rigid preſbyterians, or rather Fifth-monarchy-men, who valued neither king William nor king James, further than as thoſe princes happened to pleaſe them. Some deſigning heads in the council and parliament made uſe of thoſe men to bring their ends about, whoſe weakneſs was otherwiſe diſcernible: they took all occaſions to inſpire the people with a deteſtation of epiſcopal government, and the worſhip of the church of England, which they repreſented as very little removed from popery, and her clergy ignorant and ſcandalous livers. Theſe furious fanatics proceeded with ungovernable violence to perſecute the church of England miniſters, and at length obliged the earl of Melvil, apprehenſive that king William's intereſt in Scotland would otherwiſe be irreparably damaged, to conſent to lodge the government of the church in their hands; the conſequence of which was, that all the laws in favour of epiſcopacy were aboliſhed. About ſixty preſbyterian miniſters, who had been ejected at the Reſtoration, were ſtill alive, and declared by the parliament the only ſound part of the church and preſbytery. Having thus trampled the hierarchy again under foot, they exerciſed the very ſame tyranny over the church of England clergy, againſt which they themſelves had ſo loudly exclaimed in the former reign.

While the preſbyterian intereſt thus prevailed in Scotland, the two parties that divided England employed their whole influence and attention in managing the elections for the new parliament; and the Tories obtained the victory, to whom the king was every day giving freſh inſtances of his partiality in their favour. By the intereſt and addreſs of the biſhop of London, the marquis of Caermarthen, and the earl of Nottingham, the chiefs of that party, ſeveral of them were admitted into the commiſſion for the lieutenantcy of the city of London, from which they had been excluded: and farther to gratify them, Charles Mordaunt earl of Monmouth, and Booth earl of Warrington, were diſmiſſed from their ſeats in the council *.

The new parliament meeting on the twentieth of March, 1690, the commons choſe ſir John Trevor, a flaming Tory, for their ſpeaker, who was approved by the king. William, in his ſpeech to both houſes, gave them to underſtand, "That he ſtill perſiſted in his reſolution of going in perſon to Ireland: he deſired they would ſettle the revenue on him, as they had done on his predeceſſors, or eſtabliſh it as a fund of credit, upon which he might raiſe the neceſſary ſums to ſerve his preſent occaſions: he told them he would ſend them an act of grace, with ſome few exceptions, being deſirous to have no colour of excuſe to any of his ſubjects for raiſing diſturbances during his abſence: he adviſed them to avoid diſſentions, recommended to their conſideration a union with Scotland, and ſaid he ſhould leave the adminiſtration in the hands of the queen during his abſence, and defired they would prepare an act for that purpoſe, if it was thought neceſſary; concluding with an exhortation to them to uſe diſpatch in the buſineſs for which they were aſſembled, as the ſeaſon of the year, and his intended journey to Ireland, would admit of but a ſhort ſeſſion; adding at the ſame time, that he hoped it would not be long before he ſhould meet them again, to perfect what the time would not now allow to be done †."

As both Whigs and Tories now vied with each other to court the king's favour, by obliging him in money affairs, the commons proceeded to ſettle the revenue, and make it a fund of credit for the ſupplies which were ſtill wanted for the next campaign. They began with voting a ſupply of one million two hundred thouſand pounds between that time and Michaelmas, of which two hundred thouſand pounds was to be raiſed by a poll, and a million by a clauſe of credit in the revenue bills. Here however they ſtopped; for William could not prevail to have the revenue ſettled on him for life: all he could obtain was to have the hereditary exciſe ſettled for life, and the cuſtoms to be continued only for four years, from the twenty-fourth of December next enſuing ‡.

There was a violent conteſt this ſeſſion between the two parties on the import of a bill, requiring all ſubjects in office to take an oath, abjuring king James, on pain of impriſonment. The Tories however prevailed ſo far with the king, that, under various ſpecious pretences, his majeſty ſent an intimation to the commons, deſiring them to drop the debate, and proceed to matters that were more preſſing. This interpoſition on the part of the king greatly diſguſted the Whigs; and the earl of Shrewſbury, a man of acknowleged integrity and talents, who had intereſted himſelf warmly in behalf of the bill, inſiſted on reſigning his office of ſecretary of ſtate; nor could all the remonſtrances of the king, who well knew his abilities, engage him even to keep the ſeals until he ſhould return from Ireland. The abjuration bill was thrown out, after having received a ſecond reading. The parliament being ſenſible that his majeſty was in haſte to go over to Ireland, diſpatched the buſineſs before them as ſoon as could be expected; and the royal aſſent being given to ſeveral money-bills, the act of indemnity, and ſome other acts, as alſo an act for inveſting the queen § with the adminiſtration of the government during the king's abſence; on the twenty-third day of May, his majeſty cloſed the ſeſſion with a ſhort ſpeech, in which he thanked his parliament for the ſupplies they had granted; told them, that though he only propoſed to adjourn them for a ſhort time, yet he did not mean to call for their attendance without ſome preſſing neceſſity, till the beginning of winter; and earneſtly recommended to them the faithful diſcharge of their duties in their reſpective counties, that the peace of the nation might not be diſturbed during his abſence *." The parliament was then adjourned to the ſecond day of July, and afterwards underwent ſeveral adjournments and prorogations.

During this ſeſſion there were the following promotions among the nobility; Richard, lord viſcount Lumley, was created earl of Scarborough; Henry lord Delamere, earl of Warrington; Henry lord Grey of Ruthyn was created viſcount Longueville; and the lord Willoughby of Ereſby, chancellor of the duchy of Lancaſter, was, by virtue of his majeſty's writ of ſummons, called up to the houſe of peers; and on the third of June ſir John Trevor, ſpeaker of the commons, ſir William Rawlinſon, and ſir George Hutchins, were conſtituted commiſſioners of the great-ſeal.

In the mean time, king James's affairs in Ireland wore a very untoward aſpect: Lewis XIV. had indeed promiſed him a reinforcement of five thouſand men under the count de Lauſun, beſides thoſe he carried over with him; ſo that James had in all about ſeven thouſand French, and as many Iriſh, moſt of them accounted good troops: the reſt, which amounted to ten or twelve thouſand men more, were new-raiſed, undiſciplined, and not to be truſted to. King William, on the other hand, had increaſed his army in Ireland to near fifty thouſand men, all regular forces, under experienced generals: which ſuperiority gave him an aſſurance of ſucceſs, and he had determined to have the honour of driving his enemy out of Ireland himſelf.

On the fourth of June he embarked at Highlake near Cheſter, and on the fourteenth landed at Carrickfergus, attended by prince George of Denmark, the duke of Ormond, the earls of Oxford, Scarborough, and Mancheſter, and many other perſons of diſtinction; and the ſame evening went to Belfaſt, where he was met by duke Schomberg, the prince of Wirtemberg, major-general Kirk, and other general officers.

The king's arrival immediately gave a new face to affairs: the military operations had for ſome time been at a ſtand, through the addreſs of duke Schomberg, who carefully avoided coming to an engagement with the enemy before his majeſty's arrival to head his troops in perſon: but now every thing appeared in motion. James, on his ſide, wearied with fluctuating in a continual ſtate of uncertainty, ſeemed deſirous to determine his fate by one deciſive blow: king William was equally deſirous to put an end to all competition for the ſovereign ſway. Thus diſpoſed, the two rivals, as by mutual conſent, moved towards each other in order to give battle. King William having repoſed himſelf for two or three days at Belfaſt, repaired to Liſburne, where duke Schomberg had fixed his head quarters, and from thence to Hilſborough. He ordered the whole army to encamp at Loughbrillan, where, upon a review, he found it amounted to thirty-ſix thouſand effective men, all well equipped in every particular. King James being apprized of his arrival, immediately committed the guard of the city of Dublin to a body of militia, commanded by Lutterel; and ſetting out with the reinforcement of five thouſand infantry lately ſent him from France, joined the reſt of his forces, which were now nearly equal to the Engliſh in number, excluſive of about fifteen thouſand men, who remained in different garriſons.

James having advanced to the banks of the river Boyne, there took poſt in a very advantageous ſituation, having his front defended by that deep and rapid river, by a riſing ground, and by a moraſs or bog: in a word, it was impoſſible for the Engliſh to attack him without manifeſt danger to themſelves. On this conſideration the officers in the Jacobite army were very preſſing with James not to hazard a battle, but rather reinforce his garriſons, withdraw to the Shannon, and wait the iſſue of the naval preparations which Lewis XIV. was then haſtening, in order to attack the Engliſh fleet, and ſuccour his old ally: but James, burning with impatience, as I before obſerved, to decide the fate of his crown by a ſpeedy and deciſive engagement, could not brook theſe tame counſels, and prepared to give his adverſary battle. William, on his ſide, was equally ready to receive him: however, he thought proper, before the fight, to take a view of the enemy's ſituation. Advancing for that purpoſe to the oppoſite ſide of the river, he was ſingled out by the enemy, who brought down two field-pieces by a hidden pathway, and planted them againſt his perſon: at the firſt ſhot they killed a man and two horſes cloſe by his ſide, and the ſecond bullet rebounding from the ground, grazed his right ſhoulder, and produced a conſiderable contuſion. William betrayed not the leaſt emotion on this occaſion; but having cauſed his wound to be bound up, he remounted his horſe, and kept on his pace, only ſaying in French, "Il ne falloit pas que le coup fut tiré de plus prés: There was no neceſſity the bullet ſhould have come nearer." This accident, however, though of no great moment in itſelf, occaſioned ſome confuſion among his majeſty's attendants; which being obſerved by the enemy, and they no longer ſeeing the king on horſeback, concluded their cannon had taken the deſired effect, and that William was killed. Upon this they ſet up a general ſhout, which was re-echoed through their camp: the news even ſpread to Dublin, from whence it was carried to Paris, where, contrary to the cuſtom of the French court, the people were encouraged to expreſs their joy by bonfires and illuminations.

The king having got his ſlight wound dreſſed, returned back to ſhew himſelf to his army, in order to quiet their apprehenſions. About nine at night he called a council of war, and declared his reſolution to paſs the river the next day, and give the foe battle. This meaſure was ſtrongly oppoſed by duke Schomberg; but the king ſhewing himſelf abſolutely determined, and declaring that "he did not come there to let the graſs grow under his feet," his plan was adopted by the majority of the council; upon which duke Schomberg acquieſced, and propoſed that part of the army, horſe and foot, ſhould be ſent that night towards Slane-bridge, in order to paſs the Boyne there, and ſo get between the enemy and the paſs at Duleck. This advice, which was a piece of conſummate generalſhip, and muſt, if followed, have enſured a ſpeedy and certain ſucceſs to the Engliſh, was objected againſt and over-ruled by the Dutch officers; at which the duke was ſo diſguſted, that he retired to his tent, whither the order of battle, after being ſettled in the council, was ſent to him. He conſidered this as an additional affront: however, the reſpect he owed to his ſovereign kept him from complaining: he only ſaid, with ſome marks of diſcontent, that "it was the firſt order of that kind that had ever been ſent to him." By the concerted diſpoſition it was agreed, that early the next morning lieutenant-general Douglas, with the right wing of infantry, and Munhardt count Schomberg the duke's ſon, with the horſe, ſhould paſs the river at Slane-bridge, in order to get between the enemy's camp and Drogheda, whilſt a body of foot were to force their way at the paſs of Old-Bridge.

King James alſo called a council of war on his ſide, when it was propoſed by lieutenant-general Hamilton to ſend a ſtrong party of dragoons to take poſſeſſion of a ford which was below the town of Drogheda, the ſecuring of which he thought to be, as it really was, of great importance. James, however, by a ſtrange perverſeneſs, would have only ſixty dragoons ſent thither. The cannonade on both ſides, which had continued pretty warm ever ſince the two armies had come in ſight of each other, ceaſed towards the cloſe of the evening. William rode quite through the army by torch-light, and then retired to his tent, after having given order for the proper diſpoſitions, and directed that his ſoldiers ſhould wear green boughs in their hats during the enſuing action, to diſtinguiſh them from the enemy's men, who wore pieces of white paper in theirs.

The next day, July 1, about ſix o'clock in the morning, general Douglas, with young Schomberg, the earl of Portland, and Overkirk, marched towards Slane-bridge, and paſſed the river without any great oppoſition. Having gained the oppoſite bank, they found themſelves confronted by a conſiderable number of the enemy, formed into two lines, behind a deep moraſs that ſecured their front. General Douglas, on ſight of their diſpoſition, thought it adviſable to halt for the coming up of a freſh reinforcement, which he knew to be on its march to join him. No ſooner was this arrived than he gave orders to the foot to move towards the moraſs or bog that lay between them and the enemy, while count Schomberg with his horſe, who could not poſſibly march that way, was ſent round it, to fall upon the Iriſh in flank. Theſe latter no ſooner perceived the motion made by the Engliſh, than they wheeled about, and retreated towards Duleck; but being purſued by the cavalry under young Schomberg, numbers of them were cut in pieces in their retreat, or rather flight. In the mean time king William, who knew not what had paſſed between this part of his army and the enemy, but ſuppoſed that his men had by this time effected their paſſage over the river, ordered his main body, compoſed of the Dutch guards, the French proteſtant regiments, the Inniſkilling foot, and four battalions of Engliſh, to paſs the Old-Bridge ford, and attack the enemy. They accordingly paſſed the river, which was waiſt high; and having gained the oppoſite bank, in ſpite of the reſiſtance of a body of muſqueteers ſent to oppoſe them, they drew up into files, and then charged the Iriſh with ſuch fury, that, unable to ſtand the ſhock of the onſet, theſe latter abandoned their entrenchments, and retreated. King James had imprudently removed his cannon from the ſide of the river, which greatly facilitated the landing of the Engliſh: but before all the battalions could form, they were charged with great impetuoſity by general Hamilton, at the head of a conſiderable body of horſe and foot, and the diſpute was for ſome time very obſtinate: but the Iriſh foot, who that day behaved ſhamefully, ſoon gave way, and left their horſe to ſuſtain the whole fury of the combat, who were vigorouſly repulſed by the French proteſtants and the Inniſkilliners. In the firſt of theſe onſets La Caillemote, the boſom friend and inſeparable companion of the gallant duke Schomberg, received his mortal wound, at the head of the French proteſtants; and as he was carried back by four Engliſh ſoldiers to the Engliſh camp, he encouraged thoſe of his countrymen who were ſtill croſſing the river, by calling out to them, "A la gloire, mes enfans! a la gloire! To glory, my good lads, to glory!"

Duke Schomberg perceiving the furious attack made upon the regiments that had forded the river, and being informed that the French proteſtants were without a commander, immediately paſſed the ſtream to head them, and with ſo much hurry, that he would not ſuffer himſelf to be perſuaded to put on his armour. As ſoon as he had gained the oppoſite ſhore, he rode full gallop up to the French proteſtants, and putting himſelf at their head, called out by way of animating them, "Follow me, gentlemen; thoſe are your perſecutors," pointing at the ſame time to the French papiſts in the enemy's army. Theſe words were ſcarcely pronounced, when the duke found himſelf attacked on a ſudden by a party of king James's guards, who, on their body having been routed, were returning full gallop to the main guard of the army: the French refugees, miſtaking them, from their language, for ſome of their own troops, ſuffered them to paſs; and ſome of them riding up to the duke, fell upon and gave him two ſevere wounds on the head. The French proteſtants perceiving their error, and eager to ſave their general, made ſuch an indiſcreet fire upon theſe aſſailants, that they at the ſame time ſhot the duke dead upon the ſpot: the ſmall party of the enemy's guards were indeed quickly cut in pieces; but this was a poor recompence for the loſs of ſo great a commander as duke Schomberg, who thus fell in the field of honour, at the age of eighty-two, after a long life replete with military glory. Beſides, this accident ſo diſconcerted our troops, that they ſeemed to have loſt all their courage: their arms remained inactive in their hands: they gave ground apace; while the enemy, elated with this advantage, recovered freſh ſpirits, and returned to the charge with an ardour that ſeemed to inſure the victory in their favour.

They were juſt ready to fall upon the centre, when king William, who, during the whole of the action, might be ſaid to be every-where, ſince he directed all by his conduct, paſſed in a critical time with the left wing, conſiſting of the Daniſh, Dutch, and Inniſkilliners horſe, and advanced on a full trot to attack the enemy on the right, who were by this time come within muſket-ſhot of the centre of our foot. The ſight of William, advancing in that regular and undaunted manner to take them in flank, ſo diſconcerted the Iriſh, that they made a ſudden halt, faced about, and retreated to a little village called Dunmore, about half a mile from the paſs: there they made ſuch a vigorous ſtand, that the Dutch and Daniſh horſe, though headed by the king in perſon, unable to ſuſtain their fire, gave way; the Inniſkilliners themſelves ſhewed a backwardneſs to advance. William, ſhocked at this, rode up to theſe latter, and aſked, in a ſharp tone, "If this was a behaviour he ought to expect from them?" Stung by this reproach, and being acquainted that it was his majeſty who now did them the honour to head them, they inſtantly reſumed their wonted courage, and returned to the charge with redoubled vigour; the Dutch horſe rallying at the ſame time, the enemy, after an hour's bloody conflict, were beaten back with conſiderable loſs. In this action, lieutenant-general Hamilton, who had been the life and ſoul of the Iriſh during the whole of the fight, was taken priſoner. This accident ſo diſpirited them, that they now abandoned the field with precipitation, though the French and Swiſs guards, who acted as auxiliaries, retreated in good order; king William not thinking fit to venture the purſuit beyond the field of battle.

In the mean time young Schomberg, having been informed of his father's death, was inſpired with ſuch an ardour to revenge his fate, that nothing could oppoſe the fury of his arms. Inſpired at once with a juſt reſentment, and a noble thirſt of honour, he drove the enemy ſeveral miles beyond the village of Duleck, ſtrewing the ground with their dead carcaſes; nor can it be ſaid when he would have deſiſted, had he not received poſitive orders from the king to give over the ſlaughter, and return to the place where the foot had halted, and where they remained under arms all that night.

Thus ended the famous battle of the Boyne, in which the loſs on the ſide of king James, was generally computed at 1500 men, amongſt whom were the lord Dongan, the lord Carlingford, ſir Neile O'Neile, the marquis d'Hocquincourt, and ſeveral priſoners; the chief of whom was lieutenant-general Hamilton, who behaved during the fight with the moſt exemplary bravery, and kept the victory in ſuſpence, till he was overpowered by numbers, and taken priſoner. On the ſide of the Engliſh fell about 500, an inconſiderable loſs for the gain of ſo important a battle, had not the renowned duke Schomberg, the moſt illuſtrious general in Europe, been of the number. William himſelf was very near ſharing the ſame fate; for a cannon-ball carried away a part of his boot, and broke a horſe's leg cloſe by him. All writers concur in giving king William the higheſt praiſe for the admirable conduct, courage, reſolution, and preſence of mind, he diſplayed throughout this memorable action; and the Iriſh themſelves are ſaid to have declared, "That if the Engliſh would change king with them, they would fight the battle over again."

As for James, he remained an inactive ſpectator of an action, on the ſucceſs of which every thing dear to a king or a man of honour depended. During the whole fight, he ſtood with ſome ſquadrons of horſe upon the hill of Dunmore, till the count de Lauſun, after the retreat of the French and Swiſs troops, came up to him; and repreſenting to his majeſty that he was in imminent danger of being ſurrounded, deſired him to think of an inſtant retreat. This advice James readily took; and being attended by the regiment of Sarsfield, he marched off to Duleck, and from thence in all haſte to Dublin. When he came there he immediately aſſembled the magiſtrates and council of the city, and in a ſhort ſpeech reſigned them to the fortune of the victor. He complained of the cowardice of the Iriſh, by whom he ſaid he had been betrayed: he declared his reſolution of quitting the kingdom immediately; and as, he ſaid, it had often been debated, in caſe the fortune of the field ſhould declare againſt his arms, whether, upon deſerting the city of Dublin, the ſame ſhould not be fired? he did therefore charge them on their allegiance, that they ſhould neither plunder it nor deſtroy it in any manner, which in all kingdoms would be deemed an act of brutal barbarity, and might be believed to be done by his orders; and if done, there would be little mercy to be expected from an enraged enemy.

After a ſtay of one night in Dublin, the next morning he ſet out for Waterford, attended by the duke of Berwick his natural ſon, the earl of Tyrconnel, and the marquis of Powis: there he went on board a veſſel which he had ordered ſir Patrick Trant, the commiſſioner of the Iriſh revenue, to hold in readineſs for him in caſe of a defeat, and getting ſafely over to France, fixed his reſidence at St. Germain's. He had no ſooner left Dublin, than it was abandoned by all the Papiſts of any conſideration; the Proteſtants aſſumed the government of the city, and ſent an account of theſe tranſactions to William, accompanied with a petition, entreating him to honour that capital with his preſence. The king readily complied with their requeſt; and after detaching Mr. de la Melionere with a ſufficient force to reduce Drogheda, which he ſpeedily effected, his majeſty ſet out at the head of his army on the 4th day of July (three days after the battle) for Dublin. On the 6th he made his triumphal entry into that capital; and being Sunday, he immediately repaired to the cathedral, where he returned God thanks for his victory, and heard a ſermon preached by the learned Dr. King, afterwards archbiſhop of Dublin.

William's next ſtep was to publiſh a declaration of pardon to all the common people, who either remained at home, or who having fled from their dwellings, ſhould return to their places of abode by the firſt day of Auguſt, provided they delivered up their arms to ſuch juſtices of peace as his majeſty ſhould appoint: but with regard to thoſe deſperate leaders of the rebellion, who had violated the laws of the kingdom, called in the French, authorized the depredations which had been committed upon the Proteſtants, and rejected the gracious pardon offered to them in the king's proclamation publiſhed on the 22d of February, 1689; as his majeſty was now in a condition to make them ſenſible of their error, he left them entirely to the event of war, unleſs by evident demonſtrations of their repentance they ſhould deſerve his mercy, which ſhould never be refuſed to thoſe who were truly truly penitent*." On the tenth of the month, the king iſſued a proclamation, reducing, to its intrinſic value, the braſs money which James had coined, and which he had raiſed to three hundred times its real worth.

It is now time to turn our attention towards England, and take a view of the tranſactions there during the king's abſence. The queen, who had been left regent, ſoon found that ſhe ſtood in need of all her prudence and diſcretion to preſerve her authority. Her council, which was a mixture of Whigs and Tories, by their perpetual jarrings embarraſſed all public affairs; the French threatened the nation with an invaſion from abroad, and the Jacobites were continually at work to ſtir up inſurrections at home. In the midſt of this critical and alarming ſituation, Mary behaved with a ſpirit and reſolution little common to her ſex; and her conduct was the more admired, as it was generally known that the king had been always upon the reſerve with her in what related to public affairs. As ſoon as ſhe heard the king was ſafely landed in Ireland, ſhe began to exerciſe the power veſted in her by parliament in two ſeaſonable proclamations; one "commanding all Papiſts, and reputed Papiſts, forthwith to depart the cities of London and Weſtminſter, and from within ten miles of the ſame;" the other "for the confining of popiſh recuſants to a diſtance not exceeding five miles of their reſpective dwellings."

Advice arriving of a French fleet being ready to ſail from Breſt, in order to make a deſcent upon our coaſts, admiral Herbert earl of Torrington, who then lay in the Downs, had orders to ſail directly for Portſmouth, and there get together ſuch a number of ſhips as might render him ſufficiently ſtrong to go in queſt of the enemy, and prevent their deſign. While the admiral lay at St. Helen's, he received advice from Weymouth, that the French had entered the Channel with ſeventy-eight ſhips of war and two fire-ſhips; upon which he called a council of war to determine what was to be done. He had been lately joined by a ſquadron of Dutch men of war; but ſeveral ſhips that he expected from Plymouth, had been prevented from joining him by the contrary wind: he thought himſelf not ſtrong enough to encounter the French, as his own and the Dutch fleet combined did not amount to more than fifty-ſix ſail; but the very day that he called the council, he received expreſs orders from the queen to hazard an engagement at all events, rather than ſuffer the enemy to proceed up the Channel, all the ports to the eaſtward being deſtitute of any ſhipping to defend them, occaſioned by an ill-timed compliment paid by William to the king of Spain, at whoſe requeſt he had ſent admiral Ruſſel with a large ſquadron to convoy that prince's young bride, ſiſter to the queen of Portugal, from Holland to the Groyne.

Lord Torrington, in conſequence of theſe orders from court, put to ſea with the combined ſquadron of England and Holland, with a view to intercept the French at the back of the Iſle of Wight, ſhould they attempt to ſail up the Channel. The French fleet ſoon came in ſight; and on the 30th of June, the day before the battle of the Boyne, the two fleets engaged near Beachy-Head, on the coaſt of Suſſex. The Dutch ſquadron, which compoſed the van, began the engagement about nine in the morning; but their courage being greater than their ſeamanſhip, they advanced too far out of the line: however, at the firſt they had the advantage, the French flying before them. Our blue ſquadron engaged with great bravery; but admiral Torrington kept his line, and continued to fight at a diſtance. The French, obſerving the Dutch had advanced ſo far out of the line, collected all their force, and hemmed them in on all ſides; and, though they fought with great valour, did them conſiderable damage; and their whole ſquadron would in all probability have periſhed (not being in the leaſt ſeconded by the Engliſh under lord Torrington), had not their admiral, Calembourg ordered them to drop their anchors while their ſails were all up, there being at that time but very little wind. This manœuvre was not noticed by the French, who were now carried away by the tide, whilſt the others lay ſtill; and thus, in a ſhort time, the Dutch were out of danger, after having loſt Dick and Brackel, their two rear-admirals, with a great number of men, and being obliged to ſink ſeveral of their ſhips, to prevent their falling into the hands of the enemy. In this action the Engliſh loſt two ſhips, two of their captains, and about four hundred men. On the next day, in the afternoon, the Engliſh admiral called a council of war, in which it was reſolved to preſerve the remains of the combined fleets by a retreat, and to deſtroy what diſabled ſhips they had with them, rather than hazard another engagement by protecting them, ſhould the enemy attempt a purſuit. Accordingly Torrington retreated without much interruption to the mouth of the Thames, while the French, after a ſtay of about five weeks in the Channel, during which they inſulted our coaſts and burnt the ſmall town of Tinmouth, with ſeveral merchant ſhips in the harbour, retired to their own ports, and were no more ſeen in the Channel this year. Both the Dutch and our blue ſquadron, the only ſhips of ours that were engaged, complained much of Torrington's behaviour; and it was a general opinion, that if the whole fleet had come up to a cloſe fight, we muſt have beat the French: and conſidering how far they were from Breſt, and that our ſquadron at Plymouth lay between them and home, a victory might have had great conſequences. Both admirals, indeed, were almoſt equally blamed; ours for not fighting, and the French for not purſuing his victory†. Torrington, on his arrival at London, was deprived of his command, and ſent priſoner to the Tower; and commiſſioners‡ were appointed to examine the particulars of his conduct.

The news of the defeat of our fleet, and of the French lording it in our ſeas, no ſooner reached London, but every mind was filled with the moſt alarming apprehenſions: nothing but a deſcent was talked of, and the Jacobites exulted in the deſtruction of a government ſo obnoxious to them.

Of theſe the lord-preſident and the earl of Nottingham had the chief management of affairs, which made the Whigs diſſatisfied with the nomination. Tindal, from MS letter of Mr. Warre to ſir W. Colt.

To do the queen juſtice, ſhe behaved in this emergency with admirable ſpirit and diſcretion: ſhe betrayed not the leaſt ſigns of fear: ſhe made uſe of every precaution to guard againſt her enemies, both within and without the kingdom: the principal ſea-ports were put in as good a poſture of defence as the time would permit: proper orders were iſſued for refitting and augmenting the navy: ſhe gave directions for raiſing the militia of the weſtern counties, in order to oppoſe any attempts that might be made in that quarter; and to ſtrike the greater terror into the domeſtic enemies of the government, ſhe iſſued a proclamation for apprehending ſeveral diſaffected noblemen and gentlemen, who were either ſuſpected or accuſed of having held correſpondence with king James and his party, to diſturb and deſtroy the peace of the realm, and had adhered to their majeſties enemies in the preſent invaſion. While the queen was thus wiſely and vigorouſly executing the function of the high department ſhe filled, ſhe had the ſatisfaction to find her conduct approved by the majority of the nation, and to receive ſeveral addreſſes from the city of London, and many other reſpectable counties and corporations in the kingdom, who all declared their reſolution to defend and preſerve her and her royal conſort, and their government, with the hazard of their lives, and to the utmoſt of their power. As for the earl of Torrington, he continued in the Tower till the next ſeſſion of parliament, when he was ordered to be tried by a court-martial on the nineteenth of December. The preſident was ſir Ralph Delaval, who had acted as vice-admiral of the blue ſquadron in the engagement. It is aſſerted by many that the trial was conducted with much partiality; but as the proceedings were never publiſhed, we have nothing certain on which to form our deciſion: we only know that the earl was acquitted, and that the king was ſo offended thereat as immediately to diſmiſs him from his ſervice, together with ſeveral other ſea-officers who had appeared moſt to favour his cauſe; and that we were kind enough to repair the loſſes of the Dutch ſquadron at our own charge. The agitations occaſioned throughout the nation by our ill ſucceſs at ſea, were not a little quieted by the news of the victory gained by the king on the banks of the Boyne: the Jacobites were ſtruck with diſmay: they hung down their heads, a ſudden check was now put to all their proceedings, and they remained quiet, from a conſcious inability of being able to do hurt, while the friends of the Revolution reſumed their courage, and enjoyed in their turns the mortification of their adverſaries. The queen and council ſent to the king, preſſing him to come over with all poſſible haſte to England, to compleat by his preſence the tranquilization of the government here.

As the news of the victory of the Boyne had been a great comfort to the queen and the Engliſh nation, under the diſtreſs raiſed by the misfortunes at ſea; ſo king William, on the day he entered Dublin, had the news of the ill ſucceſs of his fleet to temper the joy his own good fortune might give him. He had taken all the papers of his father-in-law to Tyrconnel, by which he diſcovered a deſign that had been formed againſt his life. It ſeems that the enterprize was to have been undertaken by one Jones, before William undertook the Iriſh expedition: the attempt however was never made, and the conſpirator is ſuppoſed to have eloped with a large ſum of money, which he had procured from Tyrconnel, and Douglas the attorney-general of Ireland, not chuſing to incur the guilt and danger of the enterprize he was put upon. A paper was drawn up of this whole affair, in order to be publiſhed both in England and Ireland: but it is thought that their majeſties, tender of the character of James, which muſt have greatly ſuffered, from the imputation of having countenanced ſo ſhameful a deſign, cauſed it to be ſuppreſſed.

Count Lauſun and general Sarsfield having ſtill a good body of forces under their command, with which they retreated towards Limerick, the Iriſh did not ſhew any diſpoſition to ſubmit; whereupon king William decamped on the ninth of July from Finglaſs, in the neighbourhood of Dublin, and divided his army into two bodies; with the greater of which he marched to Crumlin, three miles on the ſouth of Dublin, and ſent the other, conſiſting of four regiments of horſe, two of dragoons, and ten of infantry, under the command of lieutenant-general Douglas, towards Athlone, who inveſted that city on the ſeventeenth, and ſent to colonel Grace, the governor for king James, to ſurrender. Grace was an old and a valiant ſoldier, of approved fidelity to the maſter he ſerved, and made no other reply than by firing a piſtol, and bidding the trumpeter tell the perſon that ſent him, that thoſe were his terms. Douglas therefore reſolved to attack the place; but as it was ſtrongly fortified by nature, and defended by a good caſtle, and Douglas was deficient in artillery, he was conſtrained to raiſe the ſiege, after a fortnight's fruitleſs attempt. In the mean time, king William having committed the government of Dublin to brigadier Trelawney, proceeded with the reſt of his army weſtward, and at Carlow detached the duke of Ormond to take poſſeſſion of Kilkenny, while the army encamped at Carrick; from whence, on the twenty-firſt of July, major-general Kirk was diſpatched againſt Waterford with two regiments and a party of horſe. The garriſon ſurrendered, on condition of being allowed to march out with their arms and baggage, and were conducted to Mallow. The fort of Duncannon, which commands the entrance of the harbour of Waterford, ſubmitted on the ſame terms. Here the lord Dover and lord George Howard, who had been excepted from the bill of indemnity, petitioned and obtained the king's pardon. On the twenty-ſeventh of July the king left the camp at Carrick, and went to Dublin, in order to take ſhipping for England, in purſuance of the requeſt before-mentioned from the queen and council: but here he found other letters of a different and more pleaſing tenor, informing him that every thing was now quiet at home, and that his preſence was no longer ſo preſſingly neceſſary. Hereupon his majeſty went to Chapel Izard, where he continued for ſome time, and during his ſtay publiſhed a ſecond pardon, confirming and extending the former: but this declaration had very little effect upon the Iriſh, who, ſpirited up by their prieſts, and elated with the news of the bad ſucceſs of our fleet againſt the French, ſtill held out, in hopes that the diſtractions in England would ſoon oblige king William to return thither.

His majeſty, however, ſatisfied by his late advices that his domeſtic enemies were kept in awe, and that the French had retired into their own harbours, reſolved not to quit Ireland till he had effectually reduced the Jacobite party there to perfect obedience, or at leaſt to an inability of doing him any prejudice. With this view he determined upon undertaking the ſiege of Limerick, which was defended by monſieur Boiſſeleau, the governor for king James; and the duke of Berwick and colonel Sarsfield, who with their troops had thrown themſelves into that place after the defeat of the Boyne, and James's flight, acted as inferior officers. On the ninth of Auguſt the king inveſted the town with his whole army, and immediately ſent a trumpeter to ſummon the governor. Tho' the place was extremely ſtrong, and the garriſon very numerous and healthy, there were many, as well of the ſoldiers as of the inhabitants, who were for capitulating; but the governor, the duke of Berwick, and Sarsfield, oppoſed it with ſuch vehemence that the others acquieſced, and it was determined to defend the place to the laſt extremity: upon which monſieur Boiſſeleau ſent the trumpeter back with this anſwer, "That he imagined he could not more effectually gain the good opinion of the prince of Orange, than by vigorouſly defending the town, which his royal maſter had entruſted to his care." Every thing was now prepared for the ſiege: the king the ſame evening gave orders for a party of dragoons to paſs the river Shannon, at a ford about two miles above the town, which was effected by the valour and conduct of general Ginckle, who, after defeating a body of Iriſh that guarded the paſs, croſſed over the next morning with about five thouſand horſe and foot; but before the ſiege could be regularly formed, colonel Sarsfield, hearing that the king's artillery was in its way from Kilkenny to the camp, reſolved to attempt the taking or deſtroying it. With this view he paſſed the Shannon in the night of the 10th, with a body of five or ſix hundred horſe and dragoons, and lurked all the next day in the hills; and having notice that the artillery was a little on this ſide of Cullen, and that the troops that conveyed it had halted to reſt themſelves, and were then perfectly unprepared for an attack, he took with him guides who brought him to the very ſpot, where he fell upon them before they were aware, killed ſeveral of the men, ſplit the cannon, deſtroyed the carriages, waggons, and ammunition, and returned ſafely to Limerick.

The news of this adventure was very unwelcome in the king's camp, where it gave birth to a warm diſpute between duke Schomberg (ſon to the late marſhal) and the earl of Portland, the former accuſing the latter and count Solmes of having neglected to ſend in time a detachment of ſufficient ſtrength to ſecure the train. This quarrel however was ſoon made up, and the ſiege purſued. On the ſeventeenth the trenches were opened, and a battery was raiſed with ſome cannon brought from Waterfield. Both ſides now exerted their utmoſt vigor and reſolution in the attack and defence of the place, during which the king had ſeveral narrow eſcapes for his life; and it is univerſally allowed, that on all military occaſions William's perſonal courage was more conſpicuous than his prudence or caution. On the twenty-ſixth of Auguſt, the engineers having aſſured the king that there was a ſufficient breach made in the walls for an attack, he detached monſieur de la Barthe, a brave French (proteſtant) officer, with nine companies of grenadiers, beſides an hundred French officers and volunteers, to begin the attack; which was performed with ſuch bravery and ſucceſs, that in ſpite of all the oppoſition of the beſieged, the aſſailants effected a lodgment on the redoubt or counterſcarp: but theſe brave men not being properly ſeconded, through the negligence of count Solmes and count Naſſau, the enemy returned to the charge with redoubled numbers, and a moſt bloody and obſtinate diſpute of four hours enſued; but in the end our troops were repulſed, with the loſs of one thouſand two hundred men, either killed or mortally wounded on the ſpot. Notwithſtanding this check, it is ſaid that the king would not have quitted the ſiege, had not the ſeaſon of the year, and the nature of the country, which in thoſe parts is very ſubject to be overflowed, proved ſo bad, that the ſoldiers could no longer remain in the trenches, half filled with water; which inconvenience no art or induſtry could remedy. Orders were therefore iſſued on the thirtieth of Auguſt for ſending off the heavy baggage and artillery; and the next day the army decamped, and marched towards Clonmel, without meeting the leaſt diſturbance from the enemy, either in the decamping or the march. The king now determined to return to England; and having appointed the lord Sidney and Thomas Coningſby, eſq. (afterwards earl of that name) lords juſtices of Ireland, and entruſted the command of the army to count Solmes, his majeſty ſet ſail from Waterford with prince George of Denmark, and ſome other perſons of diſtinction, on the fifth of September, and next day arrived ſafe in King's-Road near Briſtol, and on the ninth got to Windſor, where he was received by the queen with unſpeakable joy.

Great was the exultation of king James's friends in Ireland on occaſion of the raiſing the ſiege of Limerick, and the departure of William for his Engliſh dominions. They were ſtill in poſſeſſion of ſeveral good towns beſides Limerick, and their army was very numerous; ſo that they were filled with the moſt ſanguine hopes of reſtoring their old maſter to the ſovereignty of Ireland at leaſt: but how were their expectations daſhed by the arrival of an Engliſh fleet before Corke harbour, on the twenty-firſt of September, with a body of forces under the command of the earl of Marlborough! It ſeems that this nobleman, after the French fleet had retired into their harbours, and ours had repaired the damage it ſuſtained in the engagement, had propoſed employing about five thouſand troops, who then lay inactive at home, in an attempt upon Cork * and Kinſale †, in Ireland, which he doubted not of taking, with the aſſiſtance of ſuch troops as the king might be able to ſpare him from the army. This propoſal was approved of, and the earl ſent over, who on his arrival found that his majeſty, who had been made acquainted with the intended expedition, had left orders for an additional body of five thouſand men, under the duke of Wirtemberg and major-general Scrivenmore, to reinforce his lordſhip, and aſſiſt him in the reduction of the before-mentioned places.

The earl having landed his men, though with ſome oppoſition, in the neighbourhood of Corke, was ſoon after joined by the reinforcement from the main army; but a diſpute happened between the duke of Wirtemberg and Marlborough concerning the chief command, which both of them claimed; the former as due to his rank of a ſovereign prince, the other as being the elder officer, and commanding the troops of his own nation. The matter, however, was at length compromiſed by the interpoſition of brigadier la Melionere; it being agreed, that the earl ſhould command the firſt day and the duke the next, and ſo alternately, during the expedition. The diſpute thus adjuſted, the trenches were opened, and the batteries played with ſuch fury, that a breach was ſoon effected in the walls, which brought the beſieged to demand a parley; but colonel M'Ellicut, the governor of Corke, not liking the conditions of ſurrender propoſed by the king's generals, hoſtilities were renewed with double vigour. The duke of Grafton, who ſerved in the expedition as a volunteer, as he was marching on to the attack of the breach, had the misfortune to receive a wound in the ſhoulder by a cannon bullet, of which he ſoon after died greatly regretted, as being of all king Charles the Second's children, the perſon of whom there was the greateſt hope. Biſhop Burnet ſays, "he was brave, and probably would have become a great ſea-commander." The main breach being now judged practicable, all things were prepared for a general aſſault on the twenty-eighth of September, when the beſieged not chuſing to incur all the horrors of a ſtorm, colonel M'Ellicut thought proper to ſurrender himſelf and garriſon priſoners of war. Beſides the governor and colonel Rycaut, there were taken in the place the earls of Clancarty and Tyrone.

This ſucceſs inſpired our generals and their little army with freſh ardour. The ſame day that the earl of Marlborough entered Corke, he detached brigadier Villiers with a body of horſe and dragoons to ſummon Kinſale; and the next day advanced with the reſt of his troops to enforce that demand. The place was in a very indifferent poſture of defence, and therefore, after making ſome ſhew of reſiſtance for about a week or ten days, ſir Edward Scot the governor ſurrendered on honourable terms. The earl of Marlborough having thus, in little more than a month, accompliſhed the reduction of thoſe two important maritime towns, by which he effectually deprived the French of all communication with this ſide of the iſland, and confined the remains of the refractory Iriſh to the province of Ulſter, where they could not ſubſiſt without great difficulty, returned with his priſoners to England, and arrived at Kenſington the twenty-eighth of October, where he was received by their majeſties in a manner agreeable to the ſervices he had done the ſtate.

While theſe things were tranſacting, count Lauſun, with the French troops, remained in the neighbourhood of Galway (a county in the province of Connaught in the weſt of Ireland) without attempting any thing. They were, in fact, heartily weary of a ſervice they now with good reaſon looked upon as deſperate, and the count ſent preſſing remonſtrances to be recalled: his requeſt was complied with. A ſquadron of ſhips were ſent to bring him and his men off, in which he ſailed about the beginning of October, leaving the command in chief of the Iriſh forces to the duke of Berwick, which was afterwards transferred to Mr. de St. Ruth. The duke of Tyrconnel accompanied him over, and applied to the French court for a farther ſupply of arms, cloaths, and ammunition, for the Iriſh army, engaging for them, if thus encouraged, that they would ſtill continue to ſupport the cauſe of king James. This remonſtrance did not a little prejudice to the reputation of Lauſun, who was openly accuſed of having too precipitately abandoned the cauſe of that unhappy monarch. In the mean while, the Iriſh formed themſelves into a number of freebooting parties, which acquired the name of Rapparees, who committed a thouſand outrages on the defenceleſs inhabitants of the kingdom, while the troops of king William indulged themſelves at eaſe in their quarters, nor once concerned themſelves about the protection of the poor people, who ſuffered all the calamities of lawleſs rapine and cruelty. Thus ended the campaign in Ireland. Let us now take a ſhort view of the affairs on the continent.

By this time the grand alliance which William had formed againſt France was farther ſtrengthened by the acceſſion of the duke of Savoy, who, renouncing the neutrality he had hitherto obſerved, concluded a league with the emperor and the king of Spain, and openly engaged in the general confederacy. Lewis XIV. was no ſooner informed of the engagements which the duke had entered into, than he ſent twelve thouſand men into Piedmont, under the conduct of that brave and able officer monſieur Catinat, afterwards marſhal of France, with orders to demand of the duke, as a pledge of his fidelity, that he would deliver up to France his troops, together with Verrue, and the citadel of Turin, the capital of his dominions. The duke, confounded with this unforeſeen ſtroke, endeavoured to amuſe his enemy by ſubmiſſions and offers, till he could procure aſſiſtance from the emperor and Spain; but finding thoſe two powers only fed him with promiſes, he ſollicited aſſiſtance from the States-general and king William, to whom he ſent an ambaſſador in October this year, to congratulate him on his acceſſion to the Engliſh throne. William, highly pleaſed with the acceſſion of ſo valuable an ally, received his compliment with great civility, and promiſed to employ his utmoſt endeavours for his aſſiſtance. The French king, however, who was not to be deceived by fair promiſes, had before this ſent orders to Catinat to begin hoſtilities in Piedmont and Savoy, where the duke exerted his utmoſt endeavours to oppoſe the torrent which threatened the ruin of all his dominions. Victor Amadeus II. duke of Savoy, was (ſays M. de Voltaire, in his Age of Lewis XIV.) a wiſe and politic, though an unfortunate, prince: as as a general, his courage was indiſputable; he always headed his own armies, and expoſed his perſon on every occaſion like a common man: no one better underſtood the fineſſes of that kind of war which is carried on in an uneven and mountainous country, ſuch as his: he was active, vigilant, tenacious of regularity and military diſcipline, but ſometimes guilty of errors, both as a prince and a general. He was guilty of a fatal one, in the bad manner in which he drew up his army, in preſence of that of Catinat, near Saluces, or Saluzzo *, who taking advantage of his miſtake, gained a compleat victory over him on the eighth of Auguſt. After this battle all Savoy, except Montmelian, ſubmitted to the French. Catinat then marched into Piedmont, forced the enemy's entrenchments near Suſa, took that town, together with Villafranca, Montalban, Nice, deemed impregnable, Viellano, and Carmagniola, and returned afterwards to Montmelian, of which he made himſelf maſter in the ſpring of the following year, 1691, after an obſtinate ſiege.

Lewis XIV. had this ſame year (1690) another army in Flanders, under the command of the duke of Luxembourg, who had been a pupil in the art of war to the great Condé, whom he much reſembled in his character, having a fiery genius, a prompt execution, a quick diſcernment, and a mind greedy of knowlege, but too extenſive and irregular. The allies dreading the power of France, which was daily increaſing both by ſea and land, reſolved that the army of the States-general, under prince Waldeck, ſhould oppoſe Luxembourg, while the elector of Brandenbourg ſhould obſerve the motions of monſieur Boufflers, who commanded a third army for Lewis upon the banks of the Moſelle in Germany: but before the troops of Brandenbourg could be aſſembled, Boufflers found means to encamp his forces between the Sambre and the Meuſe, and thereby opened a free communication between his own army and that of Luxembourg. Prince Waldeck, ſenſible how much it behoved him to keep the French on the other ſide of the Sambre, detached the count de Berlo with one thouſand five hundred horſe, to obſerve whether the French attempted to paſs that river. The count having advanced as far as the village of Flerus, found that a good part of the French army had already paſſed the Sambre, whereof he immediately ſent notice to prince Waldeck; but it was too late: for being ſurrounded on every ſide, he was defeated and ſlain; and the next day (June 30) being the ſame on which king William obtained the victory at the Boyne, the duke of Luxembourg attacked the main body under prince Waldeck, which, after a very obſtinate engagement, was obliged to give way, leaving about four thouſand ſix hundred men dead upon the ſpot. The enemy took about four thouſand priſoners; but they bought their victory dearly, their loſs being equal, if not greater than that of the Dutch. The loſs of this battle is ſaid to have been occaſioned by the cowardice of the Dutch horſe, who abandoned their foot at the firſt charge: but never any infantry made ſo brave a retreat as thoſe under prince Waldeck; for notwithſtanding the battle was fought in a plain champaign country, and they were charged both in front and in flank by the enemy, they made ſuch an impreſſion upon the French by their regular, undaunted, and uniform fire, that the latter durſt not attempt to make the leaſt purſuit, but ſuffered the Dutch to march off with the utmoſt compoſure. This was the only action in Flanders this campaign.

In the ſpring of this year the emperor Leopold's ſon Joſeph was, by the electoral college, advanced to the dignity of king of the Romans: but his affairs ſuffered an irreparable loſs in the death of the brave duke of Lorraine, which happened ſuddenly, after a few hours illneſs only, on the eighth of April, aged forty-ſeven years, not without ſuſpicion of having been poiſoned by the procurement of the French monarch, whoſe boundleſs ambition he had conſtantly and courageouſly oppoſed. We are, however, to be cautious how we too readily believe ſuch reports without good authority. The duke himſelf, in a note he wrote to the emperor a little before he expired, expreſſed himſelf as if he thought he had met with foul play: "I am dying, ſays he: I know not whether I am paying by my death the ordinary debt of nature; or whether I am ſacrificed to the unjuſt and ambitious views of a crown which has declared itſelf an implacable enemy to me and my family †. The command of the imperial army was, upon his demiſe, given to the elector of Bavaria, who was preſently after joined by the elector of Saxony and his two ſons. The dauphin had croſſed the Rhine at the head of forty thouſand men, with a deſign to force his way into Wirtemberg; but the imperial general, by his conduct and carriage, defeated his attempt, and obliged him to remain on the defenſive during the remaining part of the campaign. After this account of the foreign tranſactions which relate to king William, as head of the confederacy againſt France, it is now time to return to England.

King William, on his return from his Iriſh expedition, was congratulated upon his victory at the Boyne, and his other ſucceſſes in that kingdom, by the city of London; and addreſſes of the ſame tenor came up from moſt of the towns and counties in England. This could not fail to be highly pleaſing to the king, who, ſo far from thinking of indulging himſelf in an eaſy inactivity during the reſt of the year, had actually formed the deſign of going over to Flanders, to put himſelf at the head of the allied army; but the ſeaſon being now ſo far advanced, as to render it neceſſary for the troops ſoon to take to winter quarters, his majeſty laid aſide his deſign for the preſent, but at the ſame time determined to call the parliament together as early as poſſible, that they might ſettle the ſupplies for the enſuing year, and give him an opportunity of going over early in the ſpring to the Hague, to have an interview with the German princes, who propoſed to hold a congreſs or meeting there, in order to concert meaſures for the next campaign.

Accordingly, on the ſecond day of October the parliament met at Weſtminſter, and was opened by a ſpeech from the throne, wherein his majeſty told them, "That he had uſed his beſt endeavours for the reduction of Ireland, in which he had met with ſucceſs, and doubted not that he ſhould have been fully poſſeſſed of that kingdom, if the ſupplies had been given him in time laſt ſeſſion. He put them in mind alſo, that he had aſked no revenue for himſelf, but what he had ſubjected to be charged for the uſes of the war; recommended to them the clearing of his revenue, ſo as to enable him to ſubſiſt, and maintain the charge of the civil government: then addreſſing himſelf to both houſes jointly, told them, that he hoped they would proceed in their deliberations with ſpirit and concord; and that whoever ſhould go about to divert their attention from the important ſubjects he had recommended to them, could neither be his friends, nor friends to the kingdom *."

The lords and commons, in anſwer to this ſpeech, congratulated him ſeparately upon his ſucceſſes in Ireland, and on the queen's happy adminiſtration during his abſence. The commons particularly told him, "That he too freely expoſed his invaluable life, upon which the whole proteſtant intereſt of Europe depended; concluding, that they ſhould be ever ready to aſſiſt him to the utmoſt of their power: and as the beſt and trueſt way of expreſſing their gratitude, would endeavour effectually to ſupport his government againſt all his enemies †." As a proof of the ſincerity of theſe aſſurances, the very ſame day theſe addreſſes were preſented, the commons voted, purſuant to an eſtimate laid before them of the next year's charges, a ſupply of four millions (the largeſt ſum that had ever been aſked by a king of England) for the ſupport of the fleet and army, in order to compleat the reduction of Ireland, and for the more vigorous carrying on the war againſt France. Among other taxes for raiſing this ſum, one hundred thirty-ſeven thouſand ſix hundred forty-one pounds per month, at three ſhillings in the pound, was laid upon lands: the exciſe upon beer and ale was doubled: a duty was laid on Eaſt-India goods and foreign-wrought ſilks, and ſeveral other goods imported; and a duty was impoſed upon new wines and ſpirits of the firſt extraction. A ſupply of five hundred and ſeventy thouſand pounds was voted to be raiſed on theſe additional duties, for building ſeventeen third-rate ſhips, of ſixty guns each, beſides the ſhips already provided to be built ‡. They alſo reſolved that the ſum of one million ſhould be raiſed by the ſale of forfeited eſtates in Ireland, and that a bill ſhould be prepared for confiſcating theſe eſtates, with a clauſe empowering his majeſty to grant a third part of them to thoſe who had ſerved in the war. This clauſe was repealed, and many petitions were preſented againſt the bill by creditors and heirs who had continued faithful. Theſe petitions however were rejected by the commons, who on this occaſion ſuffered their zeal for the ſervice of the king, to get the better of that attention they owed to the lawful and juſt remonſtrances of their fellow-ſubjects, and they unanimouſly paſſed the bill §: but when it went up to the houſe of lords, that auguſt body thought it their duty fairly to examine the merit of thoſe petitions: this took up ſo long time, that the bill was dropped for the preſent ſeſſion.

The exciſe-bill being ready, the king came to the houſe on the twenty-fifth of November, and gave it the royal aſſent: after which he made a ſpeech to both houſes, and thanked them for the large ſupplies they were raiſing, deſiring however that they would uſe all poſſible diſpatch, becauſe his preſence was required early in the following year at the Hague: at the ſame time he again put them in mind of providing for the civil liſt. His majeſty coming again to the houſe on the twentieth of December, paſſed the act for laying a duty upon Eaſt-India goods, the act for puniſhing mutiny and deſertion, and ſome others: and on the fifth of January the king, being impatient to be at the congreſs in Holland, came to the houſe, and gave the royal aſſent to the reſt of the bills of ſupply, together with a bill for appointing commiſſioners to ſtate the public accounts, in which there had been great miſmanagement; to a bill for raiſing the militia; to a bill for the relief of inſolvent debtors; and to another to prevent vexatious ſuits againſt ſuch as acted in defence of his majeſty and the kingdom. After which the king cloſed the ſeſſion with a ſpeech, in which he aſſured both houſes, that he entertained the moſt grateful ſenſe of the liberality and diſpatch with which they had granted the public ſupplies, which ſhould be faithfully employed in the ſervices for which they were allotted: that he would make no grant of any of the forfeited eſtates in Ireland, till that matter ſhould be ſettled in parliament, to the ſatisfaction of all parties: that he hoped they would take care to propagate, in their ſeveral counties, the ſame principles of zeal and attachment to his government, which they had ſo eminently diſplayed in parliament: and that he truſted the good underſtanding between him and his ſubjects, would be more than ſufficient to defeat the deſigns of their ſecret foes, and the attempts of their open and avowed enemies. Then the lord chief-juſtice Atkins declared it was his majeſty's pleaſure that the houſe ſhould adjourn themſelves to the twenty-firſt day of March ‖.

During this ſeſſion of parliament, a thankſgiving was ordered to be obſerved on the nineteenth of October, for the ſucceſſes in Ireland, and particular prayers appointed to be uſed on every Wedneſday and Friday during the war with France. On the fifteenth of the ſame month, the princeſs of Denmark was brought to bed of a daughter, baptized by the name of Mary, who died ſoon after. On the fourteenth of the ſame month a tranſaction happened, which greatly engaged the attention of the public. Captain James Campbell, brother to the earl of Argyle in Scotland, by the aſſiſtance of Archibald Montgomery, eſquire, and ſir John Johnſton, ſeized and forcibly married Miſs Mary Wharton, a rich heireſs of thirteen years of age; for which ſir John Johnſton was condemned to be hanged, and an act of parliament was afterwards obtained by the relations of the young lady, to ſet aſide the marriage between her and Mr. Campbell. For further particulars of this affair, the reader may conſult the fourth volume of the State Trials. And here we muſt not paſs unnoticed an attempt that was made by the Whig party, to revive the old impeachments againſt the marquis of Caermarthen (formerly earl of Danby) who had rendered himſelf extremely obnoxious to that party by his ſteady attachment to the Tories. and conducted by fourteen leading men, of whom the earl of Shrewſbury was the chief. Their deſign however came to nought; for the earl having performed an acceptable piece of ſervice to the government about this time, in detecting ſome deſigns ſet on foot by the Jacobite party to diſturb the peace of the kingdom, the affair was dropped *.

I ſhall cloſe the occurrences of this year with a ſhort account of ſome material tranſactions relating to the increaſe of our colonies, trade, and manufactures. In this year, 1690, general Codrington, commander in chief of the Engliſh Leeward Iſlands, by the help of ſuccours from England, joined to the regiments he had raiſed in thoſe iſlands, retook from the French the iſland of St. Chriſtopher's, in the Weſt Indies, ſending away the inhabitants to Martinico and Hiſpaniola, and peopling the place with our own ſubjects: he likewiſe retook the iſle of St. Euſtatia, of which the French had, the year before, diſpoſſeſſed the Dutch; as alſo the iſles of St. Martin and St. Bartholomew. He afterwards made an attempt upon the iſland of Guadaloupe; but in that he miſcarried.

In this ſame year ſir William Phipps, with a fleet and land-forces from New England, took the fort and town of Port Royal (ſince called Annapolis Royal), in the bay of Fundy, from whence the French had ſo greatly diſtreſſed our trade in America, by means of their privateers, as to acquire that place the appellation of the Dunkirk of America. King William, however, was obliged to reſtore it to France, by the treaty of Ryſwic, and it remained in their hands till the following reign.

Until about this year there was ſcarce any other kind of paper made in England but the worſt crown ſort; but the war with France occaſioning high duties to be laid on foreign paper, the French proteſtant refugees, in concert with our own few paper-makers, now began to manufacture white writing and printing paper, which in length of time has been brought to ſo great perfection, both for beauty and ſubſtance, that we now import only certain kinds of Genoa and Dutch paper. How great a ſaving this proved to the nation, may partly be conceived from what is affirmed by writers well verſed in thoſe ſubjects, viz. that to France alone, from whom we now take none, we paid annually for this article to the amount of one hundred thouſand pounds †. Beſides the many other benefits ariſing to England from the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, it proved of infinite ſervice to the Engliſh colonies in America; and particularly in this year, when king William ſettled ſome hundreds of French refugee families on the ſouth ſide of James's River, in Virginia, above the Falls, where they have ſince much improved that naturally fine country ‡. But to reſume the chain of our hiſtory.

King William, having obtained the ſupplies he deſired of parliament, as hath been already related, embarked for Holland on the ſixteenth of January, 1691, in order to aſſiſt at the congreſs of the confederate princes and ſtates, appointed to be held at the Hague, to concert meaſures for the defence of the liberties of Europe againſt the encroachments of France. He was attended thither by the dukes of Norfolk and Ormond, the earls of Devon, Dorſet, Eſſex, Nottingham, Scarborough, Portland, Monmouth, and Selkirk, the biſhop of London, the duke of Schomberg and his brother count Schomberg, and ſeveral other perſons of diſtinction: he was convoyed by twelve men of war, under the command of rear-admiral Rooke. On the eighteenth, in the morning, they came off Goree iſland: the weather being very thick and hazy, they hailed a fiſhing-veſſel, which paſſed cloſe by them, and aſked the maſter what diſtance he thought they were from the ſhore; who replied, about a league and half: upon this the king, who was impatient to be on land, reſolved to quit his yacht, and put off in a boat. Accordingly three large ones being manned, his majeſty got into one, attended by the duke of Ormond, the earl of Portland, the lord-ſteward, and the lord-chamberlain, and was followed in the two others by mynheers Overkirk and Zuyleſtein, and other attendants upon his perſon. There was no doubt made but that his majeſty would land in an hour or two; but the ſea being rough, and the fog growing thicker, they quickly loſt ſight both of the ſhore and their own fleet; and night coming on, they were expoſed, in very ſevere weather, to the dangers of the ſea, and of falling into the hands of the enemy, for above eighteen hours, during which the king and all his attendants were many times in imminent danger of periſhing. Providence, however, was pleaſed to order it otherwiſe, and about eight the next morning, the boats reached the Goree: here his majeſty and his retinue went aſhore, and, after taking ſome refreſhment, of which they ſtood in great need, took boat again, and, about two in the afternoon, arrived at Oranien-Haak, in the neighbourhood of Maeſland Sluys: at Hinnſlaar-Dyke, a few miles from thence, he was met and complimented by the deputies of the States, who conducted him to the Hague.

On his arrival in that capital of the United Provinces, the ſtates-general, the ſtates of Holland,

* On the fifteenth of November the king ordered a new commiſſion to paſs the great-ſeal, conſtituting the lord Godolphin, ſir John Lowther, Mr. Richard Hampden, ſir Stephen Fox, Mr. Thomas Pelham, commiſſioners of his majeſty's treaſury. About a month after, his majeſty diſpoſed of the vacant biſhoprics of Ireland, and appointed ſir Charles Porter to be lord-chancellor of that kingdom, and one of the lords juſtices, in the room of the lord viſcount Sidney, who was recalled to be made one of the ſecretaries of ſtate, on the twenty-ſixth of December: in the beginning of which month, colonel John Cuts was made baron Cuts of Gowran, in the kingdom of Ireland. On the thirtieth of the ſame month George-William duke of Zell, eldeſt prince of the houſe of Brunſwick and Lunenburg, was made a knight of the garter, an honour which juſt before had been conferred upon the elector of Brandenburg, afterwards king of Pruſſia: and on the firſt of January, 1691, ſir John Trevor, ſpeaker of the houſe of commons, and firſt commiſſioner of the great-ſeal, was admitted into the privy-council.

† Anderſon on Commerce, vol. ii. p. 196, 197.

‡ By the return of the books of the hearth-duty at Lady-day 1690, the number of houſes in England and Wales were, one million three hundred and ninety-one thouſand two hundred and fifteen, which, at ſix perſons to a houſe, makes the number of ſouls ſeven millions nine hundred and fifteen thouſand two hundred and ninety, or very near eight millions; ſo that reckoning one million and a half in Scotland, and two millions in Ireland, which may be fairly done, there will appear to have been at that time at leaſt eleven millions of ſouls in the three kingdoms. My author makes the houſes in Yorkſhire to be one hundred and twenty one thouſand fifty-two; in Wales, ſeventy-ſeven thouſand nine hundred and twenty-one; and in London, Weſtminſter, and Middleſex, one hundred and eleven thouſand two hundred and fifteen. the council of ſtate, and other colleges waited on him with their compliments and congratulations for his ſafety, after ſo great toil and hazard to his royal perſon. As his ſudden arrival had prevented the ſolemnity of a formal reception, he was ſolicited to make a public entry, which was accordingly performed on the twenty-ſixth of the month, with great pomp: triumphal arches were erected in the ſeveral principal ſtreets through which he was to paſs, with inſcriptions expreſſing his noble atchievements; the burghers appeared under arms, the cannon were fired, and the evening concluded with bonfires, illuminations, and other demonſtrations of joy. After this ceremony was over, his majeſty took his ſeat as ſtadtholder in the aſſembly of the ſtates, when he gave that reſpectable body a brief account of his ſucceſſes in England and Ireland, ſince he laſt parted from them; and concluded with the warmeſt aſſurances of ever continuing their good friend and ally. The heer Winchels, preſident of the aſſembly, then returned his majeſty an anſwer, in the name of the reſt, conceived in the moſt grateful and affectionate terms. After which the princes and other great men, who were already arrived to aſſiſt at the approaching conferences, were introduced, and paid their compliments to his majeſty.

And now was opened the moſt glorious congreſs that ever yet appeared of Chriſtian princes and miniſters, who aſſembled upon the moſt noble of all deſigns, that of oppoſing the encroachments of arbitrary power and oppreſſion, and ſecuring the peace, tranquility, and liberty of a whole continent.

The ambaſſadors and foreign miniſters preſent, were, from the emperor, the counts de Wenditſgratz and Borks, with the chevalier de Campecht; from the king of Spain, don Emanuel de Colonna; from the king of Denmark, the count de Rebenklam and M. Centhe; from the king of Sweden, count Oxenſtiern; from the king of Poland, M. Moreau; from the elector of Bavaria, the baron de Boomgarten and M. Prielmeyere; from the elector of Brandenburg, Meſſ. Van Dieſt and Smettau; from the elector of Saxony, M. Haxhauſen; from the elector of Treves, the baron de Leyen and M. Champagne; from the elector of Mentz, Meſſ. Talberg and Meyers; from the elector of Cologne, the general and baron Beruſaw and M. Soalmaker; from the elector Palatine, M. Hertermans; from the duke of Savoy, the count de Pielat and the preſident de la Tour; from the duke of Zell, Mr. Ziager; from the biſhop of Munſter, M. de Nort; from the landgrave of Heſſe Caſſel, the baron Gortz and M. Reppelaar; from the duke of Wolfembuttle, the baron Croſek; from the duke of Hanover, M. Klekk; from the duke of Holſtein Gottorp, M. Tourken; and from the prince of Liege, counſellor Mean: of king William's ſubjects, beſides thoſe already mentioned by name, who attended him out of England, were the lords Drumlanrigg and Durſley, and others. Many of the princes who had miniſters at the congreſs, aſſiſted alſo in perſon thereat, as the reader will find in the note at the bottom of the page *.

King William, as the ſoul of this grand alliance, opened the congreſs with a pathetic ſpeech, in which he laid before them "the imminent danger to which they were at preſent expoſed; plainly demonſtrated the impropriety of their former conduct, and the abſolute neceſſity of an immediate change of meaſures: that it was not time now to deliberate, but to act: that the enemy was already maſter of the principal fortreſſes which formed the barrier of the common liberty; and would ſoon be able to poſſeſs himſelf of all the inferior ones, if a ſpirit of diviſion, ſelfiſhneſs, and irreſolution, continued to influence them: that every one ought to conſider his own intereſt as involved in the general good: that the enemy's forces were numerous and powerful, and, if not prevented, would carry all things like a torrent before them: that it was in vain to oppoſe the pretenſions of injuſtice by unavailing complaints, unprofitable clamour, or fruitleſs proteſtations: that they were not the reſolutions of a peaceable diet, nor the hopes of ſome men of fortune built on a ſandy foundation, but powerful armies, bold enterprizes, and a prompt and vigorous execution, that muſt accompliſh the glorious work: that all theſe muſt inſtantly be employed againſt the common enemy, if they meant to check his progreſs, and to ſnatch from his hands the liberties of Europe, which he now held ſubjected to a cruel and heavy yoke. He concluded with aſſuring them, that for his own part he would not ſpare his forces, credit, or perſon, in order to effect ſo noble a deſign, but would come in the ſpring at the head of his troops, faithfully to make good his royal promiſes."

This ſpeech from a prince, in whom the whole confederacy placed an unbounded confidence, had ſo good effect, that this auguſt aſſembly ſpeedily came to a reſolution of employing two hundred and twenty-two thouſand men againſt France, of which the ſeveral princes and ſtates were to furniſh the following proportions: the king of England, twenty thouſand; the emperor, twenty thouſand; the king of Spain in Flanders, twenty thouſand; the States-General, twenty-five thouſand; the duke of Savoy, and the troops of Milan, twenty thouſand; the elector of Bavaria, eighteen thouſand; the elector of Saxony, twelve thouſand; the landgrave of Heſſe-Caſſel, eight thouſand; the Circles of Suabia and Franconia, ten thouſand; the duke of Wirtemberg, ſix thouſand; the elector of Brandenburg, twenty thouſand; the prince of Liege, ſix thouſand; the elector-palatine, four thouſand; and the prince of Lunenburg, ſixteen thouſand.

* The electors of Brandenburg and Bavaria; the dukes of Lunenburg, of Zell, and of Wolfenbuttle; the landgrave of Heſſe-Caſſel; prince Chriſtian-Louis of Brandenburg; prince Waldeck; the prince of Naſſau, ſtadtholder of Frieſland; the prince of Naſſau-Saarburg, governor of Bois-le-duc; the prince of Naſſau-Dillemburg; the prince of Naſſau-Idſtein; the duke, adminiſtrator of Wirtemberg; the two princes of Anſpach; the landgrave of Heſſe-D'Armſtadt; the prince his brother; the duke of Saxe-Eyſenach; prince Philip palatine; the duke of Zulſback; the prince of Wirtemberg-Neuſtadt; the prince of Wirtemberg, and the prince his brother; the duke of Courland, and prince Ferdinand his brother; the prince of Anhalt-Zeerboſt; the landgrave of Homburg; three princes of Holſteinbeck; the duke of Holſtein, prince of Commerci; the prince palatine of Berkenfelt: to which we may add the princeſs of Naſſau-Friſeland, the princeſs Radzeville, the counteſs of Soiſſons, the princeſs of Saxe-Eyſenach, and other illuſtrious perſons. The moſt remarkable of the counts were, the counts of Horn, Erbach, Tiremont, de Broca, de Gryal, d'Arco, de Rivera, de Sanfray, de Lippe, de Eſpenſe, de Fugger, de Denhof, de Carelſon; with the barons of Pallant and Spain, the Rhinegrave and his brother; the marquiſſes of Caſhlemonlayo, Caſtanaga governor of the Spaniſh Netherlands, and the generals Chauvert, d'Elwicht, Barfus, d'Autel, Valfi, &c.

These engagements however were so badly observed by several of the contracting parties, that England and Holland were forced to bear almost the whole expence and burden of the war. The next thing the assembly did, was to adjust the operations of the war, which was done among the princes themselves with such secrecy, that even their own ministers were not admitted to a knowlege of them. It is remarkable, that in this solemn interview there prevailed such an easy freedom, and such perfect unanimity and concord amongst the several princes, that none of those disputes happened on points of ceremony, which too often interrupt and retard negotiations of this kind.

The congress broke up about the beginning of March, and king William was preparing to return to England, when his departure was retarded, by advice that the French had collected all their forces, in order to take the field before the confederates could be ready to oppose them; and that Lewis in person had invested the city of Mons, accompanied by the dauphin, the dukes of Orleans and Chartres, and an army of 80,000 men. William upon this dispatched prince Waldeck to Halle, near Brussels, which was appointed for the general rendezvous of what forces could be drawn together: the king himself followed on the twenty-seventh of March, where he found an army of fifty thousand men; but, through the neglect of the Spaniards, so miserably deficient in all kind of necessaries for a march, that before the troops could be put in motion, news arrived of the reduction of the place: the governor being reduced to the last extremity, after having in vain waited for relief, was obliged to capitulate on the first of April, and surrendered the town on very honourable terms. After this disappointment, there remained nothing to require the immediate presence of king William on the continent, who therefore returned to the Hague, and embarking for England, on the 13th day of April arrived safe in London *.

Here he found, that during his absence the Jacobites had resumed their favourite scheme, in concert with France, of restoring king James. The persons chiefly concerned in this conspiracy were said to be the earl of Clarendon, the bishop of Ely, the lord viscount Preston (a Scottish peer) and his brother Mr. Graham: and William Penn the famous quaker, the lord Preston, Mr. Ashton a servant of king James's queen, and Mr. Elliot, were pitched upon to go over to France, and concert measures at the court of St. Germains. With this view they hired a vessel of one Mr. Prat of Barking in Essex, who, suspecting something from the eagerness the conspirators shewed to get under sail, and the high price they offered for their passage, communicated the matter to the earl of Caermarthen, who reported the same to the queen and council; whereupon proper persons were dispatched to board the vessel, which lay off Gravesend, when the three conspirators were found concealed in the hold. The lord Preston, who had letters about him from the chiefs of the conspiracy to king James, endeavoured to secrete them, but was discovered, and the papers taken from him. Upon examination they were found to contain several circumstances of intelligence, and other matters of a very treasonable and dangerous tendency. Hereupon a bill of high-treason was preferred, and found against the offenders by the grand jury. The lord Preston and Mr. Ashton were brought to their trials on the sixteenth, seventeenth, and nineteenth of January. Their design of going to France, and the treasonable papers found upon them, some written in the lord Preston's hand, and some in Mr. Ashton's, were fully proved; and for these practices they were found guilty and condemned. Ashton was executed, but lord Preston lay a long time under conviction by a reprieve, and his sentence was at last remitted. Elliot was not tried, there appearing no evidence against him. The earl of Clarendon was sent to the Tower, where he remained some months, and was afterwards confined to his own house in the country; an indulgence which he owed to his near relationship to the queen, who was his first cousin. The bishop of Ely, Graham, and Penn, absconded, and a proclamation was issued for apprehending them as traitors.

The discovery of the bishop of Ely's concern in this conspiracy, furnished the king with a fair pretext for filling up the bishoprics that had been so long vacant by the non-compliance of their former possessors with the act of parliament, requiring all ecclesiastics to take the oaths of supremacy and allegiance on pain of deprivation. Accordingly, the archbishopric of Canterbury was conferred upon Dr. Tillotson, in the room of Dr. Sancroft, who was now formally deprived. Dr. Simon Patrick, bishop of Chichester, was translated to the bishoprick of Ely, in the room of bishop Turner; Cumberland, to that of Peterborough, in the room of bishop White; Moore to Norwich, in the room of bishop Lloyd; Grove to Chichester, void by the translation of Cumberland; Dr. Fowler to the see of Gloucester, in the room of Frampton; and Dr. Beveridge, rector of St. Peter's in Cornhill, was nominated to the bishopric of Bath and Wells, in the room of bishop Kenn; but Beveridge refusing the offer, it was bestowed upon Dr. Kidder. Soon after their majesties nominated Dr. Sharp, dean of Canterbury, to the archbishopric of York, in the room of archbishop Lamplugh; Dr. Ironside, bishop of Bristol, to succeed Dr. Henry Crofts, lately deceased, in the bishopric of Hereford; and Dr. John Hall to be bishop of Bristol. Loud and vehement were the complaints of the deprived clergy and their friends on this occasion; the kingdom was filled with pamphlets, in which every effort of learning and resentment was exerted to blacken the character of those in power: the justice of a lay deprivation was warmly denied: the distinctions of De Jure et De Facto were now revived, and applied to the church-government, as it had formerly been to the civil administration. To frustrate these efforts of the malcontents, the court employed their engines to answer and recriminate; and, not content with that, recourse was had to the more powerful eloquence of the law: a proclamation was issued against papists and other disaffected persons, in which all magistrates were enjoined to make search and apprehend thoſe who ſhould, by ſeditious diſcourſes and libels, preſume to defame the government.

The reader will readily perceive how ſtrangely change of circumſtances operates upon the weak mind of man, ſince he cannot but recollect that the very practices which were now ſo ſtrongly condemned by the preſent government, had proved the principal means of bringing about the Revolution; and that the very prelates who were now outed from their ſees, had rendered themſelves reſpectable throughout Chriſtendom by the brave ſtand they had made in the late reign, when the religion and civil rights of the ſubject were invaded. Candour and a regard for truth has drawn from me this obſervation: I find myſelf obliged, by the ſame motives, to acknowlege that the perſons appointed to fill the places of theſe prelates, were remarkable for their moderation, piety, and learning, and moſt of them ſhining ornaments to the Engliſh church. But to return from this digreſſion:

His majeſty having ſettled affairs at home as well as the ſhort ſpace of time would admit, reſolved to ſet out for Holland, in order to command in perſon the confederate army in Flanders, agreeable to the promiſe he had made the allies at the congreſs; but firſt he gave the neceſſary orders for the total reduction of Ireland, that he might have nothing to t all off his attention from the war on the continent: and having appointed general Ginckle commander in chief of the army in that kingdom, his majeſty embarked at Harwich on the ſecond of May, ſet ſail with a fair wind for Holland, attended by a ſquadron of men of war under rear-admiral Rooke, landed the next day near Maeſland-ſluyce, and arrived the ſame evening at the Hague, where we ſhall leave him to take a view of the operations in Ireland.

The French king, who ſtill perſevered in ſupporting king James's deſperate fortune, had ſent his friends in that kingdom a large ſupply of proviſions, cloaths, and ammunition, together with three thouſand regular troops, under the command of M. St. Ruth, a brave and experienced general, who had greatly diſtinguiſhed himſelf in Germany. On the other hand, general Ginckle, who in conduct and courage yielded to few commanders of his time, having been lately reinforced by a body of troops under major-general Mackay (returned from the reduction of the Scots Highlanders) took the field in the beginning of June, and inveſted the town of Ballymore, which was defended by a thouſand men, under colonel Bourke. The batteries being raiſed quickly, made ſuch a breach in a place of no great ſtrength, that nothing remained in a few days but to give a general aſſault; however, the enemy ſaved our troops that trouble, by ſubmitting at diſcretion, after a ſix days ſiege only. There were taken ſeven hundred and eighty men, beſides four field-officers, and near three hundred of the Rapparees, or Iriſh free-booters, who had mixed themſelves with king James's forces to wait the fortune of war.

The general having put the town in a better condition of defence, marched from thence on the eighteenth of June: and being joined the ſame day by the prince of Wirtemberg, encamped at Ballymony paſs, from whence he advanced the next day to Athlone, ſituated on the other ſide the Shannon, and ſecured by the Iriſh and French army under St. Ruth, which was encamped in its neighbourhood. The Engliſh town was taken by ſtorm in two days, many of the Iriſh were killed in the attack, and more drowned by falling into the river, in their haſty retreat over the bridge to the Old-town. After this ſucceſs, batteries were planted on the twenty-ſecond againſt the Iriſh town, which did ſuch execution, that the caſtle and other ſtrong buildings were ſoon laid in ruins. The enemy, who hung out French colours, made a moſt obſtinate reſiſtance; inſomuch that on the thirtieth our general held a council of war, to conſider whether it was adviſable to continue the attack, or draw off: but the duke of Wirtemberg, the generals Mackay, Talmaſh, Ruvigny, and Tetteau, expreſſed themſelves ſtrongly againſt ſuch a meaſure, and propoſed paſſing the Shannon in order to attack the enemy, offering themſelves to be the firſt to conduct that attempt. Their opinion having prevailed, a detachment was ſent to paſs at a ford a little to the left of the town. Though the river was deep and rapid, the bottom ſlippery and full of ſtones, and the paſs defended by a baſtion which the enemy had erected on purpoſe; yet our Engliſh troops, whoſe courage and heroiſm ever increaſe with danger and difficulties, regardleſs of aught but glory, threw themſelves into the river, which they waded, amidſt the thickeſt of the enemy's fire; and having gained the other bank, threw in their hand-grenadoes, and then diſcharged ſuch a furious volley of ſmall-ſhot, that the enemy, unable to ſuſtain the charge, abandoned their works. This brave detachment being ſupported by freſh battalions, the Engliſh in an hour's time made themſelves maſters of the town, with the loſs of not more than fifty men. Mackay, Tetteau, Talmaſh, and la Meliorere, performed miracles on the occaſion, while general Ginckle, by his example, exhortations, and happy diſpoſition of his men, ſecured us victory. The French general St. Ruth, by an effect of that vanity and preſumption, which on many occaſions is but too much the characteriſtic of his countrymen, treated the attempt of the Engliſh to force the paſſage of the Shannon, with a contempt that did little credit to that prudence and circumſpection for which he had been hitherto diſtinguiſhed. In vain did Sarsfield preſs him to ſend ſuccours to the town: he laughed at that officer's apprehenſions, and it was not till too late that he found himſelf convinced, that no enterprize was too difficult for Engliſh courage. When we had got poſſeſſion of the place, he indeed ordered ſome detachments to march and drive our troops out again; but the thunder of the cannon from the town, which on our entering it was immediately turned againſt him, quickly made him glad to conſult his own ſafety by a precipitate decampment.

General Ginckle having put a garriſon into Athlone, and ordered the fortifications to be repaired, ſet out on the tenth of July in purſuit of the French and Iriſh army, who made a ſtand near Aghrim, a town about ten miles diſtant from Athlone. Here St. Ruth encamped in a very advantageous ſituation; and having by draughts from different garriſons encreaſed his army to twenty-five thouſand men, while ours under general Ginckle did not exceed eighteen thouſand, he reſolved to hazard a general engagement. Ginckle, notwithſtanding his diſparity of numbers, reſolved to fight the enemy. On Sunday the twelfth day of July both armies came to action. Of this famous battle of Aghrim, Story in his History of the Wars of Ireland, and other writers, gives us the following account.

The morning of the day appointed for making the attack proved so foggy, that general Ginckle could not begin any operation till about twelve o'clock, when the army crossed the river Suck, on the banks of which it was encamped, opposite to that of the enemy, whose center was posted on a rising ground, uneven in many places, and intersected with banks and ditches lined with musqueteers, and secured in front by a large bog almost impassable: their right was defended by intrenchments and by two Danish forts, and their left by the castle of Aghrim. The English having effected their landing, marched up to the edge of the great bog, and endeavoured to force the only two places by which it was passable, in order to gain ground on the other side. The enemy made a most furious resistance, and our horse were several times repulsed: but at last the troops on the right carried their point, by means of some field-pieces properly placed, and admirably well served. So much time however was unavoidably spent in these manœuvres, that the general would have put off the battle till the next morning; but a confusion that he observed in the enemy's camp, making him apprehensive that they intended to decamp in the night, he changed his resolution, and ordered his troops to prepare for the charge.

At five in the evening the left wing of the English attacked the right wing of the Irish, from whom they met with such a warm reception, that it required the utmost efforts of their courage and resolution before they could compel them to give ground. The Irish musqueteers who lined the ditches were strongly supported by their horse, placed behind them, and maintained their posts with a most heroic obstinacy; nor would they stir from one side of the ditch, till the English presented their pieces from the other; and then, having lines of communication, they presently took post in the next ditch, where they continued to make the same resolute defence. St. Ruth perceiving that his men were in danger of being overpowered, immediately reinforced them from his center and left wing: this motion being observed by major-general Mackay, that vigilant officer instantly ordered two regiments to go round the bog, and fall upon the enemy's left wing, weakened by the detachments sent off, as already mentioned; and at the same time our center advanced through the middle of the bog, tho' up to their waists in mud and water. After having, with unspeakable difficulty, gained the other side, they found themselves obliged to ascend a rugged hill, fenced with ditches and hedges; and these were lined with musqueteers, sustained at proper distances with squadrons of horse: there the enemy made such a resolute stand, and fought with such perseverance, that they pushed our men back into the middle of the bog, which St. Ruth perceiving, cried out in a bravado, "That now he had the English at a disadvantage, and would drive them back to the gates of Dublin." Our men were indeed most miserably hampered, and in a confusion that might have been attended with the most fatal consequences, had not general Talmash in this critical moment hastened to their relief with some fresh men, and gave orders to the broken regiments to halt and face about, which they obeyed with an unparalleled readiness and alacrity: they then in their turn charged the Irish (who had advanced upon them into the center of the bog) with such fury, as to kill above three hundred of them before they could retreat out of it; and marching forward regained the old ground from which they had been so lately driven.

While the infantry was thus engaged, Ruvigny's regiment of French protestant horse, which had formerly been duke Schomberg's, and sir John Lanier's being posted on the right, Lanier's was afterwards drawn to the left, where they did very great service; and the right wing of the English horse were in the mean time making the best of their way to succour the foot, being sensible of their extreme danger, and that all lay at stake. The cavalry, besides being exposed to a most furious fire from the enemy's dragoons, who were posted under a cover, were likewise obliged to press and tumble over a very dangerous pass; but having bravely surmounted all these difficulties, they lodged themselves at last in a dry ditch, in the hottest of the enemy's fire from Aghrim-castle, and some old walls and houses adjoining.

The battle now seemed doubtful for some time, or if there was any advantage, it was possessed by the enemy, to whose side victory appeared to be leaning: but major-general Mackay having timely reinforced the left wing with a body of horse and dragoons, first turned the balance in favour of the English. Ruvigny, who had distinguished himself by his diligence, courage, and activity, during the whole action, putting himself at the head of his own regiment of horse and another, scoured the side of the bog, and bore down all before him; which St. Ruth perceiving, resolved to attack him in an hollow way, which he knew he must be obliged to pass in his march to sustain the center. With this view he ordered a brigade of his own horse from the right wing to march up to the left; and putting himself at their head, began to descend Kircommodon-hill, towards the place which he saw the English endeavouring to pass; but when he came near this place, where the main stress of the battle was fought, he was killed by a cannon-ball.

The death of the French general decided the fate of the day: the French and Irish were so much discouraged thereby, that Sarsfield, who was second in command, in vain endeavoured to recover them from their disorder. Ruvigny observing the confusion they were in, pressed boldly on, and falling upon them sword in hand, drove them with very little resistance to the top of the hill, where their camp had lain; then their whole line giving way at once, they threw down their arms, and betook themselves to flight. They were hotly pursued for the space of three miles, and suffered a most dreadful slaughter; but night coming on, with a thick misty rain, prevented our men from getting between them and an advantageous post near Loughbreak. However, it was computed that there were no less than seven thousand of the Irish slain on the spot, while the English had only six hundred killed, and nine hundred and sixty wounded: a very inconsiderable loss, if we reflect on the great superiority of the enemy before the engage-engagement! The Iriſh took ſhelter in Limerick, where they reſolved to make a final ſtand; in hopes of receiving ſuch ſuccours from France as would enable them either to continue there, or obtain good terms from king William *.

General Ginckle, having allowed a few days for the refreſhment of his men after this hot encounter, marched to Galway, the moſt conſiderable place left in the poſſeſſion of the Iriſh, next to Limerick, and by a trumpet ſummoned the lord Dillon, the governor, to ſurrender the town. Though he at firſt refuſed, yet, upon part of the Engliſh army paſſing the river, and ſeizing a fort the Iriſh were building, he changed his reſolution, and ſurrendered the place on the twentieth of July, upon advantageous articles, and the garriſon were ſafely conducted to Limerick; to which place, the laſt refuge of the deſpairing Iriſh, general Ginckle ſoon bent his march, and came before it on the twenty-fifth of Auguſt.

The very next day the Engliſh made themſelves maſters of Ireton's and Cromwell's forts, which were now ordered to be called Mackay's and Naſſau's, becauſe gained under theſe commanders. Two days after, caſtle Connel and caſtle Garrick, two ſmall forts ſtanding upon the Shannon, three miles below the town, were attacked, and the garriſons of both made priſoners of war. The batteries were then opened againſt Limerick, and the attack of the place was carried on with all imaginable vigour till the ſeventeenth of September; but the reſiſtance of the enemy was ſo obſtinate, and the place ſo very defenſible, that a council of war was held in the Engliſh camp, to debate whether it would not be moſt eligible to paſs the river and deſtroy the enemy's forage, and then turn the ſiege into a blockade, rather than hazard the lives of the troops in fruitleſs attacks. The former expedient was preferred, and ſome ſteps taken towards putting it in practice, which filled the enemy with the greateſt joy, who took it for granted, by what they ſaw the Engliſh doing, that they ſhould ſoon be rid of ſuch troubleſome gueſts. Their ſatisfaction however was of ſhort duration; for upon a ſecond conſultation it was reſolved to preſs the ſiege, and at all events endeavour to make ourſelves maſters of the town. In purſuance of this reſolution, the Engliſh, in the night of the eighteenth, formed a bridge of boats over the river, about a mile above the camp, and a ſtrong party of horſe and foot was ſent over it; which ſtruck the enemy that guarded the oppoſite ſide of the river with ſuch a panic, that they threw down their arms and fled in haſte. On the twenty-ſecond general Ginckle himſelf paſſed the Shannon with a ſtrong detachment of horſe and dragoons, ten battalions of foot, and fourteen pieces of cannon, leaving Wirtemberg, Mackay, and Talmaſh, to command on the hither ſide of the river. The ſiege was now preſſed with redoubled vigour, and the batteries continued to play againſt the town with great fury: at length, the Engliſh having taken ſeveral of the out-forts, and made a lodgment within ten yards of Thomond-bridge foot; the Iriſh, finding themſelves cut off from all hopes of relief, determined to capitulate, which they did on the twenty-ninth of September; and on the firſt of October the lords juſtices of Ireland arrived in the Engliſh camp, where they ſettled all the articles of the capitulation, which were finally concluded on the third of the ſame month. By theſe articles, which were twenty in number, the Iriſh were all indemnified, and reſtored to the enjoyment of all the liberty in the exerciſe of their religion which they poſſeſſed in the reign of Charles II. They were admitted to all the privileges of ſubjects upon taking the oaths of allegiance, without being obliged to take the oath of ſupremacy: and not only the French, but as many of the Iriſh as choſe to go over to France, had free liberty ſo to do. In virtue of theſe articles, Limerick, and all other towns, forts, and caſtles, that yet remained in the hands of the catholics, were to be ſurrendered up within a limited time. Accordingly, the Engliſh were put in poſſeſſion of the place on the fifth; the French and many of the Iriſh were ſent away in tranſport veſſels, the remainder of their army in the field ſubmitting to be included in the amneſty.

By the ſurrender of Limerick, Ireland was reduced to the ſubjection of the crown of England, and a ſolid peace eſtabliſhed there, which has to this day continued without any interruption. Ginckle returning to England, was received with the higheſt applauſe, and, together with his general officers, feaſted by the city of London: nor was this all; for the commons, on the meeting of the parliament, in token of their gratitude for the important ſervices the general had been of to the ſtate, ordered ſeven of their members to attend him with the thanks of their houſe. His majeſty ſoon after created him earl of Athlone, and baron of Aghrim, that he might perpetuate to his poſterity the honour of his glorious atchievements; and to enable him the better to ſupport his dignity, he was gratified with a grant of lands in Ireland to a very large amount †.

The events at ſea this year were not very conſiderable. The Smyrna fleet being expected home this ſpring, and the Engliſh and Dutch having a joint concern therein, to the amount of ſeveral millions, both nations were extremely apprehenſive of its being attacked by the French fleet, then cruiſing off the Chops of the Channel and in the Bay of Biſcay, under admiral Tourville; and therefore ſtrict orders were ſent to admiral Ruſſel, to uſe his utmoſt care for its preſervation, which he executed with equal induſtry and ſucceſs: for having appointed ſingle ſhips to cruize for them on every point of the compaſs, he croſſed with the main fleet to Cape Clear on the Iriſh coaſt; and being off Kinſale, received advice that the Smyrna men were ſafely arrived in that harbour. Upon this he reſolved to conduct them as far as Scilly, and then, if they had a fair wind, to leave them to proceed up the Channel, having firſt taken the neceſſary precaution of ſending a frigate before to Plymouth, that he might be ſatisfied none of the enemies ſhips were upon the coaſt. After parting with this fleet, the admiral determined to go off Uſhant; and if the French were gone from thence, to follow them to Belleiſle; but not ſeeing any thing of them, he returned back towards our own coaſt; and arriving in the Channel, he ſent ſir Cloudeſley Shovel to look into Breſt, where he ſaw about forty ſail coming out of that port, which proved to be a fleet of merchant-ſhips from Bretagne, eſcorted by three men of war. Sir Cloudeſley on this occaſion made uſe of an excellent ſtratagem to decoy theſe ſhips into his hands: he knew the French had intelligence that a ſmall ſquadron of their fleet had made prize of ſeveral Engliſh merchantmen: he therefore ordered part of his ſquadron to put out French colours, and the reſt to take in theirs. By this method he thought to deceive the French, who might naturally ſuppoſe it that ſquadron with their prizes. This ſucceeded in part; but the greater number of the French diſcovered the cheat time enough to get ſafe back into port *. Towards the latter end of July admiral Ruſſel fell in with a convoy going to the French fleet with freſh proviſions. Some of theſe were taken, and from them he learnt that count Tourville had orders to avoid fighting; and though for the ſpace of a month Ruſſel did all he could to come up with them, yet they ſtill eluded his vigilance. The ſeaſon being over for action, Ruſſel wrote to be recalled; but before he could receive an anſwer, was overtaken by a violent ſtorm on the ſecond of September off the Land's End, which obliged him to bear up for ſo dangerous a port as Plymouth, where the Warwick, a third-rate, and the Coronation, a ſecond-rate, were loſt in coming to an anchor, and many others were in the utmoſt danger.

The admiral immediately gave orders for refitting ſuch ſhips as had been damaged in the ſtorm, and left ſir Cloudeſley Shovel at Plymouth to ſee it performed, ſteering himſelf with the reſt of the fleet for Spithead. Here he received orders to form a ſquadron of thirty ſail of Engliſh and Dutch ſhips, to be ſent to the coaſt of Ireland; and he accordingly appointed ſir Ralph Dalaval, vice-admiral of the blue ſquadron, to the command, who attempted four times to execute that duty, and was as often forced back by contrary winds †. Thus ended the naval operations of the year 1691, very little to the honour, profit, or ſatisfaction of the nation. Loud complaints were made againſt admiral Ruſſel for miſmanagement; whereupon the houſe of commons ordered the admiral's inſtructions, and the letters written to and by him, to be laid before them, which ſufficiently cleared him from all blame. It is now time to return to king William, whom we left at the Hague.

We have already ſeen that the French had taken the field much earlier than the confederates. Luxemburg, with an army of forty thouſand men, was advancing to beſiege Bruſſels, while the marquis de Bouffiers with another army ſat down before Liege. William, upon advice of theſe motions, loſt no time in putting himſelf at the head of his troops, and arrived in time not only to cover the former place, but likewiſe to raiſe the ſiege of the latter. The confederate army was now ſuperior to that of the enemy, and the king did all in his power to bring Luxemburg to an engagement; but that able commander, who was perfectly ſkilled in every art of war, as well defenſive as offenſive, ſo managed matters as to baffle all the king's endeavours, who perceiving he could not bring what he intended to bear, cauſed the fortifications of Beaumont, a place which he had made himſelf maſter of, to be demoliſhed, and marched the army towards Aeth, from whence he departed the ſeventh of September for Loo, leaving the forces under the command of prince Waldeck. In his abſence the French became ſomewhat more daring, yet not till they found they had gotten the confederate army at an advantage: for the prince having remained ſome time in the neighbourhood of Aeth, to cover and ſecure the adjacent country from the inroads of the enemies parties; and having, as he thought, provided effectually for that purpoſe, he moved off towards Benain; when Luxemburg, taking the advantage of this motion, advanced by great marches, and with ſeveral choſen ſquadrons of his beſt horſe fell upon the rear of the confederate army, as it was paſſing a little river and defile near Caſoire, charging ſo furiouſly, that after a terrible fight, the firſt line of the confederates gave way, and fell behind the ſecond; which, after ſuſtaining very hot charges, gave ground alſo; but their officers exerting themſelves with unparalleled bravery, ſo animated the men by their example and exhortations, that they ſoon returned again to the fight. Whereupon the French horſe, fearing to be encompaſſed by our infantry, retired, and left the confederate army to march on without any farther moleſtation. In this encounter we loſt one thouſand men: nor had the enemy much occaſion to boaſt; for notwithſtanding the great diſadvantage at which they had taken the allies, they had five hundred of their men left dead upon the place; among whom were ſeveral officers of note, and a great many afterwards died of their wounds. The ſeaſon being now far advanced, nothing of moment was farther attempted during this campaign, but both armies returned into winter-quarters. In the mean time, the duke de Noailles, with the army that acted againſt Spain, beſieged and took Urgel in Catalonia, while a French ſquadron commanded by the count d'Etrées bombarded Barcelona and Alicant ‡.

The confederates had propoſed to act vigorouſly in Italy againſt the French; but the ſeaſon was far advanced before they were in a condition to take the field. The elector of Bavaria was nominated to the chief command; but Catinat had already over-run Piedmont, and the duke of Savoy ſaw himſelf reduced to the brink of ruin, almoſt all his places of ſtrength being in the hands of the enemy, who now laid ſiege to Coni, a fortified town about thirty miles from Nice. The garriſon was reduced to ſuch extremity, that, unleſs ſpeedily relieved, nothing remained for them but to ſurrender the place, the loſs of which would have been attended with the moſt fatal conſequences. To prevent therefore, if poſſible, this additional calamity, prince Eugene, brother to the duke of Savoy, was ſent with a convoy of proviſions and two thouſand horſe. At Magliano he was joined by ſix thouſand militia. M. Bulonde, who by Catinat's orders conducted the ſiege, hearing of their approach, thought proper to quit the place, and ſeek for his ſafety in a retreat; which he performed with ſo much haſte and confuſion, that he left behind him ſeveral pieces of cannon, mortars, bombs, arms, ammunition, tents, proviſions, and utenſils, with all his ſick and wounded; for which he was, on his arrival in Catinat's camp, immediately put under arreſt. The inglorious retreat of the French from before Coni gave no ſmall reputation to the duke of Savoy's army, and that prince's affairs aſſumed a more favourable aſpect from this period *. Catinat retired with his army towards Villa Nova and Aſti, while La Hoguette, another French general, who had forced the paſſes of Aoſte, which opened an entrance into the Verceillois, and threatened Turin with a bombardment, was obliged to abandon his poſt, and retreat with his forces into winter-quarters.

The Imperialiſts, under the command of prince Lewis of Baden, had alſo the good fortune to gain a ſignal victory over the Turks at Salankamen, on the nineteenth of Auguſt this year, in which Kuperli the grand vizier was killed; and the prince of Baden afterwards took the town of Peterwaradin in Lower Hungary: but this did not put an end to the war between the emperor and the Turks; the Imperialiſts were ſtill obliged to keep the greateſt part of their forces in Hungary, and could not furniſh their quota of troops againſt France, which was a great diſadvantage to the allies. It is obſervable that the French have ſeldom entered into a war with their neighbours, but they have brought the Turks into Chriſtendom, who uſually make a powerful diverſion in their favour. Our attention muſt now be turned to affairs at home.

King William, after leaving the army, continued ſome time at the Hague, regulating the operations of the next campaign; and then embarking for England, attended by a ſquadron of men of war under the command of ſir Cloudeſley Shovel, arrived at Margate on the nineteenth of October; and three days after, viz. on the twenty-ſecond of the ſame month, both houſes of parliament met for the diſpatch of buſineſs. The ſeſſion was opened by a ſpeech from the throne, wherein his majeſty told the two houſes, "That he hoped the ſucceſs his forces had met with in Ireland would be a great encouragement to them to aſſiſt him with freſh ſupplies. He recommended to them the keeping a ſtrong fleet at ſea, and an army of ſixty-five thouſand men aſhore, that they might annoy the enemy in the moſt ſenſible part; adding, that they had now an opportunity of eſtabliſhing their future quiet and proſperity, which if they neglected they might never more regain †."

Both houſes hereupon congratulated his majeſty upon his happy return, after ſo many hazards in his voyage to Holland, as alſo on the ſucceſs of his arms in Ireland, promiſing to aſſiſt him in carrying on a vigorous war againſt France, in order to procure an honourable peace to his own dominions, and to ſecure his neighbours from the common oppreſſor ‡. A proclamation was alſo publiſhed for keeping a thankſgiving on the twenty-ſixth of November, "for his majeſty's preſervation from the great and manifeſt dangers in his voyage to and from Holland, and for the wonderful ſucceſs of the Iriſh war, whereby their majeſties were now happily eſtabliſhed in the full poſſeſſion of their three kingdoms." Addreſſes were alſo preſented to the queen, acknowleging her prudent care in the adminiſtration of the government during the king's abſence §.

Notwithſtanding theſe warm and loyal proceedings, it ſoon appeared that there was a very ſtrong party formed againſt the government. Theſe were the Tories, who by no means approved of the maxims or conduct of king William: they inveighed both in private and public againſt the folly and extravagance of keeping on foot a ſtanding army; they inſiſted that England ought only to aſſiſt her allies with ſome auxiliary troops, and that the management of affairs at ſea was chiefly to be regarded. To this the advocates for the court replied, that without the interpoſition of England the grand alliance would never have taken place, nor could a ſtop have been put to the ſpreading conqueſts of the ambitious Lewis, who muſt ſoon have reduced both Flanders and Holland, and in them have deſtroyed the commerce, and even the liberties, of this kingdom. The arguments againſt continental connections were ſo much to the taſte of the public, that the preſent government was in general greatly cenſured. Another principal cauſe of diſcontent was the evident partiality the king ſhewed to the Dutch over the Engliſh; and it was the general cry of the nation, that the former were the only perſons favoured and truſted, while the Engliſh were wholly overlooked. It muſt be confeſſed that king William took too little pains to obviate this general diſguſt, which ſpread both among the Engliſh officers and nobility, or to gain the affections of his Britiſh ſubjects. He continued ſhut up all day with one or two particulars only, and thoſe his own countrymen; and the ſullen reſerve and ſilence he obſerved when he did admit any of our nobility to an audience, gave them as much diſtaſte as a denial would have done. The earl of Marlborough thought that his ſervices were not ſufficiently rewarded, and began to ſpeak the language of a diſcontented perſon ‖. Let us now attend the proceedings of the parliament.

The commons on the ninth of November voted upwards of a million and a half for the ſervice of the navy and ordnance, and upwards of two millions for the ſervice of the land forces, for the enſuing year 1692, beſides the ſupplies given the year before for the civil liſt, and other uſes; ſo that there were about five millions of money raiſed this year ¶.

The king coming to the houſe of peers on the

By the poll-tax granted this ſeſſion, all perſons (excepting the poor) were to pay twelve-pence per quarter for one year; all tradeſmen who were worth three hundred pounds, ten ſhillings

the twenty-fourth of December, gave the royal aſſent to ſeveral acts *. After which his majeſty made a ſpeech to both houſes, wherein he thanked them for their reſolutions to aſſiſt him, but preſſed them to haſten the remainder of the ſupplies, that the enemy might not get the ſtart of him in the field, as they had done in the laſt campaign. But the diſpatch ſo much deſired by the king was retarded by ſeveral incidental affairs which engaged the atention of the houſe: one was a conteſt between the Eaſt India Company and ſome private merchants: the matter was referred to the examination of a committee; and the Company's defence was ſo little to the ſatisfaction of the examiners, that the houſe addreſſed the king to diſſolve the preſent Company, and grant a charter to a new one. The king returned this anſwer; "It is a motion of very great importance to the trade of this kingdom: I will conſider of it, and in a very ſhort time give the commons a poſitive anſwer †." However, his majeſty in the mean time was pleaſed to confer the honour of knighthood on ſir John Goldſborough, who was going to India in quality of the Company's commiſſary-general. The next affair that came before the parliament was the pretended diſcovery of a plot, by one Fuller, a priſoner for debt in the King's-Bench, who fell upon this ſtratagem to procure his enlargement: but having trifled moſt egregiouſly upon ſeveral examinations, and not being able to make good the leaſt part of his ſham-evidence, the commons were ſo provoked at his inſolence and preſumption, that they voted him "a notorious impoſtor, cheat, and falſe accuſer, who had ſcandalized his majeſty's perſon and government, abuſed the houſe of commons, and falſly accuſed ſeveral perſons of honour and quality:" and they farther reſolved, "That an addreſs be preſented to his majeſty to command his attorney-general to proſecute the ſaid impoſtor." Fuller was accordingly proſecuted, and ſentenced to ſtand in the pillory; which ignominious puniſhment he underwent with a ſurpriſing effrontery.

The public buſineſs met with a farther and more conſiderable interruption, by a very warm conteſt that aroſe between the two houſes, on occaſion of a bill for regulating trials in caſes of high-treaſon; which being paſſed by the commons, was ſent up to the lords for their concurrence, who on the firſt reading added the following clauſe to it: "That upon the trial of any peer or peereſs for treaſon, or miſpriſion of treaſon, ALL the peers who have a right to ſit and vote in parliament, ſhould be duly ſummoned to attend twenty days at leaſt before the trial, and ſhould vote at the trial of ſuch peers or peereſſes:" and with this amendment the bill was ſent back to the commons, who rejected to the clauſe, which occaſioned ſeveral conferences between both houſes; in which Charles Montagu, afterwards earl of Halifax, diſtinguiſhed himſelf as a manager for the commons; as did the duke of Bolton, the marquis of Halifax, the earls of Mulgrave, Rocheſter, Nottingham, Monmouth, and Stamford, for the lords ‡. After a long time waſted in fruitleſs arguments in both ſides, neither of which would give way to the other, the bill was dropped for the preſent, but it paſſed with the ſaid clauſe a few years afterwards.

The funds for the enſuing year being at length ſettled, the king came to the houſe on the twenty-fourth of February; and having given the royal aſſent to the money-bills, and ſeveral acts relating to civil polity §, he cloſed the ſeſſion with a ſhort ſpeech, in which he thanked his parliament for the zeal and attachment they had ſhewn to his government, and the liberality and diſpatch with which they had provided for the neceſſities of the ſtate, acquainting them at the ſame time with his intention of repairing ſpeedily to the continent. Then the parliament was adjourned to the twelfth day of April, and afterwards prorogued to the twenty-ninth of May.

In the courſe of this ſeſſion, Dr. Wellwood, a Scottiſh phyſician, was taken into cuſtody, and reprimanded at the bar of the houſe of commons, for having reflected upon that houſe in a weekly paper, entituled Mercurius Reformatus; but as it was written in defence of the government, the king appointed him one of his phyſicians in ordinary. But the moſt remarkable incident during this ſeſſion, was the diſgrace of the earl of Marlborough, to whom his majeſty ſent the earl of Nottingham, ſecretary of ſtate, ſome day in January, to acquaint him, that he had no farther occaſion for his ſervices, and therefore demanded all his commiſſions. Numberleſs were the conjectures of the public, on the cauſe of this nobleman's diſgrace: it was ſaid that he had incurred the king's diſpleaſure by ſome ſpeeches reflecting upon the Dutch favourites, particularly the earl of Portland (Bentinck) and the earl of Rochford (Zuyleſtein); it was alſo alleged that the king having formed a deſign to ſurprize Dunkirk, had communicated it to the earl of Marlborough, and he had told it to his lady, who is ſuppoſed to have acquainted her ſiſter, lady Tyrconnel with the ſecret, by whom it was revealed to the king's enemies; and that his majeſty thereupon thought proper to remove ſo imprudent a perſon from any place of truſt: thus much is certain, that the earl was not employed again, nor called to council, till after the peace of Ryſwick ‖. His counteſs was alſo forbid the court; and the princeſs of Denmark was deſired to diſmiſs her from her falings per quarter; all gentlemen and reputed gentlemen having eſtates of three hundred pounds per annum, and all clergymen and diſſenting teachers having eccleſiaſtical benefices or contributions of the value of eighty pounds per annum, twenty ſhillings per quarter; and every lord of parliament, ſpiritual and temporal, ten pounds per quarter, and all nonjurors double.

mily, which ſhe refuſing to do, it occaſioned a quarrel between her and the queen her ſiſter; upon which her royal highneſs retired from court, and removed to Sion Houſe, which ſhe borrowed of the duke of Somerſet. Great endeavours were uſed on this occaſion by the diſcontented party at home to get the princeſs to head their faction; but her highneſs gave not the leaſt encouragement to their meaſures, but continued to obſerve the ſame unblameable conduct which ſhe had made the ſole rule of her actions ever ſince the acceſſion of their majeſties to the crown.

Before I cloſe the tranſactions of the year 1691, I ſhall juſt take notice of an unſucceſsful expedition of our coloniſts from New England, againſt the French in Canada. It ſeems that the government of New England, finding the French very troubleſome neighbours, ſent out a fleet, in the ſummer of this year, of thirty-two ſail, with two thouſand land-forces on board, for the attack of Quebec; but this armament being eight weeks in ſailing up the river of St. Lawrence, they thereby gave the enemy time to bring all their ſtrength for the defence of the place, before which our people were repulſed, obliged to reimbark, and, in coming down the river, loſt many of their ſhips upon the rocks and ſhoals: and when two thouſand Engliſh and fifteen hundred Indians had marched over-land from New York, Connecticut, &c. they found no canoes to tranſport them over the lakes, and were therefore obliged to return home. In this unfortunate and ill-conducted expedition, the province of New England contracted a debt of one hundred and forty thouſand pounds; and there were ſaid to have been upwards of one thouſand lives loſt, by the different accidents attending it *.

As ſoon as Lewis XIV. perceived that it was impoſſible to ſupport the war in Ireland any longer to advantage, he came to a reſolution of employing the forces that were ſtill left king James, to ſerve his purpoſe another way: with this view he entered into a correſpondence with the Jacobite party in England for an invaſion on the coaſt of Suſſex: and though for this deſign it was neceſſary to draw together a great number of tranſports, as well as a conſiderable body of forces, yet he had both in readineſs before it was ſo much as ſuſpected here, ſo extremely bad was the intelligence of our court at that time. The land army conſiſted of fourteen battalions of Engliſh and Iriſh troops, and about nine thouſand French, commanded by the marſhal de Belfondes; ſo that in all there were full twenty thouſand men †. The fleet of tranſports conſiſted of three hundred ſail, and was well provided with every thing neceſſary for the invaſion: in ſhort, nothing was wanting to the execution of the deſign in the beginning of April, but the arrival of count d'Eſtrées's ſquadron of twelve men of war, which was to eſcort the embarkation, while Tourville cruized in the Channel with the grand fleet, which was alſo ready to put to ſea, but detained by contrary winds. Things being in this promiſing ſituation, king James ſent over colonel Parker, and ſome other agents of his, to give his friends intelligence of his motions: theſe arrived about the latter end of January 1692. This officer, with one Johnſon, had formed a plot for aſſaſſinating king William; but before they could execute their barbarous deſign, his majeſty, having ſettled all affairs at home, embarked for Holland: the fifth of March, and arrived ſafely at the Hague, from whence he ſoon after went to Loo ‡.

In this interval king James, finding his queen big with child, that there might be no more diſputes about her majeſty's delivery, ſent over letters, directed to ſeveral lords who had formerly been members of his council, as well as to divers ladies of quality and diſtinction §, acquainting them with his queen's pregnancy, and requiring them to attend as witneſſes at the labour. This invitation, however, was not accepted by any of thoſe to whom it was addreſſed. Thoſe among them who wiſhed well to his intereſt were reſtrained, by fear of incurring the reſentment of the preſent government, while the Revolutioniſts thought it a matter of little concern whether James's queen was really in a ſtate of child-bearing or not. Not long after, king James ſent over a printed declaration, dated at St. Germain's, in which he openly avowed his intentions of uſing all poſſible means to recover the throne of his anceſtors, and boaſted of the powerful aſſiſtance he expected from France; at the ſame time exhorting all his faithful ſubjects to continue their fidelity to him: he offered pardon and rewards to all of the prince of Orange's ſoldiers, or others, who would come in to him; and proceeded ſo far as to except by name from the ſaid indemnity no leſs than thirteen noblemen, two biſhops, ſeven barons, and a great number of clergy and gentlemen.

All this time colonel Parker, and other agents, were employed in inliſting men privately in the counties of York and Lancaſter, and the biſhopric of Durham, while Mr. James Fountaine, as lieutenant-colonel to the lord Montgomery, and colonel Holman, were forming two regiments of horſe in London, who were to join king James on his landing. In their zeal for their old maſter's ſervice, however, they overſhot the mark: for having entertained a notion that rear-admiral Carter was diſaffected to king William's government, they applied to him; and he having given the queen and council information thereof, he was ordered to feign an inclination to join the conſpirators; which he did ſo effectually, that they credulouſly gave into the ſnare, to the deſtruction of their plot and their

‡ Before the king went abroad he made the following promotions: Thomas earl of Pembroke, in the beginning of March, was made lord privy-ſeal, being ſucceeded as a commiſſioner of the admiralty by Charles lord Cornwallis; ſir Edward Seymour, bart. and Charles Montagu, eſq. were made lords commiſſioners of the treaſury, in the room of ſir John Lowther, vice-chamberlain of the houſhold, and Thomas Pelham, who reſigned; and Henry lord viſcount Sidney, principal ſecretary of ſtate, reſigning that office, was conſtituted lord-lieutenant of Ireland.

§ The letter was directed not only to the privy counſellors, but likewiſe to the ducheſſes of Somerſet and Beaufort, the marchioneſs of Hallifax, the counteſſes of Derby, Mulgrave, Rutland, Nottingham, Lumley, and Danby, the ladies Fitzharding and Fretchville, thoſe of ſir John Trevor ſpeaker of the houſe of commons, ſir Edward Seymour, ſir Chriſtopher Muſgrave, ſir Thomas Stamford lord mayor of London, ſir William Aſhhurſt and ſir Richard Levett ſheriffs; and laſtly to Dr. Chamberlain the famous practitioner in midwifery. good friend's fleet; for they preſently ſent over an expreſs to the lord Melfort, James's ſecretary, to acquaint him with their having corrupted Carter, who would take care of the officers of his ſquadron. They likewiſe ſent a liſt of the ſhips that compoſed the Engliſh fleet, deſiring lord Melfort to lay the ſame before the French king, and preſs him to ſend peremptory orders to Tourville to attack them before they could be joined by the Dutch ſquadron from Holland. Lewis, pleaſed to find his ſchemes in ſo fine a way of ſucceeding, commanded Tourville to put to ſea, and fall upon the Engliſh fleet at all events, without waiting for being joined by the ſquadron under count d'Eſtrees, while king James repaired to La Hogue, on the coaſt of Normandy, ready to embark with his army.

The court of England muſt certainly have been in great conſternation when they heard that James was on the coaſt of France with an army ready to invade them, and the Dutch ſquadron not yet come over to join our fleet. Queen Mary, however, who had the adminiſtration during the king's abſence, behaved upon this occaſion with great wiſdom and firmneſs of mind; for without diſcovering any apprehenſions of danger, ſhe took all the precautions that were neceſſary to prevent it, by publiſhing a proclamation requiring all papiſts to quit the cities of London and Weſtminſter; another for aſſembling both houſes of parliament; and a third for apprehending the following noblemen and gentlemen, who were ſuppoſed to be in her father's intereſt, namely, the earls of Scarſdale, Litchfield, Newburgh, Middleton, and Dunmore; the lords Griffin and Forbes; ſir John Fenwicke, ſir Theophilus Oglethorpe, ſir Andrew Forreſter, and others. Theſe proclamations were iſſued on the fifth of May, and the next day the earls of Huntingdon and Marlborough, with the lords Brudenell and Fanſhaw, were ſent to the Tower; and Mr. Edward Ridley, Mr. Knevitt, Mr. Haſtings, and Mr. Robert Ferguſon, to Newgate, on violent ſuſpicion of high-treaſon, in abetting and adhering to their majeſties enemies. The trained-bands of London and Weſtminſter, amounting to about ten thouſand men, were drawn out in Hyde-Park, and reviewed by the queen in perſon. Orders were likewiſe ſent to admiral Ruſſel, then lying at St. Helen's, to haſten out to ſea, in whatever condition the fleet might be.

King William, as ſoon as he arrived in Holland, had taken care to haſten the naval preparations there with unuſual diligence; ſo that the Dutch fleet was ready to put to ſea much ſooner than had been expected, or at leaſt much ſooner than it had done the year before, and in a much better condition: in ſhort, the Dutch ſquadron under admiral Allemonde, of thirty-ſix ſail, joined our fleet at St. Helen's about the middle of May; and the admiral was ſoon after farther reinforced by the ſquadron under ſir Ralph Delaval from the Mediterranean, and admiral Carter from the Channel *. While they lay at St. Helen's, admiral Ruſſel received a letter from the earl of Nottingham, as ſecretary of ſtate, written by queen Mary's directions; wherein he was informed, "That a ſcandalous and malicious report was ſpread, as if ſome of the officers of their majeſties fleet were diſaffected, or not hearty in their ſervice, and that her majeſty had been thereupon induced to order the diſcharge of many of them; but her majeſty charged the admiral to acquaint his officers, that ſhe was ſatisfied this report was raiſed by the enemies of the government, and that ſhe repoſed an entire confidence in their fidelity, and had reſolved not to diſplace ſo much as one of them †." Upon this the flag-officers and captains drew up a very dutiful and loyal addreſs, dated from on board the Britannia, at St. Helen's, May 15, 1692, which was tranſmitted to court, and preſented by the lords of the admiralty to her majeſty, who was pleaſed to return this gracious anſwer, which was publiſhed that ſame night (May 17) in the Gazette ‡: "I always had this opinion of the commanders, but I am glad this is come, to ſatisfy others."

The whole confederate fleet being now in a body, admiral Ruſſel weighed anchor from St. Helen's on the eighteenth of May, and ſteered over to the coaſt of France. Next morning about three o'clock, the ſcouts to the weſtward of the fleet made the ſignal for diſcovering the enemy. The admiral immediately gave orders for forming the line of battle, which by eight o'clock was in good order, having the Dutch ſquadron in the van, our red ſquadron in the center, and the blue in the rear. Tourville was confounded at the ſight of the combined ſquadrons: he might, as he was to windward, have avoided an engagement; but he had received poſitive orders to fight, on the ſuppoſition, as we have already mentioned, that the Dutch and Engliſh ſquadrons had not joined. Full of that implicit obedience which every Frenchman thinks it his duty to pay to the commands of his ſovereign, he reſolved to fight at all events §, and bore down upon our fleet with great reſolution.

tion. About half an hour after eleven he, in our ſhip the Royal Sun, of one hundred and four guns, brought to, and began the fight with admiral Ruſſel, within leſs than muſket-ſhot; in which poſture he lay about an hour and a half, plying his guns very ſmartly; but then began to tow off in great diſorder, his rigging, ſails, and top-ſail-yards, being very much damaged.

About noon the wind ſhifted to the north-weſt, ſo that five of the enemy's blue ſquadron poſted themſelves three a-head and two a-ſtern of their admiral, and fired very briſkly till after three. The admiral and his two ſeconds, captain Churchhill and captain Aylmer, had all theſe ſhips to deal with. About four there was ſo great a fog, that the enemy could not be ſeen; and as ſoon as it cleared up, the French admiral was ſeen towing away northward: upon which admiral Ruſſel crowded ſail after him, and made the ſignal for the reſt of the fleet to chace. While this paſſed between the admirals, ſir Cloudeſley Shovel was got to windward of Tourville's ſquadron, and engaged them; but the fog growing darker than before, they were forced to anchor. The weather afterwards clearing up a little, the French followed their flying admiral, while the Engliſh purſued with all the canvaſs they could ſpread; and the Engliſh blue ſquadron having again fallen in with the enemy, engaged about three quarters of an hour, till the latter, having loſt four ſhips, bore away for Conquet Road. In this ſhort action admiral Carter was killed, whoſe laſt words ſufficiently refuted the opinion the Jacobites had formed of him; for finding himſelf mortally wounded, he recommended it to his captain to fight the ſhip as long as ſhe could ſwim *.

The next day, the twentieth of May, proved ſo dark and foggy, that it was eight o'clock before our fleet deſcryed that of the enemy, and then there followed a general chace, the French crowding away to the weſtward. About four in the afternoon both fleets came to an anchor near Cape La Hogue. On the twenty-ſecond, about ſeven in the morning, our fleet reſumed the chace with all the ſucceſs they could deſire: about eleven the French admiral ran aſhore near Cherbourg, where ſhe was burnt by ſir Ralph Delaval, together with the Admirable, a ſhip of 102 guns, the Conquerant of eighty, and three others of leſſer force. Eighteen other ſhips of the fleet took ſhelter in La Hogue, where thirteen of them were burnt by admiral Rooke, who at the ſame time deſtroyed a great number of tranſports loaded with ammunition, in the midſt of a terrible fire from their fort, and in ſight of king James's camp. Sir John Aſhby, with the blue ſquadron and ſome Dutch ſhips, purſued the reſt of the fleet which eſcaped, through the Race of Alderney, among ſuch rocks and ſhoals, that the Engliſh could not attempt to enter without running the moſt imminent danger of being daſhed in pieces †.

Beſides the Royal Sun, of one hundred and four guns, the French loſt another ſhip of one hundred and two, one of ninety, two of eighty, four of ſeventy-ſix, four of ſixty, and two of fifty guns ‡. If indeed ſir John Aſhby could have come up with thoſe that took ſhelter in St. Maloes, it had in a good meaſure put an end to the French power at ſea. As it was, it muſt be acknowleged a moſt glorious victory, and perpetual praiſe is due to the memory of the brave men who atchieved it. From this time to the peace concluded in 1697, the French did not attempt to engage the Engliſh fleet at ſea, but contented themſelves with prejudicing our trade by their ſmaller ſhips of war and privateers.

The loſs of the French fleet was a fatal ſtroke to king James, who now ſaw all his hopes ſwallowed up at once; and, according to Burnet and ſome other authors, he wrote a letter to the king of France, wherein, after lamenting his own ill fortune, which he ſaid had proved contagious to all his friends, he intreated his moſt chriſtian majeſty no longer to concern himſelf for a prince ſo fated to diſappointments; "Since, ſays he, I doubt not to hear of the quick return of your majeſty's wonted triumphs over both your enemies and mine, when my intereſt ſhall be no longer intermixed with yours." Lewis endeavoured to ſooth his affliction by the warmeſt expreſſions of friendſhip, and a promiſe never to forſake him in his moſt deſperate fortunes.

Admiral Ruſſel, having ordered ſir John Aſhby to ſcour the French coaſt as far as Havre de Grace, returned to England to refit his damaged ſhips (none of which were loſt in the late glorious victory) and ſupply the fleet with proviſions. As ſoon as news arrived of the fleet's being anchored at Spithead, the queen ſent down thirty thouſand pounds to be diſtributed among the ſailors, and gold medals for the officers, to expreſs the ſenſe ſhe had of their fidelity and courage. She alſo gave orders for the bodies of admiral Carter and captain Haſtings (of the Sandwich) the only two

So that admiral Ruſſel had ninety-nine ſhips of the line under his command, and count Tourville but ſixty-three, ſome of which were detached in the time of action. It is however to be remarked, that though the confederate fleet had this great ſuperiority over the French, yet ſcarce one half of it could engage, which was owing to the diſpoſition made by admiral Ruſſel, upon notice that the enemy was at hand; for he made a ſignal for the blue ſquadron, under ſir George Rooke, the vice-admiral, to tack northward, in order to engage the French the ſooner, in caſe they had ſtood that way; but the fog which uſhered in the day diſperſing about four o'clock in the morning, they were ſeen ſtanding to the ſouthward. officers of note who loſt their lives in the engagement, to be honourably interred, at the charge of the crown. At the ſame time, in order to make the moſt of the conſternation the French were thrown into by their late defeat, it was reſolved to make a deſcent either at St. Malo's, Breſt, or Rochfort. Accordingly, in the latter end of July, ſeven thouſand men were embarked for that purpoſe, under the command of the duke of Leinſter; and the nation conceived the moſt ſanguine hopes of this expedition; but by ſome unaccountable negligence in the miniſtry, the whole ſcheme vaniſhed into air: and the ſoldiery, after having lain upwards of a month on board, were ſent over to ſerve in Flanders, where they arrived on the twenty-ſecond day of Auguſt. The general reflection of the more ſenſible part of the nation on this occaſion was, that the victory, which the favour of heaven and the bravery of our men had procured us, thoſe who were entruſted with the management of public affairs had neither ſpirit nor ſagacity to improve. The Dutch openly exclaimed againſt the treachery of the king's counſellors, affirming, that every thing that was tranſacted in the cabinet at Whitehall, was ſo ſpeedily betrayed to the French, that it was in vain to hope for any ſucceſs from deſigns concerted there. After the ſending theſe troops into Flanders, the great ſhips were ordered round to Chatham, and the reſt of the fleet divided into ſquadrons, as was judged moſt convenient for the ſervice; and thus ended the naval tranſactions of this year. From England we will now paſs over to the continent, and take a view of the military operations there.

Lewis XIV. to conſole himſelf for the diſgrace he had lately ſuſtained in the defeat of his fleet, laid ſiege to Namur, the ſtrongeſt place in the Netherlands, both by its ſituation, which is at the confluence of the Sambre and the Maeſe, and by its citadel, which is built on a rock. His army conſiſted of one hundred and twenty thouſand men, with part of which he inveſted the town on the fifteenth of May, while Luxemburg with the reſt covered his operations. The ſiege was puſhed with ſuch vigour and reſolution, that in eight days the French made themſelves maſters of the town, and of the citadel in twenty-two, while the duke of Luxemburg prevented king William from paſſing the Mehaigne, who had advanced to the banks of that river, at the head of eighty thouſand men, to raiſe the ſiege. After this conqueſt, Lewis returned again to Verſailles, and Luxemburg ſtill continued to make head againſt the army of the confederates *: and now it was that the battle of Steinkirk was fought, ſo famous for the military art and courage diſplayed there.

King William, rightly judging that it would be ſome reflection either on his conduct or courage, to have ſuffered a place of ſuch importance as Namur to be taken in his view, earneſtly ſought an opportunity to retrieve his reputation. With this view he formed a deſign to ſurprize Mons; but being diſappointed in this enterprize alſo, he determined to fight the French at all hazards, eſpecially as he had juſt received a reinforcement of eight thouſand Hanoverians. Marſhal Luxemburg had pitched his camp in a very advantageous poſt, covered by a wood and thick hedges, between Enghien and Steinkirk. Here king William reſolved to attack him, upon the information of ſome perſons who were thought to underſtand the nature of the ground, though it was found to be narrower, and more difficult of acceſs than the king had been made to believe it was. However, on Sunday the twenty-fourth of July, the army was ordered to march by break of day, and attack the enemy in their camp. The prince of Wirtemberg began the attack: the French were all aſleep in their tents, never dreaming of ſuch a viſit, and one entire brigade was cut in pieces before the marſhal knew any thing of the matter. He was then very ill; a fatal circumſtance at a time when uncommon activity was required: but the greatneſs of the danger ſeemed to give him new ſtrength: he changed his ground; gave a field of battle to his army which before was pent up; recovered the right wing, which was all in confuſion; rallied his men three ſeveral times, and three times charged at the head of the houſhold troops; and all this in leſs than two hours. He had with him in his army the duke of Chartres, a grandſon of France, who was then not above fifteen years old, and conſequently could be of but little ſervice in any great operation; but his preſence contributed much to animate the ſoldiers. A grandſon and a grand-nephew of the great Condé ſerved alſo under Luxemburg as lieutenant generals: the one was the duke of Bourbon, the other the prince of Conti. Theſe two were rivals in courage, ambition, and fame, and exerted themſelves in a memorable manner to retrieve the fortune of the day. All theſe princes put themſelves at the head of the rallied troops, and made a moſt furious and deſperate reſiſtance. Wirtemberg, unable to contend with ſuch ſuperior numbers, ſent ſeveral meſſages to count Solmes, ſolliciting a reinforcement: but that nobleman, from ſome pique he had conceived againſt the Engliſh, diſregarded his requeſt. The king being informed of the danger his troops were expoſed to, ſent orders to the count to march to their aſſiſtance; but the horſe, on account of the unevenneſs of the ground, could be of no ſervice; ſo that the Britiſh troops, with a few Dutch and Danes, ſuſtained the whole fury of the fight. At length Boufflers, who was poſted with a ſtrong body of dragoons at ſome diſtance from the field of battle, coming up and joining the French army, the confederates, unable to withſtand this additional ſuperiority, gave way, though the retreat was performed in good order; for the French, contenting themſelves with having thus retrieved their affairs, did not offer to moleſt them. On the other hand, king William would not venture to renew the engagement, for fear of expoſing his whole army to the danger of a defeat, and therefore drew off his forces. In this attack, which was a very deſperate one, we loſt five or ſix thouſand men at leaſt; and among them lieutenant-general Mackay, ſir John Lanier, the earl of Angus, ſir Robert Douglas, and ſeveral other officers of diſtinction. The loſs of the French was alſo very conſiderable, both in private men and officers of rank; and they would have ſuffered ſtill more, had it not been for the treachery of one Millevoix, ſecretary to the elector of Bavaria, who had for a conſiderable time made it his practice to ſend intelligence to the enemy of all the plans agreed upon by the allies in their councils of war. Being detected on this occaſion, he was hanged on a tree on the right wing of the confederate army.

But a ſcene of greater treachery was about this time happily brought to light: for the French court, finding that they could not deſtroy king William in open war, reſolved to take him off by ſecret villainy; and an attempt was now ſet on foot againſt his life by the management of Barbeſieux, ſecretary of ſtate to Lewis XIV. and one colonel Parker, who had fled to that court. Grandval, a French knight of a deſperate fortune, was encouraged with conſiderable ſums in hand, and ſtill more conſiderable promiſes, to aſſaſſinate the king of England as he ſhould ride out at the head of the troops, or upon any other advantage as he could find it, by laying in ambuſh and ſhooting at him. Troops were accordingly ordered to be near at hand, to ſupport and bring him off as ſoon as the murder was perpetrated. Grandval took two other perſons into the confederacy as his aſſiſtants; one Du Mont, and Leefdale a Dutch papiſt. Theſe three had ſeveral times attempted to put their helliſh purpoſe in execution, as well at Loo, while the king was there, as in the camp. Du Mont had entered into the confederate army as a deſerter, in order to have the fairer opportunity: but being at length diſcouraged by ſeveral diſappointments, and ſtruck with horror at the thought of the villainy he was engaged in, he made a full diſcovery of the whole plot. Hereupon Grandval was ſeized as he was ſkulking about the king's quarters; and being examined before a court-martial, for ſome time obſtinately denied any knowlege of the intended aſſaſſination, till being confronted with Du Mont, and ſome papers produced, in which the whole plan of operations was laid down, he at length confeſſed the deſign, with all the circumſtances that had attended it from time to time, and made a full diſcovery of the perſons who had ſet him on and were to ſupport him *. Upon full evidence of his guilt he received ſentence of death, as in caſes of high-treaſon, and was drawn, hanged, and quartered, his head and quarters being, by way of terror, ſet upon poles without the camp. Du Mont and Leefdale were allowed to eſcape with their lives, on account of being evidences to convict Grandval.

Not long after the battle of Steenkirk, the count Sericlas de Tilly fell in with a ſtrong detachment of French, ſent out of Namur to put the country under contribution, whom he totally defeated, taking four hundred priſoners, and amongſt them thirty officers, ſome of conſiderable note, who were ſent to Hays: amongſt the ſlain was the marquis of Hocquincourt. Our army being about the ſame time reinforced by the recruits from England under the duke of Leinſter, a detachment from the camp, under the command of lieutenant-general Talmaſh, was ſent towards Newport, when they poſſeſſed themſelves of Furnes, a very important poſt, and fortified it; and ſoon after ſeized on Dixmuyde, with the villages, and all the dependent territories. Many ſkirmiſhes happened during theſe tranſactions, but none worthy of notice here. In Germany the town of Reinfeldt was inveſted this year by count Tallard. On the ſide of Italy, the duke of Savoy made an invaſion into Dauphine, but ſoon retired; and the ſeaſon now advancing to cloſe the campaign, many of the troops were ſent into winter-quarters, and the reſt had their rendezvous appointed for ſome time longer, to prevent the enemy making incurſions. King William having conferred the command of the allied army on the elector of Bavaria, embarked for England on the fifteenth day of October, arrived at Yarmouth the eighteenth, was met by the queen at Newhall on the twentieth, and proceeded to his capital, where he was received with great acclamations by the people.

In the courſe of this year the proteſtant intereſt in Germany received a conſiderable addition of ſtrength, by the creation of a new electorate, in favour of Erneſt Auguſtus duke of Hanover, through the application and interpoſition of king William. After a tedious negotiation, the duke of Hanover was honoured with the inveſtiture, under the title of Elector of Brunſwick, and created great marſhal of the empire; but as he had not attained the conſent of all the electors, he was not as yet admitted into the college †.

During the king's abſence, a ſham plot was diſcovered by one Young, a priſoner in Newgate. This miſcreant had formed a pretended aſſociation in favour of king James; to which he had counterfeited the hands of the earls of Marlborough and Saliſbury, Sprat biſhop of Rocheſter, the lord Cornbury, eldeſt ſon to the earl of Clarendon, and ſir Baſil Firebrace. This paper was artfully dropped in the biſhop's hall, where it was found by the king's meſſenger, in conſequence of Young's information. The biſhop was thereupon apprehended; but the forgery being ſoon after fully detected, his lordſhip was ſet at liberty; and the earl of Marlborough, who had been impriſoned in the Tower, was admitted to bail. Young the impoſtor was afterwards brought to his trial at the King's-Bench bar, and ſentenced to ſtand three times in the pillory, and to continue in priſon till he ſhould pay a fine of one thouſand pounds.

Now it was that the affair of the Glencoe men in Scotland was greatly talked of throughout the kingdom, and repreſented as bad as the maſſacres at Paris and in Ireland, and the whole blame laid upon the king as his act and deed, though the Scottiſh parliament, upon making a ſtrict enquiry

† In the beginning of September this year, the ſhock of an earthquake was felt in London, and in many other parts of England, as well as in France, Germany, and the Netherlands. Violent agitations of the ſame kind had happened about two months before in Sicily and Malta. In the former, eſpecially, no leſs than an hundred thouſand perſons are ſaid to have periſhed on the occaſion. into this affair in the year 1695, reſolved, "That the perſons concerned in it had exceeded his majeſty's inſtructions for ſuppreſſing the Highland rebels who had not accepted the indemnity that was offered by the time prefixed in the proclamation." I ſhall, however, relate the ſtory with all its circumſtances, as given us by biſhop Burnet (in the ſecond volume of his Hiſtory of his own Times, p. 88, &c.) and leave the reader to make his own reflections upon it.

"There was at this time (in the beginning of this year 1692) a very barbarous maſſacre committed in Scotland, which ſhewed both the cruelty and treachery of ſome of thoſe who had unhappily inſinuated themſelves into the king's confidence. The earl of Braidalbin formed a ſcheme of quieting all the Highlanders, if the king would give twelve or fifteen thouſand pounds for doing it; which ſum was remitted down from England, and this was to be divided among the heads of the tribes or clans of the Highlanders. He employed his emiſſaries among them, and told them, the beſt ſervice they could do king James was to lie quiet, and reſerve themſelves to a better time; and if they would take the oaths, the king would be contented with that, and they would have a ſhare of this ſum that was ſent down to buy their quiet; but this came to nothing: their demands roſe high: they knew this lord had money to diſtribute among them: they believed he intended to keep the beſt part of it himſelf; ſo they aſked more than he could give. Among the moſt clamorous and obſtinate of theſe were the Macdonalds of Glencoe, who were believed guilty of much robbery and murders, and ſo had gained too much by their pilfering war to be eaſily brought to give it over. The head of that Valley had ſo particularly provoked lord Braidalbin, that as his ſcheme was quite defeated by the oppoſition which the other raiſed, ſo he deſigned a ſeverer revenge. The king had by a proclamation offered an indemnity to all the Highlanders that had been in arms againſt him, upon their coming in by a prefixed day to take the oaths. The day had been twice or thrice prolonged, and it was at laſt carried to the end of the year 1691, with a poſitive threatening of proceeding to military execution againſt ſuch as ſhould not come into his obedience by the laſt day of December.

"All were ſo terrified that they came in; and even Macdonald went to the governor of Fort-William; but he being only a military man, could or would not tender them, and Macdonald was forced to ſeek for ſome of the legal magiſtrates to tender them to him. The ſnows were then fallen, ſo that four or five days paſſed before he could come to a magiſtrate. He took the oaths in his preſence on the fifth or ſixth of January, when, by the ſtrictneſs of the law, he could claim no benefit by them. The matter was ſignified to the council, and the perſon had a reprimand for giving him the oaths when the day was paſt.

"This was kept up from the king, and the earl of Braidalbin came to court to give an account of his diligence, and to bring back the money, ſince he could not do the ſervice for which he had it. He informed againſt this Macdonald as the chief perſon who had defeated that good deſign; and that he might gratify his own revenge, and render the king odious to all the Highlanders, he propoſed that orders ſhould be ſent for a military execution on thoſe of Glencoe. An inſtruction was drawn by a ſecretary of ſtate to be both ſigned and counterſigned by the king (that ſo he (lord Braidalbin) might bear no part of the blame, but that it might lay wholly on the king) that ſuch as had not taken the oaths by the time limited ſhould be ſhut out of the benefit of the indemnity, and be received only upon mercy: but when it was found this would not authorize what was intended, a ſecond order was got to be ſigned and counterſigned, that if the Glencoe men could be ſeparated from the reſt of the Highlanders, ſome examples might be made of them, in order to ſtrike terror into the reſt. The king ſigned this order without any enquiry about it; for he was too apt to ſign papers in a hurry, without examining the importance of them. This was one effect of his ſlowneſs in diſpatching buſineſs: for as he was apt to ſuffer things to run on till there was a great heap of papers laid before him, ſo then he ſigned them a little too precipitately: but all this while the king knew nothing of Macdonald's offering to take the oaths within the time, and of his taking them ſoon after it was paſt when he came to a proper magiſtrate. As theſe orders were ſent down, the ſecretary of ſtate writ many private letters to Livingſtone, who commanded in Scotland, giving him a ſtrict charge and particular directions for the execution of them, and the paſſes in the Valley to be kept, deſcribing them ſo minutely, that the orders were certainly drawn by one who knew the country well. He gave alſo a poſitive direction that no priſoners ſhould be taken, that ſo the execution might be as terrible as poſſible. He preſſed this upon Livingſtone with ſtrains of vehemence, that looked as if there was ſomething more than ordinary in it: he indeed grounded it on his zeal for the king's ſervice, adding, that ſuch rebels and murderers ſhould be made an example of.

"In February 1692 a company was ſent to Glencoe, who were kindly received, and quartered over the Valley, the inhabitants thinking themſelves ſafe, and looking for no hoſtilities. After they had ſtaid a week among them, they took their time in the night, and killed about ſix and thirty of them, the reſt taking the alarm and eſcaping. This raiſed a mighty outcry, and was publiſhed by the French in their gazettes, and by the Jacobites in their libels, to caſt a reproach on the king's government as cruel and barbarous, tho' in all other inſtances it had appeared that his own inclinations were gentle and mild rather to an exceſs. The king ſent orders to enquire into the matter; but when the letters writ upon this buſineſs were all examined, which I myſelf read, it appeared that ſo many were involved in the matter, that the king's gentleneſs prevailed on him to a fault, and he contented himſelf with diſmiſſing the maſter of Stair from his ſervice. The Highlanders were ſo inflamed with this, that they were put in as forward a diſpoſition as the Jacobites wiſhed for to have rebelled upon the firſt favourable opportunity; and indeed the not puniſhing this action with a due rigour was the greateſt blot of this whole reign, and had a very ill effect in alienating the Scottiſh nation from the king and his government." Let us now return to the affairs in England.

His majeſty, on his arrival at Kenſington, received a congratulatory addreſs from the lord-mayor and aldermen, with whom he dined in public by invitation. A day of thankſgiving was alſo appointed for the victory at ſea, and his majeſty's happy eſcape from the perils and dangers of war, and the private attempts of his enemies againſt his royal perſon. On the fourth of November the parliament met, when the king in his ſpeech to both houſes thanked them very cordially for their laſt ſupplies; congratulated them upon the victory obtained at ſea; condoled them on the bad ſucceſs of the laſt campaign by land, obſerving, that the diligence of the French in augmenting their forces was ſuch, that it would be abſolutely neceſſary to have as great a force to oppoſe them; and demanded a ſupply ſuitable to the exigence. He expreſſed great concern at the ſending ſuch large ſums out of the kingdom for the payment of the troops; an inconvenience, he ſaid, that he wiſhed they could find ſome way to remedy. He intimated a deſign of making a deſcent upon France, and hoped that his parliament would give ſuch ſpeedy diſpatch to the ſupplies, that the preparations might be timely and effectual: he declared that he had no intereſt but what was theirs, nor any other view but that of making them a happy people. "Hitherto, added he in concluſion, I have never ſpared my own perſon for the good and welfare of this nation; and I am ſo ſenſible of your good affections to me, that I ſhall continue ſo to do with great chearfulneſs upon all occaſions, wherein I may contribute to the honour and advantage of England *."

There was at this time a ſtrong party formed in the upper houſe againſt the meaſures of the government, which party was chiefly under the direction of the earl of Marlborough; ſo that, inſtead of receiving the king's ſpeech with that applauſe which was expected, they immediately fell upon an enquiry into the commitment of thoſe peers who had been lately impriſoned. This enquiry was conducted with great animoſity; but the king having agreed to releaſe theſe lords upon their bail, the affair at laſt was entirely compromiſed.

The commons, by occaſion of the thinneſs of the houſe, adjourned to the eleventh of November, when they preſented an addreſs of thanks to his majeſty for his ſpeech, and another deſiring that the ſtate of foreign alliances might be laid before them; and on the twelfth a bill was introduced for regulating trials in caſes of high-treaſon; they alſo voted thanks to admiral Ruſſel, and the commanders and ſeamen of the fleet, for their behaviour in the late fight off La Hogue. However, it having been much talked abroad that this victory had not been improved as it might have been, ſeveral inſtructions, orders, and reſolutions of councils of war, concerning the laſt ſummer's expedition at ſea, and the intended deſcent after the victory, were called for and examined by the houſe; and ſir John Aſhby, one of the admirals, was particularly examined in relation to the French men of war that eſcaped through the Race of Alderney into St. Malo's; when that officer gave an account of the proceedings of the ſhips under his command in and after the engagement, ſo much to the ſatisfaction of the houſe, that they directed their ſpeaker to acquaint him in form, "That the houſe took notice of his ingenuous behaviour at their bar, and that he had given an account to the ſatisfaction of the houſe, and was diſmiſſed from farther attendance †." Admiral Ruſſel was alſo examined the ſame day, in relation to the miſcarriage of the intended deſcent, who juſtified himſelf by the orders he received from the earl of Nottingham, ſecretary of ſtate; and the earl ſhewed that thoſe orders had been dictated to him by a ſuperior power; whereupon the matter was dropped, though not till ſeveral ſevere ſpeeches had been made againſt the miniſters in general, and his lordſhip in particular: the commons thought fit, however, again to teſtify their approbation of the admiral's conduct.

The houſe next proceeded to take into conſideration the article of ſupplies; and the proper eſtimates being laid before them, they reſolved to grant the whole ſum demanded, which amounted to about five millions, viz. near two millions for the charge of the navy and ordnance, two millions and upwards for the land-forces, including the extraordinary charges of the office of ordnance in relation to the land-ſervice, and the charge of the tranſports, hoſpitals, and other contingencies. Beſides which, the ſum of ſeven hundred and fifty thouſand pounds was granted to make good the deficiencies in the late quarterly poll. The civil liſt was provided for in the former ſeſſion, ſo that the expences of the government, ordinary and extraordinary, for the enſuing year 1693, could not be computed at much leſs than ſix millions of money.

In order to raiſe theſe ſupplies, a tax of four ſhillings in the pound was impoſed upon all lands, according to their yearly value; and all offices and employments of profit, except military offices in the army or navy. They likewiſe empowered his majeſty to borrow money on the credit of this tax at the rate of four per cent. and farther enabled him to raiſe one million on the general credit of the Exchequer by granting annuities. This was the firſt annuity-act, and was the principal means of involving this nation in debt. A third way of raiſing money was, by levying additional duties on goods and merchandize imported and exported, particularly the ſum of eight pounds on every ton of French wines. A new impoſition of eight per cent. was alſo laid on the capital ſtock of the Eaſt-India Company, eſtimated at ſeven hundred forty-four thouſand pounds; of one per cent. on the African; and of five pounds on every ſhare of the ſtock belonging to the Hudſon's-Bay Company; and they empowered his majeſty to borrow half a million on thoſe funds which were entirely ſet apart for carrying on the war ‡.

A bill was brought in this ſeſſion for incapacitating perſons having certain civil and military employments, to ſit in the houſe of commons, which paſſed the lower houſe, but occaſioned long and warm debates in the houſe of peers; in which the earl of Mulgrave diſtinguiſhed himſelf in a particular manner, by a ſpeech he made in favour of the bill. He obſerved, that the commons were the repreſentatives of the people: "But if, after they are choſen, ſays he, they ſhall change their dependency, engage in employments plainly inconſiſtent with the great truſt repoſed in them, what are the people to expect from them? A commoner who has a command in the army muſt have a divided duty; and perhaps his troops or regiment may be in ſome action abroad, and he muſt either have the ſhame of being abſent from them at ſuch a time, or from that houſe where he is entruſted with our liberties. There is another ſort of incapacity worſe than this, proceeded he, I mean that of parliament-men having ſuch places in the Exchequer, as the very profit of them depends on the money given to the king in parliament: Would any of your lordſhips ſend or entruſt a man to make a bargain for you, whoſe very intereſt ſhall be concerned to make you give as much as he poſſibly can?" After ſeveral other arguments of the like tendency, he deſired the houſe "to conſider of what great conſequence it might be that ſo many votes ſhould be free, when upon one ſingle voice might depend the whole ſecurity or loſs of the nation; adding, that the people could never be brought to bear patiently ſo great a provocation as the being debarred from a ſecurity in their repreſentatives; and would be eaſily perſuaded, by thoſe whoſe intereſts it was to inflame their minds with diſcontent, that all thoſe vaſt ſums which had been, and ſtill muſt be, raiſed towards carrying on the war, were not diſpoſed of in ſo fair a manner as they ought to be; and I am afraid, concluded he, that their money is not given, but taken." This bill however was thrown out, after a long debate, by a majority of two voices only; the argument againſt paſſing it being, that it ſeemed to eſtabliſh an oppoſition between the crown and the people, as if thoſe who were employed by the one were not fit to be truſted by the other. Various attempts have ſince been made to procure an act of this kind, but always without ſucceſs, for reaſons that are too obvious to be repeated.

Another bill was introduced much about the ſame time for eſtabliſhing triennial parliaments, which, after having paſſed both houſes, was rejected by his majeſty, who ſeems to have had no mind to part with a parliament which had been ſo liberal to him in their ſupplies.

A complaint was made to the houſe of commons ſoon after of a pamphlet, entitled, King William and Queen Mary Conquerors, which tended to make the lives and eſtates of the ſubject depend entirely on the will of the ſovereign. The houſe was ſo alarmed at the pernicious tendency of this book, that they ordered it to be burnt by the hands of the common hangman, together with biſhop Burnet's Paſtoral Letter to the Clergy of his Dioceſe, in which this notion of conqueſt had been firſt advanced. After which both houſes, in order to ſhew their ſentiments of the matter, came to this reſolution, That the aſſertion of king William and queen Mary being king and queen by conqueſt, was highly injurious to their majeſties rightful title to the crown, inconſiſtent with the principles on which this government was founded, and tended to the ſubverſion of the rights of the people *. The lords ſhortly after taking into conſideration the ill ſucceſs of the campaign in Flanders, reflected ſeverely on count Solmes, as the principal cauſe of the defeat at Steinkirk, and preſented an addreſs to his majeſty, humbly entreating that the commanding officer of the Engliſh forces ſhould be a native of his majeſty's dominions; that Engliſh officers might take rank of thoſe in the confederate armies who did not belong to crowned heads; and laſtly, that no foreigner ſhould ſit at the board of ordnance. To this addreſs the king only replied, that he would take it into conſideration. They next proceeded to enquire into the failure of the intended deſcent upon the French coaſt, and paſſed ſome votes reflecting on the conduct of admiral Ruſſel; but the commons ſtill adhered to their former opinion, and repeated their thanks to that admiral for his fidelity, courage, and conduct.

There was a grievance at this time much complained of, namely, the preſſing landmen for the ſea-ſervice by the officers of the navy, who carried them over to Holland, and there ſold them to the officers of the army; which infamous practice would in all probability have paſſed unnoticed, had not a ſervant belonging to one of the members of parliament been thus ſpirited away. Sir John Trevor the ſpeaker being ordered to lay this oppreſſion before his majeſty, the king was pleaſed to expreſs a juſt reſentment on the occaſion, and ordered that no officers ſhould preſume to preſs landmen for the future, on pain of being caſhiered. The parliament next proceeded to take into conſideration the ſtate of Ireland, concerning which they examined a number of witneſſes, and then both houſes preſented addreſſes to his majeſty †; wherein they complained of the conditions that had been granted the Iriſh on the ſurrender of Limerick, and of the king's diſpoſal of ſome of the forfeited eſtates and effects in that kingdom; as alſo of the licentiouſneſs of the ſoldiers for want of pay in that kingdom, which, they ſaid, they hoped they had provided for. They complained of the recruiting of his majeſty's troops with Iriſh papiſts, of the ſelling the forfeited eſtates at under rates, to the prejudice of the revenue, the embezzlement of the ſtores in the towns and garriſons taken from king James, as alſo of the forfeited eſtates and goods; and repreſented that certain additions made to the articles of Limerick, after the ſaid articles had been ſigned, had given great encouragement to the Iriſh papiſts, and conſiderably weakened the Engliſh intereſt in that country. Theſe abuſes they moſt humbly beſought his majeſty to redreſs, particularly that the ſoldiers might be paid their arrears, and that no Iriſh papiſt might ſerve in the army there; that no grant might be made of the forfeited eſtates in Ireland, till there be an opportunity for ſettling that matter in parliament, &c. &c. To which the king anſwered in general terms, That what was amiſs ſhould be remedied. It was however noticed, that he granted large portions of theſe eſtates to the lord Portland and other of his favourites afterwards.

On the fourteenth day of March 1693, the king came to the houſe of lords, where, after having given the royal aſſent to ſeveral bills, he cloſed the ſeſſion with a ſpeech, in which he thanked the parliament for the large ſupplies they had given him, recommended the peace of their reſpective counties to their care, as alſo the levying the taxes equally. He told them that his preſence was required abroad, but that he ſhould leave a ſufficient number of troops for the ſecurity of the kingdom, concluding, "That he ſhould continue to expoſe his perſon upon all occaſions, for the good and advantage of theſe kingdoms, aſſuring them that his hearty and ſincere endeavours ſhould never be wanting in any way to make England a great and flouriſhing nation;" and then by his majeſty's command the parliament was prorogued to the ſecond of May *.

During this ſeſſion of parliament, in the month of December, ſir John Trevor, ſpeaker of the Houſe of Commons, was made Maſter of the Rolls, in the room of Henry Powle, eſq. deceaſed. He had enjoyed that place under king James. Sir Edward Ward was made attorney-general, which gave ſuch diſguſt to ſir Thomas Trevor, the ſollicitor-general, who thought he had a right to ſucceed to that office, that it was with great difficulty his friends could prevail on him not to reſign his own place. About the latter end of January the king thought fit to diſmiſs admiral Ruſſel, and gave the command of the fleet jointly to Henry Killigrew, eſq. ſir Ralph Delaval, and ſir Cloudeſley Shovel. George Rook, eſq. was appointed vice-admiral of the red, George lord Berkeley vice-admiral of the blue, captain Matthew Aylmer rear-admiral of the red, and captain David Mitchel rear-admiral of the blue. On the 16th of February his majeſty went down to Portſmouth to take a view of the fleet there; and dining on board with vice-admiral Rook, conferred on him the honour of knighthood; and now his majeſty being about to embark for Holland, was pleaſed on the twenty-third of March to conſtitute John Somers, the attorney-general, lord-keeper of the great-ſeal, and ſir John Frankland one of the principal ſecretaries of ſtate: and at the ſame time ſir John Lowther, Henry Prieſtman, eſq. Anthony lord viſcount Falkland, Robert Auſten, eſq. ſir Robert Rich, Henry Killigrew, eſq. and ſir Ralph Delaval, were appointed lords commiſſioners of the admiralty.

We ſhall cloſe this year, 1692, with ſome remarks on the ſtate of our trade. Immenſe was the loſs that England ſuſtained in the two firſt years of her wars with France, by the captures made of her merchant ſhips by the French privateers; for by an account laid before the parliament this year, it appeared that they had taken from us no fewer than three thouſand ſail of trading veſſels great and ſmall; whereas we had during the ſame ſpace of time taken from France only ſixty-nine merchant ſhips: an alarming difference! But on the other hand, to balance in part this great misfortune, the ſtrict prohibition of commerce by both nations during this war, proved the occaſion of vaſt detriment to France, and advantage to us, by putting a ſtop to the importation of many of her moſt lucrative manufactures. Thus, in the firſt place, ſhe was deprived of a moſt profitable linen-manufacture in dowlas and lockram, chiefly manufactured in Normandy and Brittany, of which it was ſaid we took off to the value of two hundred thouſand pounds yearly. In the next place, France before this war manufactured ſuch good and cheap felt hats at Caudebec, Havre de Grace, and other places in Normandy, that by our prohibiting them we have gradually arrived at ſo great a perfection in that manufacture as to make them better, as well as cheaper, than the French can do. Again, before this war, the fine glaſs manufacture was almoſt entirely in the poſſeſſion of France, who not only furniſhed us with almoſt all the glaſs for our coaches and chairs, and our fine looking-glaſſes, but alſo with our fineſt window-glaſs, which was uſually called Normandy glaſs and French crown-glaſs: both which we have ſince made our own manufacture in the greateſt perfection. Laſtly, cutlery-ware, watches, toys, ribbands, &c. and particularly our broad ſilk manufacture, have been ſo greatly improved as even to out-do the French themſelves. Hence our reader will readily conceive how great a blow the French muſt have received by this decreaſe of their manufactures.

In this ſame year ſeveral French refugees, ſtudious to promote the intereſt of England, and to weaken France by impairing her manufactures, in conjunction with ſome Engliſh merchants, and being ſupported by the protection of the earl of Pembroke, whom they choſe their governor, erected themſelves into a company, called the Royal Luſtring Company, and obtained the king's patent, whereby they were reputed a body-politic, having the full and ſole privilege for the making of luſtrings and alamodes in England. On the twenty-ſixth of October this patent was read in full committee at their houſe in Auſtin-Friars; at which time the Company was aſſured by their governor of his majeſty's ſatisfaction in this undertaking to ſuch a degree, that all other encouragements might be expected for the promoting of it. And although by the change of faſhion theſe ſilks are not at preſent much in requeſt, yet the project greatly contributed to the improvement of the ſilk manufacture in general †.

I ſhall now proceed to the tranſactions of the year 1693.

King William having ſettled affairs at home on ſuch a footing as he thought moſt likely to enſure the peace of his dominions during his abſence, embarked for Holland, on the thirty-firſt of March, at Graveſend. On his arrival at the Hague, the ſecond of April, the elector of Bavaria, having been appointed by the king of Spain governor of his territories in the Netherlands, ſent the count d'Arco to wait on his majeſty, and compliment him on his arrival. The campaign this year began with ſeveral ſkirmiſhes on either frontier, with various ſucceſs. A party of one hundred Newburghers ſuddenly entering the village of Multerne, ſurprized eighty French horſe, which they brought priſoners, with their arms and baggage, to the general rendezvous; but in the mean while the French army broke into the Palatinate, and committed grievous outrages there, burning and plundering in ſuch a manner as to lay the whole country waſte. The war in Flanders was now puſhed on with vigour; the duke of Wirtemberg was ſent, with a ſtrong detachment of horſe and foot, to force the enemies lines, which they had drawn to ſecure that part of the Netherlands commonly called French Flanders. This he effected with much facility, and put the country for ſeveral leagues round under contribution, raiſing ſome millions of livres, and taking in ſeveral places much booty. This ſpirited enterprize greatly alarmed Luxemburg, the French general, who ſaw his honour at ſtake unleſs he performed ſome daring exploit to preſerve it: accordingly he formed the bold deſign of obliging Wirtemberg to withdraw his forces. With this view he, in the firſt place, attempted, with fifty ſquadrons of horſe, ten battalions of foot, and ſome field-pieces, to fall upon part of the garriſons of Liege and Maeſtricht, conſiſting of eighteen ſquadrons of horſe and ſome regiments of foot, under count Tilly; but they, having received timely notice of his intentions, retreated over the river Sare, whilſt three ſquadrons of horſe kept the French in play, and beat back their advanced parties, thus ſecuring the retreat of their own foot.

Luxemburg, thus baffled in the firſt of his ſchemes, fell upon a ſecond, which was attended with greater ſucceſs. King William, upon his joining the army in Flanders, had poſſeſſed himſelf of the ſtrong camp of Landen, in Louvain; the allied army at that time did not conſiſt of above ſeventy thouſand men, and, beſides, was conſiderably weakened by the detachments the king was obliged to ſend off, to reinforce the neighbouring garriſons; whereas the French army amounted to no leſs than one hundred and twenty thouſand men. Luxemburg, conſcious of his ſuperiority over the confederate forces, and knowing that the king of England's camp muſt be greatly weakened by the many detachments lately ſent off, eſpecially that under the duke of Wirtemberg, reſolved to attack his majeſty in his camp, or at leaſt to fall upon the rear of his army, ſhould he attempt to retreat at the approach of the French. With this view he made a motion towards Liege, as if he intended to inveſt that place, and encamped at Heidelſheim, about ſeven leagues from the camp of the confederates. On the eighteenth of July O. S. he began his march, in four columns, and paſſed the Sare without oppoſition. The king had marched out, a few days before, to relieve Huy, which the French had inveſted; but on his way he had news by his ſcouts, that Huy had ſurrendered, and that the van of the French army was advancing towards him, which they believed to be the fore-runner of the motion of the whole army. This made him change his march; for, having ſent a detachment to ſtrengthen the garriſon of Liege, he directed his route to the neighbourhood of Heſpen, near Landen, and then halted to get more certain intelligence of the enemy's intention: there being informed that the whole French army was advancing againſt him, he reſolved to keep his ground, and immediately drew up his forces in order of battle; but his diſpoſition was ſo erroneous, that Luxemburg, as ſoon as he ſaw it, cried, "Now I believe that Waldeck is dead!" alluding to that general's known ſagacity in chuſing ground for an engagement.

Early next morning, the twenty-ninth of July, the French appeared on the high ground and hills of Gertruyden and Landen, and ſoon after deſcended, in good order, into the plains, though the cannon of the allies played on them very fiercely all the time. About eight in the morning they attacked the villages of Lare and Neer Winden (or Nerwinde) with great impetuoſity. Luxemburg and the princes of France, at the head of the houſehold troops, carried the village ſword in hand two different times; but the inſtant the marſhal turned another way, the allies retook it again. At length the French, out-numbering the confederates, preſſed on with reſiſtleſs fury, freſh men ſtill ſupplying the ranks that were broken by the well-ſerved artillery from the king's camp. Thus the battle increaſed, and held on till near ſun-ſet, when Luxembourg having carried the village of Neer Winden a third time, and the confederates being wearied out with the heat of the day, and their long fatigue, the French forced their camp with their horſe, and formed their lines, though with great loſs. After this, making way for their whole army to follow, William, who had through the whole day ſignalized himſelf by the greateſt efforts of courage and perſeverance, giving every where the neceſſary orders, and leading up in perſon ſeveral troops and battalions to the charge, ſeeing all loſt, and fearing that he ſhould be ſurrounded by the enemy's victorious troops, drew off his army, and retreated in as good order as ſo preſſing a ſituation would admit. After having paid the juſtice due to king William's perſonal courage, it muſt be acknowleged that Luxemburg ſhewed himſelf much the greater general, firſt by thoſe feints and ſtratagems that induced the confederates to weaken their army by detachments, and then by forcing them in a camp which they looked upon as inacceſſible. Few actions proved more bloody; there were about twenty thouſand killed, including both ſides, the French having loſt eight, and the allies about twelve thouſand men: the greateſt loſs of the latter fell on the foot, eſpecially the Engliſh, who fought bravely to the laſt: the duke of Ormond was wounded in ſeveral places, and taken priſoner; and the count de Solmes had his leg ſhot off by a cannon-ball, of which he died in a few hours. The allies loſt ſixty pieces of cannon and nine mortars. The enemy, though they had gained the day, had little reaſon to boaſt of their victory: beſides the common men, they loſt two thouſand officers, either killed or wounded, and were ſo much weakened that they either were not able or willing to purſue the confederates; while king William having ſent to the duke of Wirtemberg to join him, and in a little time the ſcattered ſoldiers coming to their colours, the army was ſo well recruited, that in a few days it took the field again, and marched againſt the enemy, who thought fit to retire, having had enough of hot work for one campaign. This battle was called the Battle of Landen by the allies, and by the French the Battle of Neer Winden. The remaining part of the campaign produced nothing memorable, except the reduction of Charleroy, which, after ſuſtaining a regular ſiege of ſix-and-twenty days, ſurrendered, on the tenth of September, to the enemy on honourable terms.

The French were equally ſucceſsful in every other quarter, though the advantages they gained were generally purchaſed at a dear rate. In Catalonia they reduced Roſes and the caſtle of Ampurias, a circumſtance which threw the whole kingdom of Spain into the utmoſt conſternation. But no where did the confederates receive ſo entire a defeat as at Marſaglia, in Piedmont, where the duke of Schomberg commanded the troops in Engliſh pay, and thoſe celebrated generals, the duke of Savoy and prince Eugene, his brother, the reſt of that army. Catinat, the French general, obtained this victory by a ſtratagem never uſed before, which was making his ſoldiers ſcrew their bayonets over the barrels of their pieces, and charge with them loaded: the generals of the allied army obſerving bayonets at the end of the enemies muſquets, imagined they had been diſcharged, and were thrown into confuſion; when they found their miſtake, and were ſaluted with a terrible volley of ſhot. Soon after this action pikes began to be laid aſide, and bayonets to be uſed in their room, all over Europe. Duke Schomberg was mortally wounded, and taken priſoner by the French in this engagement, which was fought on the fourth of October.

The Engliſh were as unſucceſsful at ſea this year, as the allies had been by land. About the middle of May the fleet aſſembled at St. Helen's, and ſoon after were joined by the Dutch, when they made a formidable appearance *, and every one expected ſomething very conſiderable would be performed. It appeared, however, but too ſoon, that things were in a very diſtracted condition, and that the admirals had not proper orders to warrant their ſtriking any blow of moment, and were too much divided in their opinions to undertake any thing of themſelves: in ſhort, the only ſervice reſolved on, was that ſir George Rook ſhould convoy the merchant-fleet going to the Mediterranean, amounting in all to about four hundred ſail, belonging to England, Holland, Denmark, Sweden, Hamburgh, and Flanders. Had this deſign been executed as ſoon as taken, it had been honourable for the nation and fortunate for the merchants; but ſuch was the dilatorineſs of either the admirals or the higher powers, that it was the beginning of June before this fleet ſailed, and then we had no intelligence of the enemy's motions, but the admirals took their meaſures at random; a circumſtance which, however diſgraceful to our naval officers at that time, comes too well authenticated ‡ to warrant a doubt, and is too important to be concealed. It was reſolved that the combined fleets ſhould accompany the trading veſſels fifty leagues to the weſtward of Uſhant, but were then to leave ſir George Rooke, with a ſquadron of twenty-three ſhips of war, to proceed with them to their deſtined ports.

It was not long before the imprudence of theſe meaſures appeared: admiral Rooke had no ſooner arrived off Cape St. Vincent, on the coaſt of Portugal, than he diſcovered, on the ſeventeenth of June, the French fleet, amounting to eighty ſail, under the command of the counts de Tourville and d'Etrées. A council of war being called in this exigence, it was reſolved that orders ſhould be ſent to the ſmall ſhips that were near the land, and therefore not likely to keep up with the fleet, to uſe their utmoſt endeavours in the night to ſlip into the neighbouring ports of Faro, St. Lucar, or Cadiz, while the admiral ſhould ſtand off to ſea, with an eaſy ſail, for the protection of the reſt. About ſix in the evening, the French admiral and vice-admiral of the blue, which had the whole afternoon gained upon the ſquadron, notwithſtanding all the ſail they could make, came up with the leeward and ſternmoſt ſhips of the confederate fleet; theſe were Dutch men of war, commanded by the captains Schrijver and Vander Poel, who, finding there was no probability of eſcaping, tacked-in for the ſhore, and thereby drew the enemy after them, which ſaved the reſt of the fleet. The Dutch captains made a moſt obſtinate defence, and for five hours together bravely fought, firſt eleven and then ſeven of the enemy's ſhips, till at length, overpowered by numbers, they were conſtrained to yield. Admiral Rooke ſtood off all night with a freſh gale, and the next morning ſaw fifty-four ſhips of the convoy about him; he alſo deſcried five ſail of the enemy's ſhips to leeward, and one to windward, which laſt continued to dog him all that day. On the nineteenth the admiral ſent for the officers of the men of war and merchant-ſhips on board, in order to get an account of the condition they were in, and to concert the proper meaſures for ſecuring the remainder of the trade; the reſult was, that the admiral bore away for the Madeiras, where he hoped to meet with a part of his ſcattered fleet; and having provided himſelf at that place with wood and water, of which he ſtood in need, he ſet ſail for Ireland, and on the third day of Auguſt arrived at Corke, with about fifty ſail, including ſhips of war and trading veſſels.

Had the French admirals purſued their advantage properly, there is hardly any probability that any part of the men of war or merchant-ſhips could have eſcaped; but either from a wrong diſpoſition of their fleet, or from their orders not being obeyed by the commanders of the reſpective ſhips, they made but a very poor uſe of their prodigious ſuperiority; not but that the Engliſh and Dutch trade ſuſtained a ſevere loſs by this attack: according to the beſt accounts, the marquis de Coetlogon took ſeven large Smyrna ſhips, and burnt or ſunk four more at Gibraltar; and M. de Tourville and the count d'Etrées took two Dutch men of war, burnt a rich pinnace and an Engliſh man of war, took twenty-nine merchantmen, and deſtroyed about fifty more: the value of the cargoes and the men of war together, was computed at twenty millions of French livres, or one million ſterling; whereas had the French admirals exerted themſelves properly, they muſt have been gainers four millions. The ſieur Du Mont, who then wrote a political journal in Holland, ſpeaks thus of the matter: "It is certain that the French miſſed taking the greateſt part of the convoy; and that ſir George

* Of the Engliſh there were ſix firſt rates, nine ſecond, twenty-ſix third, five fourths, two fifths, and three ſixths, beſides thirteen fireſhips; of the Dutch, ſix firſt rates, three ſecond, fourteen third, ſix fourths, three ſixths, and ſix fireſhips: in all one hundred and two ſail. Rooke upon this occaſion acquired infinitely more honour than thoſe who commanded the French fleet: for the one, unable to reſiſt ſuch as attacked him, in the midſt of threatening danger, by his prudence, dexterity, and courage, ſaved the beſt part of the fleet committed to his charge, at a time that the others ſuffered themſelves to be deprived, by the ſuperior ſkill of this admiral, of a booty which, if they could have kept it, fortune put into their hands." The French admirals next made an attempt to ſurprize Cadiz, but found the deſign impracticable. They then bombarded Gibraltar, where the merchants ſunk their ſhips to prevent their falling into the enemy's hands, who afterwards ſailed along the coaſt of Spain, burnt ſome Engliſh and Dutch ſhips at Malaga and Alicant, and then returned to Toulon about the latter end of September.

On the nineteenth of the ſame month fifteen Dutch ſhips of the line of battle, and two frigates, were ordered by his majeſty to Holland, and twenty-ſix men of war and ſeven fire-ſhips were aſſigned for the winter fleet, which it was then thought would have put an end to the naval operations of this year; but it ſoon after appeared that there was yet a ſecret expedition to be undertaken, in order to check the immoderate boaſting of the French for their late ſucceſsful exploits by ſea.

Our trade had ſuffered moſt terrible loſſes for a conſiderable time by the privateers from St. Malo's: never did one port ſend out ſo great a number of theſe cruizers, nor any place acquire, in ſo ſhort a ſpace of time, ſo much wealth, without engaging in any trade. The ſea was covered with their cruizers from the Channel to the Mediterranean, and their very names were dreaded by the merchants of London, Amſterdam, and Cadiz. The repeated complaints of the ſufferers by this depredatory war ſo alarmed our government, that a reſolution was taken to make a deſcent and deſtroy St. Malo's, the neſt of theſe formidable enemies to our trade: and commodore Benbow, in conjunction with captain Philips, a famous engineer, was appointed to the command of this expedition, who, with a ſquadron of twelve men of war, four bomb-ketches, and other veſſels, ſailed for St. Malo's, where they arrived on the ſixteenth of November, and about four in the afternoon came to an anchor before the place. After bombarding the town for three days, on the night of the nineteenth, taking advantage of a freſh gale of wind, a ſtrong tide, and very dark weather, they ſent in a fire-ſhip of an extraordinary conſtruction *, and which was intended to reduce the town to aſhes: this it would unavoidably have done, but for an accident; for when ſhe had got, unperceived by the enemy, within piſtol-ſhot of the place where they intended to have moored her, a ſudden flurry of wind drove her upon a rock, from which all the ſkill of thoſe on board could not get her off. At laſt, the engineer who was on board finding her beginning to open, and fearing ſhe might ſink, ſet fire to her; the exploſion of which was ſo terrible as to ſhake the whole town like an earthquake, unroofed three hundred houſes, and broke all the glaſs and earthen-ware for three leagues round. The inhabitants were ſtruck with ſuch conſternation, that a ſmall body of troops might eaſily have taken the place: but the miniſtry, by an effect of their uſual inattention, or ſomewhat worſe, had ſent out this ſquadron without a ſingle ſoldier on board. Sir George Rooke's ſquadron was by this time arrived in England, and laid up. Thus ended the naval expeditions of this year, as little for the honour of the Engliſh nation as any that had ever been ſet on foot.

The diſcontents begotten by ſuch a continued ſeries of miſcarriages, were too violent to be dormant: every mouth in the nation was opened againſt the miniſters, whom they ſcrupled not openly to accuſe of treachery. It was affirmed that the French court was privately acquainted with all the deſigns of ours, and were thereby enabled to take their meaſures for rendering them ineffectual; while the Engliſh remained, or affected to remain, in the moſt profound ignorance of the ſchemes of our adverſaries. The weight of this accuſation fell chiefly on the earl of Nottingham, Killigrew, and Delaval, two of the admirals, the marquis of Caermarthen, and the earl of Rocheſter. Certain it is, theſe perſons were all then known to have been ſtrongly attached to the late king, and were not yet reconciled to the preſent government, though poſſeſſing lucrative and honourable poſts and employments under it. It is not for us raſhly to aſſert that the accuſations againſt theſe perſons were abſolutely true: it is ſufficient to remark, that the proofs alleged in ſupport of them were very ſtriking, and that their conduct had given but too much occaſion to unfavourable ſurmiſes.

While we were thus pining under our loſſes in England, the French were ſtarving amidſt their victories: that kingdom was afflicted with a dreadful famine, which ſwept off many thouſands; and the whole nation was reduced to poverty and diſtreſs. Lewis XIV. in this conjuncture thought it his duty to free his people, if poſſible, from the burthen of that ruinous war in which his ambition had involved them. With this view he attempted to conclude a ſeparate peace with ſome of the allies; but as his demands were ſtill ſo high as to afford the allies no proſpect of a juſt peace, theſe offers were rejected.

The campaign being now cloſed in Flanders, king William returned to England the latter end of the month of October, when his firſt care was to quiet the murmurings among his people, by making a total change in his miniſtry. The earl of Nottingham, ſecretary of ſtate, was now laid aſide, and his department filled by the earl of Shrewſbury. The command of the fleet was taken out of the hands of the commiſſioners, and committed ſolely to the gallant admiral Ruſſel: in a word, the Tory party were in general forced to make way for their adverſaries the Whigs, ſuch only of the former who were thought ſtaunch to the preſent government being continued in office. Theſe meaſures were chiefly owing to the repreſentations of the earl of Sunderland, who had acquired a conſiderable influence with his majeſty, and had found means to perſuade him that the Whigs were his only true friends, while the Tories, under a mark of pretended loyalty to him, were in their hearts devoted to the intereſts of the late ſovereign: and yet it ſeems hard to reconcile this imputation with the conduct they had obſerved ever ſince the Revolution; for no parliament ever contributed more bountifully to the neceſſities of the ſtate than this (which was chiefly compoſed of thoſe called Tories) had done. It is no wonder indeed that king William ſhould ſhew diſtinguiſhing marks of favour to the earl of Sunderland, who, by the intelligence he afforded him when prince of Orange, and the double part he acted towards king James, contributed principally to the ſucceſs of the Revolution: but I ſhall forbear entering into remarks, in which it will be impoſſible to pleaſe all my readers.

* The reader may not be diſpleaſed to ſee a deſcription of this famous engine of deſtruction: I ſhall therefore give it a place in this note, as I find it in Campbell's Lives of the Admirals, vol. iii. p. 103, 104. The French writers ſay that this was one of thoſe dreadful machines, ſtiled Infernal, which the Dutch made uſe of to deſtroy the bridge over the Schelde, when the prince of Parma beſieged Antwerp in the year 1585. The reader will perceive by the following deſcription, that it was in fact a fire-ſhip, contrived to operate when moored cloſe to the town walls. It was a new ſhip of about three hundred, or, as the marquis de Quincey ſays, 350 tons. At the bottom of the hold were one hundred barrels of powder: theſe were covered with pitch, ſulphur, roſin, tow, ſtraw, and faggots; over which lay beams bored through, to give air to the fire, and upon theſe lay three hundred carcaſſes, filled with granadoes, chain ſhot, iron bars, and the bottoms of glaſs bottles. There were ſix holes or mouths to let out the flames, which were ſo vehement as to conſume the hardeſt ſubſtances, and could be checked by nothing but the pouring in of hot water.

On the king's coming over a thankſgiving was obſerved for his preſervation in the field, and his ſafe return. The parliament meeting on the ſeventh of November, his majeſty made a ſpeech to both houſes, wherein he took nótice of the ſeveral diſadvantages the confederates had received by land, and of our own miſcarriages at ſea: "The former, he ſaid, were occaſioned by the ſuperior numbers of the enemy in all places: as to the latter, he told them he would make them the particular objects of his ſtrict enquiry; promiſed to inflict condign puniſhment on ſuch as ſhould, upon trial, appear to have been wanting in their duty; and would uſe his utmoſt endeavours that our naval power ſhould be rightly managed for the future. He recommended to the parliament the increaſing our forces by ſea and land, as the allies, he ſaid, had reſolved to increaſe theirs. He then concluded with deſiring the commons to take ſuch timely reſolutions that their ſupplies might be effectual, and our preparations in that forwardneſs, as to enſure the ſafety and honour of the nation §."

The commons, in anſwer to this ſpeech, unanimouſly reſolved, "that they would ſupport their majeſties and their government, and grant a ſufficient ſupply for the vigorous proſecution of the war." But before they proceeded upon that matter, they thought proper to make enquiry into the miſcarriages of the fleet laſt ſummer. Biſhop Burnet's account of this enquiry is ſo conciſe, and at the ſame time ſo ſtrong and to the purpoſe, that I think myſelf obliged to lay it before the reader, as the beſt information he can receive on this head.

"The enquiry into the conduct at ſea (ſays that right reverend author *), particularly with relation to the Smyrna fleet, took up much time, and held long. Great exceptions were taken to the many delays, by which it ſeemed a train was laid, that they ſhould not get out of our ports till the French were ready to lie in their way, and intercept them. Our want of intelligence was much complained of; the inſtructions that the admirals, who commanded the fleet, had received from the cabinet-council, were thought ill-given, and yet worſe executed: their orders ſeemed weakly drawn, ambiguous, and defective; nor had they ſhewed any zeal in doing more than ſtrictly to obey ſuch orders; they had very cautiouſly kept within them, and had been very careful never to exceed them in a tittle. They had uſed no diligence to get certain information concerning the French fleet, whether it was ſtill in Breſt, or had ſailed out; but in that important matter they had truſted general and uncertain reports too eaſily: nor had they ſailed far enough with Rooke to ſee him paſt danger. To all this their anſwer was, that they had obſerved their orders; they had reaſon to think the French were ſtill in Breſt; that therefore it was not ſafe to ſail too far from the coaſt of England, when they had, as they underſtood, ground to believe that they had left behind them a great naval force, which might make an impreſſion on our coaſt, when they were at too great a diſtance from it. The getting certain intelligence from Breſt was repreſented as impracticable. They had many ſpecious things to ſay in their own defence, and many friends to ſupport them; for it was now the buſineſs of one party to accuſe, and of another to juſtify their conduct. In concluſion, there was not ground ſufficient to condemn the admirals, ſince they had followed their inſtructions, ſo a vote paſſed in their favour." A proteſt, however, againſt this reſolution was entered by ſeveral peers †, who mentioned a number of facts which reflected greatly on the conduct of the admirals.

On the twenty-fifth of November the commons proceeded to take into conſideration the eſtimates and ſupplies for the enſuing year, when they voted the following ſums; viz. five hundred thouſand pounds to pay the arrears due to the ſeamen, two millions for the ſervice of the fleet, and two millions five hundred thouſand pounds and upwards, for the army, which it was reſolved to increaſe to the number of eighty-three thouſand one hundred and twenty-one men, including officers; and there appearing a deficiency of one hundred and eighteen thouſand pounds in the late annuity-act, this was agreed to be made good by enlarging the time for paying in the ſum of one million, intended to be raiſed by that act; and towards raiſing the money for the maintenance of the fleet, it was agreed that any perſon might add a ſecond life to the life already named in the annuity-act, upon paying thirty-five pounds more to every hundred already paid in; and a third life for the farther ſum of twenty pounds ‡.

The king coming to the houſe on the twenty-fifth of January, gave the royal aſſent to an act for raiſing four ſhillings in the pound upon lands; to an act for the importation of Italian thrown ſilk;

and

and to ſome other acts of leſſer moment; but he again refuſed the place-bill, which ſo piqued the commons that they paſſed, the next day, the following vote: "That whoever had adviſed the king not to give the royal aſſent to that bill, was an enemy to their majeſties and the kingdom §." They alſo drew up an addreſs, or repreſentation, which they preſented to his majeſty, wherein they expreſſed themſelves in the following terms: "That it was with great grief of heart they obſerved, ſince his majeſty's acceſſion, that this and ſeveral other bills had not obtained the royal aſſent, which they could not impute to any other cauſe than the inſinuations of particular perſons, who took upon them, for their own private ends, to adviſe his majeſty contrary to the advice given him by his parliament." To which addreſs his majeſty returned an anſwer, thanking them for their zeal, profeſſing his attachment to the conſtitution of the kingdom, aſſuring them that he was fully ſenſible of the abſolute neceſſity of a good underſtanding between the ſovereign and his people, and declaring that he would look upon all thoſe as his enemies who ſhould endeavour to leſſen that mutual confidence. This anſwer, however, appeared too vague and general to many in the houſe, and therefore they made a motion, "that his majeſty ſhould be intreated to return a more particular anſwer;" but the queſtion being put, it was carried in the negative by a great majority, two hundred and twenty-nine againſt twenty-eight.

On the ſixteenth of December, the earl of Bellamont having preſented articles of impeachment againſt Thomas, lord Coningſby, and ſir Charles Porter, two of the late lords juſtices in Ireland, the commons, after ſeveral debates, agreed that there were not ſufficient grounds to found a charge of high-treaſon upon. If the lords-juſtices had been guilty of any arbitrary and violent proceedings, the earl of Bellamont, by bringing a charge ſo much above the nature of the offence, defeated his own deſign.

But the lord Falkland, a member of the commons, did not eſcape ſo well; for Mr. Harley, one of the commiſſioners for taking and ſtating the public accounts, delivered a report to the houſe, which contained a charge of peculation againſt that nobleman, for having received from his majeſty two thouſand pounds, contrary to the uſual method of iſſuing and beſtowing the king's money. Upon examination he was found guilty of a high miſdemeanor and breach of truſt, and committed to the Tower, there to continue during the pleaſure of the houſe. He was, however, ſet at liberty a very ſhort time afterwards *.

The revenues of the city of London having in ſome former times been under bad management, the fund for the orphans of freemen was ſuffered to run ſo far in arrears, that the chamber of London was ſhut for ſeveral years: hereof great complaints were made at ſundry times; at length the magiſtracy coming into better hands, they, in this ſeſſion, obtained an act of parliament "for the relief of the orphans and other creditors of the city of London," by which the city was empowered to pay the yearly intereſt of theſe ſums at the rate of four per cent. This act conſiſted of ſeveral articles, extending to different charges on the city-lands, aqueducts, perſonal eſtates, and impoſing duties on binding apprentices, and admitting freemen, as alſo upon wines and coals imported into London ‡.

The Eaſt India company having, on the eleventh of November this year, 1693, obtained a new charter ‖, ſome merchants moved the houſe of commons againſt the ſame, entreating them to erect a new company; whereupon the houſe having examined the charter of the old company, the book of new ſubſcriptions, the ſtate of the preſent ſtock, and the petition of the merchants, reſolved, on the nineteenth of January, "that all the ſubjects of England have equal right to trade to the Eaſt Indies, unleſs prohibited by act of parliament." This gave the firſt hint to forming a new Eaſt India company by ſtatute.

Among other expedients for raiſing money this year, the parliament hit upon one that was not thought of before, which was by way of lottery, for which certain duties upon ſalt, beer, and ale, were aſſigned as a fund; and by this means a million of money was raiſed to defray the charges of the war.

On the twenty-eighth of February the royal aſſent was given to the bill for making good the deficiencies of the late annuity-act; to an act to prevent diſputes concerning the royal mines; and on the twenty-third of March to an act for granting certain aids on ſalt, and on beer and ale, to be a fund for the intended lottery. This ſeſſion is alſo memorable for the firſt erection of the preſent moſt uſeful and laudable corporation of the Bank of England, which has not only proved extremely beneficial to commerce, but has alſo, on many emergencies, been a great ſupport to the public credit

‖ This charter was in ſubſtance as follows:

"I. All ſubſcribers ſhall be members of the company.

"II. Seven hundred and forty-four thouſand pounds ſhall be the whole capital of the company.

"III. None ſhall ſubſcribe above ten thouſand pounds.

"IV. In general courts, one thouſand pounds ſtock to have one vote; nor none ſhall have above ten votes.

"V. Such as ſhall become proprietors by purchaſe, ſhall pay for their freedom five pounds, who (as alſo the new ſubſcribers) ſhall take the oaths appointed by law, and alſo the freeman's oath.

"VI. The governor, or, in his abſence, the deputy-governor, to have a caſting vote in all courts; each of them to have four thouſand pounds in their own right; and each committee-man one thouſand pounds. [They had not as yet got the modern name of Directors]

"VII. No permiſſion ſhall be granted for ſhips to India on a private account, on penalty of forfeiting the Charters.

"VIII. No private contract is to be made for ſale of the company's goods (ſalt-petre only excepted, ſold for the king's uſe), but all to be openly and publicly ſold; and no one lot (jewels excepted) to exceed five hundred pounds value.

"IX. The company ſhall annually export to India, of the growth and product of England, to the value of at leaſt one hundred thouſand pounds.

"X. The company ſhall annually ſupply the crown with five hundred tons of ſalt-petre, at thirty-eight pounds ten ſhillings per ton in time of peace, and at forty-five pounds in time of war.

"XI. All dividends of the company's profits ſhall, for the future, be made in money only.

"XII. A book hereafter to be kept by the company, wherein the value of their ſtock ſhall be entered, as atteſted upon oath; and to be viewed by all concerned: and the like as to all mortgages, alienations, tranſfers, and Aſſignments.

"XIII. The joint-ſtock of the company ſhall continue for twenty-one years; and one year before its expiration, books ſhall lie open for new ſubſcriptions to a new joint-ſtock." Anderſon, vol. ii. p. 199, 200.

of the nation: and it is, indeed, ſomewhat ſtrange that a public or general bank, capable of not only ſupporting its own credit by a paper-currency, for the benefit of trade (eſpecially in reſpect to large payments), but alſo for aſſiſting or ſupporting the national credit, was not ſooner eſtabliſhed in a country ſo much abounding in wealth and commerce.

We muſt not forget to obſerve, that a new corporation was erected by an act of parliament this ſeſſion, for the Greenland trade, by the name of the Company of Merchants of London trading to Greenland, with the uſual powers of ſucceſſion, &c. this company having already ſubſcribed forty thouſand pounds for that end: the maſter and only one third of the mariners of each veſſel employed in this trade, to be natives of this kingdom, the want of Engliſh harponeers being then very great; the ſhips were to be Engliſh built. This corporation was to exiſt for only fourteen years, from the firſt of October, 1694*.

On the twenty-third of March the Bank-act was paſſed, as was alſo another act for granting to their majeſties ſeveral duties on vellum, parchment, and paper; and a third for raiſing money by licenſing hackney and ſtage-coaches and chairs. Thus there were granted this ſeſſion, for the ordinary and extraordinary charges of the government, upwards of ſix millions. Beſides the acts of ſupply, and thoſe already mentioned, there paſſed ſeveral other acts, which the reader will find in the note at the bottom of the page†.

Theſe being all ready for the royal aſſent, and his majeſty being impatient to return to the continent, he came to the houſe of peers on the twenty-fifth of April, 1694, and cloſed the ſeſſion with a ſhort ſpeech, in which he thanked the commons for the large ſupplies they had given; and as the poſture of affairs made his abſence neceſſary, he recommended it to both houſes to preſerve the public peace; then the lord-keeper, by his majeſty's command, prorogued the parliament till the eighteenth of September; and ſoon after this prorogation the king beſtowed the following honours and preferments: lord Butler, brother to the duke of Ormond, was created lord Butler of Weſton in England, and earl of Arran in Ireland. The earl of Shrewſbury was dignified with the title of duke: the earl of Mulgrave was gratified with a penſion of three thouſand pounds, and the title of marquis of Normandy: Henry Herbert, eſq. was ennobled by the title of baron Herbert of Cherbury, in the county of Salop: the earls of Bedford and Devonſhire were promoted to the rank of dukes: the marquis of Caermarthen was made duke of Leeds: the earl of Clare, duke of Newcaſtle: lord viſcount Sidney, earl of Rumney: and the viſcount Newport, earl of Bradford. Peregrine Bertie was appointed vice-chamberlain to his majeſty, in the room of ſir John Lowther, who reſigned: admiral Ruſſel, ſir George Rooke, and ſir John Houblon, were appointed commiſſioners of the admiralty: Charles Montague was made chancellor and under-treaſurer of the Exchequer: and lord Godolphin, ſir Stephen Fox, ſir William Trumball, and John Smith, were conſtituted commiſſioners of the Treaſury.

There were ſeveral occurrences that happened in the year 1693 that muſt not be paſſed over in ſilence, though I choſe to give the preference to the proceedings in parliament, and to continue them to the end of the ſeſſion without interruption.

The whole preſbyterian party in Scotland were now again in the king's intereſt: the matters of the church were now brought into better temper than was expected. The epiſcopal clergy had more moderate terms offered them: they were only required to make an addreſs to the general-aſſembly, offering to ſubſcribe to a general confeſſion of faith, and to acknowlege preſbytery to be the only government of that church, with a promiſe to ſubmit to it; upon which, within a fortnight after ſuch ſubmiſſion and ſubſcription, if no matter of ſcandal was objected to them, the aſſembly was either to receive them into the government of the church; or if they could not be brought to that, the king was to take them into his protection, and maintain them in their churches, without any dependence on the preſbytery. The Scottiſh parliament augmented their taxes ſo as to proportion them to the maintenance of ſix thouſand three hundred men, to ſupply the magazines of the kingdom with arms and ſtores, and to ſatisfy the country for their arrears and quarters; ſo that the whole ſum then given amounted to one hundred and fifty-ſix thouſand pounds ſterling, to be raiſed in eighteen months, by a poll-tax, an exciſe upon beer and malt, and by continuing the ceſs upon land, which was then to laſt ſeven months and an half to ten months and an half beyond that term. Duke Hamilton, who had for ſome time withdrawn from buſineſs, was now prevailed on to reſume it, and was appointed his majeſty's high-commiſſioner to this parliament, which met on the eighteenth of April 1693. The Jacobite party, however, and the diſcontented Highlanders were very buſy all this year in cutting out work for the government; and they even made a propoſition, which if the court of St. Germains had accepted, as it appeared to be its intereſt to do, might have thrown the nation into great cabals and diſorders: this was no other than that king James ſhould offer to reſign his title in favour of his ſon, and ſend him to be bred up in England under the directions of the parliament till he ſhould be of age; but for ſome reaſons this was not complied with †.

A parliament had been ſummoned this year in Ireland; but they met full of diſcontent, ſo that the lord Sidney, the lord-lieutenant, diſmiſſed them before they had brought any of their bills to perfection. There were indeed great complaints of an ill adminiſtration in that government, chiefly in the revenue, in the paying of the army, and in the embezzling of the ſtores, which made much noiſe in England, and, as we have related, occaſioned both houſes of parliament to addreſs his majeſty upon the ſubject; the reſult of which was, that the king recalled the lord Sidney (who was afterwards made maſter of the ordnance) and put the government of Ireland into the hands of three lords-juſtices, viz. lord Capel, ſir Cecil Wych, and Mr. William Duncomb, who had lately been ambaſſador extraordinary to the court of Sweden.

On the twenty-fourth of November this year died the moſt reverend father in God, Dr. William Sancroft, late archbiſhop of Canterbury, who had retired to a little eſtate he had at Fretchingfield in Suffolk, where, by his own direction, he was buried in the church-yard of that place.

On the thirty-firſt of December prince Lewis of Baden arrived at Graveſend, and continued in England till the fourteenth of February; during which time he concerted meaſures with the king, and was treated with ſingular reſpect, and at a great expence, not only by his majeſty, but alſo by ſeveral of the nobility, particularly the duke of Ormond.

The duke of Schomberg, commander of the forces in Piedmont, in the pay of Great Britain, being killed, as has been related, at the battle of Marſaglia in the laſt campaign, monſieur de Ruvigny, who had been ſo inſtrumental in the reduction of Ireland, and for his ſervices had been lately honoured by his majeſty with the title of earl of Galway in that kingdom, was this winter appointed to the command of thoſe forces in the duke's ſtead, and at the ſame time received the character of his majeſty's envoy extraordinary to the duke of Savoy.

In the beginning of the year 1694 the nation ſuſtained a great misfortune in the fate of ſir Francis Wheeler, who with three men of war, and ſeveral Turkey ſhips of great value, were loſt in a moſt terrible ſtorm on the nineteenth of February, off Gibraltar-Bay, in the Mediterranean. The Suſſex, on board which the admiral was, foundered, and himſelf, with all his crew, to the number of five hundred and fifty, were loſt. The admiral's body was ſoon after found on a ſand-bank in his ſhirt and ſlippers, from whence it was conjectured that he had thrown himſelf over-board, in order to ſave his life, if poſſible, by ſwimming. His body was afterwards embalmed and ſent to England.

His majeſty having ſettled all affairs in England, embarked for Holland on the ſixth of May 1694, and after a very ſhort paſſage got ſafe into the Brill in Holland, from whence he ſet out for the Hague, where having preſided at an aſſembly of the States, he went to Loo; at which place he remained till matters were ripe for opening the campaign in Flanders, which, as we ſhall hereafter ſee, proved a very languid one.

In Spain indeed the French exerted themſelves with great activity, and their arms were attended with no leſs ſucceſs. Lewis, purſuing his project of obtaining a ſeparate peace, in order to relieve the miſeries his ſubjects ſuffered from famine, and the other melancholy conſequences of a long war, had applied to the court of Spain to induce them to accept a ſeparate peace, and to declare the duke of Anjou, one of his grandſons, heir to that crown; but theſe overtures being rejected, Lewis propoſed this ſpring to have forced the Spaniard into his meaſures, by invading that kingdom by ſea and land, and particularly on the ſide of Catalonia. With this view the marſhal de Noailles, taking the field early in the ſpring, advanced at the head of thirty thouſand men to the banks of the Ter, and forced the paſſage of that river on the twenty-eighth day of May, in the face of ſixteen thouſand of the Spaniſh forces encamped there to oppoſe him. After that he proceeded to Palamos, which he immediately inveſted; while the combined ſquadrons of Breſt and Toulon, under Tourville and d'Eſtrées, kept it blocked up by ſea. On the ſeventh of June the place was taken by ſtorm, and the French exerciſed great cruelties on the wretched inhabitants, which ſtruck the Spaniards with ſuch dread, that they immediately withdrew their garriſons out of Felieu de Quixolo and the caſtle of St. Elmo, with which they reinforced that of Gironne, a town well fortified, and capable of holding out a long ſiege: yet ſuch was the panic that prevailed among the ſoldiers, that it ſubmitted on the nineteenth of June, upon very humiliating terms. From Gironne Noailles led his troops before Oſtalric, a town on the road to Barcelona, which he carried without meeting with the ſmalleſt reſiſtance. This ſucceſs encouraged the marſhal, after having given his troops time to refreſh themſelves, on account of the extreme heat of the country at that ſeaſon, to attempt the reduction of Barcelona, the capital, and the only fortified town in the province of Catalonia now remaining to the Spaniards. His plan was to attack the town both by ſea and land at the ſame time, and upon meeting with the ſucceſs he expected, he intended afterwards to have ſecured the whole ſea-coaſt of Spain, deſtroying every town of any note he came to. Theſe deſigns however were happily fruſtrated, by the arrival of the Engliſh admiral Ruſſel in the Mediterranean, with a numerous fleet under his command.

King William having been previouſly informed of the enemy's deſign upon Barcelona, had reſolved to ſend a ſtrong fleet up the Mediterranean, as well to aſſiſt the king of Spain, as to prevent the Toulon ſquadron from coming into the Ocean, and thereby hindering the French from making any figure this year at ſea. With this view all imaginable pains had been taken both in England and Holland to fit out a more numerous fleet, and to ſend it earlier to ſea than in any year ſince the war began. Accordingly Ruſſel, who, as we have already obſerved, was again appointed to the command of the fleet, ſailed from St. Helen's on the third of May with the combined ſquadrons, conſiſting of fifty-two Engliſh, and forty-one Dutch ſhips of the line, beſides frigates, fire-ſhips, and other ſmaller veſſels: but when he came off Breſt, he found the ſquadron that had been fitted out there under Tourville, had already quitted that harbour. Upon which he determined to follow them: but being informed by the captain of a Swediſh ſhip, that there was a fleet of French merchant ſhips laying in an harbour near Conquet-Bay, he detached captain Pritchard, in the Monmouth, with the Roebuck and Reſolution fire-ſhips, to attempt the taking or deſtroying them. This ſervice Pritchard performed ſo effectually, that out of fifty-five ſail he burnt or ſunk thirty-five, and drove the man of war, which was to protect them, aſhore on the rock, where ſhe was loſt. The admiral, not having been able to find the Breſt fleet, returned to St. Helen's, which he again left on the twenty-ninth; and, after having detached ſeveral of his ſhips to go upon the intended expedition againſt Breſt, of which we ſhall ſpeak hereafter, he proceeded for the Mediterranean with the reſt. On the twenty-fifth of June he arrived off the Rock of Liſbon, where he was joined by rear-admiral Neville from Cadiz, together with the Dutch vice-admirals Callemberg and Evertzen, with ſixteen ſhips of the line, which increaſed the number of thoſe already under his command to ſixty-three. Ruſſel now made the beſt of his way for Barcelona, in order to ſave that city and the province of Catalonia from falling into the hands of the French, who had by this time blocked it up both by land and ſea. On his appearance before that place on the laſt day of July, the French admirals, not being able to look ſuch a fleet in the face, returned, purſuant to their orders, into the harbour of Toulon, and Noailles abandoned his enterprize. The ſiege of Barcelona was now raiſed, to the infinite joy of the king of Spain, whoſe empire was juſt before reduced to the moſt deſperate condition. The French durſt not appear at ſea while Ruſſel continued in the Mediterranean, which he did all the winter of this year; and it was now out of diſpute that France was no longer in a condition, as ſhe had vainly boaſted, to give laws to the other maritime powers *.

The death of the biſhop and prince of Liege towards the beginning of this year, gave the French a fair proſpect of embroiling the affairs of the confederates on that ſide; but the elector of Cologne being choſen in his room againſt the cardinal of Bouillon, whom the French court had put up and ſtrongly ſupported in this election, together with the great power of the allies in Flanders this campaign, changed the face of affairs, greatly to the diſadvantage of Lewis. The confederate army under king William's command took the field the latter end of June, and encamped at Mont St. André, conſiſting of thirty-one thouſand horſe and dragoons, and fifty-one thouſand foot, all prime troops; beſides a body of ſeven thouſand men under count Thian near Ghent. The French were not much inferior in number: but the dauphin of France, who commanded in perſon, declared that he had orders not to ſtir out of his camp ſo long as the allies continued in theirs; ſo that theſe two great armies continued looking at each other only, and waiting to take their advantages, till the latter end of the year, when king William attempted to paſs the Schelde, and force the French lines; but was diſappointed by an incredible ſwift march of the enemy, who thereby prevented the allies from penetrating into French Flanders, where, conſidering their ſtrength, they would in all probability have made ſome important conqueſt, or at leaſt ſecured winter-quarters. The king having in vain, by marches and counter-marches, endeavoured to bring the French to an engagement, gave orders for beſieging Huy, which was accordingly inveſted by the count de Tilly, in the beginning of September, and after a ſiege of ten days ſurrendered to the allies, by whom it was garriſoned. By this conqueſt the biſhopric of Liege was ſecured from the inſults of the French; and now the ſeaſon advancing for putting an end to the campaign on this ſide, William, after having ordered Dixmuyde, Deynſe, Nivove, and Tillemont, to be ſecured for winter-quarters to part of the army, quitted the camp on the laſt day of September. The dauphin ſoon afterwards left his army, and returned to Verſailles, and both camps broke up about the middle of October. Thus ended this fruitleſs campaign in Flanders, not a little to the mortification of the confederates, eſpecially the Dutch and Engliſh, who loudly complained of being obliged to bear the burthen of ſuch an expenſive war to ſo little purpoſe, either in point of honour or advantage.

On the ſide of the Rhine the prince of Baden, at the head of the Imperialiſts, being impatient of action, croſſed the river, and marched towards the French under marſhal de Lorges, who being apprized of the prince's motions, retired towards Landau. In this retreat however great part of his rear was cut off by the Imperialiſts, who, as the French ſtill retreated before them, advanced and plundered ſeveral towns in their way, and then returned unoppoſed, having raiſed contributions all over the adjacent country, and made a very conſiderable booty; and thus ended the campaign in Germany.

The war was carried on with as little ſpirit in Piedmont; for though the duke of Savoy had openly rejected the terms which had been offered him by France after his defeat at Marſaglia, he yet engaged in ſecret negotiations with that court, which made him neglect the military operations of the campaign, notwithſtanding the preſſing remonſtrances of Ruvigny, lord Galway, who, as we have before obſerved, had ſucceeded the duke of Schomberg in the command of the Britiſh forces in that country. Caſal indeed was blocked up by the reduction of Fort St. George, and the Vaudois gained ſome petty advantages in the Valley of Ragelas; but no enterprize of importance was attempted during the whole campaign.

King William, perſuaded that there was no way left effectually to humble France, but by carrying the war into her own bowels, had, before his departure from England, concerted a plan to make a deſcent on Breſt, and other places on her ſea-coaſt. The execution of this was committed to lieutenant-general Talmaſh. Accordingly, when admiral Ruſſel ſailed with the grand fleet for the Streights in June this year, the lord Berkeley, with thirty ſail of men of war and tranſports, having a body of ſix or ſeven thouſand men on board, under the command of the afore-named general, was ordered to make a deſcent at Camaret-Bay, near Breſt, in order to ruin that harbour, or render it uſeleſs to the French. There is a high rock or promontory that runs up from Camaret to the entrance of the harbour of Breſt, which whoever is maſter of, may command the ſhipping going in and out. This promontory is joined to the continent by a narrow iſthmus, which it was propoſed to poſſeſs ourſelves of, and which might be defended with four or five thouſand men againſt any force that could have been brought againſt it. By the poſſeſſion of this important ſpot, where we were to have built a fort, we ſhould not only have prevented the French from aſſembling their fleets

there as uſual, but have had it in our power to make incurſions into the province of Brittany at pleaſure. Had this ſucceeded, the French would not have had one port upon the Ocean fit for receiving their large men of war: but the French king being appriſed of the deſign, as indeed he was at this time of moſt that we formed, and ſenſible of the fatal conſequence it would be attended with, had taken care, under the conduct of the famous engineer Vauban, to have the iſthmus, the rock, and all the avenues to it, ſo fortified as to render it inacceſſible. An army had alſo been drawn down, twice the number of ours which was to attack them; and ſtrong batteries were raiſed, that commanded every place where there appeared the leaſt poſſibility of landing. Such was the ſtate of the place, when our fleet, having on board the lord Berkeley, general Talmaſh, the marquis of Caermarthen, the lord Cutts, and other brave commanders, arrived before it on the ſeventh of June.

The diſadvantages of making an attempt upon a place well prepared for annoyance, as well as defence, was warmly repreſented by ſeveral of the officers to general Talmaſh, and he was adviſed not to expoſe himſelf or his men: to which he anſwered, "This advice comes too late; the honour of the Engliſh nation is at ſtake, and therefore I muſt and will land." Hereupon the marquis of Caermarthen, with great bravery, ſtood in with ſeven or eight of the men of war, and came to an anchor very near the ſhore, in order to cover the deſcent of our troops. He had not been long in this ſtation before he found himſelf expoſed to a moſt terrible fire from ſeveral batteries, none of which they diſcovered till they felt the ſhot from them. The marquis, however, not in the leaſt daunted, kept up a briſk and continual fire from his ſhips, in return. The firſt eight hundred men that went on ſhore in the boats were commanded by general Talmaſh in perſon; who was no ſooner landed but he found the enterprize impracticable, and made a ſignal to retreat; but it happening to be tide of ebb, the boats ſtuck faſt upon the ooze, and the men being all the while expoſed to the fire from the batteries, and the troops in the entrenchments, no leſs than ſix hundred of them were ſlain; and a ſquadron of the French coming down to the ſhore, obliged thoſe that were left alive to lay down their arms and demand quarter. Upon this ſeveral other boats full of men, who were haſting from the fleet to land and join their comrades, returned on board with precipitation. The boat in which general Talmaſh was, did indeed fortunately get off, but not till that gallant officer had received a wound in his thigh by a ball, of which he died at ſea on his return to England. The ſhips that covered the deſcent were alſo very roughly handled, having loſt ſix or ſeven hundred of their men, and their maſts and rigging almoſt cut in pieces by the batteries from the ſhore. The marquis of Caermarthen however brought them all off, with infinite difficulty and hazard, except a Dutch frigate of thirty guns, which fell into the hands of the enemy: a council of war being now called on board the lord Berkeley's ſhip, it was reſolved to return immediately to Spithead *, where the fleet arrived on the fifteenth of June: there they found the queen's orders to call a council of war, to conſider how the ſhips and troops might be beſt employed. After ſeveral conſultations, it was reſolved to make ſome attempts on the coaſt of Normandy: accordingly, putting to ſea on the twenty-ſeventh of June, after being driven about for ſome time by hard and contrary winds, they arrived before Dieppe on the 8th of July, and on the twelfth they began to play upon the town, and continued firing without ceaſing for the ſpace of twelve hours, during which time they threw one thouſand one hundred bombs and carcaſes into the town: and the ſtreets being narrow, the houſes old, and moſt of them built of timber, the town was ſet on fire in twenty places at once; ſo that the far greater part of it was conſumed to aſhes. After this execution, the Engliſh ſquadron ſailed along the coaſt, and obliged the French troops quartered thereabouts to march night and day, in order to be ready, in caſe we ſhould attempt a deſcent, which however was no part of the admiral's orders. On the fifteenth, about noon, the lord Berkeley came off Havre de Grace, and about four o'clock began to bombard it. The marquis de Quincy ſays, that but very few houſes were deſtroyed on this occaſion: however, he owns that not only the inhabitants, but the ſoldiers, of which the French had poured in great numbers, laboured exceſſively in putting out the fires wherever the bombs fell, which muſt have been attended with great loſs of men. On the other hand, this could not be done without loſs on our ſide; for during this ſervice, which laſted, with intervals, ſix days, the Grenada bomb veſſel was blown up, with all the men on board, and ſeveral other of the ſmaller craft ſo ſhattered, that it was thought convenient to retire, and the fleet returned to St. Helen's on the twenty-fifth of July to refit. An attempt was afterwards made, by a ſquadron under ſir Cloudeſley Shovel, upon Dunkirk: but as that place was well fortified, and ſtrongly garriſoned, the deſign at laſt was found impracticable, and ſir Cloudeſley drew off his ſhips; but in his way home he came before Calais, and ſent the bomb-veſſel in, which diſcharged ſo many ſhells upon the town, that about forty houſes were ruined. After this the admiral returned with his whole ſquadron into the Downs. Secretary Burchet, in ſpeaking of theſe bombarding expeditions, gives it as his opinion (and indeed it ſeems to be a juſt one) that the expence the nation was put to by them, was more than equivalent to what the enemy ſuffered by them †.

* The marquis of Caermarthen, in his account of this deſperate action, does great juſtice to all the officers employed therein. He ſays (page 46.) "My lord Berkeley, during all this expedition, has had a great deal of unuſual trouble, by reaſon of the embarkation of the ſoldiers: notwithſtanding which, both by his advice at councils of war and iſſuing orders, which his lordſhip has done very methodically, he hath behaved himſelf, in my opinion, with all the conduct and prudence that could be expected from a gentleman in his ſtation. "Lieutenant-general Talmaſh, the earl of Macclesfield, my lord Cutts, and all the officers of the land-forces, I think, have ſhewn all the forwardneſs and readineſs imaginable for the attempting any thing that was poſſible to be done on this occaſion. There are no officers of note, that I can yet hear of, killed in this action but monſieur Lamote, and lieutenant-general Talmaſh died the Tueſday following of the wound he received in his thigh."

† Naval Memoirs, p. 234.

The government, however, ſeem to have ſeen the matter in another light; for a medal was ſtruck on the bombarding of Havre, which had on one ſide the king's head in profile, with theſe words, GULIELMUS MAGNUS INVICTISSIMUS: on the reverſe, Perillus' bull, with this inſcription, SUIS PERIT IGNIBUS AUCTOR; alluding to the French king's having begun this barbarous kind of war, by burning the Palatinate, and bombarding Genoa. In the exergue were theſe words, PORTUS GRATIÆ EXUSTUS ET EVERSUS BOMBARDIS ANGLO BATAVIS, 1694.

No domeſtic tranſaction of any moment happened in England during the king's abſence, if we except the affair of colonel Parker, who was apprehended and committed to the Tower, having been charged with a deſign to aſſaſſinate his majeſty ſome time before. This man, according to Mr. Oldmixon *, knew ſo much of the deſigns of the Jacobite party, that they uſed all their endeavours to get him out of priſon, as he was looked upon as the moſt daring and deſperate, as well as the moſt active and bloody, of all king James's agents. While he was in the Tower a perſon came and offered to procure him his liberty for two hundred pounds. Packer told him he ſhould have three: upon which, by this man's means, he got out of the Tower in the night of the eleventh of Auguſt, and made his eſcape to France, though a reward of four hundred pounds was offered for apprehending him.

The campaign in Flanders being cloſed, and his majeſty having ſettled the affairs of the confederacy at the Hague, embarked the eighth of November at Helvoetſluys, and the next day landed at Margate. He lay that night at Rocheſter: the day following he came to Kenſington; and on Monday the 12th the parliament met, when the king opened the ſeſſion with a ſhort ſpeech, wherein he obſerved, "That the deſigns of the French had been diſappointed by ſending a fleet into the Mediterranean, and this year a ſtop had been put to the progreſs of their arms; and earneſtly recommended the providing ſupplies to proſecute the war with vigour, as the only effectual means to procure an honourable peace. He put them in mind that the act of tonnage and poundage, given for the civil liſt, would expire at Chriſtmas; and hoped they would continue that revenue to the crown, and alſo take care for diſcharging the debt for the tranſport ſhips employed in the reduction of Ireland, which was ſtill undiſcharged †."

This ſeſſion proved the moſt unanimous and tranquil of any held during this reign: the ſupplies demanded by the government were very weighty; little leſs than five millions! ‡ but they were granted without any oppoſition. In order to raiſe this ſum, the land-tax of four ſhillings in the pound was continued; the ſubſidy of tonnage and poundage renewed for five years; and certain rates and duties were impoſed upon marriages, births and burials, bachelors and widows. An act was paſſed for laying additional duties upon coffee, tea, and chocolate, towards diſcharging the debt for the tranſport ſhips; and another, impoſing duties upon glaſs-wares, ſtone and earthen bottles, coals, and culm.

The commons, however, while they were ſhewing their loyalty to their ſovereign in the liberality of their grants, forgot not what they looked upon as their own intereſt and that of the nation; the triennial bill, or bill for the frequent meeting and calling of parliaments, was now inſiſted on afreſh, as the price of theſe compliances: and William, unable to reſiſt the repeated applications of his ſubjects, or unwilling to ruffle a parliament that appeared in ſuch a favourable diſpoſition for giving, gave the royal aſſent to this bill on the twenty-ſecond of December. It enacted, that a new parliament ſhould be ſummoned every third year; and that the preſent parliament ſhould ceaſe and determine before the firſt day of January 1696, unleſs their majeſties ſhould think fit to diſſolve it ſooner. Univerſal was the joy expreſſed by the people on the paſſing this act; they fondly imagined that the door was now effectually ſhut to all thoſe methods of corruption which long parliaments had given birth to; but they ſoon found themſelves miſerably deceived: candidates had ſtill the ſame ends to anſwer; miniſters had ſtill favourite points to carry; and, in proportion as the time was ſhorter for them to accompliſh their ends in, they were induced to bid up higher, and, more generally, to carry a majority.

About this period died Dr. John Tillotſon, archbiſhop of Canterbury, being in his ſixty-third year. He had filled the metropolitan chair from the deprivation of archbiſhop Sancroft in 1690. Few prelates ever left behind them a more excellent character: no writer ever exceeded, few, very few, have equalled him in ſacred compoſition, his ſermons being to this day read with equal pleaſure and inſtruction, by thoſe who do not deem it too unfaſhionable to peruſe works of that kind. He was ſucceeded by Dr. Tenniſon, biſhop of Lincoln, who was alſo indulged with the permiſſion of recommending Dr. Gardiner to the biſhopric from which he had been tranſlated. Moſt people, however, thought that Dr. Stillingfleet was better qualified for the archiepiſcopal function; but he had too little of the courtier about him to be truſted in a ſtation of that importance.

Queen Mary did not long ſurvive her favourite prelate. She was taken ill of the ſmall-pox; a diſtemper which had proved fatal to ſeveral of her family, on the twenty-firſt of December, and died the twenty-eighth, in the thirty-third year of her age, and in the ſixth of her joint reign. Mary, though perhaps not quite ſo perfect as her panegyriſts have made her, was certainly an excellent woman, and had many virtues which adorn the ſex. Her charity was extenſive, and without oſtentation. She was an example of conjugal affection, beyond moſt we meet with in her exalted ſtation, the will of the king her huſband being the ſole rule of all her actions; and to this only we can impute the little reluctance ſhe diſcovered in mounting the throne from which her father had been depoſed, by the aſſiſtance of that huſband to whom, probably, ſhe thought herſelf more ſtrictly bound, than by any other earthly ties. Her treatment of her ſiſter Anne is not perhaps ſo eaſily to be juſtified: all we ſhall therefore attempt to bring, in extenuation of her conduct in this reſpect is, that Mary was not exempt from thoſe failings which are the neceſſary attendants on human nature. She was in her perſon tall and well proportioned: her ſhape, till latterly, was eaſy and genteel, but began to be ſomewhat clogged: with a light brown complexion, and a viſage perfectly oval, ſhe had a quick and lively eye, and a pleaſing regularity of features: ſhe had a natural air of greatneſs that commanded reſpect, which was however tempered by a graceful countenance and an affable diſpoſition. Her apprehenſion was clear and ready; her memory exact; her judgment ſolid: equally able to bear proſperity or adverſity, ſhe ſeemed to add the courage of the other ſex to the ſoftneſs of her own.

The parliament, ſenſible that his majeſty's intereſt was extremely weakened by the queen's death, both houſes attended him on the thirty-firſt of December with the following addreſs, in which the lords led the way.

"We your majeſty's moſt dutiful and loyal ſubjects, the lords ſpiritual and temporal, in parliament aſſembled, do with inexpreſſible grief humbly aſſure your majeſty of the deep ſenſe we have of the loſs your majeſty, and the whole kingdom, doth ſuſtain, by the death of that excellent princeſs our ſovereign lady the queen; moſt humbly beſeeching your majeſty that you would not indulge your grief upon this ſad occaſion, to the prejudice of the health of your royal perſon; in whoſe preſervation, not only the welfare of your own ſubjects, but of all Chriſtendom, is ſo much concerned. We further beg leave, upon this ſad occaſion, humbly to renew to your majeſty the hearty and ſincere aſſurances of our utmoſt aſſiſtance againſt all your enemies both at home and abroad, and of all other demonſtrations of the greateſt duty and affection that can poſſibly be paid by the moſt faithful ſubjects." To which his majeſty returned them his hearty thanks for their kindneſs manifeſted to him and eſpecially for the ſenſe they ſhewed of the great loſs he had ſuſtained, "which, ſays he, is above what I can expreſs *." The example of the two houſes was followed by the whole nation, and conſolatory addreſſes now poured in upon his majeſty from all quarters of the kingdom; but nothing gave him greater ſatisfaction than a letter he received from the princeſs of Denmark on this occaſion, and which we ſhall here inſert, for the reader's peruſal:

"Sir, I beg your majeſty's favourable acceptance of my ſincere and hearty ſorrow for your great affliction in the loſs of the queen; and I do aſſure your majeſty I am as ſenſibly touched with this ſad misfortune, as if I had never been ſo unhappy as to have fallen into her diſpleaſure.

"It is my earneſt deſire your majeſty would give me leave to wait upon you, as ſoon as it can be without danger of increaſing your affliction, that I may have an opportunity myſelf not only of repeating this, but of aſſuring your majeſty of my real intentions to omit no occaſion of giving you conſtant proofs of my ſincere reſpect and concern for your perſon and intereſt, as becomes, ſir,

Your majeſty's moſt affectionate ſiſter and ſervant,

ANNE." †

This letter removing his majeſty's apprehenſions of the princeſs's forming a party againſt him, he liſtened to the inſtances of the earl of Sunderland, who brought about a reconciliation between them, and he made the princeſs a preſent of moſt of the late queen's jewels, and aſſigned her St. James's palace for her reſidence: but notwithſtanding theſe appearances of friendſhip, there ſeems to have ſtill ſubſiſted a jealouſy on the king's ſide: a few formal viſits paſſed between him and his ſiſter in-law, but he admitted her to no ſhare in public buſineſs, nor would he ſuffer his miniſters to attend her, or inform her of any of the tranſactions of ſtate. Biſhop Burnet tells us, that the king was inconſolable upon the death of his conſort, inſomuch that he could not for a long time give any attention to the buſineſs of royalty, ſeeming inſenſible of any thing but his great loſs. I ſhall only obſerve here, that this extreme tenderneſs is not very agreeable to the character generally given of William as an huſband; nor can we think he ſhewed any great reſpect to the memory of the deceaſed queen, by going to the houſe in perſon before ſhe was buried, to give the royal aſſent to the land-tax bill, which he might have done by commiſſion. Mary's corpſe having lain in ſtate at Whitehall till the fifth of March, was interred in Henry VII's chapel that evening, the ducheſs of Somerſet being chief mourner; and both houſes attending the ſolemnity, a funeral ſermon was preached in the Abbey on this occaſion by archbiſhop Tenniſon.

Before we put an end to the tranſactions of the year 1694, it will be neceſſary briefly to mention ſome occurrences which we could not ſo conveniently introduce in their proper order of time.

Towards the beginning of this winter the public attention had been engaged by the trial of ſome papiſts in Lancaſhire, who had been detected in a conſpiracy againſt the government. Their deſigns had been diſcovered by one Lunt, an Iriſhman; upon whoſe circumſtantial evidence orders were iſſued for taking the principal conſpirators into cuſtody; and they were ſoon after brought to their trials at Mancheſter, where the witneſſes for the crown proved that the priſoners, and particularly one Mr. Standiſh, of Standiſh-hall, had received commiſſions from the late king James to levy war againſt the preſent government; for which purpoſe they had bought up arms, and enliſted and maintained ſoldiers at their own expence. To corroborate this, captain Baker, and other officers employed in ſecuring the conſpirators, depoſed to the finding ſuch a quantity of arms in ſeveral of their houſes, as plainly indicated a treaſonable deſign to be on foot againſt the government. There was likewiſe found in Mr. Standiſh's cloſet the draught of a declaration, in the name of king James, which was to be publiſhed at his landing. Notwithſtanding the force of this evidence, the friends of the plotters found means to manage matters ſo, by corrupting ſome of the king's witneſſes, and getting others out of the way, that the accuſed gentlemen were acquitted, and ſeveral who had been taken into cuſtody were immediately diſcharged without trial. The affair was afterwards brought into parliament at the inſtance of the Jacobite party, who accuſed Lunt and his fellow-witneſſes of a conſpiracy againſt the lives and eſtates of the perſons

they

they had charged with the conſpiracy: but upon a fair and candid examination into the merits of the cauſe, the commons reſolved that there was ſufficient ground for the proſecution and trial of the gentlemen at Mancheſter; and that there was a dangerous conſpiracy againſt the king and government. The conſpirators, diſappointed in this quarter, preferred their complaints before the houſe of peers; but their lordſhips concurred in the vote of the commons, the earls of Rocheſter and Nottingham only excepted, who entered their proteſts againſt this reſolution. After this another indictment for perjury was preferred againſt Lunt and three more of the king's witneſſes at the Lancaſter aſſizes, and all of them were found guilty. They were likewiſe indicted by the crown for a conſpiracy againſt the lives and eſtates of the gentlemen accuſed. The deſign of the miniſtry in this indictment, was to diſcover the falſhoods which had been advanced by the witneſſes in favour of the gentlemen: but the latter not chuſing to abide that iſſue, dropped the proſecution, and the priſoners were releaſed.

On the twenty-eighth of September, 1694, the Engliſh Eaſt-India Company had a ſecond charter of regulations, which, after reciting the ſubſtance of the preceding charter, made the following alterations and explanations, viz.

I. "The Company may licence their own commanders and mariners [but none other] to trade on their own private account in ſuch commodities, and to ſuch value as a general court ſhall direct, provided entry be firſt duly made, as well as cuſtom paid, before landing the ſame.

II. "To the intent that the Company's annually exporting to India the value of one hundred thouſand pounds of Engliſh goods, may truly be proved, a juſt account thereof in writing, ſigned by the governor or deputy, ſhall be annually laid before the king and council, atteſted by the oaths of the proper officers; which goods ſhall not be re-landed, nor carried any where out of the Company's limits.

III. "Neither the governor, deputy, nor committee, ſhall lend out the Company's money, without the authority of a general court, &c.

IV. "If this and the two laſt charters ſhall not appear to be profitable to the crown, and either in whole or in part, then after three years warning all the ſaid three charters ſhall be determined and void, and the ſaid governor and Company ſhall no longer continue a corporation. Laſtly,

V. "This Company ſhall, by a writing under their common ſeal, declare their acceptance and ſubmiſſion to this and the ſaid two charters, or elſe they ſhall no longer act as a corporation."

Affairs in the Weſt-Indies had for ſome time been in a very bad ſituation: the French deſtroyed our trade by their privateers, diſturbed our ſettlements continually, and frequently made deſcents upon them, particularly on Jamaica, where they committed great devaſtation, and enriched themſelves by the booty they carried off in their different incurſions. The few ſhips of war we had in thoſe parts were ſo far from being able to defend our colonies with any effect, that ſeveral of them were taken by the enemy, inſomuch that the loſs of our colonies ſeemed no improbable, or indeed remote, conſequence; ſince all their trade was deſtroyed, and their coaſts plundered at will by their privateers that were equipped in whole ſquadrons from the ſettlements the French had eſtabliſhed in Hiſpaniola. Theſe advantages, however, ſeem not to have been ſo much owing to the ſuperior force or courage of the French in thoſe parts, as to the notorious want of public ſpirit and right management in us and the Spaniards. Our governors there had from time to time made the moſt preſſing inſtances to the miniſtry at home, to take more care of our concerns in the Weſt-Indies, by ſending proper ſquadrons, and with them a ſufficient ſupply of land forces, into thoſe parts: but other buſineſs intervening, and the Spaniards not appearing either willing or able to join us in the curbing the inſolence of the enemy, neither the council nor the admiralty ſeem to have thought any more about the plantations till towards the end of this year, when they were alarmed with an account of a briſk attempt made upon Jamaica by monſieur Ducaſſe, the French governor of St. Domingo. This officer ſailed in the month of June, with three men of war and twenty-three tranſports, having on board one thouſand five hundred men, for the coaſt of Jamaica, where they arrived on the twenty-fourth of the ſame month, and made a deſcent on Port Morant, which they found abandoned; and marching from thence up the country, they plundered, burnt, and deſtroyed all they found in their way, and carried off money and effects to a conſiderable value *, having found that their ſchemes of conqueſt were altogether impracticable: for the people of Jamaica, when they found their property in danger, aſſembled readily for its defence, and behaved themſelves ſo well in an engagement with the French, that it contributed not a little to make the latter lay aſide their deſign, and to hinder them from reſuming it afterwards †.

In this ſame year a beginning was made at home to the deſign of the now noble and magnificent hoſpital of Greenwich, for the reception of the decayed ſailors ſerving in the royal navy. King William and queen Mary had for ſome time had this eſtabliſhment much at heart, and they accordingly made a grant of the royal palace at Greenwich (a part of which, on the weſt ſide, had been begun to be rebuilt for a royal palace for king Charles II.) as alſo of a large adjoining ſpace of ground. For this end king William, after the death of his royal conſort, appointed by patent a number of commiſſioners for directing the building and endowing of this intended hoſpital, and granted a large ſum out of his civil liſt for that purpoſe; and his royal ſucceſſors were conſiderable benefactors to it. At length annual ſums were granted by parliament for the finiſhing of this truly noble ſtructure, which was fully compleated in the reign of his late majeſty king George the Second.

WILLIAM III. alone. A. D. 1695.

THE death of queen Mary gave the enemies of the government a desirable opportunity to attempt distressing the nation, by pretending that the parliament was legally dissolved by her majesty's decease. This, however singular, was the opinion of her majesty's uncle the earl of Rochester, and of some others, who maintained it in the house of peers, though it was certainly very ill founded. The executive part of the government was by law in king William only, though the title, as well as the right, was declared to be in their majesties jointly. The calling of a parliament was undoubtedly an act of the executive power, and consequently it ought to have been understood in law as the special and immediate act of the king, though the writs ran in the joint names of both their majesties, as all other acts of state did, yet without impeachment or diminution of the king's authority. Upon this principle, and nobody's seconding the earl of Rochester in his motion in the house of lords, the parliament was held to be no way affected by her death, but proceeded in its deliberations as if no such accident had happened *. It is evident, if this could have been carried, and the parliament dissolved, things must have run into the utmost confusion; and therefore it is amazing that any man, who pretended the least regard for his country, should espouse so destructive a scheme, even though his sentiments had been opposite to those of the persons intrusted with the administration!

While the commons were employed in finding out ways and means for raising the money they had voted, they found their attention called off by the discovery of a surprising scene of bribery and corruption, in which not only the agents of the army, some members of parliament, but even the privy-counsellors themselves were deeply concerned. This discovery was made by a petition presented to the house by the inhabitants of Royston in Hertfordshire, January 12, complaining, that the officers and soldiers of the regiment belonging to colonel Hastings, which was quartered upon them, demanded and exacted subsistence-money in their quarters and upon their march, and were guilty of many other abuses. Upon this, colonel Hastings, his agent, Mr. Tracey Pauncefort, his brother Edward Pauncefort, major Montell, and the agents of some other regiments, were sent for, and examined before the house, who thought proper to commit Tracey Pauncefort to the Tower, for having refused to answer certain questions put to him; as they also did his brother, for having defrauded colonel Hastings's regiment of five hundred guineas. These two were soon followed by Henry Guy, esq. a member of the house, and secretary to the treasury, who was proved to have received a bribe of two hundred guineas, for procuring the payment of the arrears which were due to the regiment.

The house next proceeded to draw up an address to his majesty, which was presented on the fourth of March, and which we shall lay before the reader for his further insight into this shocking scene of military tyranny and corruption. The representation was as follows: "I. That the violences complained of from the soldiers, were in great measure occasioned by the ill practices of the agents of the army, who detained the soldiers pay, and converted it to their own use. II. By their intolerable exactions and extortions upon the officers and soldiers for paying money by way of advance, by charging more for the discount of tallies than they actually paid. III. That colonel Hastings in particular had compelled some officers of his regiment to take their cloaths from him at an exorbitant price, to promote his own private advantage, without any regard to his majesty's service, or to the discipline of the army. IV. That the said colonel Hastings had fraudulently detained five hundred guineas out of a bounty given by his majesty to the officers of his regiment, under pretence of having paid that sum as a bribe to obtain the said bounty; and had also taken two-pence in the pound out of the money due to the officers and soldiers, without having any warrant for making such deduction. V. That colonel Hastings's agent had refused or neglected to give an account of the pay due to the captains of his regiment and their companies, which tended apparently to the defrauding the officers and soldiers. VI. That many grievous and great deductions had been arbitrarily made by the agents, who had endeavoured to cover their frauds under the uncertain head of contingencies. VII. That colonel Hastings had discharged an ensign by putting another in his room, contrary to the true discipline of the army. VIII. and lastly, That the said colonel Hastings had taken money for recommending to commands in his regiment, to the discouragement of the officers who were to serve in his majesty's armies, who ought to be such as merited their commands, and not such as paid for them †." To all which abuses the house humbly intreated his majesty to give immediate redress. The king received this representation very graciously, and assured the house of his compliance with their request. Accordingly, colonel Hastings was cashiered, and his regiment given to sir John Jacob, his lieutenant-colonel. His majesty likewise appointed a council of officers to sit weekly, and examine all complaints against any officer or soldier; and published a proclamation for the strict discipline of the army, and the payment of quarters.

The commons however still continued to prosecute their enquiries, and on the seventh of March called before them several of the contractors for cloathing the army, particularly Mr. James Craggs and Mr. Richard Harnage, who refusing to be examined upon oath, or to produce their books, were committed: and a bill was brought in to compel the agents to discover their practices; but so great was the interest of the offenders, that the bill was dropped; and it does not appear that either the agents or ſuperior officers of the army, who had cheated the ſoldiers, and defrauded the government in a moſt egregious manner, were ever puniſhed according to their demerits. The commiſſioners for licenſing hackney-coaches next came under cenſure, for having, by receiving bribes and other undue means, acted corruptly and arbitrarily, and his majeſty was addreſſed to remove three of them, who were accordingly diſplaced *.

But the affair of the Eaſt-India Company, and of the bill for ſatisfying the debt due to orphans of London, made the greateſt noiſe, on account of the high rank of thoſe concerned in this ſcene of iniquity. The Eaſt-India Company had been ſtruck at in ſeveral ſeſſions: their patent was repreſented as an illegal monopoly, and another company propoſed to be erected by parliament, or at leaſt the trade laid open to all his majeſty's ſubjects; which when the Company found the parliament inclined to concur in, they applied themſelves to ſome leading men, whom they gratified with conſiderable ſums to obtain a new charter, and an act of parliament to confirm it. The diſintereſted part of both houſes being greatly ſurprized, to hear the very members who had been moſt zealous againſt the Company's patent, now declare themſelves their warmeſt advocates, ſuſpected ſome iniquitous myſtery, and therefore reſolved to dive to the bottom of it, and to vindicate, if poſſible, the honour of parliament. The firſt enquiry ſet on foot was concerning the orphans bill, which was ſuppoſed to have been procured by the like undue influence †. A committee was accordingly appointed to inſpect into the books of the chamberlain of London, and of the Eaſt-India Company; and was alſo impowered to ſend for perſons and papers. After a due examination, the committee reported, "That they found an order made by the committee of the common-council of the city, directing the chamberlain to pay ſir John Trevor, ſpeaker of the houſe of commons, one thouſand guineas; and another order for paying Paul Jodrel, eſq. clerk of the houſe, one hundred guineas, for his pains and ſervice in aſſiſting the orphans bill to paſs the parliament: that ſeveral other ſums were entered into the chamberlain's books, paid to Mr. Barret the city-ſollicitor, to defray the charge of drawing the ſaid bill, and making copies thereof; and of the petitions and orders relating to the ſame: among which payments were, five guineas paid to Mr. ſollicitor-general for his advice, five guineas to Mr. Harcourt, twenty guineas to Mr. Hungerford, chairman of the committee, for his pains and ſervice, and ſixty pounds to Mr. Jodrel; and they underſtood that the orphans had given bond to Mr. Smith and Mr. Charles Noyes to allow them twelve-pence in the pound when the bill paſſed: that the ſaid Noyes and Smith produced to the committee of the common-council a bill of their charges, amounting to upwards of three thouſand pounds monies diſburſed ‡." Upon theſe reports the commons reſolved, "That ſir John Trevor their ſpeaker receiving a gratuity of a thouſand guineas, after paſſing the orphans bills, was guilty of a high crime and miſdemeanor." Sir John Trevor, to his infinite diſgrace, was himſelf obliged to put the queſtion from the chair for his own expulſion. He did not think fit to offer any defence, but the next day abſented himſelf, and ſent the mace to the houſe, who thereupon choſe Paul Foley, eſq. their ſpeaker in his ſtead; at the ſame time, Mr. Hungerford the other member was expelled the houſe.

The commons next proceeded to enquire into the means by which the Eaſt-India Company had obtained their late charter, and appointed a committee (of which Mr. Foley was chairman) to inſpect the books of the ſaid company, when, upon examination, the moſt flagrant inſtances of venality and corruption were quickly manifeſted. It appeared that the Company had iſſued for the ſingle articles of ſecret ſervice, no leſs than one hundred and ſeventy thouſand pounds, and that ſir Thomas Cook, one of the members of the houſe of commons, had been the chief manager of this infamous traffic. Cook, upon being examined, at firſt refuſed to anſwer; ſo that on the twenty-ſixth of March the commons enacted, "That ſir Thomas Cook, a member, having refuſed to give an account of the money of the Eaſt-India Company by him diſtributed, be committed to the Tower, and a bill be brought in to oblige him to give ſuch account." But this was dropped, and a bill paſſed to indemnify him upon making a due diſcovery. Hereupon he delivered in writing, to a committee of both houſes, an account of the diſpoſal of large ſums to ſeveral perſons §: but his diſcovery not being deemed ſatisfactory, a bill paſſed both houſes, which afterwards received the royal aſſent, for impriſoning ſir Thomas Cook, ſir Baſil Firebrace, Charles Bates, eſq. and James Craggs; and for reſtraining them from alienating their eſtates: and in conſequence of further diſcoveries made, the commons, on the twenty-ſeventh of April, drew up articles of impeachment againſt the duke of Leeds, preſident of the council, "for contracting and agreeing with the merchants trading to the Eaſt-Indies, or their agents, for five thouſand five hundred guineas, to procure a charter of confirmation and a charter of regulations, or by his agents and ſervants, with his privity and conſent." The articles of impeachment being preſented at the bar of the upper houſe, the duke pleaded Not Guilty, and the commons promiſed to make good the charge. The duke, however, ſent his ſervant Robart, who had received the money for him, out of the kingdom; and his abſence prevented the matter being ever brought to a trial: but the duke's character ſuffered an indelible ſtain from the diſcovery that had been already made.

On the ſecond of May the commons reſolved, "That the offer of any money, or other advantage, to any member of parliament, for promoting any matter whatſoever depending in parliament, was a high crime and miſdemeanor, and tended to the ſubverſion of the conſtitution." By this time ſuch diſcoveries were made, and ſuch numbers of conſiderable perſons appeared to be concerned in the grand ſcene of corruption, that a full detection was equally dreaded by both parties; ſo that his majeſty, to put an end to the proceedings of the commons, who were about to impeach ſeveral other perſons, came to the houſe of peers on the third of May, and ſending for the commons, cloſed the ſeſſion with the following ſpeech:

"My lords and gentlemen, I am come to give you thanks for the ſupplies provided for carrying on the war in which we are engaged, and at the ſame time to conclude this ſeſſion, which cannot be continued any longer without manifeſt prejudice to the ends for which theſe ſupplies are given, the ſeaſon of the year making it ſo neceſſary for me to be abroad, that it were to be wiſhed our buſineſs at home would have allowed me to have been there ſooner.

"I will take care to place the adminiſtration of affairs during my abſence, in ſuch perſons on whoſe care and fidelity I can entirely depend; and I doubt not, my lords and gentlemen, but every one of you in your ſeveral ſtations will be aſſiſting to them. This is what I require of you, and that you will be more than ordinarily vigilant in preſerving the public peace." Then the lord-keeper, by his majeſty's order, prorogued the parliament to the eighteenth of June *.

The ſame day the king appointed the following high perſonages to be lords-juſtices of England for the adminiſtration of the government during his abſence, viz. Thomas lord archbiſhop of Canterbury; ſir John Somers, lord-keeper of the great-ſeal; Thomas earl of Pembroke, lord privy-ſeal; William duke of Devonſhire, lord-ſteward of his majeſty's houſhold; Charles duke of Shrewſbury, principal ſecretary of ſtate; Charles earl of Dorſet, lord-chamberlain of the houſhold; and Sidney lord Godolphin, firſt commiſſioner of the treaſury. It is remarkable, that neither the princeſs of Denmark nor her huſband were admitted into any ſhare of the adminiſtration; a neglect which could not but produce great heart-burnings in the friends of that princeſs, who was now heir-apparent to the crown.

His majeſty alſo about this time made the following promotions, viz. ſir William Trumbal was appointed ſecretary of ſtate, in the room of ſir John Trenchard, lately deceaſed; Henry lord Capel was conſtituted lord-lieutenant of Ireland; William de Naſſau, lord of Zuyleſtein, was created baron of Enfield, viſcount Tunbridge, and earl of Rochford; and Ford lord Grey of Werk was created viſcount Glendale and earl of Tankerville; and on the twelfth of May his majeſty embarked at Graveſend for Holland, from whence he ſoon after went to the army in Flanders.

The campaign of 1695 was a glorious one to king William and the allies, whoſe army being ſuperior to that of the French in the Netherlands, his majeſty reſolved to ſtrike ſome memorable blow. Accordingly, after having for ſome time amuſed marſhal Villeroy (who commanded the French army in the room of Luxemburg, who died the preceding winter) by ſeveral feints, he at length inveſted the city of Namur on the third of July. This place, the capital fortreſs in the Netherlands, was ſtrong by art and nature, before it fell into the hands of the enemy, ſince which it had received additional fortifications, ſo that it was looked upon as altogether impregnable. It was defended by a garriſon of fifteen thouſand choſen men, commanded by the count de Guiſcard; and marſhal Boufflers, who conducted a ſeparate army from that of Villeroy, though ſubjected to the other's orders, found means to throw himſelf into the town with ſeveral regiments, and thereby increaſed the garriſon to twenty or twenty-five thouſand men. It would be tedious to enumerate all the particulars of this celebrated ſiege, one of the moſt important events of the war. We ſhall therefore relate only the principal circumſtances.

It is however neceſſary to ſet before the reader the diſpoſition of the French army and that of the allies, for his better underſtanding what follows. The enemy, conſcious of their own inferiority, had thought proper to ſecure their late conqueſts, by a new line drawn between the Lys and the Schelde, and to make diſpoſitions for covering Dunkirk, Ypres, Tournay, and Namur; ſome of which they apprehended would be attacked by the allies. Mean while, the confederates formed two great armies in Flanders and Brabant: the firſt, compoſed of ſeventy-two battalions of foot, and eighty-two ſquadrons of horſe and dragoons, was encamped at Aerſeele, Canghem, and Wanterghem, between Theildt and Deynſe, and commanded by the king in perſon, aſſiſted by the old prince of Vaudemont, the beſt general in the allied army after the death of prince Waldeck. The other army, conſiſting of ſixteen battalions of foot, and one hundred and thirty ſquadrons of horſe, encamped at Zellrich and Ham, on the road from Bruſſels to Dendermonde, under the command of the elector of Bavaria, ſeconded by the duke of Holſtein-Ploen, the earl of Athlone, and ſeveral other excellent generals. There was alſo a third little army, called the Body of the Maeſe, which lay encamped between Bref and Talais on the Mehaigne. This body conſiſted of eighteen battalions of Brandenburghers, and ſeven of Dutch, and thirty-two ſquadrons of horſe; the whole commanded by the baron de Heyden, lieutenant-general of Brandenbourg, and the count de Berlo, general of the Liege cavalry. On the other hand, the marſhal de Villeroy had drawn his army together at Liege, between Condé, Tournay, and Aeth: marſhal de Boufflers, with another body of about twelve thouſand horſe and foot, lay encamped about the Sambre; and monſieur Montal, with another ſmall body, was poſted between Ypres and the fort La Knocque.

King William having ſucceeded according to his wiſh, by drawing all the enemy's forces on one

* Few acts of any conſequence were paſſed this ſeſſion beſides the money-acts, and an act againſt clipping and coining. It appears that about this time the ſilver coin of the kingdom was ſo much diminiſhed by the villainy of clippers, as to be reduced near half in value, to the great detriment of trade, and embarraſſment of the public revenue. Various expedients were propoſed for remedying this grievance; but ſome of them were dangerous, and others impracticable. An act, however, paſſed, containing very ſtrict penalties againſt clippers; but the remedy was not perfected till the next parliament.

ſide by his feigned marches, directed baron Heyden and the earl of Athlone to inveſt Namur, which was accordingly done. The king ſent them a plan of the ſiege, which he had previouſly formed, and which the elector of Bavaria highly applauded, as a well-concerted project. On the eleventh of July the trenches were opened, and the next day the batteries began to play with incredible fury.

It was natural to expect, that a place of ſo much importance as Namur, ſo ſtrong in its fortifications, and defended by ſuch a numerous garriſon commanded by a marſhal of France, would diſpute every foot of ground; and indeed it made a moſt bold and deſperate defence for near two months. During the ſiege marſhal Villeroy attempted to cut off prince Vaudemont, who commanded the army that covered the ſiege, conſiſting of fifty battalions of foot, and as many ſquadrons of horſe, encamped at Aerſeele. The French out-numbered the prince by more than two to one, and were very nigh ſurpriſing him in his trenches; but he effected a retreat to Ghent, in a manner hardly to be paralleled in antient or modern hiſtory. He firſt detached his baggage and artillery: theſe were ſoon followed by his infantry: laſtly, he drew off his horſe; and all this was performed with ſuch ſecrecy and addreſs, that the enemy had not the leaſt ſuſpicion of his deſign. Enraged to find himſelf thus baffled, Villeroy diſpatched Montal to attack the prince's rear; but the Frenchmen met with ſo warm a reception, that they were glad to retire, after having killed a few of the prince's men, and ſuffered very conſiderably themſelves. King William was ſo highly pleaſed with the prince's conduct, that he wrote him a letter with his own hand, wherein he acknowleged himſelf obliged to him; adding, "That he had given greater marks of a general conſummate in the art of war, than if he had gained a victory."

Villeroy, diſappointed in this attempt, afterwards endeavoured to ſurprize Nieuport, and was diſappointed there alſo. He then, with better ſucceſs, attacked the forts of Dixmuyde and Deynſe, both which ſurrendered to him without ſtriking a blow, though their garriſons conſiſted of near ſeven thouſand men, among whom were two garriſons of Engliſh; and what rendered this misfortune the greater was, that the French detained theſe garriſons priſoners of war, refuſing to ranſom or exchange them according to cartel; inſomuch that many of them, by the hardſhips they ſuffered, were forced into the French ſervice, and ſent quite acroſs France into Catalonia. The next ſtratagem Villeroy made uſe of to draw off the allies from the ſiege of Namur, was the bombarding of Bruſſels, which was executed with ſuch fury *, that within the ſpace of forty-eight hours two thouſand houſes and upwards, in the heart of the town, were reduced to aſhes; the ſtadthouſe, the great church, and ſeveral others, demoliſhed; and the very foundations of them thrown up by the bombs. The electreſs of Bavaria, who was then in the city, though removed out of danger from theſe miniſters of deſtruction, was yet ſo terrified by their dreadful and inceſſant noiſe, that ſhe miſcarried; and it was with the utmoſt difficulty that ſhe eſcaped with life. This terrible deſtruction of a capital city, which by the cartel was to have been exempt from bombardments, was juſtified by the French, on account of the bombardments that the Engliſh had made upon the coaſt of France.

After the perpetrating of this unmanly revenge, Villeroy being conſiderably reinforced by all the troops that could be ſpared out of the garriſons, and the forces from the ſea-coaſts, marched directly towards Namur, with an army, as the French themſelves gave out, of no leſs than eighty thouſand men, and which came juſt time enough to be witneſs to the ſurrender of that important fortreſs. King William having taken up the camp which the French army had occupied when they covered the ſiege of that place, the marſhal found there was no attacking him, and therefore returned towards the Mehaigne; ſo that the garriſon now loſt all hopes of being relieved. It had indeed made a moſt noble reſiſtance, and never was military valour and ſkill more illuſtriouſly diſplayed than in the attack and defence of this place. The genius, or the ſuperior courage of the allies, however, at length ſucceeded. Count Guiſcard finding that the enemy, after having effected ſeveral ſucceſſive lodgments of great importance, were preparing for a general aſſault, ſurrendered the town on the fourth of Auguſt, and on the ſixth the French retired into the caſtle, againſt which twelve batteries were opened on the thirteenth. Boufflers made ſeveral bold attempts to break through the camp of the allies, but was always diſappointed, by the prudent precautions of king William. At length the garriſon being from near twenty thouſand, now reduced to little better than ſix thouſand, the marſhal thought proper to ſurrender, and the capitulation was ſigned on the evening of the ſecond of September. Villeroy, who lay emcamped at Gemblours, was no ſooner informed of the ſurrender of Namur than he paſſed the Sambre, near Charleroi, with great precipitation; and having reinforced the garriſon of Dinant with two thouſand men, retreated with the reſt of his army towards the lines in the neighbourhood of Mons.

On the fifth day of September the French garriſon marched out of the caſtle, when king William cauſed marſhal Boufflers to be arreſted and detained priſoner, by way of repriſal for the detention of the garriſons of Dixmuyde and Deynſe, contrary to the cartel eſtabliſhed between the two nations. Hereupon the court of Verſailles thought proper to give its parole of honour that the ſaid garriſons ſhould be reſtored, and the marſhal was immediately ſet at liberty. The reduction of Namur, in the ſight of an army of eighty thouſand men, ſeemed to eſtabliſh the military character of king William, and more than ever confirmed him in the confidence of the allies: the Dutch in particular teſtified their acknowlegements, by every poſſible mark of gratitude and reſpect. His majeſty now entruſted the command of the army to the elector of Bavaria, and retired to Loo, the uſual place of his receſs. Soon after both armies went into winter-quarters. We are not to ſuppoſe that ſo capital a conqueſt as that of Namur, could be gained without a conſiderable loſs on the ſide of the victors: the allies left near twelve thouſand men before the place. Among the ſlain were the count de Rivera, the baron de Heckeren, and ſeveral other officers of note. Among the wounded were the prince of Holſtein-Norburgh, the prince of Heſſe-Homburgh, and ſeveral inferior officers. The elector of Bavaria diſtinguiſhed himſelf in a particular manner during the whole ſiege.

On the Rhine nothing was done this whole campaign; the army of the empire under prince Baden, and that of the French commanded by the mareſchal de Lorges, being ſo nearly equal, that neither of the two generals would venture upon a battle, but contented themſelves with watching the motions of each other: nor did Italy this year furniſh any military tranſactions deſerving notice ſince the ſiege of Caſal, which was yielded up to the duke of Savoy in fourteen days, to the ſurprize of all the world, as that place was eſteemed the ſtrongeſt perhaps in Europe: but it appeared afterwards that the duke and the French king were privately negotiating with each other; and it was conjectured that the latter made a voluntary ſacrifice of this fortreſs to the duke, in order to engage his forbearance during the remaining part of the campaign. The French made but a very indifferent figure in Catalonia this year. Admiral Ruſſel, who wintered at Cadiz, prevented them from forming the ſiege of Barcelona; upon which they retired to Palamos, which our admiral bombarded ſo furiouſly, that the greateſt part of the town and caſtle were laid in ruins: after which he retired again to Cadiz; there he made the neceſſary diſpoſitions for ſecuring our trade in the Mediterranean from any interruption, by leaving a ſufficient force to fruſtrate the deſigns of the enemy, and even to aſſiſt the Spaniards in caſe they had ſhewn any activity in their own concerns. Having ſettled theſe matters, and given proper inſtructions to ſir David Mitchel, rear-admiral of the red, who was to be left with a ſquadron of twenty-three ſhips of the line, beſides frigates and bomb-veſſels, he turned his thoughts entirely to the carrying the reſt of the fleet back to England; which deſign he happily accompliſhed in the beginning of the winter.

I ſhall now conſider what paſſed at home, in reſpect to the deſign of humbling the French on the Ocean. The great men in the cabinet had determined to proſecute the methods of bombardment which had been ſet on foot the laſt year; and St. Malo's and Dunkirk were the places marked out to be demoliſhed. The fleet intended for this ſervice was in ſuch forwardneſs, that the lord Berkeley of Stratton, who was to command it, ſailed from Spithead on the twenty-third of June, and on the fourth of July came before St. Malo's. On the fifth the bombardment began about ſix in the morning, and was ſo vigorouſly purſued, that in about two hours time a great fire broke out in the eaſt part of the town, and vaſt clouds of ſmoke were ſeen aſcending in ſeveral places. About four in the afternoon another great fire broke out in the weſt part of the town. By ſeven in the evening the bomb-veſſels had ſpent their whole cargo of nine thouſand bombs and carcaſſes, and therefore the ſignal was given to put to ſea. This enterprize againſt St. Malo's was executed by ſix Engliſh and four Dutch men of war, nine galliots, fourteen flat-bottomed boats, and two brigantines. The loſs we ſuſtained on this occaſion was ſixty men, killed and wounded, by the enemy's fire from their batteries, and one bomb-veſſel ſunk. The bombardment laſted ſomewhat more than eleven hours, and laid the greateſt part of the town in ruins.

After this affair was over, it was reſolved to ſend a ſecond ſquadron to Granville, a place of great trade, under the command of captain Bembow, who on the eighth of July anchored before the place, and began the bombardment, which laſted from nine in the morning till ſix in the evening; and then the ſquadron ſailed away, leaving the town all in flames. After this the fleet ſailed to Portſmouth, in order to make the neceſſary preparations there for an attempt upon Dunkirk; the deſtruction of which port was eagerly deſired both by the Engliſh and Dutch, whoſe trade had ſuffered prodigiouſly from the enemy's privateers that were fitted out from thence. Lord Berkeley putting to ſea again with the fleet on the laſt day of July, came the next day before Dunkirk, which he battered for eight hours: but the French had in all places made ſuch ſtrong preparations for their defence, as rendered an attempt to land altogether impracticable. Two of the machines, called Infernals, were ſent in by the admiral, but did little or no execution. His lordſhip therefore drew off the fleet, and proceeded to Calais, which he bombarded without interruption for nine hours, in which time ſix hundred ſhells were thrown into the place. The magazine and the Rife-Bank were entirely burnt, ſeveral houſes deſtroyed, and many others very much damaged. It is remarkable, that notwithſtanding all the efforts of the enemy, and a prodigious fire from their batteries, we ſuffered very little loſs, only the captain of a ketch being killed by a cannon-ball.

Our trade however ſuffered ſeverely this year from the enemy's privateers, who, notwithſtanding all the vigilance of the government, and our uncontrolled dominion at ſea, found means to ſlip out of their ports, and take a number of our merchant ſhips. The marquis of Caermarthen, ſon to the duke of Leeds, a young and inexperienced nobleman, being ſtationed with a ſquadron off the iſles of Scilly, miſtook a fleet of merchant-ſhips for the Breſt fleet, and retired with precipitation into Milford-Haven, without taking any pains to be ſatisfied whether he was right or not in his conjecture. By this raſh ſtep, to give it no worſe a name, the Barbadoes fleet, then on its return home, was left a defenceleſs prey to the French privateers, who took a great number of them, and alſo five Eaſt-India ſhips, valued at a million ſterling. This occaſioned a great clamour at home, eſpecially on the part of the merchants of London, who complained loudly, that neither the admiralty nor the government took the care that was neceſſary for preſerving our trade. A French man of war at the ſame time fell upon our factory on the coaſt of Guinea, took a ſmall fort we had there, and deſtroyed it. Theſe loſſes ſenſibly abated the joy the nation would otherwiſe have felt from the ſucceſs of our arms on the continent.

In the courſe of this year a parliament was held in Scotland, which met the ninth of May; and three things were chiefly propoſed to their conſideration by the miniſtry of that kingdom, in virtue of a letter ſent from his majeſty, juſt before his departure for Holland, to the marquis of Tweddale, his high-commiſſioner: for not only the duke of Hamilton, but his brother the duke of Queenſberry, died the laſt winter. The matters propoſed were theſe: 1. Supplies for the enſuing year. 2. Moderation in church affairs. His majeſty at the ſame time gave them his aſſurances of his maintaining preſbytery. 3. The advancement of trade. As to the ſupplies, this parliament granted one hundred and forty thouſand pounds for the maintenance of their forces by ſea and land. They alſo paſſed an act in relation to their kirk, in which however there was not one word in favour of epiſcopacy, or any thing that looked like a toleration of the members of the church of England; but the act that made the moſt noiſe in England was that for ſettling a trade and colonies in the weſtern plantations, it being propoſed to carry on a trade from thence to the Eaſt Indies, by the aſſiſtance of ſome wealthy merchants and interlopers in London, which alarmed the Eaſt India company greatly, and was the occaſion of a miſunderſtanding between the two nations, as will be related hereafter.

But this ſeſſion of the Scottiſh parliament was chiefly remarkable for its ſtrict enquiry into the affair of Glencoe (of which we have already given an account) when they entirely acquitted the king from any ſhare of guilt in that barbarous maſſacre, by unanimouſly reſolving, "That his majeſty's inſtructions to ſir Thomas Livingſtone contained no warrant for the execution of the Macdonalds: that the ſaid execution was a downright murder: that the Maſter of Stair's letters exceeded the king's inſtructions: that ſir Thomas Livingſtone had reaſon to give the orders he had given. They likewiſe ordered that lieutenant-colonel Hamilton ſhould be inſtantly arreſted, and brought to his trial for the murder of the Macdonalds: that Campbell of Glenlion, captain Drummond, lieutenant Lindſey, enſign Lundy, and ſerjeant Barber, who had been concerned in the ſaid maſſacre, ſhould be likewiſe proſecuted; and that an impeachment ſhould be lodged againſt the earl of Braidalbin, who had ſo groſsly impoſed upon his majeſty, and abuſed his authority." Notwithſtanding theſe reſolutions, by which the king appears to be ſo ſolemnly acquitted, his ill-judged lenity, in inflicting no puniſhments on ſuch inhuman delinquents, ſubjected him to much cenſure, which his enemies took care to improve with all their art, inſomuch as to deprive him of the affection of the Scots.

A parliament being aſſembled in Ireland this ſummer by the new lieutenant, the lord Capel, they granted the king a ſupply of one hundred and ſixty-three thouſand pounds, to be raiſed by a poll-tax, and a further ſum by additional duties of exciſe and on wine, foreign merchandize, &c. They alſo paſſed ſome acts for preventing the growth of popery, and the diſarming of papiſts. Let us now reſume the affairs of England.

King William arriving at Kenſington from Holland, the tenth of October, iſſued a proclamation the next day for diſſolving the parliament, and aſſembling another on the twenty-ſecond of November; and it having been repreſented to his majeſty how much it might conduce to his intereſt in the enſuing elections, to endeavour to gain the affections of his people, by a more open and familiar deportment than he had hitherto obſerved, he thought fit to go to the races at Newmarket this ſeaſon, where he was met and complimented by the vice-chancellor and heads of the univerſity of Cambridge. From thence he made a tour through Northamptonſhire, Lincolnſhire, Warwickſhire, and ſeveral other counties, viſiting the nobility and perſons of diſtinction, who vied with each other in the magnificence of their entertainments. In his progreſs he viſited the city and univerſity of Oxford, where he was received by the duke of Ormond, chancellor of that univerſity, the vice-chancellor, and the reſt of the members, in their academical habits; and an elegant entertainment was prepared in the Theatre, from the preſumption that his majeſty would honour them with his preſence at dinner: but an anonymous letter having been conveyed to his majeſty, in which the writer acquainted him that there was a deſign laid to poiſon him, he immediately ſet out for Windſor; nor could all the intreaties of the univerſity prevail on him to ſtay: he did indeed condeſcend to aſſign ſomething like a reaſon for his abrupt departure, by ſaying, "He only paid them this viſit to manifeſt his affection for them: that he had before ſeen the curioſities of the univerſity, and therefore did not propoſe the making any ſtay at this time."

On Friday the twenty-ſecond of November the new parliament met, in purſuance of the ſummons; and the commons being directed to chuſe a ſpeaker, elected Paul Foley, eſq. who was approved by his majeſty the next day, when the king made a ſpeech to both houſes, to the following effect:

"He engaged in the preſent war, he ſaid, by the advice of his firſt parliament; and the laſt had with great chearfulneſs aſſiſted him in carrying it on, and he doubted not but the preſent one would as willingly ſupport him in it by their ſupplies: that he could not but take notice on this occaſion of the ſignal bravery of the Engliſh forces during the laſt campaign, which had reflected equal honour on themſelves, and on the nation to which they belonged. He lamented, as a great misfortune, his having been obliged, from the beginning of his reign, to aſk ſuch large aids of his people; but, he obſerved, they were abſolutely neceſſary, for the effectual proſecution of the war. He took notice that the funds had been deficient, and the condition of the civil liſt ſuch, that he could not poſſibly ſubſiſt without their care. He told them, that compaſſion obliged him to mention the miſerable condition of the French proteſtants who ſuffered for their religion, and the redreſs of the ill ſtate of the coin, would prove a farther charge. He recommended to them the framing bills for the encouragement and increaſe of ſeamen, the advancement of trade, particularly that of the Weſt-Indies, and that the army might be properly recruited, without giving the ſubject cauſe of complaint; and concluded with exhorting them to uſe diſpatch, and to avoid heats and diviſions."

Hereupon the two houſes addreſſed his majeſty ſeparately, but to the ſame effect, congratulating him on his ſucceſſes this campaign, and his ſafe return; aſſuring him they would ſupport his government, and aſſiſt him in the proſecution of the war. The commons addreſſed his majeſty to appoint a faſt for the ſucceſs of their deliberations; and accordingly cordingly the eleventh of December was appointed for London, and the eighteenth for the reſt of England. Great complaints being made to the houſe of the abuſe of written protections which had been given by the members, all ſuch protections were called in, and declared void in law: at the ſame time, however, it was declared, that their menial ſervants ſhould enjoy their uſual privileges, but no perſon ſhould be taken into cuſtody upon complaint of breach of privilege till this matter ſhould be examined. This order was not to extend to any breach of privilege upon the perſon of a member.

On the fourth day of the ſeſſion the bill was introduced for regulating trials in caſes of high-treaſon, which was ſuddenly paſſed thro' both houſes, tho' it had met with ſuch oppoſition in former parliaments, on account of the clauſe added by the lords, "That all the peers ſhould be ſummoned to attend at the trial of every peer and peereſs:" which amendment was now agreed to by the lower houſe *.

The commons next proceeded to take into their conſideration the ſupply for the year 1696, when, upon going through the accounts and eſtimates laid before them, they voted five millions twenty-four thouſand eight hundred and fifty-three pounds for that ſervice, viz. two millions and an half for the navy, and the reſt for the army and ordnance, to be raiſed on the following funds, viz. 1. By a land-tax of four ſhillings in the pound. 2. By duties continued on wine, vinegar, tobacco, Eaſt India goods, and other merchandizes, from 1698 to 1701. 3. An additional duty upon all French goods, wines twenty-five pounds per ton, brandy thirty pounds per ton, vinegar fifteen ſhillings per ton; all other French goods twenty-five per cent. ad valorem, for the term of twenty-one years. 4. Duties upon low wines or ſpirits of the French extraction. 5. Duties continued upon ſalt, glaſs-wares, tobacco-pipes, &c. Purſuant to that part of the king's ſpeech relating to the civil liſt, and to the diſtreſſed condition of the French proteſtants, the commons alſo ſettled a fund for raiſing 500,000 l. a-year for the former, and 15,000 l. a-year for the relief of the latter †.

The neceſſity of amending our money at this time occaſioned ſeveral debates, which ended in a reſolution to proceed to a new coinage, by calling the diminiſhed ſilver-money into the mint by tale, whereby the people had good new ſilver coin returned them from the Mint. The next point to be determined was, whether the new coin, in its different denominations, ſhould retain the original weight and purity of the old, or the eſtabliſhed ſtandard be raiſed in value. Mr. Lowndes, ſecretary of the Treaſury, who was the chief advocate for the enhancing method, alleged in favour of his ſcheme, That the raiſing the ſtandard would prevent the exportation of our coin, as alſo the melting of it down; and that thereby people would be more induced to bring in their plate and bullion to the Mint. On the other ſide it was argued very juſtly, that the common conſent of all nations had fixed ſilver at one and the ſame price, or very nearly: that the worth of it was relative: that the weight and fineneſs, or the quantity of pure ſilver, and not the bare denomination, were the only rules which governed not only foreign nations in their exchanges and other dealings with us, but alſo our own people in their home-trade; ſince ſix ſhillings and three-pence, for which it was propoſed a crown-piece of the new currency ſhould paſs, would purchaſe no more of any commodity, nor go farther in paying bills of exchange, than five ſhillings of our unclipped preſent coin would purchaſe, becauſe the latter contained as much pure ſilver as the former: that this was clear in the caſe of guineas, now at thirty ſhillings, all commodities being raiſed in price in proportion to the ſaid price of guineas: that an ounce of ſilver was not even at preſent worth ſix ſhillings and three pence of our good coin, but only of the diminiſhed or clipped money, ſince one ounce of ſilver could not be worth more than another ounce of the ſame fineneſs; and with five ſhillings and two-pence per ounce of the new milled money they could buy as much bullion as they pleaſed: that with reſpect to the before-named argument, that the raiſing the denomination would keep our ſilver at home, it is of no weight, ſince nothing can keep or bring in money but our getting the balance of trade in our favour: for if we take more goods from foreign parts than they take from us, the balance muſt be paid them in our money, or in bullion, which is all one: that with regard to our home concerns in particular, there are many objections againſt raiſing the ſtandard. Firſt, All poor labourers, ſoldiers, and ſailors, would thereby be defrauded of part of their juſt wages, as would alſo creditors of part of their juſt debts, and the landlord of part of his rent, or elſe great confuſion and diſpute would ariſe about theſe matters. Theſe arguments were moſt judiciouſly and clearly handled, and the truth of them demonſtrated by the great Mr. Locke, in his excellent Treatiſe on Coin, which he publiſhed at this time, in anſwer to Mr. Lowndes's Eſſay for the Amendment of the Silver Coin.

In concluſion, the arguments of the philoſopher were deemed more convincing than thoſe of the projector; and the commons reſolved that the eſtabliſhed ſtandard ſhould be preſerved, with regard to weight and fineneſs; and that the loſs ariſing from calling in the old money, which was calculated at two millions ſterling (though it afterwards

* By this act it is decreed, That perſons indicted for high-treaſon, or miſpriſion of treaſon, ſhould be ſupplied with a copy of the indictment five days before the indictment, and indulged with two counſellors to plead in their defence: that no perſon ſhould be indicted but upon the oaths of two lawful witneſſes ſwearing to the ſame overt-act, or at leaſt to different acts of the ſame treaſon: that in two or more treaſons of divers kinds, alleged in the ſame bill of indictment, one witneſs to one, and another witneſs to another, ſhould not be deemed two witneſſes: that no perſon ſhould be proſecuted for any ſuch crime, unleſs the indictment was found within three years after the offence was committed; except in caſe of a deſign or attempt to aſſaſſinate or poiſon the king, which ſhould not be ſubject to this limitation: that perſons indicted for treaſon, or miſpriſion of treaſon, ſhould be furniſhed with copies of the pannel of jurors, two days at leaſt before their trial; and ſhould have the ſame proceſs to compel their witneſs to appear, which is uſually granted to witneſſes againſt them: that no evidence ſhould be admitted of any overt-act not expreſsly laid in the indictment: and that this act ſhall not extend to any impeachment, or other proceedings in parliament; nor to any indictment for counterfeiting his majeſty's coin, his great-ſeal, privy-ſeal, ſign-manual, or ſignet. turned out to be near two millions and an half) ſhould be borne by the public, and a fund ſettled for ſupplying the deficiency: accordingly, on the 31ſt of December the commons reſolved to raiſe one million two hundred thouſand pounds by a duty on houſes or windows, for ſupplying the deficiency of the clipped money. A proclamation was alſo iſſued, at the inſtance of the houſe, for calling in the clipped money by degrees, which occaſioned inexpreſſible confuſion, the receivers refuſing to take it for what it was coined, on pretence of its being clipped too near, or its being of bad alloy, &c. Whereupon the commons reſolved, "That the recompence for ſupplying the deficiency of the clipped money ſhould extend to all clipped money that was ſilver, though of a coarſer alloy than the ſtandard; and that the collectors and receivers of taxes ſhould receive all ſuch: that a reward of five per cent. ſhould be given to ſuch perſons as brought in milled or unclipped money: that three-pence per ounce ſhould be given for all wrought plate brought in to the Mint, above the value; and that commiſſioners ſhould be appointed in every county to pay and diſtribute the milled and broad unclipped money, and the new coined money, and to receive the clipped money." Theſe reſolutions were formed into a bill, with a clauſe to prohibit the melting down and exportation of our coin and bullion, and to prohibit the uſe of plate in public houſes: which article proved the beſt expedient to ſupply the mints with bullion, there being at this time ſcarce any public houſe in England that had not ſilver tankards, and other utenſils of the ſame metal; which the owners choſe rather to carry to the Mint and turn into ready money, than keep ſo much uſeleſs and dead ſilver at home. Means were alſo uſed for gradually reducing the price of guineas to near their juſt value in ſilver in foreign parts, the parliament with great judgment directing the manner of gradually lowering them, viz. from thirty ſhillings to twenty-nine ſhillings, twenty-eight ſhillings, twenty-five ſhillings, and laſtly to twenty-two ſhillings, whereby very little loſs accrued to individuals.

Thus in about a year's time, or a little more, our ſilver coin came forth from the Mint, the fineſt and moſt beautiful of any in Europe: and although many inconveniencies happened in trade till this recoinage was completed, yet in the end it aſtoniſhed and confounded all the enemies of this kingdom both at home and abroad, and procured great credit to Mr. Montagu (afterwards lord Halifax) who then had the chief management of the Treaſury.

It was on this occaſion that Mr. Montagu firſt ſet on foot a new circulating paper-credit, by iſſuing bills from the Exchequer, at the ſame time contracting (as has ever ſince been done) for their being circulated for ready money on demand: and as many of theſe firſt exchequer-bills were for ſums ſo low as five pounds and ten pounds, they were of ſingular uſe during the great ſcarcity of ſilver occaſioned by the re-coinage, as they were taken at the Exchequer for all payments of the revenue; and as, when re-iſſued, they were then allowed ſeven pounds twelve ſhillings per cent. intereſt, they ſoon aroſe, from a ſmall diſcount, to be better than par. Theſe have ſince been iſſued yearly; and the Bank of England has conſtantly, for many years paſt, been the contractor for their circulation at a certain premium; for which end the ſaid Bank takes annual ſubſcriptions for enabling it to circulate them. This famous re-coinage was performed at London, Exeter, Briſtol, Cheſter, York, and Norwich *.

While the parliament thus manifeſted their attachment to the preſent government, they likewiſe reſolved to ſupport the liberties of the ſubject. The king had a particular regard for the earl of Portland (Mynheer Bentinck) who had been a faithful ſervant to him, and had accompanied him from Holland at his coming to take poſſeſſion of the crown of theſe realms. To this nobleman he had lately made a grant of ſome lordſhips in the county of Denbigh, including part of the antient demeſnes of the principality of Wales. The vaſſals and tenants of theſe lordſhips preſented a petition to the parliament, remonſtrating againſt the legality of the grant, and inſiſting on the right which they had always enjoyed, of holding ſolely of the prince of Wales. The commons took the affair into conſideration; and finding the objections advanced by the petitioners to be well founded, addreſſed the king to recal his grant. His majeſty was not a little piqued at this addreſs, which ſeemed to reflect on his conduct. He promiſed however to recal his grant, and ſaid he would find ſome other waw of ſhewing his favour to the earl of Portland †.

In this remarkable year, the parliament, gentry, and merchants of Scotland, made a very great effort (perhaps the greateſt that had ever been made by one European nation in the firſt attempt) for eſtabliſhing a colony of their own people in America, and at the ſame time a company for trading to Africa and Eaſt India, which however proved in the end very fatal to Scotland. It was ſaid to have been underhand ſet on foot, and encouraged by the interlopers in the Engliſh Eaſt India trade, who finding that both king and parliament inclined to favour the company, flattered themſelves with hopes, that by encouraging the deſigns of the Scots, they might obtain their own particular ends.

Be that as it may, it is certain that the Scots had long lamented their being almoſt the only maritime country in Europe without the Mediterranean and Baltic Seas, which had no colony nor ſettlement out of Europe. This point had more eſpecially occupied their thoughts ſince the Reſtoration; but the arbitrary meaſures of king Charles II. and his brother the late king James, prevented their carrying this national concern. Upon the acceſſion of king William, they began to think more ſincerely about mercantile ſchemes; and in 1693 their parliament paſſed an act "for encouraging of foreign trade," by empowering merchants to enter into commercial ſocieties, more eſpecially for trading to Aſia, Africa, and America. And in this year, 1695, in the parliament of which we have already made mention, thay obtained a royal charter, incorporating a company to trade to thoſe parts.

It ſeems the king had, as uſual, empowered his commiſſioner (then the marquis of Tweddale) to promiſe his aſſent to any bill for the encouragement of trade, provided it did not interfere with the commerce of England. The commiſſioner, not properly regarding this reſtriction, gave his aſſent to an act for eſtabliſhing a company trading to the Eaſt or Weſt Indies, empowering them to plant colonies, build cities, towns, or forts, in places uninhabited, or in others, with the conſent of the natives, veſting them with an excluſive right, and an exemption for twenty-one years from all duties and impoſitions. This act was likewiſe confirmed by letters-patent under the great-ſeal, without any further warrant from the crown. It had been framed by Mr. William Paterſon, the projector of the Bank of England and of the new Orphans Fund. He had lived ſome years in America, as well as in ſundry other foreign parts, and had entered far into ſpeculations relating to commerce and colonies. This gentleman had thought of a place called Darien, very near the Iſthmus which joins North and South America, uninhabited by any European people, and where his countrymen the Scots might make a good ſettlement; as alſo another oppoſite to it on the ſouth ſide of the Iſthmus, near Panama, whereby he propoſed that a trade might be carried on both to the Eaſt and Weſt Indies.

No ſooner was the company erected in virtue of the royal patent obtained, than Mr. Paterſon and his friends in England had influence enough to get three hundred thouſand pounds ſterling ſubſcribed in nine days time. Soon after three hundred thouſand pounds more was ſubſcribed in Scotland, the whole capital being at firſt deſigned to be but ſix hundred thouſand pounds ſterling: but fearing that the Engliſh ſubſcribers would be ſoon obliged to withdraw their ſubſcriptions, Mr. Paterſon and his aſſociates went to Amſterdam, where they at firſt met with good encouragement, till the Dutch magiſtrates, apprehending that this new company might do great prejudice both to their Eaſt and Weſt India companies, entirely fruſtrated their ſubſcriptions there. Their next attempt was at Hamburgh, where they were very cordially received, and the ſubſcription was preſently filled. Thus far the company's wiſhes ſucceeded, and they began with all expedition to build and purchaſe ſhips of great burthen, both at Amſterdam and Hamburgh, when ſuddenly this fine proſpect was overclouded, by the alarm taken by both the Engliſh houſes of parliament, who appointed a committee to enquire into the act which had lately paſſed in Scotland, for erecting a company trading to Africa and the Eaſt Indies. After a full and impartial examination of all the particulars relating to this act, the committee made its report, when the two houſes preſented an addreſs to his majeſty on the twenty-fifth of December, againſt the great advantages which he had conſented to be granted to this company, "whereby (ſay they) a great part of the ſtock and ſhipping of England will be carried into Scotland, where there will be a free port for all Eaſt India commodities; and that conſequently the ſeveral places of Europe, till now furniſhed from England, would be furniſhed much cheaper from thence. The ſaid Eaſt India merchandize will be alſo run into England by the Scots, to the unſpeakable prejudice of the trade and navigation of England, and of your majeſty's cuſtoms. And that if the Scots be ſuffered to ſettle plantations in America, our commerce in tobacco, ſugar, cotton, ſkins, maſts, &c. will be utterly loſt:" with much more to the ſame effect *. To this addreſs the king returned for anſwer, "That he had been ill ſerved in Scotland; but he hoped ſome remedies might be found to prevent the inconveniencies which might ariſe from this act." Soon after his majeſty turned out both the ſecretaries of ſtate for Scotland and the marquis of Tweddale, and great changes were made in the miniſtry of that kingdom: the lord Murray, ſon of the marquis of Athol, was made ſecretary of ſtate.

The commons afterwards came to a reſolution, on the twenty-ſixth of January, 1696, "That the directors of the company of Scotland trading to Africa and the Indies, adminiſtring and taking here in this kingdom an oath De Fideli, and under colour of a Scottiſh act of parliament ſtiling themſelves a company, and acting as ſuch, and raiſing money in this kingdom for carrying on the ſaid trade, were guilty of a high crime and miſdemeanor; and that the lord Belhaven, William Paterſon the projector, James Bateman, and the reſt of the directors, who were reſident in England, ſhould be impeached:" but while the impeachments were drawing up, Roderic Mackenzie, who had been the chief informer againſt the company, began to retract his evidence, and was ordered into cuſtody; but he made his eſcape, and could never be retaken, though the king iſſued a proclamation for that purpoſe. The Scots however proceeded in their project of making ſettlements in the Weſt Indies, and actually ſettled a colony a year or two afterwards at Darien. But of this affair I ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak more particularly hereafter.

Towards the end of the year 1695, John Sobieſki king of Poland, who, at the inſtance of his queen, a daughter of France, had hitherto refuſed to acknowlege king William's title to the crown of theſe realms, now conſented to recognize him as king of Great Britain; as did alſo about the ſame time the republic of Venice. His majeſty, ſoon after his acceſſion to the throne, communicated the ſame to the ſenate in a very handſome letter, which they took no notice of, but recalled Sarotti, who reſided as their ſecretary at London. About this time, however, they wrote an anſwer to it, and put it into the hands of ſignor Alexander Zeno, their ambaſſador at Vienna, to be by him delivered to lord Lexington, his majeſty's envoy-extraordinary at the imperial court, who received it with marks of eſteem and ſatisfaction; and then the ſenate proceeding to the choice of their ambaſſadors-extraordinary, the ſignors Lorenzo Soranzo and Gerolamo Venier were pitched upon, who made a very ſplendid public entry in the ſpring of the year 1696, and were received in a magnificent manner by the king, notwithſtanding the compliment came ſo much after time.

The year 1696 opened with the diſcovery of a plot for aſſaſſinating king William and invading the kingdom, in order to reſtore the late king

James. The French king was by this time grown heartily weary of the war, after having in a manner ruined and depopulated his country. However, before he put a period to his military operations, he determined to make one grand effort to reſtore his good friend and ally James, in concert with the Jacobites here, whoſe ſpirits were greatly elated by the death of queen Mary; the deceaſe of whom, they imagined, had conſiderably weakened the intereſt of her royal conſort. The ſcheme of an invaſion, and the deſign of taking off the king, were as early as the beginning of February this year publicly talked of in France; and that court had drawn down an army towards Dunkirk and Calais, ſo that nothing ſeemed wanting but the winds and weather to put them in action. On the eighteenth of February king James took poſt for Calais, when the troops, artillery, and ſtores, were ordered to be put on board the proper veſſels, then lying ready, with the utmoſt diligence, while news of the ſucceſs of the aſſaſſination was with great impatience expected from England, in order to ſet ſail. The duke of Wirtemberg, on news of theſe preparations, and the reports current at that time, diſpatched an aid de camp for England, to give king William notice of what was on foot. The prince of Vaudemont, who was then at Bruſſels with the elector of Bavaria, alſo diſpatched expreſſes to the ſame purport. The duke of Wirtemberg's meſſenger came firſt to England, and acquainted his majeſty that the duke had ſtopped all the ſhips in the harbour and canal of Oſtend, as well as that of Bruſſels, in order to tranſport forces over for his ſervice. The ſtates of Holland made the like preparations at Sas Van Ghent: but notwithſtanding all the expedition uſed by the duke of Wirtemberg, the king had ſome time before received certain intimation, not only of the invaſion, but alſo of the conſpiracy againſt his perſon. The earl of Ayleſbury, lord Montgomery ſon to the marquis of Powis, ſir John Fenwick, ſir John Friend, captain Charnock, captain Porter, and one Mr. Goodman, appear to have been the principal perſons concerned in this infamous deſign, which, from the chief and moſt bloody circumſtance of it, obtained the name of The Aſſaſſination Plot. The duke of Berwick had come privately over to England in the beginning of February, in order to haſten the preparations of the conſpirators, whom he aſſured of king James's being ready to make a deſcent with twenty-two thouſand French forces; and diſtributed commiſſions, and gave directions for procuring men, arms, and horſes, to join him at his arrival. There were various rumours about the nature of theſe commiſſions; ſome ſaid it was only to levy war againſt the prince of Orange, and all his adherents; and that king James was in no way privy to the murdering part of the ſcheme. We ſhall not take upon us to decide this point, but ſhall relate the moſt remarkable circumſtances of this affair from the beſt authorities.

It appears then that the conſpirators, who were ſeveral in number, beſides thoſe already mentioned, had held ſeveral meetings, in order to concert the proper meaſures for executing their helliſh purpoſe. One ſir George Barclay, a native of Scotland, a man of undaunted courage, cloſe, cautious, and circumſpect, but a furious bigot to the church of Rome, had come over in January with a private commiſſion from king James; in virtue of which the reſt of the party here were implicitly to obey his orders. This man took upon himſelf the taſk of murdering the king, with the aſſiſtance of forty horſemen, each of the conſpirators being to furniſh their quota. Various methods were at firſt propoſed for effecting this purpoſe; but at length it was reſolved to attack his majeſty on his return from Richmond, where he uſually hunted on a Saturday; and the place pitched upon was a lane between Brentford and Turnham-Green: and indeed one more likely to do their buſineſs could not have been found out; for his majeſty very often returning late from the chace, uſually croſſed the water at Queen's-ferry with a few of his guards, without coming out of his coach; and as he landed on the Middleſex ſide of the water, the coach drove on without waiting for the reſt of the guards, who could not croſs till the boat returned to the Surry ſide again to bring them over; ſo that the king muſt have unavoidably fallen into the hands of his murderers, before the reſt of his guards could have come up to his aſſiſtance.

Nor was the time and place more artfully contrived than the diſpoſition of their men; for having ſecured ſeveral places in Brentford, Turnham-Green, and other houſes thereabouts, to ſet up their horſes till the king's return from hunting, one of the conſpirators was ordered to wait at the ferry till the guards appeared in ſight on the Surry ſide of the water, and then to give ſpeedy notice to the reſt, to be ready at their reſpective poſts while the king was croſſing over. For this end they were divided into three parties, who were to make their approaches by three different ways, one from Turnham-Green, another from the lane that leads to the Thames, and a third from a road that goes round Brentford. One of theſe parties was to attack the king's guards in front, another in the rear, whilſt ten or twelve of the moſt bloody and reſolute were to aſſaſſinate his majeſty, by firing their blunderbuſſes at him through the coach-windows. It was alſo agreed, that when the bloody purpoſe was accompliſhed, the conſpirators ſhould keep in a body till they had got beyond Hammerſmith, then to divide in ſmall parties of three or four, and make the beſt of their way to London, and from thence to Dover, where the ſudden landing of the French might ſecure them from the rage of the multitude, and the hand of juſtice. Horſes were now the only neceſſaries wanting; and ſir George Barclay, complaining that the money he had brought over with him was ſo far exhauſted that he could not out of the remainder provide ſo great a number as forty, they all agreed that he ſhould find but half, and ſir William Perkins, Porter, and Charnock, were to provide the reſt.

Saturday the fifteenth of February was the day appointed to murder the king; and the leaders having quartered the aſſaſſins in ſeveral parts of the town to avoid ſuſpicion, lay cloſe and ſtill, expecting notice from the ſcouts of the king's being gone to Richmond; but it happened, his majeſty not being very well, did not go abroad that day; upon which the aſſaſſins were ſtruck with diſmay, fearing a diſcovery; but finding all quiet, they met and took further meaſures, appointing to be in readineſs the Saturday following; but as they were ſetting out they had notice from Durant and Cham-

Chambers, two of their accomplices, that the guards were all come back in a foam, and that there was a muttering among the people that a horrid plot was diſcovered. This unexpected news put the conſpirators into the utmoſt conſternation, as really believing they were now detected, and accordingly, through a miraculous providence, it proved true; whereupon they diſperſed, and gave over their deſign.

It ſeems that one Pendergraſs being made acquainted with the whole plot, a day before it was to have been put in execution, by captain Porter his intimate friend, and ſollicited to be one of their number, ſeemingly complied; but being ſtruck with the blackneſs and barbarity of the act, he went to the earl of Portland on Friday the fourteenth of February, and diſcovered to him all the ſcheme, intreating to be introduced to the king. After a little time he waited on his majeſty in his cloſet, when he fully made known all the particulars he knew of this horrid conſpiracy; and after much preſſing on the part of the king, who promiſed him he ſhould not be produced as an evidence without his own conſent, he gave in a liſt of the aſſaſſins. Pendergraſs's relation was confirmed the next day by one de la Rue, a Frenchman, one of the conſpirators, who knew nothing of any diſcovery being made of the matter before.

The king having received a full account of the intended inſurrection and invaſion, with the deſign upon his perſon, a proclamation was forthwith iſſued for apprehending the conſpirators. Barclay abſconded, and could never be found; but moſt of the other conſpirators were ſecured. Admiral Ruſſel was immediately diſpatched down to Chatham to haſten the fleet out to ſea, and the rendezvous was appointed in the Downs, where all the men of war then in the ſea-ports were ordered to ſail and join the admiral, which was done with ſuch amazing expedition, that in a few days time he had a fleet of at leaſt fifty ſail with him, with which he ſtood over to the French coaſt; and the enemy, confounded at his appearance, retired into their harbours with the utmoſt precipitation; while James, perceiving that his deſign was defeated, returned overwhelmed with deſpair to his court at St. Germains, where he paſſed the reſt of his days, living on Lewis's bounty, and a penſion of ſeventy thouſand francs, or about three thouſand pounds per annum, which it is ſaid he was mean-ſpirited enough to receive as a legacy of his daughter Mary, who had certainly been inſtrumental in dethroning him. He died at St. Germains in 1700. Some Iriſh jeſuits pretended to aſſert that miracles were performed at his tomb: they even carried the farce ſo far, as to pretend that his relics cured the biſhop of Autun of a fiſtula.

"We have few examples in hiſtory, ſays M. de Voltaire (in his Life of Lewis XIV.) of a family for ſo long a time unfortunate. The firſt of the kings of Scotland, his anceſtors, who bore the name of James, after having been detained for eighteen years a priſoner in England, was murdered, together with his queen *, by his own ſubjects. James II. the ſon of this prince, was killed in battle againſt the Engliſh, at nineteen years of age †. James III. after being impriſoned by his own ſubjects, was ſlain by the rebels in fight. James IV. fell in a battle which he loſt. Mary Stuart, his grand-daughter, after being driven from her throne, and forced to take refuge in England, where ſhe languiſhed eighteen years in priſon, was at length condemned to die by Engliſh judges, and loſt her head on a ſcaffold. Charles I. grandſon to this Mary, and king of England and Scotland, was ſold by the Scots, ſentenced to death by the Engliſh, and executed publicly as a traitor. His ſon James was driven from three kingdoms, and, to crown the misfortunes of the family, even the birth of his ſon was diſputed. This ſon, by the efforts he made to recover the throne of his fathers, brought many of his friends to an untimely end; [and of late days we have ſeen Charles-Edward, his eldeſt ſon, making the ſame attempts, and with the like or ſtill more fatal conſequences, both to himſelf and his adherents, and ſuffering calamities almoſt beyond the reach of credit]. If any thing can juſtify thoſe who believe in an unavoidable fatality, it muſt be the continued ſeries of misfortunes which have befel the family of the Stuarts for upwards of three hundred years."

Several of the conſpirators being now taken up, and full diſcoveries made of their deſigns, king William went to the houſe of peers on the twenty-fourth of February, and, in a ſpeech to both houſes, acquainted them with the conſpiracy and intended invaſion. Upon which they, in a very affectionate and loyal addreſs, congratulated him on the eſcape of his royal perſon from the deſigns of his enemies, declaring their abhorrence of ſuch villainous and traitorous attempts, and ſolemnly promiſing to ſtand by and aſſiſt his majeſty, and defend his royal perſon againſt all his enemies, open and private; and if he ſhould come by a violent death, to revenge it upon the papiſts. They likewiſe drew up an aſſociation to the ſame purpoſe, which was ſigned by all the members of the houſe, wherein they declare king William their rightful and lawful king, mutually engaged to ſtand by each other in his defence againſt king James, &c. &c. From the parliament the aſſociation was carried over the whole kingdom, and was ſigned by all ſorts of people. The biſhops drew up a particular form, much in the ſame ſpirit, which was ſubſcribed by the greateſt part of the clergy. The commons alſo brought in a bill for the ſitting and continuing of the parliament, if the king ſhould happen to die, till the next heir in ſucceſſion ſhould come to diſſolve it: and that commiſſions ſhould continue in force till the further pleaſure of the ſucceſſor was ſignified. A pardon was alſo offered to ſuch as were knowing of the conſpiracy, who would come in and make any farther diſcovery: and a bill likewiſe paſſed both houſes, importing, that ſuch as refuſed to take the oaths to his majeſty, ſhould be ſubject to the forfeitures and penalties of popiſh reculants: that ſevere penalties ſhould be inflicted on thoſe who, by words or writing, ſhould affirm that king William was not the rightful and lawful ſovereign of theſe realms; or that the late king James, or the pretended prince of Wales, or any other perſon than thoſe named in the Act of Succeſſion, had any right to the crown of theſe kingdoms: that no perſon who refuſed to ſubſcribe the aſſociation, ſhould be capable of holding a ſeat in parliament, or any other office or poſt of truſt, whether civil or military; and that the ſame penalties ſhould be inflicted on thoſe who came out of France as thoſe who went thither *. The king was highly pleaſed with thoſe marks of duty and affection from his parliament, and returned them thanks for the ſame. While thoſe matters were paſſing, the duke of Wirtemberg brought over to England twenty battalions from the confederate army for the aſſiſtance of king William, but happily all danger was over before he arrived.

The king coming to the houſe on the ſeventh of March, gave the royal aſſent to a bill for ſuſpending the Habeas Corpus act, and empowering his majeſty to apprehend and detain ſuch perſons as were conſpiring againſt his government, with three other acts. And three or four days afterwards, viz. on the eleventh of March, Robert Charnock, Edward King, and Thomas Keys, three of the conſpirators, were brought from Newgate to their trials at the Old Bailey upon a ſpecial commiſſion; when, having been indulged by the court with all the liberty they could deſire to make their defence, they were, upon full and plain evidence, found guilty of high-treaſon, for conſpiring the death of the king; and ſentence paſſing on them, they were drawn to Tyburn on the eighteenth of March, and there hanged and quartered. Charnock and King daringly confeſſed the fact in the paper they delivered at the gallows, and Keys did not deny it.

On the twenty-third of March ſir John Friend, a brewer in the Minories, was brought to his trial, being charged with levying horſe to join the enemy upon their landing; and having conſulted with divers other perſons about it, he was in ſome forwardneſs towards the execution. Sir William Perkins, who was formerly one of the ſix clerks in Chancery, was alſo tried for high-treaſon in levying war, &c. it being proved, amongſt other things, that a great quantity of arms for that purpoſe were found in a garden of his country-houſe, where he had cauſed them to be buried upon the diſcovery. For this they both received ſentence, and were drawn to Tyburn, and there hanged and quartered on the third of April. At the place of execution Mr. Collier, Mr. Snatt, and Mr. Cook, three nonjuring clergymen, gave them the abſolution of the church, and then accompanied the ceremony with a ſolemn impoſition of hands. The government, as may eaſily be imagined, was highly offended at this inſult; nor was it ſuffered to paſs unnoticed; Mr. Cook and Mr. Snatt were committed to Newgate, and an indictment was preferred againſt them in the King's-Bench on the eighth of April, but not proceeded upon.

On the twenty-firſt day of April, Rookwood, Lowick, and Cranborne, three of the other conſpirators, were brought to the bar of the King's Bench, and were the firſt who had the benefit of the act paſſed in the laſt ſeſſion for regulating trials in caſes of high-treaſon, which allowed council, a copy of the indictment, and of the jury impannelled: but not all theſe aſſiſtances could avail them; the evidence againſt them was ſo plain and poſitive, that they were all three found guilty, and accordingly condemned as traitors. Mr. Peter Cook and captain Knightly were likewiſe brought to their trials: the firſt was convicted; the latter pleaded guilty: neither of them however ſuffered death; and ſoon after, moſt of the others being continued in confinement, the proceſs ended. The evidences againſt the conſpirators were, captain Porter, Mr. Harris, Blair, De la Rue, Bertram, Fiſher, Goodman, Haywood, and Ewebank, all of them concerned in the deſign of an inſurrection; ſome of them in the ſcheme of aſſaſſination. Prendergraſs likewiſe agreed to give teſtimony, notwithſtanding the promiſe he had obtained from his majeſty of not obliging him to it againſt his will. We muſt not forget that a proclamation was iſſued, offering a reward of five hundred pounds for apprehending the lord Montgomery and ſir John Fenwick, ſuſpected to be accomplices in the plot. The earl of Ayleſbury had been already apprehended and committed to the Tower on the like ſuſpicion.

The ſeſſion of parliament was ſoon brought to a concluſion. A fund was created, upon which the ſum of two millions five hundred and ſixty-four thouſand pounds was to be raiſed, which, in the opinion of the beſt judges, was neither juſt nor prudent. A new bank was propoſed, called the Land Bank, becauſe the ſecurities were to be upon land: this was the main difference between it and the Bank of England. This ſcheme, ſuppoſed to have been contrived by Dr. Chamberlain, the famous man-midwife, was chiefly managed by Foley and Harley, and was generally thought to be a plan of the Tory party to ruin the Bank of England. The company of the latter petitioned againſt the bill, but without effect; for it paſſed through both houſes, and at laſt received the royal aſſent: but this Bank came to nothing, nobody ſubſcribing to it; and therefore I refer the reader to the Statutes, if he deſires to ſee the plan on which it was attempted.

On the twenty-ſeventh of April the king came to the houſe of peers, and cloſed the ſeſſion with a ſpeech, in which he thanked the houſes for the generous concern they had ſhewn for his perſon, and the zealous attachment they had manifeſted to his government; as alſo for the large ſupplies they had granted him, and deſired they would preſerve the public peace, and aſſiſt the lords juſtices while he was abroad: and then, his majeſty having given his royal aſſent to ſeveral acts, the parliament was prorogued to the ſixteenth of June †.

* Proceedings of the Houſe of Commons, iii. 21, &c.

† Beſides the laws already mentioned, an act was paſſed this ſeſſion for voiding all elections, at which the elected had been at any expence in meat, drink, or money, to procure votes. From the preſent ſcandalous practice, which reflects equal diſhonour upon the electors and elected, one would imagine that this law had been formally repealed. Another act was paſſed againſt unlawful and double returns. A third for the more eaſy recovery of ſmall tythes. A fourth to prevent marriages without licence or bans; impoſing a fine of one hundred pounds upon the miniſter, and ten pounds upon the bridegroom. A fifth, enabling the inhabitants of Wales to diſpoſe of all their perſonal eſtates as they ſhould think fit. This law was intended to aboliſh an ancient cuſtom which prevailed in that country, by which the widow and younger children claim a ſhare of the effects, commonly called their reaſonable part, though the effects had been otherwiſe diſpoſed of by will or deed. See ſtat. 8. W. III.

The parliament being up, his majeſty was pleaſed to appoint the archbiſhop of Canterbury, the lord-keeper Somers, and five other great officers of ſtate, lords juſtices for governing the kingdom in his abſence. The ſame day he created ſir John Lowther, baronet, Baron Lowther and Viſcount Lonſdale; and ſir John Thompſon, baronet, was created Baron Haverſham. On the fifth of May the king embarked for Holland, and arrived at the Hague on the ſeventh, where I ſhall leave him till I relate ſome other occurrences that happened while the parliament was ſitting.

Admiral Ruſſel, as we have ſaid, going upon the French coaſt, battered many of their ſhips and tranſports that lay in the harbours ready for invading this country; and the reſt ran ſo cloſe in ſhore, that finding it impoſſible to burn them, he determined to quit his ſtation and return into Dover Road, leaving ſir Cloudeſley Shovel to watch the motions of the enemy. This ſquadron continued cruizing off the French coaſt all the month of March, without attempting any thing; but towards the end of the month, being reinforced with ſeveral Dutch ſhips, fire-ſhips, and bomb-veſſels, he received orders to undertake the bombardment of Calais; in purſuance of which he immediately came before that town, and made the neceſſary diſpoſitions for executing his orders. On the third of April the bomb-veſſels began firing about noon, and continued till the evening, in which time above three hundred bombs and carcaſſes fell either in the town or among the ſhips in that harbour, with ſuch effect as to ſet many houſes and veſſels on fire, and did otherwiſe very great miſchief: but as moſt of the bomb-veſſels had their rigging deſtroyed and their mortars diſmounted, the wind too blowing very hard from the ſhore, ſir Cloudeſley, having left a ſquadron to keep in the French men of war at Dunkirk, returned into the Downs, where he received orders to join the grand fleet at Spithead. In the mean while the fleet arrived from Cadiz under ſir George Rooke, who had, upon occaſion of the firſt diſcovery of the plot, orders ſent him, for the better ſecurity of the nation, to return home; and he arrived ſafely at Spithead towards the latter end of April.

The confederates began this campaign with burning a vaſt magazine which the enemy had laid up for their army at Givet. Notwithſtanding this rough beginning, the campaign in Flanders proved the moſt pacific of any that had happened during the war; and indeed the difficulties that both armies had to ſtruggle with were ſuch, that very little was to be expected. The French, by keeping ſuch numerous armies on foot, had entirely exhauſted their country; and it is certain that towards the cloſe of the preceding year Lewis had ſeriouſly thought of making peace; nor is it probable that any thing would have retarded his overtures to that end but the proſpect of the invaſion of England ſucceeding: but this deſign failing, and there being now a very fair view of our being able to weather our other inconveniencies, there was no room for nor occaſion of delay. Lewis therefore ſent M. de Callieres as his ambaſſador to the States-general, for ſettling ſuch preliminaries as might be a ſufficient baſis for a treaty. The Dutch, with the conſent of king William, who was ſo diſtreſſed for want of money, that though at the head of an army greatly ſuperior to the enemy, he found he could not avail himſelf of that advantage, liſtened to the propoſal; and it was agreed to accept the mediation of the king of Sweden, which the baron Lillenroot his ambaſſador at the Hague had offered. However, before any treaty was ſet on foot, the duke of Savoy made a ſeparate peace with France, without the privity of the allies.

Victor Amadeus, duke of Savoy, was a prince of all others the moſt eaſily perſuaded to break his engagements when his intereſt was concerned. Lewis XIV. knew this, and omitted no endeavours to detach the duke from the grand alliance: he had ordered the count de Teſſé, afterwards mareſchal of France, an amiable and able man, of a genius formed for pleaſing, which is the firſt qualification of a negociator, to begin a private treaty at Turin; and mareſchal Catinat, who was equally ſkilled in making peace and war, put the finiſhing hand to the affair. There did not want two ſuch able men to determine the duke of Savoy to accept of what was to his advantage: they reſtored him his country, gave him a ſum of money, and propoſed a marriage between the young duke of Burgundy, ſon to the dauphin of France, and his daughter. Matters were ſoon agreed between them: the duke and Catinat concluded the treaty in the month of July at our Lady of Loretto, whither they went under pretence of a pilgrimage of devotion *.

The allies in general were highly enraged at this perfidious conduct of the duke: his miniſters indeed attempted to excuſe it, by alleging the neceſſity he lay under of preventing his own ruin, and that he could not in common prudence let ſlip a conjuncture which brought ſuch ſingular and happy advantages to his family. Lord Galway, our general and miniſter at Turin, was very warm in his expoſtulations on this occaſion; and, agreeable to William's inſtructions, after having condemned the duke's ingratitude, on account of the large ſubſidies paid him, and aſſuring him that the allies would not come into the neutrality, made him an offer of larger ſubſidies, to be paid monthly, if he would recede from the treaty: but the duke had choſen his ſide, and was not to be diverted from his new engagements: nay, he ſoon after exerted a ſtretch of policy, or rather perfidy, not to be paralleled in hiſtory; for it being one of the articles of his treaty with the court of France, that if the allies ſhould refuſe to depart the duke's dominions, they ſhould be expelled by the joint arms of France and Savoy; and they refuſing this condition, as alſo a neutrality for Italy that was offered them, the duke being appointed generaliſſimo of the French king, put himſelf at the head of Catinat's army of fifty thouſand men, which had advanced into the plains of Turin, and entering the duchy of Milan, laid ſiege to Valencia; ſo that in one campaign he commanded two contending armies. Valencia was reduced to the utmoſt extremity, when it was ſaved by the king of Spain's agreeing to accept of a neutrality for Italy. Thus ended the war in Piedmont, after it had laſted ſix years.

* Voltaire's Age of Lewis XIV.

On the ſeventeenth of June this year died John Sobieſki, the martial king of Poland, of an apoplectic fit, in the ſeventieth year of his age, leaving that elective kingdom in much confuſion, of which the French king thought to have made great advantage, by getting the prince of Conti, of the blood royal of France, choſen in the late king's room; and it coſt Lewis vaſt ſums to make a party for that purpoſe: but when all was done he was diſappointed in his views, and Auguſtus elector of Saxony was placed on the throne of Poland, after having changed his religion.

The campaign in Catalonia and on the Rhine was as inconſiderable as that in Flanders: the advantage, if any, was on the ſide of the allies; but all the armies went into quarters about the beginning of October. Though our armies did ſo little by land, which indeed was chiefly owing to their want of pay, the generals being more taken up with providing a ſubſiſtence for their troops than in military enterprizes, yet our fleet was not altogether idle by ſea; for beſides the bombardment of Calais already mentioned, lord Berkeley, to whom the command of the fleet was given this ſummer, greatly inſulted the French coaſts, pillaging and burning a number of villages on the iſlands of Grouais, Houat, and Heydic. He alſo took a ſhip from Newfoundland, with twenty ſmall veſſels, and carried off about one thouſand five hundred horſes and black cattle. On the fifth of July he ſent captain Beckman with a ſquadron of ten men of war and bomb-veſſels, to bombard the town of St. Martin's in the Iſle of Rhé, who performed his commiſſion very exactly, throwing in the ſpace of one night two thouſand two hundred and thirty bombs and carcaſſes into the place, by which the beſt part of the town was burnt down, with all the warehouſes and the goods contained in them, notwithſtanding the place was very well fortified, and our ſhips had to ſuſtain a very warm fire all the time. On the 7th the ſame ſquadron bombarded Olonne with the like ſucceſs. After this, the admiral finding it not convenient to land on Belleiſle, which had been projected, continued to alarm the French coaſt till towards the beginning of Auguſt, when he was under the neceſſity to return to Spithead to clean and revictual his ſhips.

Theſe enterprizes, however inconſiderable the French writers affect to repreſent them, were certainly of great ſervice, by keeping the maritime coaſts of France under perpetual apprehenſion, inſomuch that the miniſtry of that kingdom were obliged to keep ſixty thouſand men continually in arms to oppoſe an invaſion, which they expected from the Engliſh. In the mean while, rear-admiral Benbow was with a ſmall ſquadron blocking up M. Du Bart, the French admiral, in Dunkirk; but that bold adventurer found means to eſcape in a fog; and ſailing to the Baltic, fell in with a large fleet of Dutch merchant ſhips, under convoy of ſix or ſeven frigates. Theſe he took, together with a great number of the trading veſſels; but in the height of this victory the outward-bound Boſton fleet appeared in ſight, under an eſcort of thirteen men of war, who immediately attacked Du Bart, and forced him to burn four of the frigates and thirty-five merchantmen, and make the beſt of his way into Dunkirk. Thus ended the naval operations of this year, during the whole courſe of which we rode inconteſtible maſters of the ſea, blocked up the beſt part of the French fleets in their harbours, inſulted their coaſts, and protected our trade better than it had been known for many years paſt *.

As the diſtreſs of the army abroad was very great for want of their pay, occaſioned by the calling in and recoining the money, ſo was there a ſad confuſion in England, eſpecially among the labourers and meaner ſort of people, who could get little or no money for their work, and indeed few could employ any workmen: whereupon an order of council was iſſued in July this ſummer, that the juſtices of peace ſhould frequently meet in their diviſions, to conſider of the moſt effectual means to relieve and ſubſiſt the poor people till money became more plentiful; and another order was iſſued, commanding the attorney-general to proſecute all thoſe who entered into confederacies not to employ any perſons in the woollen and other manufactures during this ſcarcity of money. Theſe difficulties it was that in a manner compelled king William to hearken to terms of peace, which he would otherwiſe ſcarcely have done.

While the king was abroad a parliament was held in Scotland, and another in Ireland; the former was opened on the eighth of September by the lord Murray, ſecretary of ſtate, lately created earl of Tullibardine, and appointed king's commiſſioner. The Scots ſeemed to vie with the Engliſh in expreſſing their abhorrence of the late intended invaſion and conſpiracy: the parliament unanimouſly ſigned an aſſociation ſimilar to that of England: they granted a ſupply of one million four hundred and forty thouſand pounds for maintaining their forces by ſea and land; and paſſed an act for ſecuring their religion, lives, and liberties, in caſe his majeſty ſhould come to an untimely death; and they obliged all perſons enjoying public poſts or offices to ſign the aſſociation; after which they were prorogued †.

Lord Capel, lord-deputy of Ireland, dying on the thirtieth of May this year, the council, in purſuance of an act made in the thirty-third year of Henry VIII. elected the lord-chancellor Porter to be lord-juſtice and chief governor of that kingdom till his majeſty's further pleaſure ſhould be known. The Iriſh parliament met at Dublin on the twenty-ſeventh of June, when the commons expelled Mr. Sanderſon, the only member of their houſe who had not ſigned the Aſſociation. By this time ſir Charles Porter, lord-chancellor, and the earls of Montrath and Drogheda, were by the king's letter appointed lords-juſtices of Ireland; and the parliament having paſſed a bill tranſmitted from England, called, "An act for confirming ſeveral outlawries and attainders, as alſo for veſting in his majeſty the eſtates of thoſe who were dead in rebellion there or in foreign parts;" and being fearful this act might prove prejudicial to the proteſtants, they preſented an addreſs to the lords-juſtices, "beſeeching their excellencies to tranſmit to England certain heads of a bill which they had prepared, and therewith preſented to their excellencies, for ſaving the eſtates, rights, titles, and poſ-ſeſſions of proteſtants, from being prejudiced by the ſaid act; and they unanimouſly, earneſtly, and humbly intreated their excellencies to recommend the ſame ſo effectually to his majeſty, that it might be returned to them in order to be paſſed into a law."

Their excellencies hereupon were pleaſed to return the following anſwer: "That they believed the whole kingdom was ſatisfied that the king deſigned nothing more than the good of his proteſtant ſubjects, the orders he had been pleaſed to give them being expreſs to that effect; and they had reaſon to hope it had been obſerved how exactly they had followed thoſe orders: that they ſhould always continue ſo to do, and in that caſe particularly ſhould be very careful to repreſent to his majeſty the preſervation of the intereſts of the proteſtants, to the end that no one of them might ſuffer by that law, which they did believe ſo advantageous to the proteſtant intereſt in general." The lords juſtices and the parliament agreeing thus well, and the latter having by way of exciſe and other means raiſed the money expected from them, and having alſo paſſed an act for baniſhing all papiſts exerciſing eccleſiaſtical juriſdiction, and all regulars of the popiſh clergy, out of the kingdom; another to confirm the articles of Limeric; and a third to prevent proteſtants intermarrying with papiſts; they were by the lords juſtices prorogued. In the mean while, ſir Charles Porter was ſeized with a fit of the apoplexy, which carried him off inſtantly *.

The winter ſeaſon now advancing, put a concluſion to all military and naval operations for this year; and king William leaving Holland, arrived in England on the fourth of October to meet his parliament, which after ſeveral prorogations met on the twentieth of the ſame month, when his majeſty opened the ſeſſion with a ſpeech from the throne to the following purport:

He told them, "That he thought it a great happineſs that this year had paſſed without any diſadvantage abroad, or diſorder at home, conſidering the great diſappointments in the funds †, and the difficulties that had ariſen in receiving the money: that the buſineſs they had before them would be attended with great difficulties, as they were not only to provide for the next year's ſervice, but to make good the vaſt deficiencies of the laſt. He obſerved, that overtures of peace had indeed been made him, but he ſaid he was certain they would not agree with him: that the only way to procure an honourable peace was to treat ſword in hand; for this purpoſe he ſaid, the ſupplies for this year muſt at leaſt be equal to thoſe for the laſt. Beſides which, he preſſed them to maintain the honour of parliament, by making good the funds they had granted. He again put them in mind of the civil liſt and the French proteſtants, of making ſome further proviſion for remedying "the difficulties relating to the coin, and for the recovery of the national credit ‡."

In anſwer to this ſpeech the commons preſented an addreſs to his majeſty, wherein they aſſured him, "that, although this was the eighth year they had aſſiſted him with large ſupplies to carry on this juſt and neceſſary war, they ſhould not be amuſed nor diverted from their firm reſolutions of obtaining by war a ſafe and honourable peace; and concluded with declaring, that they would continue to ſupport his majeſty againſt all enemies, both at home and abroad §."

After theſe expreſſions of loyalty they began to deliberate upon the three important points which the king had recommended to their conſideration in his ſpeech, and which indeed ſeemed to demand the moſt immediate and ſerious attention; theſe were, the farther remedying the bad ſtate of the coin, the providing ſupplies for the enſuing year, and the reſtoring the public credit.

With regard to the coin, they brought in a bill repealing the act for taking off the obligation and encouragement of coining guineas, and allowing the importation and coining of gold in the mint ‖; for as the currency of guineas was now reduced to nearly their real value, the reaſon for importing them no longer ſubſiſted, and the act which had paſſed for that purpoſe was of conſequence become unneceſſary.

They next proceeded to take into conſideration the eſtimates and accounts, and voted five millions for the ſea and land-ſervice, beſides a ſupply for the civil liſt, and new funds for making good the deficiencies and ſecuring the public debts, amounting to ten or twelve millions ¶.

The laſt and the moſt difficult point was to reſtore the public credit, which was at this time in a miſerable condition, owing to the great ſcarcity of money, inſomuch that government tallies and debentures were at forty, fifty, and ſixty per cent. diſcount, and even bank-bills at twenty per cent. diſcount. And as the ſellers of the government ſecurities and bank-notes became very numerous, they were in a manner hawked about the Exchange, where ſeveral perſons who were poſſeſſed of money, which they had hoarded up as it was delivered from the mint, raiſed vaſt fortunes by buying them up. This, it is ſaid, gave riſe to the infamous practice of Stock-jobbing, many buying that had no money to purchaſe, and ſelling ſtock they were not poſſeſſed of: a thouſand ſtories were framed to raiſe or lower this kind of ſtock, in order to purchaſe or ſell to advantage; which traffick continued till an effectual ſtop was put to it by an act of the laſt ſeſſion.

Such was the diligence of this parliament, that, notwithſtanding the complicated difficulties they had to encounter, they contrived a ſcheme for diſcharging the debts of the government by a continuation of certain duties upon births, marriages, windows, the ſubſidy on tonnage and poundage, and various other articles, for ten years; and all the branches conſtituted a general fund, ſince known by the name of the General Mortgage. As

† All the funds for this year proved defective; and the land-bank failed, without having produced any other effect than that of injuring the credit of the national bank by its oppoſition. The loſs of the nation upon the recoinage amounted to two millions two hundred thouſand pounds: and though the mint was conſtantly employed, ſo as to furniſh about eighty thouſand pounds a week, yet was not this ſufficient to ſupply the circulation, eſpecially as thoſe who received the new money either kept it up, or diſpoſed of it at an unreaſonable advantage.

the Bank had been found of ſingular ſervice to the government, in order to raiſe the credit of it, they agreed to increaſe the capital ſtock another million, by new ſubſcriptions, and to continue their term to the year 1710; and thoſe new ſubſcriptions were allowed to be made in tallies and bank-notes; yet, as there were good funds now ſettled for paying them off, the monied men, who could bear ſtock, ran into it, by which means bank-bills and notes in a ſhort time roſe to par again. But nothing ſupplied the want of caſh at this time better than the parliament's authorizing the treaſury to iſſue out near three millions in Exchequer-bills, which being allowed in taxes, and circulated by the Bank for a moderate premium, contributed greatly to reſtore things to their ancient ſtate. In fine, never were more vigorous meaſures taken to ſupport the credit of government; though it muſt be confeſſed, the weight of the enormous impoſitions laid upon the ſubject to create the ſeveral funds for this purpoſe, is ſeverely felt at this day.

Theſe affairs being thus happily ſettled, the attention of the commons was transferred to the caſe of ſir John Fenwick, who had been concerned in the late conſpiracy: this affair was of ſuch a nature that it deſerves to be related in a particular manner. This gentleman had been concealed in London from the time of the diſcovery of the plot till the beginning of June this year, when he endeavoured to make his eſcape over to France, but was taken at Romney, on the coaſt of Kent, before he could get on ſhipboard. He had, when taken, written a letter to his lady, the daughter of the earl of Carliſle, which fell into the government's hands, and contained ſuch matter as plainly evidenced him guilty: for he appeared thereby ſo far ſenſible of his crime and danger, that he could propoſe no other way for the preſent to ſave himſelf, but by getting a jury packed that would be obſtinate and not bring him in guilty; or by making friends to the king for a pardon, or reprieve at leaſt, to gain time. Being brought to town and committed to Newgate, after conſulting with his friends, and it being concluded that none of the ſaid methods would avail him, there was another expedient pitched upon, which had a more apparent proſpect of ſucceſs; this was, to ſet up a counter-plot, by accuſing a number of the king's beſt friends of having been guilty of conſpiring againſt him: it was thought this would get his trial (which was to have been brought on at common-law), deferred till the king's return to England, eſpecially as ſome promiſes had been made him, if he would diſcover his accomplices.

Sir John accordingly entered into a treaty with the court for turning evidence, and amuſed the miniſtry from time to time with one plauſible ſtory or other, and at length delivered in a long paper of information, wherein he charged the duke of Shrewſbury, the earl of Marlborough, the earl of Bath, admiral Ruſſel, the lord Godolphin, and commiſſary Crawford, with holding a correſpondence with king James: this gave him an opportunity of having his trial put off for ſome time. In the mean time his friends had another game to play, which was to ſeduce the evidences who ſwore the treaſon againſt him; theſe were captain Porter and Mr. Goodman, and he was ſo fortunate as to ſucceed with Goodman, who went over to France; but Porter had been a witneſs againſt ſo many of the conſpirators, that he did not think he ſhould be ſafe in France, and having a penſion of three hundred pounds a year from king William, he determined to diſcover thoſe who had attempted to buy him off, tho' they offered him a thouſand pounds a year, upon his retiring, and a large ſum of money in hand: he alſo contrived the matter ſo, that when a payment of ſix hundred pounds was made him by one captain Donalow and one Clancy, in behalf of ſir John, he had ſome of the king's meſſengers in the next room, who ruſhed in and ſeized the two agents, the latter of whom was afterwards convicted of tampering with the king's evidence, condemned to pay a fine of five thouſand marks, and to ſtand three times in the pillory, which ſentence was executed upon him. However, as one witneſs only remained, ſir John began to think himſelf out of danger: the lords-juſtices did not think proper to proceed to his trial, but deferred the proſecution of him till his majeſty came over, when they propoſed to bring the matter before the parliament.

Accordingly, when the ſeſſion began, notwithſtanding the multiplicity of important affairs in which that aſſembly were engaged, the great men who had been charged by ſir John Fenwick with correſponding with king James, being determined to clear their reputations and make the informer feel the weight of their reſentment, found means to introduce the affair into the houſe. Admiral Ruſſel, who was one of the perſons accuſed, on the ſixth of November brought the ſeveral papers containing the informations of ſir John Fenwick into the houſe of commons, and moved that they might be read, that he might have an opportunity of juſtifying himſelf. The papers being read, Fenwick was ordered to be brought before the houſe; who, finding that he gave no ſatisfactory anſwers to the queſtions then put to him, nor could ſupport his charge againſt the ſeveral noble peers and members of the houſe whom he had accuſed in his information, the houſe voted his informations falſe and ſcandalous, and ordered a bill to be brought in to attaint ſir John Fenwick of high treaſon; at the ſecond reading of which, on the thirteenth of November, the priſoner, at his own requeſt, was heard by his counſel againſt the bill. The king's counſel, the ſerjeants Gould and Lovell, opened the evidence they had for proving the ſuggeſtions of the bill; they were anſwerd by ſir Thomas Powis and ſir Bartholomew Shower, the priſoner's counſel, who alleged, that if the others would only call in evidence the ſuggeſtions of the bill, they were ready to anſwer to that; but if they meant to prove ſir John guilty of the conſpiracy by living witneſſes, they were not prepared for that, as they did not know whether they ſhould have the liberty of producing any. And being thereupon ordered to withdraw, the houſe debated the ſame a long time; and, after much conteſtation, it was at laſt reſolved, "That the counſel, in managing evidence againſt ſir John Fenwick, be allowed to produce evidence touching the allegations of the bill, and of the treaſons for which he was indicted."

The houſe reſuming the conſideration of this matter on the ſixteenth of November, the king's counſel produced their evidence, captain Porter, who gave an ample relation of what he knew concerning lady Fenwick's having practiſed with him about about his evidence; though it was objected by sir John's counsel, that what a wife said or did, could be no evidence against her husband. Then the king's counsel produced the records of Clancy's conviction, and so proceeded to Goodman's examination, taken under the hand of Mr. secretary Vernon, which they desired might be read; but this was opposed by the prisoner's counsel, and the house entered into a hot debate about it; but at length it was carried, that the information should be read, and that afterwards some of the grand-jury should give an account upon what evidence they found the bill of indictment against sir John Fenwick. This was also objected to by the counsel, as an extraordinary step. The record of the conviction of Mr. Peter Cook, son to sir Miles Cook, at whose trial Goodman had deposed against sir John Fenwick, was also read, which was objected to, as illegal, by the prisoner's counsel, who, it must be confessed, appear to have said as much in behalf of their client, as the nature of the case would admit. It was agreed, that the counsel for the prisoner might, if they had any witnesses to examine on his behalf, do it that night; but they having nothing but a record to produce, accepted of the time offered them till the next day, to make their observations on the evidence for the king; and then they and the prisoner were ordered to withdraw. The next day, sir John still declining to deal more clearly and candidly in respect to his accusations of several persons of quality, and his counsel having offered all they could in his behalf, it was resolved by the house, that Mr. secretary Vernon should give in his evidence relating to the various artifices sir John, or persons by his direction, had made use of to put off his trial, and that in his and the counsel's presence on both sides.

Here the counsel were discharged from their farther attendance at that time, and the order for reading the bill a second time being read, and the same afterwards opened by the speaker, and no member rising to speak, he asked whether he should put the question for committing it? This brought on very long and warm debates on both sides, about the extraordinary method of proceeding, the power and justice of parliament compared with other inferior courts of judicature, with several precedents of former bills of attainder, pro and con, with a number of other arguments, all reducible to this single question, whether sir John Fenwick, who was confessedly guilty, should be condemned to the punishment which his crime deserved, though he was protected by the forms of law, two witnesses not being to be found against him; an advantage, however, which he had not been able to obtain without having recourse to bribery and corruption? The Whigs supported the affirmative, the Tories contended for the negative; but, upon the whole, the result was, that the bill should be committed. The bill was read for the third time on the twenty-fifth of November, when the contest upon the debate ran as high as ever, the members being no less divided in their opinions than before; but the question being at length put for passing the bill, the house divided upon it, about eleven at night, when it was carried in the affirmative, by one hundred and eighty-nine voices against one hundred and fifty-six. It was then sent up to the lords for their concurrence, where it met with a great opposition, and the debates were the warmest and the longest of any that had ever been known; the bill, however, passed by a majority of seven voices only, there being sixty-eight for it, and sixty-one against it.

The lords who were for the negative, among whom were several of the king's servants and counsellors, entered their protest, which they grounded on the following reasons:

"I. Because bills of attainder against persons in prison, and who are therefore liable to be tried by common law, are of a dangerous consequence to the lives of the subjects, and may tend to the subversion of the laws of the kingdom.

"II. Because the evidence of grand-jury men, of what was sworn before them against sir John Fenwick, as also the evidence of the petty-jury men, were admitted here, both which are against the rules of the law; besides that they disagreed in their testimony.

"III. Because the information of Goodman in writing was received, which by law was not admitted; and the prisoner, for want of appearing face to face (as is by law required), could not have the advantage of cross examining him: and it did not appear by evidence, that sir John Fenwick, or any person employed by him, had persuaded Goodman to withdraw himself; and it would be of very dangerous consequence, that any person so accused should be condemned, for by this means a witness who should be found insufficient to convict a man, shall have more power to hurt a man by his absence, than if he were produced vivâ voce against him.

"IV. Because if Goodman had appeared against him, he was infamous in the whole course of his life, and could not be a good witness, especially in cases of blood.

"V. Because in this case there was but one evidence, Porter, and he a very doubtful one.

"VI. Lastly, because sir John Fenwick was so inconsiderable a man, as to the endangering the peace of government, that there was no necessity of proceeding against him in so extraordinary a manner."

The bill of attainder soon after had the royal assent; as at the same time another had to attaint such as were concerned in the assassination plot, that had fled from justice, and for continuing several others of the conspirators in custody. Sir John Fenwick was complimented with the axe, in consideration of his rank and of his alliance with the family of Howard, and suffered on Tower-hill, on the twenty-eighth of March following, with seeming composure and resignation. He owned his loyalty to king James, and prayed for his restoration; but declared himself perfectly innocent of the assassination of king William, which he justly termed a most villainous project.

After Fenwick's business was over, the parliament proceeded to enact several laws for regulating the domestic œconomy of the nation, and, among others, passed an act for the more effectual relief of creditors in cases of escape, and for preventing abuses in prisons and pretended privileged places. It seems that, ever since the Reformation, certain places in and about the city of London, which had been sanctuaries during the prevalence of the popish religion, afforded asylum to debtors, and were become receptacles of desperate persons, who set all law at defiance. One of these places, called White Friars, was filled with a crew of ruffians, who every day committed acts of violence and outrage; but the law was ſo vigorouſly put in execution, that they were obliged to abandon the diſtrict, which was ſoon filled with more creditable inhabitants. The Mint, in Southwark, another of thoſe infamous places, was likewiſe cleared of its diſſolute tenants in the ſame manner.

Towards the beginning of this ſeſſion, the commons entered into an enquiry concerning ſome late miſcarriages of the fleet, when ſir George Rooke was ordered to attend the houſe, to give an account why the Toulon ſquadron was ſuffered to get unmoleſted into Breſt. That admiral attended accordingly, and produced copies both of his journal and of the orders he had received from the admiralty; which being examined, it was ordered that ſir Cloudeſley Shovel ſhould lay before the houſe, copies of all ſuch orders as he had received in relation to the joining ſir George Rooke: which being done, and much time being ſpent in both houſes about this affair, it did not appear that either of the admirals had failed in their duty, or were deſerving that cenſure their enemies attempted to bring upon them †.

During this ſeſſion, captain Thomas Vaughan, commander of the Royal Clancarty, was tried, convicted, and executed, as a traitor, for having accepted and acted under commiſſion from the French king.

The Eddyſtone rock, lying off the port of Plymouth, having been experienced to be very dangerous to navigation, ſeveral ſhips having been caſt away thereon, the corporation of the Trinity-houſe being applied to, they, in this year 1696, began a light-houſe thereon, and completed it in three years time, great numbers of maſters and owners of Engliſh ſhips agreeing, in conſideration thereof, to pay one penny per ton outwards, and the like inwards; and it proved of very great benefit to ſhipping paſſing that way, till, in the great and dreadful ſtorm in 1703, it was blown down and deſtroyed. It was again directed to be rebuilt, by an act of parliament in the fourth year of queen Anne, and the like duty on tonnage of ſhips granted for its ſupport to the Trinity-houſe. Yet it has lately been once more demoliſhed, by fire; and is again reſtored by the like means to its former utility, to the great benefit of not only the Britiſh trade and navigation, but of the numerous ſhipping of other nations paſſing that way.

Upon the repeated complaints of the merchants of England, of their great ſufferings by the French men of war and privateers, and of the little regard or care that had for many years paſt been taken of trade and commerce, king William, deſirous to redreſs theſe grievances, did in this year erect a new and ſtanding council for commerce and plantations, in their moſt comprehenſive ſenſe, commonly ſtyled the Lords Commiſſioners for Trade and Plantations: one of the firſt appointed to this board was the famous John Locke, eſq. beforementioned. This board (which ſtill ſubſiſts) conſiſts of a firſt lord-commiſſioner, who is uſually a peer of the realm, and of ſeven other commiſſioners, with a ſalary of one thouſand pounds per annum each. To this board propoſals are made, by merchants and others, for the eaſe, improvement, and encouragement of our commerce, navigation, plantations, manufactures, fiſheries, &c. for redreſſing all grievances and burdens on trade, which are there argued between one party and another, and all moſtly heard by council: Britiſh conſuls appointed to reſide in foreign parts, for the benefit and protection of our commerce, receive their inſtructions from this board, with whom they are obliged to hold a conſtant correſpondence; as are alſo the governors of our American plantations: and reports are made to the commiſſioners, from time to time, how Britain may be beſt ſupplied with naval ſtores from our ſaid colonies; what new productions may be raiſed, or old ones improved, in America. Enquiries alſo come before this board for regaining of loſt branches of trade, as well as to enlarge thoſe we are poſſeſſed of, or ſet new ones on foot; with many other matters too tedious to relate, of which the commiſſioners are to make their reports, and give their opinions thereon, to the king and privy-council. From all which it appears, that this board of trade is a moſt excellent inſtitution.

In this ſeſſion an act paſſed for the increaſe and encouragement of ſeamen, eſtabliſhing a regiſter for thirty thouſand ſailors, to be in readineſs at all times, as the preamble ſets forth, for ſupplying the royal navy, in conſideration of a yearly premium or bounty of forty ſhillings each. It enacts, That none but ſuch regiſtered ſeamen ſhall be capable of preferment to any commiſſion or warrant-offices in the royal navy: they ſhall have a double ſhare or dividend for all prizes, more than non-regiſtered ſeamen of equal rank; with other privileges as in that act ſet forth: and particularly, they were to have the ſole right, when maimed or ſuperannuated, of being admitted into the newly eſtabliſhed hoſpital for ſeamen at Greenwich; or, if killed in the ſervice, their widows and children were to have the ſame admiſſion †. The law for regiſtering ſeamen was unhappily repealed by an act of the ninth year of queen Anne; and although ſundry ſchemes have ſince been ſet on foot for the reviving ſuch a regiſter, yet ſo many objections have been ſtarted, that no law has as yet been framed for ſecuring a body of ſeamen in readineſs, in caſe of any ſudden emergency, without having recourſe to the cruel and unconſtitutional practice of preſſing.

By another act of this ſeſſion our plantations were farther regulated, and the former acts of navigation improved ‡. By this act, no goods ſhall be imported or exported to or from any of the Britiſh colonies or plantations, in Aſia, Africa, or America, but in ſhips built in England, Ireland, or the plantations, and navigated by three-fourths mariners of the ſaid places, on pain of forfeiture of ſhip and goods: nor ſhall it be lawful to land in Scotland or Ireland any merchandize of the growth or product of the plantations, unleſs they have been firſt landed in England, and paid the duties there: and in order to ſubject the great charter colonies in America more cloſely to the kingdom of England, it was by this ſame act provided, that no charter proprietors of land on the continent of America ſhall ſell or diſpoſe of the ſame to any but natural-born ſubjects, without his majeſty's licence in council for that purpoſe.

On the twelfth of December this year his majeſty was pleaſed to nominate the earl of Pembroke lord privy-ſeal, the viſcount Villiers, and ſir Joſeph Williamſon, knight, lately admitted into the privy-council for that purpoſe, to be his majeſty's plenipotentiaries, to treat with thoſe of the French king, touching a general peace; the preliminaries of which had been ſettled between M. de Callieres and the States-general. The earl of Galway and Mr. Methuen were alſo conſtituted lords juſtices of Ireland, and the latter lord-chancellor of that kingdom, in the room of ſir Charles Porter, deceaſed. The earl of Mancheſter was alſo appointed ambaſſador-extraordinary to the ſtate of Venice. In February 1697 the earl of Ayleſbury, who had been committed on account of the conſpiracy, was releaſed upon bail; but this privilege was denied to lord Montgomery, who had been impriſoned in Newgate on the ſame account. Much about the ſame died lord Berkeley of Stratton, who had ſignalized himſelf as a ſea commander.

The act above-mentioned, and ſome others of leſs note, being ready for the royal aſſent, his majeſty came to the houſe of peers on the ſixteenth of April (1697) and ſigned them; after which he cloſed this long ſeſſion with a ſpeech, in which he thanked his parliament for the large ſupplies they had granted him; congratulated them on the ſucceſs of their endeavours for reſtoring public credit; acquainted them with his intention of going over to the continent; and begged they would carry down into their reſpective counties the ſame loyal principles which they had ſo conſpicuouſly diſplayed in parliament.

The earl of Dorſet having reſigned the office of lord-chamberlain of the houſhold, his majeſty was pleaſed to beſtow it upon the earl of Sunderland, who was at the ſame time ſworn of the privy-council, and was now looked upon as the greateſt favourite of all the Engliſh miniſters. Sir John Somers was alſo conſtituted lord-chancellor of England, and at the ſame time created baron of Eveſham, in the county of Worceſter. Arnold Van Keppel was created earl of Albemarle. On the twenty-ſecond of April the king appointed the following noblemen lords juſtices during his abſence; namely, the archbiſhop of Canterbury; the lord-chancellor Somers; the earl of Pembroke, lord privy-ſeal; the duke of Devonſhire, lord-ſteward; the duke of Shrewſbury, ſecretary of ſtate; the earl of Sunderland, lord-chamberlain; the earl of Dorſet; the earl of Romney; and admiral Edward Ruſſel, for whom a patent was preparing to create him Baron Ruſſel of Shingey, viſcount Barfleur in Normandy, and earl of Orford, which was accordingly done the beginning of the following month. William having made theſe promotions, embarked on the twenty-ſixth of April for Holland, that he might be at hand to manage the negotiations for a general peace, the preliminaries of which had been already concluded at the Hague, under the mediation of Charles XI. king of Sweden, and were ſigned on the fourteenth of February, in the preſence of Mr. Lillienroot the Swediſh plenipotentiary, by Callieres the French ambaſſador, and by the miniſters of all the allies, except the ambaſſador of Spain, who demanded as a ſine quâ non, that France ſhould agree to reſtore all the places mentioned in a long liſt which that miniſter produced to the aſſembly. The preliminaries as agreed to were as follow:

I. The French agreed that the treaties of Weſtphalia and Nimeguen ſhould be the baſis of the enſuing negotiation.

II. That Straſburgh ſhould be reſtored to the emperor, in the ſame condition as the French took it.

III. That Luxemburg ſhould be reſtored to the Spaniards in the condition it was now [but here the French made the allies an offer of an equivalent for the ſaid places.]

IV. That Mons and Charleroi ſhould be ſurrendered as they were.

V. That all places taken by the French in Catalonia ſince the peace of Nimeguen, ſhould be reſtored as they were.

VI. That the city and caſtle of Dinant ſhould be ceded to the biſhop of Liege.

VII. That all re-unions ſince the treaty of Nimeguen ſhould be made void.

VIII. That Lorrain ſhould be reſtored, according to the condition of that treaty. It was moreover agreed, that in caſe the conditions made in reſpect to that country ſhould not pleaſe, that article ſhould be referred to the general treaty, and that it ſhould be the firſt point treated on in the negotiation.

Here it was alſo agreed more particularly, that upon the concluſion of the peace Lewis XIV. ſhould acknowlege the prince of Orange for king of Great Britain, without any reſtriction, condition, or reſervation; but as to the pretenſions of other princes, whether in the confederacy or not, they were to be referred to the general negotiation.

Beſides theſe, there were other preliminaries, founded on the demands of the ſeveral German miniſters, which are not of conſequence enough to claim particular notice. The preliminaries being thus ſettled, it next remained to fix upon a place for holding the general congreſs. The emperor propoſed that it ſhould be held at Aix la Chapelle or Francfort, or ſome other town in Germany: the other allies were more diſpoſed to negotiate in Holland. At length the French king ſuggeſted, that no place would be more proper than a palace belonging to king William, called Newburgh-houſe, ſituated between the Hague and Delft, cloſe by the village of Ryſwick; and to this propoſition the miniſters agreed. The plenipotentiaries of England were, the earl of Pembroke, the lord Villiers, and ſir Joſeph Williamſon; and France ſent the famous preſident Harlay and M. de Crecy to the aſſiſtance of Callieres.

The ſeveral powers engaged in the war were actuated by very different motives in their deſires for a peace. The Engliſh and Dutch had no other view than to reſtrain the power of France within proper bounds, to eſtabliſh a good barrier for the Netherlands, and to procure an acknowlegement of king William's title. Lewis was deſirous of a peace, on account of the miſerable condition to which his kingdom was reduced; but he had yet another view, which he carefully concealed from the knowlege of the allies, and which was concerted with the deepeſt policy.

His grand deſign was to prevent the certain ſucceſſion of the vaſt Spaniſh monarchy from devolving upon the other branch of the houſe of Auſtria, on the death of the king of Spain, who was now in a very declining ſtate: and he even entertained hopes that the houſe of Bourbon might at laſt come in for a ſhare in the diſmemberment, and perhaps one day ſucceed to the whole. The formal renunciations made by his wife and mother ſeemed no other than trivial agreements, which ought to give way to a change of circumſtances. In this view, to aggrandize the houſe of France, it was neceſſary to ſhew ſome moderation towards Europe, not to incenſe ſo many powers, who were ſtill full of ſuſpicions. The peace, he knew, would give him leiſure to form new alliances, to ſettle the diſorder in his finances, gain over thoſe whom he had occaſion for, and to form new bodies of militia in his kingdom: in a word, he found it requiſite to give up ſomething, in hopes of obtaining much more.

Theſe were the private motives of the French court in the peace of Ryſwick, which in the event actually procured the throne of Spain for the grandſon of Lewis XIV. The emperor had an eye upon the ſame crown, and this had determined him to ſupport the grand alliance. In purſuance of the reſolutions of the plenipotentiaries, the conferences were opened on the ninth of May, N. S. (April 29, O. S.) at Ryſwick; but the negotiations had like to have been interrupted by the death of Charles XI. king of Sweden, who had been received as mediator. He was ſucceeded by his ſon the famous Charles XII. then a minor: however, the late king having appointed the queen and five ſenators the adminiſtrators of the government during his ſon's minority, they reſolved to continue the mediation, and ſent full powers to M. Lillienroot for that purpoſe.

King William may juſtly be ſaid to have been the great manager of this treaty, in reſpect to all the allies, eſpecially if we conſider that the Dutch plenipotentiaries acted nothing but in concert with him. This treaty was undoubtedly a matter of great concern to the court of St. Germains: the partizans of king James in England ſeemed all along confident that Lewis would never acknowlege the prince of Orange for king of England, and even ridiculed all notions of a peace founded on ſuch a demand: yet it is certain that the French boggled the leaſt of any thing at that. This James himſelf was ſoon made ſenſible of; and finding that he could not have a miniſter received from him at the treaty, he publiſhed a manifeſto, ſetting forth the injuſtice done him, and proteſting againſt all that was or ſhould be done at the congreſs, in violation of his rights, as null and void. Beſides this manifeſto, he invited all the foreign miniſters to a conference, and delivered to each a paper written in Latin to the ſame purport as his manifeſto, and at the ſame time delivered himſelf to them to the following effect: "That if the calamitous ſtate of his affairs had been leſs known to the world, and his caſe not ſo juſt, he had not even then, any more than before, broke ſilence, but would patiently have ſuffered all ſorts of misfortunes, rather than have been inſtrumental in diſturbing the peace then in agitation: that he was ſenſible the circumſtances of the times, and much more that of his own fate, would not permit any one to engage in his quarrel; that therefore, without ſeeking any aſſiſtance or conſolation, he was willing to ſubmit to all his ſufferings, as a puniſhment for his ſins, in hopes that through the divine goodneſs he might one time or other enjoy the fruits of his patience. Nevertheleſs, added he, as I hold myſelf obliged by the laws of religion and nature to maintain, as far as I am able, my own intereſts and the rights of my ſon, I have in this inſtrument (delivering the Latin papers to the ſeveral miniſters) expreſſed the ſentiments I have always entertained, and always ſhall do as long as I live *."

Mean while the French, to bring down the demands of Spain, beſieged and took Aeth in Flanders this year; king William, who had ſince recovered of a ſevere indiſpoſition, not thinking proper to hazard his men for the relief of a place which, if taken, muſt neceſſarily be reſtored by the peace: nevertheleſs he effectually ſecured Bruſſels, which marſhal Boufflers had determined to inveſt. In the month of June the duke of Vendome, who commanded the French forces in Catalonia, inveſted Barcelona both by ſea and land, which, after having been gallantly defended for the ſpace of nine weeks by the prince of Heſſe d'Armſtadt the governor, was at laſt ſurrendered, in conſequence of an expreſs order from the court of Madrid.

The Spaniards alſo ſuffered conſiderable loſſes in America this year, where monſieur de Pointis, a French commodore, with a ſmall fleet equipped at the charge of a private company, had taken and plundered the town of Carthagena, and returned to France with a rich booty. Upon the whole, it appears that the king of England and the ſtates-general, who had in a manner borne the whole burden of the war, connived at theſe conqueſts, to bring Spain the more readily to accept the offers of France; eſpecially knowing, as I have obſerved before, that theſe places muſt be reſtored by the peace. This however was ſpinning the web of policy rather too fine; for the ſucceſſes of the French at home and abroad were ſuch as might have made Lewis maſter of the conditions of a peace, had he not been happily diſappointed in another project of his, I mean that of placing the prince of Conti on the throne of Poland, vacant by the death of the famous John Sobieſki.

This was the only regal crown then elective in the world. Natives and foreigners had equally a right to pretend to it; but to retain it required either a diſtinguiſhed ſhare of merit properly ſupported by intrigues to engage the ſuffrages, or elſe money enough to buy the kingdom, which is almoſt always put up at auction.

The candidates for the Poliſh crown were at firſt young Sobieſki, ſon of the late king; the duke of Lorraine; prince Lewis of Baden; and Don Olivio de Odeſcalchi, the pope's nephew: but the abbe, afterwards cardinal, de Polignac had the art to engage the greater part of the ſuffrages in favour of the prince of Conti, known by the gallant actions he had performed at Steinkirk and Nerwende, or Landen: whereupon the other candidates finding themſelves unable to oppoſe the ſuperior influence of the French court, transferred their intereſt to Auguſtus elector of Saxony, who ſoon advanced with a conſiderable army to the frontiers of Poland. Lewis-Francis, prince of Conti, was however elected king by the majority of the nation, and proclaimed on the ſeventeenth of June, N. S. by the primate. Auguſtus was elected two hours after by another party, inferior in numbers: but Auguſtus was a ſovereign prince, and powerful, and had a body of troops in readineſs to ſupport his intereſt: he had alſo privately ſecured the good offices of the imperial court, had engaged to change his religion, and to diſtribute eight millions of florins among the Poles, and to confirm all their privileges. The prince of Conti was abſent, deſtitute of men, money, and power, and had nothing on his ſide but his name, and the intrigues of Polignac. Lewis XIV. contrary to his uſual manner of proceeding, acted on this occaſion with that lukewarm policy which begins an affair only to drop it again. The prince of Conti was ſent over with only a ſmall ſquadron of ſhips, and a few bills of exchange, with which he arrived in the road of Dantzic, in his way to Poland; but they would not even receive the prince at Dantzic, and his bills of exchange were proteſted. The intrigues of the pope and the emperor, and the money and troops of Saxony, had already ſecured the crown on his rival's head; and Conti returned with the empty glory of having been choſen king, while the court of France had the mortification of having ſhewn all Europe that ſhe was not ſufficiently powerful to make a petty northern prince *.

This diſgrace which befel the prince of Conti, and the eſtabliſhment of Auguſtus on the throne of Poland, was a great mortification to the French miniſters at the congreſs of Ryſwick, and made them more inclinable than ever to come to an accommodation. On the twentieth day of July the French ambaſſadors produced their project of a peace, in order to ſhorten the negotiation, which had hitherto proceeded very ſlowly, by reaſon of the numerous and complicated pretenſions of the ſeveral powers; declaring at the ſame time, that if their project ſhould not be accepted before the laſt day of Auguſt, France would not hold herſelf bound for the conditions ſhe now offered: but Caunitz, the emperor's plenipotentiary, declared he would pay no regard to this limitation, unleſs France would previouſly engage to reſtore all the places and dominions ſhe had wreſted from the empire ſince the peace of Munſter, whether by force of arms or pretence of right. On the thirtieth of Auguſt, however, he delivered to the mediator (M. Lillienroot) an ultimatum, importing, That he adhered to the treaties of Weſtphalia and Nimeguen, and accepted of Straſburg with its appurtenances: that he inſiſted upon the reſtoration of Lorraine to the prince of that name, and demanded that the church and chapter of Liege ſhould be re-eſtabliſhed in the poſſeſſion of their inconteſtable rights. Next day the French plenipotentiaries declared, That the month of Auguſt being now expired, all their offers were vacated: that therefore the king of France would reſerve Straſburg, and unite it with its dependencies to his crown for ever: that in other reſpects he would adhere to the project, and would reſtore Barcelona to the crown of Spain; but at the ſame time inſiſted that the terms muſt be accepted by the twentieth of September, otherwiſe he would think himſelf at liberty to recede. The Imperialiſts were much ſurprized at the ſhort time prefixed by France for their anſwer. This was ſtill the more mortifying to them, as they began now to be ſuperior to the French on the Rhine; and the proceedings of the allies made them jealous leſt the latter ſhould ſign a ſeparate peace, and leave them out, eſpecially as they ſaw that the Spaniards had now abated of their former obſtinacy, and were ready to concur with England and Holland in putting a final hand to the negotiation. This occaſioned ſome warm remonſtrances on the part of the imperial plenipotentiary; but all that he could obtain was, that the term for adjuſting the peace between France and the emperor ſhould be prolonged to the firſt of November, and in the mean time an armiſtice be punctually obſerved. It was however reſolved that the treaty between France, England, Spain, and Holland, ſhould be ſigned on the twentieth of September, even though the emperor and empire ſhould not concur †.

All this time we heard little or nothing of our plenipotentiaries; nor was it known whether they had done any thing at all till the very latter part of the negotiation; and the ſilence of the reſt of the allies concerning the treaty had greatly amazed the French plenipotentiaries: but it ſeems the concluſion of the peace was to be owing to the ſame perſon who had been the cauſe of the war, king William: for while the negotiations at Ryſwick were going on ſo ſlowly, it was ſo managed that the earl of Portland and Boufflers, when the confederate army was encamped near Bruſſels, and the French not far from thence, had four or five ſeveral meetings by order of their maſters, in ſight of the two armies. Theſe interviews occaſioned various ſpeculations, and by the jealouſies it raiſed in the minds of the ſeveral parties in the grand alliance, greatly conduced to the diſpatch of the treaty. On the ſecond of Auguſt the earl of Portland and marſhal Boufflers ſigned a paper, in which the principal articles of the peace between France and England were adjuſted. Next day king William quitted the camp of the allies, and retired to his houſe at Loo, ſenſible that he had taken ſuch meaſures for a pacification as could not be diſappointed.

It is ſaid that the earl of Portland, in one of the conferences between him and Boufflers, inſiſted that king James and his family might be ſent out of France, which the marſhal would not yield to, but promiſed, in his maſter's name, that he would not diſturb William in the poſſeſſion of his crown. Lewis had before that imparted to king James the neceſſity he found himſelf under of coming to an accommodation with king William, but at the ſame time promiſed to allow him an annual penſion of ſix hundred thouſand livres, which James accepted with thanks; but added, that in any future treaties he would not conſent that any propoſals for his maintenance ſhould be made or accepted, which might be an argument of his ſubmiſſion; and that he was reſolved at leaſt to tranſmit, uninjured, the ſucceſſion of the title to his ſon, in hopes a ſeries of more happy events might reſtore his fallen fortunes. Beſides this ſubject of the field negotiation between the earl and the marſhal, it was ſuppoſed by ſome of the deeper politicians, that the firſt foundation of the famous Partition-treaty was now laid; and it is not improbable but ſomething of that kind was then propoſed and conſidered.

At length the twentieth of September came, when either a happy peace or a long and bloody war was like to determine the fate of Europe. That day the Engliſh, Dutch, and Spaniſh plenipotentiaries, after a long conference with thoſe of France, in which they adjuſted all matters of difference remaining between any of them, mutually ſigned the peace a little before midnight, and then complimented each other upon the finiſhing ſo important a negotiation.

Caunitz and the other miniſters of the empire were in the hall all or moſt part of that time; but they did not give their conſent in what was done, nor contribute the leaſt in bringing this matter to a period. On the contrary, they required M. Lillienroot, the mediator, to enter proteſts in the name of their reſpective maſters and ſovereign princes of the empire, "That this was a ſecond time a ſeparate peace had been made with France (meaning that of Nimeguen for one) in which the emperor and the empire had been excluded." On this occaſion Don Bernardo de Quiros, and the other plenipotentiaries, excuſed themſelves, by ſaying that they had for a conſiderable time been made acquainted with their ſovereign's pleaſure, and had received orders to make no farther delay, but to ſubſcribe the treaty; and that if they had ſo done without ſuffering themſelves to have been over-perſuaded by the imperial miniſters, it would have prevented the loſs of the city of Barcelona, which was the conſequence of their having deferred their aſſent."

The emperor was highly chagrined at the conduct of the allies; and his diſguſt was nothing alleviated by receiving advice, ſoon after the concluſion of the treaty, of a victory which his general prince Eugene of Savoy had obtained over the Turks at Zenta in Hungary, where the grand ſeignior commanded his army in perſon. In this battle, which was fought on the eleventh of September, the grand vizier, the aga of the janiſaries, twenty-ſeven baſhaws, and about thirty thouſand men, were killed or drowned in the river Thieſſe; ſix thouſand men were wounded or taken, together with all their artillery, tents, baggage, proviſion, and ammunition, the grand ſeignior himſelf eſcaping with the utmoſt difficulty. Had the news of this important victory arrived ſome few weeks ſooner, it might poſſibly have rendered the French more moderate in their demands on the empire; but having now taken off three of the moſt powerful ſtates in the confederacy againſt them, they ſuffered it not to have the leaſt influence on their conduct with regard to the others. The emperor therefore, fearing that he ſhould be left alone to encounter the whole power of France, thought proper at length to ſubmit to the terms which had been agreed on at the congreſs, and accordingly ſigned on the thirtieth day of October; and his example was followed by all the princes of the empire. It now remains to give the ſubſtance of the ſeveral treaties concluded at this famous congreſs of Ryſwick.

The moſt material articles of the treaty between GREAT BRITAIN and FRANCE were as follow:

By the third (the two firſt being only words of form) all offences, injuries, and damages on either ſide, were to be forgotten.

By the fourth, the French king engaged that he would not, on any pretence, diſturb or diſquiet the king of Great Britain in the poſſeſſion of his crown or government, nor aſſiſt his enemies, nor favour conſpiracies againſt his perſon.

By the fifth, a free commerce was to be reſtored between the ſubjects of the two nations.

The ſeventh provides for the mutual reſtoration of all countries, iſlands, forts and colonies, which either the French or Engliſh poſſeſſed before the war.

By the eighth, commiſſaries were appointed to meet at London and ſettle the pretenſions of each crown to Hudſon's Bay, taken by the French during the late peace, and re-taken by the Engliſh in the courſe of the war; and to regulate the limits of places to be reſtored, as well as the exchanges to be made.

By the tenth, all ſhips and merchandizes taken on either ſide, twelve days after the publication of the peace, in the Britiſh and North ſeas, as far as Cape St. Vincent, within ten weeks beyond the ſaid Cape and on this ſide the Equator, ſhall remain in the poſſeſſion of the captors.

By the twelfth, ſix months are allowed to the ſubjects on either ſide to withdraw their effects, in caſe of a rupture between the two courts.

By the thirteenth, the principality of Orange, and all other lands belonging to the king of Great Britain as prince of Orange, were to be reſtored him with the meſne profits.

By the fifteenth, the treaty between the French king and the duke of Savoy, in 1696, is confirmed.

By the ſixteenth, all powers were to be comprehended in this treaty which ſhould be named within ſix months after the ratification thereof, and particularly the king of Sweden the mediator.

And by a ſeparate article, the emperor was allowed to the firſt of November to accept the conditions agreed on for him between the two kings of England and France.

At the very inſtant that the French plenipotentiaries changed the name of prince of Orange, by which they uſually deſignated king William, to that of king of Great Britain, the politicians of thoſe times began to make ſome remarks on the fourth article; in which the French king barely allows king William the ſtile of king of Great Britain, without acknowleging his right, or ſtipulating not to ſupport king James by name, or bringing him under any obligation to compel him to quit his dominions, as queen Anne obliged him to do in relation to the pretender at the peace of Utrecht: and indeed it was looked upon as a great defect in the treaty of Ryſwick, that the ſucceſſion of the princeſs Anne and her iſſue was not inſerted. But the moſt melancholy part of this treaty was, that nothing was obtained in favour of the French proteſtants, tho' king William had obliged himſelf, by the grand alliance, not to make peace with France till the proteſtants of that kingdom had all their grants and poſſeſſions reſtored them, with an entire liberty of conſcience, nor till the eſtates of that kingdom might enjoy their antient and lawful privileges, with a great deal more to the ſame purpoſe. Lewis however on this occaſion peremptorily refuſed to be laid under any reſtraint, or have any terms dictated to him in reſpect to his conduct towards his own ſubjects; and William, it is to be ſuppoſed, did not think this a ſufficient reaſon for continuing the war, ſo that the French proteſtants were not ſo much as mentioned in the articles of peace, but abandoned to the fury of their incenſed monarch. This negligence or acquieſcence of William, by whichſoever name it may be called, does not ſeem to agree perfectly well with the title he was ſo fond of aſſuming on all occaſions, that of the Protector of the Proteſtant Intereſt.

In the treaty between France and Holland it was agreed,

That all cities, lands, forts, iſlands, and places which had been taken on either ſide during the war, were to be reſtored, and particularly the fort of Pondicherry in the Eaſt Indies, was to be reſtored to the States.

But the greateſt advantage the Dutch got by this peace was, the concluding a treaty of commerce with France very much in their favour *, while nothing of this kind was ſtipulated in behalf of England, only in general, that there ſhould be a free trade on both ſides.

Spain was in a particular manner benefited by this pacification; for by the treaty between that crown and France, Lewis engaged to reſtore the following places, viz. Gironne, Roſes, Belver and Barcelona in Catalonia, Luxemburg, Charleroi, Mons, Courtray, Aeth, and all the towns, fortreſſes, and territories, taken by his arms in the provinces of Luxemburg, Namur, Brabant, Flanders, and Hainault, except eighty two towns and villages claimed by the French. Theſe were to be left to the deciſion of commiſſioners; or in caſe they could not agree, to the arbitration of the States-general.

By the treaty between the emperor and empire and France, which was ſigned on the thirtieth of October, N. S. it was agreed,

That the treaties of Weſtphalia and Nimeguen ſhould be the baſis and foundation of this treaty, both in ſacred and civil matters, unleſs where it was expreſsly covenanted to the contrary.

That the French king ſhould reſtore to the emperor and empire, and the members thereof, whatever places had been taken, as well during the war by way of force, as by the name of unions and reunions, which were ſituated without Alſace, only the Roman catholic religion ſhould remain in thoſe places thus reſtored in the ſtate it then was.

That France ſhould yield up to the emperor and empire Fort Kiel, Friburg, Sturſort, Old Briſac, and Philipſburg.

That Dinant ſhould be reſtored to the biſhopric of Liege, and that the caſtles of Trierbach, Ebrenburg, Kiruburg, and the fortreſs of Montroyal, works on which the great Vauban had exhauſted his art, and the French king his treaſury, ſhould be demoliſhed, and reſtored to their reſpective proprietors. And on the other hand it was agreed,

That the imperial town of Straſburg, the capital of Alſatia, and the dependencies on the left ſide of the Rhine, ſhould be yielded up and united to France; ſo that the Rhine was looked upon as the boundary between the empire of France for ſome time †.

In certain preparatory articles ſettled between England and France, king William promiſed to pay a yearly penſion to Mary d'Eſte, king James's queen, of fifty thouſand pounds, or ſuch ſum as ſhould be eſtabliſhed for that purpoſe by act of parliament: now the Engliſh plenipotentiaries having declared this in the preſence of thoſe of Holland, the ſame was entered into the regiſter of the ambaſſador-mediator, who delivered a copy of it to the miniſters of France. It ſhould ſeem however that theſe latter fell ſhort in their politics on this occaſion; for they ſhould have required a more clear explanation of the matter, and that a time ſhould be fixed for making the firſt payment. The Britiſh miniſter on this occaſion inſiſted that the queen ſhould give him a receipt on the behalf of his maſter, by the name and title of William III. king of Great Britain, which ſhe abſolutely refuſed, and ſo received no part of her dowry, at leaſt during the continuance of this reign.

Europe was ſurprized, ſays M. de Voltaire, and the French filled with indignation, to ſee Lewis XIV. make peace as if he had been conquered. Harlai, Crecy, and Callieres, who negotiated and ſigned this treaty, durſt not ſhow themſelves either at court or in the city; they were loaded with reproaches and deriſion, as if they had taken any ſtep they had not been ordered by the king and the miniſtry. Certain it is, that by this treaty the French monarch found himſelf obliged to relinquiſh all his ambitious projects, and a ſtop was put, at leaſt for ſome time, to the further progreſs of his arms. Had Lewis indeed had no latent deſign in thus yielding up ſo many important places which he had conquered, the world would have had reaſon to ſay he acted moderately: but his real view in this ſeeming moderation was to diſarm and diſunite the allies, that ſo he might the more eaſily ſeize on the Spaniſh monarchy, upon the death of its old and feeble king Charles II. now daily expected, tho' it did not happen till three years later.

King William having by the peace of Ryſwick firmly eſtabliſhed himſelf on the Engliſh throne, and accompliſhed his aim of putting a ſtop to the encroachments of the French monarch, returned to England about the middle of November, and was received in London amidſt the general acclamations of the people, who now again beheld him as their deliverer from a war, by the continuance of which they muſt have been infallibly beggared. Juſt before his majeſty's return home, the lords juſtices had iſſued a proclamation for apprehending ſuch of his majeſty's Britiſh ſubjects as ſhould return from France without leave; as alſo another proclamation for apprehending the duke of Berwick, ſir George Barclay, and others attainted of high-treaſon, and ſuppoſed to be then lurking in England; for it was expected that king James's friends would have taken ſome deſperate reſolution on the concluſion of the peace; but nothing of this nature appeared.

* This treaty of commerce was concluded for twenty years. It is thereby ſtipulated, that the Dutch ſubjects ſhall enjoy the ſame privileges, franchiſes, &c. in France as Lewis's own ſubjects did; and that they might freely carry to Marſeilles, &c. the merchandize of the Levant, as well in their own ſhips as in French bottoms, without being liable to the twenty per cent on the Levant commerce, ſaving only in caſes where the French themſelves were liable to pay it. The Dutch alſo might hereby import pickled herrings, without being liable to re-packing. France alſo hereby remitted to the Dutch the fifty ſols per ton on foreigners ſhips, excepting only when Dutch ſhips carry French goods coaſt-ways, from one port of France to another.

The parliament meeting on the third of December, was opened with a ſpeech from the throne, wherein his majeſty obſerved, "That the war he had entered into by the advice of his people, was by their aſſiſtance brought to the end which he had ever propoſed, a ſafe and honourable peace: that he was ſorry however to acquaint them, that his ſubjects could not at firſt find that relief by the peace they might expect, the funds having fallen ſhort, and there remaining ſo great a debt to the navy and army, beſides what was wanting to ſupport the civil liſt. He ſaid, he made not the leaſt doubt that his parliament would make ſuch a proviſion for him during his life, as might be for his honour and that of his government. He obſerved, that our naval force was increaſed almoſt double ſince his acceſſion, and could not be ſupported without a proportionable increaſe of money; and he believed they would agree with him in allowing that the chief ſtrength of England muſt ever conſiſt in a powerful navy. He gave it as his opinion, that conſidering the ſtate of affairs on the continent, the kingdom could not be ſafe without a land-force. He promiſed to rectify ſuch abuſes as had crept into any part of the adminiſtration during the war, and effectually to diſcourage prophaneneſs and immorality. He expreſſed himſelf delighted with the proofs his ſubjects had given him of their loyalty and attachment to his perſon; and concluded, that as he had at the hazard of his life reſcued the religion, laws, and liberties, when they were in the extremeſt danger, ſo he ſhould place the chief glory of his reign in preſerving and leaving them entire to poſterity."

To this ſpeech the two houſes returned an addreſs by a compliment of congratulation upon the peace, and an aſſurance "that they would be ever ready to aſſiſt and ſupport his majeſty, who had confirmed them in the quiet poſſeſſion of their rights and liberties; and by putting an end to the war, fully compleated the work of their deliverance *." Notwithſtanding theſe appearances of good humour, the majority of the parliament, and indeed the whole nation, were equally alarmed at that part of the king's ſpeech which diſcovered a project for maintaining a ſtanding army: but before I go upon the proceedings of the parliament, which ſat the longeſt, and was the moſt buſy of any that had aſſembled for ſome years, and that I may not break in upon its tranſactions, I ſhall here give a brief account of our naval affairs during this year, 1697.

And firſt, I am to take notice of the expedition of vice-admiral Neville to the Weſt Indies, who was ſent thither on the firſt intelligence of Mr. Pointis' being ſailed for that part of the world with a ſtrong ſquadron. It was ſuppoſed that the true deſign of this armament, which was kept a profound ſecret by the French court, was againſt Jamaica, which alarmed us the more, becauſe, conſidering the ſmall force we had in that quarter, if the French had really attempted this iſland, there was but too great a probability of their ſucceeding. Their intent however appeared afterwards to have been againſt the Spaniſh ſettlements in that part of the globe. To parry this blow wherever it was intended, orders were given to aſſemble a ſquadron at Portſmouth, under the command of rear-admiral Meeze; and other orders were at the ſame time diſpatched to Mr. Neville, who commanded our fleet in the Mediterranean; which orders he was directed to open in a certain latitude, by which he was inſtructed to join admiral Meeze at the iſland of Madeira, which he accordingly did on the ſeventeenth of April, and they bore away together for Antigua, where they arrived the third of May. Here they received advice that M. de Pointis was ſailed from Hiſpaniola on the twenty-firſt of March, N. S. with twenty-ſix ſhips ſmall and great. It was then reſolved in a council of war to proceed forthwith to Jamaica. Before they reached their deſtined port, they met with a ſloop, the maſter whereof informed them there was a report of the French ſquadron's being before Carthagena. Whereupon it was reſolved to ſteer for that place, in hopes of finding the French either embarraſſed in the ſiege, or in embarking the plunder. Had this reſolve been put in execution immediately, we muſt have ſurprized monſieur Pointis, and deſtroyed his whole force; but it appears from admiral Neville's Journal, that he was under an abſolute neceſſity of putting into Jamaica for a freſh ſupply of proviſions and water, where he was detained ſo long by the winds and other croſs accidents, that Pointis had time to do his buſineſs at Carthagena, and ſail away. But though our fleet miſſed him there, yet on the twenty-ſeventh of May, being half ſeas over from Jamaica, the admiral ſaw the ſieur de Pointis' ſquadron at no great diſtance; upon which he endeavoured all he could to engage, but could not come near enough. Five days the vice-admiral continued the purſuit, in which five ſhips (among which his own and rear-admiral Meeze's were included) ſprung their maſts; and their ſails were ſo torn, that it was found impoſſible to continue the chace with any hopes of ſucceſs †.

Hereupon the vice-admiral thought it expedient to proceed to Carthagena, in order to ſee if the galleons were ſafe, and how far he could be uſeful to the Spaniards. Here he had advice that the galleons were at the Havannah: he therefore proceeded for Jamaica, after having deſtroyed ſeveral ſail of the Buccaneers *, who had aſſiſted the French in their depredations upon the Spaniards. While the admiral lay at Jamaica, the governor, who at that time was ſir William Beeſton, propoſed to him the deſtruction of that neſt of pirates at Petit-Guavas †; with which Mr. Neville inſtantly complied, and detached rear-admiral Meeze with nine ſhips from the fleet on the twenty-ſecond of June for this purpoſe; who on the twenty-ninth ſurprized Petit-Guavas before it was light, and immediately gave orders for burning it, which was done with ſo much precipitation, that notwithſtanding there was abundance of gold and ſilver in the place, yet very little was ſaved or brought away. However, the burning the town, and carrying off priſoners a good number of negroes to Jamaica, was a great and ſeaſonable ſervice to the Engliſh colonies.

Vice-admiral Neville then proceeded to the Havannah, in order to take the galleons under his eſcort, which was the principal part of his inſtructions: but the general of the galleons excuſed putting his ſhips under our protection, pretending his orders would not warrant it; but, in reality, being fearful of truſting ſo rich a fleet, worth above fifty millions, in the vice-admiral's power: the ſame motive induced the governor of the Havannah to refuſe admitting the admiral to enter the harbour with his ſquadron. This kind of treatment, from thoſe whom he had come principally to ſerve, broke the vice-admiral's ſpirits very much: and this, added to the conſciouſneſs of the little ſervice he had been able to do his country with ſo ſtrong a ſquadron, threw him into a fit of ſickneſs, which carried him off at Virginia, where he arrived on the ſeventh of Auguſt. Rear-admiral Meeze being alſo dead before our fleet reached the Havannah, the chief command devolved upon captain Robert Dilkes as ſenior captain, who brought the fleet home to England about the latter end of October this year, but in a very bad condition.

The Engliſh were highly enraged at being diſappointed in the great hopes that had been entertained of this expedition; and their anger was farther raiſed by other croſs accidents which happened about the ſame time in the ſame quarter of the world. It ſeems that Pointis, after eſcaping vice-admiral Neville, fell in on the coaſt of Newfoundland with another Engliſh ſquadron, commanded by commodore (afterwards ſir John and admiral) Norris: but this officer, who propoſed to attack him, was prevented from executing his reſolution by the deciſion of a council of war. In his return Pointis was encountered by ſix Engliſh ſhips commanded by captain Harlow; but after maintaining a running fight during a whole day, he at length ſecured himſelf in the harbour of Breſt, with the treaſure he had taken at Carthagena, amounting, by the beſt accounts, to upwards of twenty millions of livres, or near one million two hundred thouſand pounds ſterling. The blame of theſe miſcarriages was laid upon the conduct of the admirals, and the orders of the admiralty: theſe were chiefly directed by admiral Ruſſel (lately made earl of Orford) who preſided at that board, and who, though neither deficient in courage nor integrity, was ſuppoſed to have been betrayed by thoſe in whom he too much confided. Thus much is certain, that all our naval hiſtorians agree in aſſerting, that the officers of the fleet were divided by the moſt violent factions and animoſities, which had as fatal an effect, with regard to the intereſts of the nation, as the blackeſt treachery and corruption.

This is the ſum of what paſſed in the Weſt Indies this year. I now come to the naval tranſactions in Europe, where we ſhall not find many extraordinary actions to detain us.

His majeſty having before his going to Holland in the ſpring of this year, declared Edward Ruſſel eſq. admiral of the fleet, one of the lords juſtices in his abſence, and ſoon after created him earl of Orford; he thereupon quitted his command of the fleet to take his ſeat at the head of the admiralty board, when the command in chief devolved on ſir George Rooke, who in the beginning of June went down to Portſmouth to take upon him that office; and ſoon after being joined by vice-admiral Mitchel and rear-admiral Bembow, he put to ſea with forty-four ſail of the line, and continued cruizing for a few weeks, when he was obliged to put into port again for proviſions.

Previous to this, however, rear-admiral Benbow had been ſent out with a ſeparate ſquadron, conſiſting of ſeven third-rates, and two fire-ſhips, with ſtrict inſtructions to uſe all his endeavours to protect our trade, and annoy the enemy; but he was able to perform nothing remarkable, and was therefore recalled, and ordered to join ſir George Rooke as above. After the grand fleet had put in to revictual, admiral Bembow was ſent to reinforce, and take command of a ſquadron which had for ſome time been cruizing off Dunkirk, under the command of commodore Beaumont, to intercept M. du Bart, the French admiral, who was expected to ſail from thence with a fleet that was to carry over the prince of Conti, whom the French attempted to make king of Poland. The French ſhips at Dunkirk were in all about eleven, from fifty to twenty-ſix guns. About the latter end of July Mr. Bembow was joined by rear-admiral Vandergoes with 11 Dutch ſhips; ſo that his fleet then conſiſted of about thirty ſail large and ſmall. The Engliſh admiral propoſed to ſtation one ſquadron to the northward of Dunkirk, and the other in or about Oſtend-road, that if Du Bart attempted to paſs out either at the eaſt or north channel, they might the better diſcover him; but the Dutch commander repreſenting that his ſhips were foul, and in no condition to purſue the French fleet, ſhould he even get ſight of it, this diſpoſition was laid aſide. Du Bart having hawled his ſhips into the baſon, where they were thoroughly cleaned, waited only for the next ſpring-tide to make a puſh out. Accordingly, on the twenty-third of Auguſt, he left Dunkirk with five ſail, having the prince of Conti on board. Admiral Bembow immediately purſued him, but to no purpoſe, our ſhips as well as the Dutch being miſerably foul: he therefore returned to his ſtation, and in his way got ſight of eight other ſhips that had ſailed from the ſame port, which he purſued likewiſe, but with the ſame ill ſucceſs; and this was the laſt action of the war, for on the twentieth of September following peace was concluded between England, Spain, Holland, and France *.

* As Jamaica was hitherto principally inhabited by the military men (and their offſpring) who had poſſeſſed it ever ſince it was taken in the year 1656; thoſe people, as generally diſliking agriculture, betook themſelves to cruizing at ſea againſt the Spaniards on the American ſeas, even after peace had been concluded between England and Spain in America; and allured by the wealth acquired thereby, they continued that illegal practice throughout all the reign of king Charles II. to this time, and got the name of the Buccaneers of Jamaica, ſome of whoſe bold exploits againſt the Spaniſh towns and ports in Mexico, &c. would paſs for mere romances, had they not been too much known by both nations.

I ſhall cloſe this account of our naval affairs with a ſhort reflection on the conſequences of this long war to the naval power and commerce of England. Mr. Burchet has clearly ſhewn us that the French ſuffered much more in their maritime power than we; and conſequently, if we conſider the great facility with which we were able to repair ſuch loſſes as we ſuſtained at ſea, and the great difficulties the French lay under in this reſpect, however pompouſly their writers may dreſs up their accounts, it will be clear they were in no way able to ſtruggle againſt the Dutch and us in a maritime war. King William, in his ſpeech to both houſes of parliament, of which we have juſt given an abſtract, aſſerted that our naval force was near double to what it was at his acceſſion; and upon carefully comparing the liſts of the royal navy, and other authentic writers on this ſubject, the truth of this very clearly appears; while, on the other hand, the French never attempted to build any new ſhips in the room of thoſe that were taken or deſtroyed during the progreſs of the war. The reader will find in the note an account of the loſs ſuſtained on each ſide, while we were diſputing the empire of the ſea †: from whence, and what we have remarked above, he will readily perceive that, as a maritime power, we were gainers by the war; but with reſpect to our trade, it is paſt all doubt that we ſuffered infinitely more than the enemy: our traffic was exceſſively diſturbed; our merchants were many of them ruined, which occaſioned an abſolute diſtruſt of and diſtaſte againſt thoſe who had the direction of naval affairs, a loud clamour againſt the war, and an univerſal deſire of peace at any rate ‡. Let us now proceed to a review of the parliamentary affairs of this year; and as an introduction, it may not be amiſs to preſent the reader with a ſketch of the miniſtry, as it ſtood at this juncture.

Bentinck earl of Portland had long poſſeſſed the chief place in the king's affections, but of late his intereſt with his royal maſter had been conſiderably weakened by the intervention of the earl of Sunderland, who had by every act of complacency and adulation inſinuated himſelf into William's eſteem. Tho' this nobleman could not but know by experience the inſuperable diſlike the people of England entertained to a ſtanding army; yet he no ſooner found that the king was deſirous of keeping up ſuch a force, from an apprehenſion that a reduction of it would leſſen his importance both at home and abroad, diminiſh the dependence upon his government, and tear from him thoſe foreigners in whoſe attachments he chiefly confided: Sunderland, I ſay, no ſooner diſcovered theſe ſentiments in the king, than he laboured to encourage him with hopes of ſucceſs; and as we are never upon our guard againſt thoſe who flatter our paſſions or inclinations, king William ſoon made this miniſter his chief confident. He had alſo a female favourite, one Mrs. Villiers, on whom he had conferred ſeveral marks of his conſideration: theſe two are ſaid to have joined their intereſts to ſupplant Portland. Chance concurred with their deſign: the king had lately taken more than common notice of one M. Van Kepple, a gentleman of Guelderland, who had firſt ſerved him as a page, and afterwards acted as a private ſecretary. The earl of Portland growing troubleſome, from his jealouſy of theſe competitors, the king reſolved to ſend him into honourable exile, in quality of ambaſſador extraordinary to the court of France; and Trumbal, the earl's confident and friend, was diſmiſſed from the office of ſecretary, which was beſtowed upon Vernon, who had acted as under-ſecretary to the duke of Shrewſbury. This nobleman rivalled Sunderland at the council-board, and was ſupported by lord-chancellor Somers; Ruſſel the new earl of Orford, firſt lord of the admiralty; and Charles Montagu, chancellor of the Exchequer. Somers was an upright judge, a diſcerning ſtateſman, and an adroit courtier: he equalled the famous chancellor More in the ſweetneſs and affability of his diſpoſition; and the great Bacon in the depth of his learning. Orford was honeſt, but indelicate: he meant well, but his underſtanding was ſhallow; and he was by nature very headſtrong and obſtinate. Montagu had diſtinguiſhed himſelf as the moſt able financier of his time: he was an encourager of the liberal arts, and the profeſſed patron of projectors: as a ſtateſman, he was bold, dogmatical, and aſpiring.

England

The terrors of a military force had produced ſuch a ſpirit of diſcontent in the nation, that when the commons came to conſider that part of the king's ſpeech which related to the maintenance of a ſtanding army, ſeveral of the leading members warmly exclaimed againſt a practice to which the people had conceived an inveterate averſion, and the recommendation of which from the throne had not a little alarmed their fears. The ſpirit ſhewn on this occaſion by the oppoſers of the court was ſuch, that its friends and adherents were driven to a great dilemma. The matter was debated with much warmth, and many learned arguments were adduced on both ſides in ſupport of and againſt ſuch a meaſure; the ſubſtance of which cannot fail to be entertaining to the curious reader.

It was alleged by thoſe in the oppoſition, that a ſtanding army being founded upon ſlaviſh principles, was by its very nature and conſtitution inconſiſtent with the ſpirit of a free government: that being abſolutely ſubject to the will of a ſingle perſon, whoſe orders it was capital to diſobey; it might, if that perſon thought proper, be employed to the moſt dangerous and deſtructive purpoſes; to the ſubverſion of that liberty which it was intended to protect; and the ruin of thoſe by whom it was maintained: that ſuppoſing it could not carry theſe pernicious deſigns by open force, yet it would neceſſarily accompliſh the ſame in the end, by over-awing elections, and preſcribing to the legiſlature; and thus in a ſlow and inſenſible manner eſtabliſh a tyranny, before the nation could be ſufficiently on its guard to counteract ſuch efforts, or ſecure its own ſafety: that allowing theſe inconveniencies to exiſt only in a chimerical apprehenſion; yet as the bulk of ſuch an army is and would be generally compoſed of people indigent in their circumſtances, and licentious in their morals, they would ſtop at nothing to gratify their appetites or reſentments, and be ever the ready tools of a bad prince, who might think it his intereſt to make uſe of them for the oppreſſing or humbling his ſubjects. It was urged beſides, that an army could at beſt be conſidered, in time of peace, but as an uſeleſs and unneceſſary burden, and thoſe who compoſed it as drones living on the labours of the more induſtrious and uſeful part of the nation; and this was more particularly the caſe in Great Britain, who, ſurrounded as ſhe was by a boiſterous ocean, ſecured by a numerous fleet, and bleſſed with a ſtout and hardy race of natives, ſtood not in need of the aſſiſtance or protection of hireling mercenaries to defend herſelf againſt the attempts of any enemy, foreign or domeſtic.

Theſe arguments, cogent as they were, paſſed not unanſwered: ſeveral individuals, and amongſt thoſe ſome who were the genuine friends of their country, eſpouſed the oppoſite maxims: they ſaid, that granting all the objections to a ſtanding army to be founded on truth, and that it was really pregnant with all the miſchiefs charged upon it; yet in the preſent ſituation of things it appeared to be a neceſſary evil: that would every ſtate in Europe diſband its forces on the concluſion of a peace, ſuch a ſtep muſt certainly conduce greatly to the eaſe and happineſs of the reſpective ſubjects, and of Chriſtendom in general: but while, on the contrary, every kingdom maintained a ſtanding force of mercenaries, and that in particular the very nation who, by intereſt and inclination, were the inveterate enemies of England, kept on foot the greateſt army of any ſtate in Europe, it would be the utmoſt ſtretch of folly and madneſs to ſtrip ourſelves of every means of defence, and ſtand naked and expoſed to every attempt that ambition or ill faith might think proper to make againſt us. In anſwer to the ſufficiency of our numerous and formidable fleet for protecting us againſt all inſults, it was obſerved, that a thouſand unforeſeen accidents might render this bulwark uſeleſs. The ſame wind, it was ſaid, that wafted over to our ſhores an hoſtile fleet, might detain our ſhips in their harbours, as was actually the caſe when his preſent majeſty arrived in this kingdom, when the eaſt wind that brought over the Dutch fleet kept ours in the river till the Dutch fleet paſſed them; and when they got out a ſtorm ſtopped and ſhattered them ſo, that without being able to come to any action, they were laid up. It is eaſy to infer what would have been the fatal conſequences, if the king had then come to deſtroy our liberties, inſtead of reſcuing them from a deſtroyer: and would any man, it was aſked, hazard the nation upon ſuch a contingency? eſpecially knowing that England is an open country, full of plenty, every where able to ſubſiſt an army; our towns and cities all open; our rivers all fordable; and no paſſes nor ſtrong places to ſtop an enemy, ſhould they effect a deſcent. In anſwer to the aſſertion that a ſtanding army would be always ſubject to the arbitrary will and command of the ſovereign, who might at pleaſure uſe it for the deſtruction of his people's liberties; the late Revolution was again urged as a ſtriking and memorable example againſt ſuch a ſuppoſition. James, at the time his rival meditated a deſcent on England, was at the head of an army of thirty thouſand well-diſciplined troops; a force certainly ſufficient to have driven out the prince of Orange, and have eſtabliſhed that tyranny which the reigning prince intended to erect, had they been actuated by a blind and implicit obedience to the royal will: but the event proved how differently they thought and acted; the inſtant that lawleſs prince attempted to employ them to ſubvert the liberties and religion of their fellow-ſubjects, they one and all rejected the propoſal with an honeſt indignation, and laid down their arms, a few catholics only excepted, repairing moſt of them to the ſtandard of the prince, who came to eſpouſe the cauſe of liberty againſt the attempts of deſpotiſm. It was urged, moreover, that it was very improbable that the army ſhould be rendered perpetual and independent while it remained on its preſent footing, being ſtill ſubject to the annual inſpection of the parliament; and whenever that aſſembly ſhould ſee cauſe to ſuſpect the deſigns of the prince, or the diſpoſitions of the military, they had it in their power to diminiſh their number, or entirely diſband them. In concluſion it was alleged, that nothing could be more abſurd than to expoſe ourſelves to certain ruin, from a ſuppoſition that what now preſerves us from it, may at ſome time hereafter have ill effects on our liberty: nor are thoſe effects to be apprehended as conſiderable, ſo long as England remains true to itſelf; and whenſoever the nation has loſt that ſenſe of liberty by which it has been ſo long preſerved, it will ſoon make fetters for itſelf, though it ſhould find none at hand ready *.

This diſpute likewiſe gave occaſion to ſeveral pamphlets whichwere publiſhed on the ſubject, and in which the authors diſplayed a propriety of language, a force and energy of ſtile, and a ſtrength of reaſoning; rarely to be met with in the writings of our preſent politicians. The queſtion, it muſt be allowed, is of a very delicate and intricate nature: happily, however, it is now rendered in a great meaſure uſeleſs, by the revival of an old and excellent inſtitution, the eſtabliſhment of a regular and well diſciplined militia, who having acquired the dexterity of profeſſed ſoldiers, and animated by every concurring motive of intereſt, ſentiment, and affection, will, under the guidance of Providence, be found capable, with the concurrence of our fleet, effectually to protect this kingdom from the danger of an invaſion. The oppoſers of a ſtanding army were at that time for forming ſuch a body of native forces; but this ſcheme would have defeated the purpoſe of the government, which was more afraid of domeſtic foes than foreign enemies, and induſtriouſly avoided every plan of this nature which could contribute to render the party of the people more formidable: but though the Engliſh at that time had no regular militia, they had conceived ſuch an intolerable jealouſy of a ſtanding army, that though the miniſtry uſed all their addreſs in perſuading the houſe to agree in part to the king's requeſt, the commons paſſed a vote, about a week after they met, "That all the forces raiſed ſince the year 1680 ſhould be diſbanded, and the forces be reduced to ten thouſand men †." Purſuant to this reſolution, they granted a ſupply for diſbanding the army, and ordered the ſum of two hundred and fifty thouſand pounds to be given as a gratuity to ſuch officers and ſoldiers as were or ſhould be diſbanded, in the following proportions, viz. to every foot-ſoldier and non-commiſſioned officer, fourteen days ſubſiſtence, and ſix days full pay to each private trooper and non-commiſſioned officer: proviſion was alſo made for half pay to commiſſion-officers, being Engliſhmen; and a bill was ordered to be brought in, that the diſbanded ſoldiers might exerciſe their reſpective trades in any town or corporation in the kingdom.

During the debates about a ſtanding army in parliament, the earl of Sunderland had been particularly active both within and without doors, in ſhewing the neceſſity of keeping up a conſtant military force, by which he had drawn upon himſelf a great load of odium; and the Tories, who had now got the popular ſide of the queſtion, reſolved to make a handle of this conduct to remove him from about court. They began by openly repreſenting him as a perſon to whom they aſcribed moſt of the arbitrary meaſures taken in the late reign, and ſuſpected of having counſelled the like in this, and particularly the keeping up a ſtanding army. The earl, apprehenſive of a further attack from this party, and fearing he ſhould be weakly ſupported by the Whigs, who were moſt of them jealous of his growing in favour with the king, reſolved to avoid the danger with which he thought himſelf threatened, by a timely retreat: accordingly, on the twenty-ſixth of December he reſigned the office of lord-chamberlain, not only againſt the intreaties of his friends, but even the king's earneſt deſire that he would continue about him.

To raiſe the ſums for diſbanding the army, paying their arrears, and making good all deficiencies, amongſt other aids, a tax of three ſhillings in the pound was laid upon land, which was to be aſſeſſed in every county, in proportion to the rates it was aſſeſſed at in the year 1692, when it brought in the moſt, there having been ſuch commiſſioners appointed that year as the crown was pleaſed to pitch upon, who, in the counties in the neighbourhood of London, taxed the people to the rack-rent, while the northern and weſtern counties were ſcarce rated half the value of their eſtates; and thus it has been ever ſince, and is likely to continue while the remote boroughs are too numerous for the reſt of the kingdom. An additional duty was laid upon coal, culm, and ſalt; a duty was impoſed upon all coals imported from Scotland, or from any part beyond ſea. The toll-tax was continued for one year longer; and the duties upon coffee, tea, chocolate, ſpices, pedlars and hawkers, for three years; the duties upon ſtamped paper, parchment, vellum, and thoſe upon imported alamodes and luſtrings, were doubled; the time was enlarged for purchaſing and granting annuities; and a bill paſſed for raiſing a ſum not exceeding two millions, upon a fund for payment of annuities, at the rate of eight per cent. redeemable by parliament.

His majeſty having expreſſed himſelf extremely diſpleaſed at the proceedings of the commons for diſbanding the army, they, in order to ſweeten the unpalatable cup, voted the ſum of ſeven hundred thouſand pounds per annum for the ſupport of the civil liſt, diſtinct from all other ſervices, to be paid his majeſty for life, which was to be raiſed out of the duties ariſing from tonnage and poundage, or on merchandize imported and exported, former parliaments having granted it him from time to time only for a ſhort term of years.

The king coming to the houſe on the fourteenth of January, 1698, gave the royal aſſent to an act for calling in the hammered ſilver money to be recoined; to an act to prevent correſponding with king James and his adherents; and to an act for continuing the impriſonment of one Counter and others, then confined in Newgate, on ſuſpicion of being accomplices in the Aſſaſſination Plot. The ſame day the commons voted three hundred and fifty thouſand pounds for maintaining guards and garriſons for the year 1698, and a ſupply of two millions ſeven hundred thouſand pounds for paying off and cancelling the exchequer-bills that had been iſſued. Then they took into conſideration the ſubſidies due to foreign powers in the Engliſh pay, and other ſums due to the contractors for bread and forage. Examining further the debts of the nation, they found the general debt of the navy amounted to one million three hundred ninety-two thouſand ſeven hundred and forty-two thouſand pounds; that of the ordnance to two hundred four thouſand one hundred and fifty-ſeven thouſand pounds. The tranſport debt contracted for the reduction of Ireland, did not fall ſhort of four hundred ſixty thouſand four hundred and ninety-three pounds; and they owed forty-nine thouſand nine hundred and twenty-nine pounds for quartering and cloathing the army which had been raiſed by an act of parliament in the year 1677, and diſbanded by another in the year 1679. In order to lighten this great burden, proviſion was made for granting the proprietors an intereſt for their money till their debts ſhould be paid.

But notwithſtanding this vaſt load of debts, it was found that the officers concerned in the revenue had increaſed them, by robbing the public various ways, particularly by falſe indorſements on Exchequer notes, whereby they gained ſeven pounds twelve ſhillings per cent. which was allowed indeed upon the ſecond iſſuing of Exchequer-bills, but not upon the firſt, till theſe honeſt gentlemen found means clandeſtinely to procure ſuch indorſements to defraud the people. Among thoſe plunderers of the nation were Mr. Charles Duncombe, receiver-general of the exciſe; Mr. John Knight, treaſurer of the cuſtoms; Bartholomew Burton, of the Exciſe-office; and Reginald Marriot, one of the deputy-tellers of the Exchequer; which laſt, to get his pardon, compounded to accuſe the reſt: whereupon Duncombe and Knight, who were members of the commons, were expelled the houſe, and committed to the Tower: Burton was ſent to Newgate. A bill was brought into the houſe of commons for fining Duncombe about half his eſtate, valued at four hundred thouſand pounds, and paſſed that houſe; but being ſent up to the lords, the votes happening to be equal, the duke of Leeds gave his caſting vote againſt the bill, which was accordingly laid aſide: the lords alſo ſet Duncombe at liberty; but the commons reſenting this, remanded him, and he remained in the Tower till the end of the ſeſſion. The bill againſt Knight and Burton had the ſame fate; whereupon the proſecution was dropped, and they all eſcaped with their ill-gotten wealth, it being generally ſuppoſed they made their peace with part of the ſpoils they had gained from the nation. There were many in the commons at this time who had conceived a diſlike againſt Mr. Charles Montagu, Chancellor of the Exchequer, on account of the affair of the re-coinage, and his having been a ſtrenuous advocate for a ſtanding army; and his majeſty having made him a grant in the name of one Railton, this was brought upon the carpet, and it was moved in the houſe that he ſhould withdraw; but that paſſing in the negative, it was reſolved by a great majority, "That it was the opinion of the houſe that the honourable Charles Montagu, chancellor of the Exchequer, doth deſerve his majeſty's favour *;" a vote that muſt render his name famous to all poſterity.

The commons now obſerving that the enemies of Chriſtianity were never more audacious than at this time, in ridiculing the myſteries of the chriſtian religion, both in their converſation and the blaſphemous pamphlets they publiſhed; and, in a word, that prophaneneſs and immorality daily gained ground amongſt us, preſented an addreſs to his majeſty, beſeeching him to give ſtrict orders to all his judges, juſtices, and magiſtrates, to put the laws in execution againſt blaſphemy, atheiſm, and other acts of immorality, and to diſcourage them in his officers and courtiers †." The king, who in his own conduct was particularly ſtrict and regular, was pleaſed with this addreſs, and readily promiſed to comply with their requeſt. Accordingly, he iſſued a proclamation "for preventing and puniſhing immorality and prophaneneſs, and for ſuppreſſing certain impious books."

In the midſt of the deluge of immorality which overſpread the nation at this time, Dr. Thomas Bray, an active divine, formed a plan "for propagating the goſpel in foreign parts." Miſſionaries, catechiſms, liturgies, and other books for the inſtruction of ignorant people, were ſent to the Engliſh colonies in America. This laudable deſign was ſupported by voluntary contribution; and a bill having been brought into the houſe of commons for the better diſcovery of eſtates given to ſuperſtitious uſes, Dr. Bray preſented a petition, praying that ſome part of theſe eſtates might be ſet apart for the propagation of the reformed religion in Maryland, Virginia, and the Leeward Iſlands.

At the ſame time king William encouraged the Society for the Reformation of Manners. Conſiderable collections were made for maintaining clergymen to read prayers in certain places of public worſhip, and adminiſter the ſacrament every Sunday. The members of this ſociety engaged to inform the magiſtrates of all the vice and immorality that ſhould fall under their cognizance; and with that part of the fines allowed by law to the informer, to conſtitute a fund of charity. This inſtitution had been firſt ſet on foot by Dr. Beveridge and Dr. Horneck, in the reign of James II. who fearing it might tend to prevent the growth of that religion which he unhappily profeſſed, induſtriouſly checked and diſcouraged it; ſo that it remained for a long time in a very weak and declining ſtate: but being now honoured and protected by the ſovereign, it ſoon acquired a more ſolid eſtabliſhment, and for ſome time exerciſed its influence with a very conſiderable effect.

The king coming to the houſe the ſeventh of March, gave the royal aſſent to ſeveral acts relating to the civil polity, when the commons addreſſed his majeſty, that he would be pleaſed to cauſe a liſt to be printed of the perſons names to whom licence had been granted, purſuant to the late act, againſt correſponding with king James or his adherents: to which his majeſty returned a gracious anſwer; and on the ſecond of April came again to the houſe, when, beſides private acts, he gave the royal aſſent to the two following public ones; 1. An act for granting his majeſty the ſum of one million four hundred eighty-four thouſand fifteen hundred pounds, for diſbanding the land forces, and paying off the ſeamen. 2. An act for ſupplying ſome defects in the laws made for the relief of the poor.

On the twenty-firſt of May a complaint was made to the commons of a printed book, entitled, The Caſe of Ireland being bound by Acts of Parliament in England ſtated; written by one Mr. Molyneux of Dublin, a gentleman of great parts and learning. In this book the author had endeavoured to prove that Ireland was independent of England, or the authority of its parliament. Such tenets as theſe were too dangerous to be paſſed over unnoticed: accordingly, a committee was appointed to enquire into the nature and tendency of this performance. Upon the report of the committee, it was unanimouſly reſolved, "That the book entitled, &c. was of dangerous conſequence, as tending to leſſen the dependence that Ireland has and ought to have upon England, as being united and annexed to the imperial crown of this realm; and that an act "for the better ſecuring of his majeſty's perſon and government," tranſmitted under the great ſeal of Ireland, by which an Engliſh act of parliament was pretended to be re-enacted, and alterations made therein obligatory on the courts of juſtice and great-ſeal of England, had given occaſion to the writing and publiſhing the dangerous aſſertions contained in the ſaid book." After which the commons in a body addreſſed the king, beſeeching him "to give effectual orders for preventing any ſuch encroachment for the future, as well as the pernicious conſequences of what was paſt, by puniſhing and diſcountenancing thoſe who had been guilty of ſuch pernicious attempts." This addreſs his majeſty received very graciouſly, and was pleaſed to aſſure the commons that he would comply with their requeſt. About the ſame time alſo the commons addreſſed the king on the ſubject of ſome complaints that had been made to the houſe, that the woollen manufacture was carried on in Ireland, to the great prejudice of that ſtaple commodity in England. To which addreſs his majeſty returned for anſwer, "That he ſhould do all that in him lay to promote the trade of England, and to diſcourage the woollen, and encourage the linen, manufacture in Ireland." Orders were accordingly tranſmitted to the lords juſtices, who recommended the matter to the Iriſh parliament; and the members promiſed to uſe their utmoſt endeavours to effect a reformation in this article; and from hence may be dated the great increaſe and improvement of the Iriſh linen manufacture, which has turned out ſo advantageous to that country.

In this ſeſſion the luſtring company obtained an act of parliament, wherein the preamble ſets forth, "That the ſaid company have, with great labour and charge, brought that manufacture to perfection; but that by the fraudulent importation of foreign alamodes and luſtrings, the company have not enjoyed the benefit intended them by the royal charter, but have waſted their time and ſtock in contending with many difficulties and obſtructions which they had met with: and it now appearing that the ſaid manufacture cannot be ſo well conducted and ſecured to England by any other means than by the eſtabliſhing of an excluſive company for the ſame; it was therefore now enacted, firſt, That the ſaid company be a perpetual corporation, with the uſual powers, &c. of a body-politic, as in their charter. Secondly, That they ſhall enjoy the ſole uſe, exerciſe, and benefit of making, dreſſing, and luſtrating of plain black alamodes, renforcez, and luſtrings, in England and Wales, for fourteen years to come *." All which however could not ſupport this monopoly when the faſhion changed, new fabrications driving out the former general wear of thoſe ſilks, ſo that the company had run out their ſtock, and was quite broke up, even before the expiration of their ſaid excluſive term, which therefore was not renewed.

We cannot paſs over two good ſtatutes for the benefit of inland commerce made in this ſame ſeſſion: the one is "for determining differences by arbitration, whereby merchants, traders, and others deſiring to end any controverſy (for which there is no other remedy but by perſonal action or ſuit in equity) by arbitration, may agree their ſubmiſſion of their ſuit to the award of any perſon or perſons, which ſhould be made a rule of any court of record: by which agreement, ſo made and inſerted in their ſubmiſſion, the parties ſhall be finally concluded by ſuch arbitration." The other is "for the better payment of bills of exchange;" by which it is enacted, "That all bills of exchange drawn in England for five pounds or upwards to any other place in England, and payable at a certain number of days, weeks, or months after date, ſhall from and after preſentation and acceptance (which acceptance ſhall be by the under-writing the ſame under the party's hand ſo accepting) and after the expiration of three days after the ſaid bill ſhall become due, the party to whom the ſaid bill is made payable, his ſervant, agent, or aſſigns, may and ſhall cauſe the ſaid bill to be proteſted by a notary-public, or any other ſubſtantial perſon of the city, town, or place, in the preſence of two or more creditable witneſſes (refuſal or neglect being firſt made of the payment) which proteſt ſhall be made and written under a fair written copy of the ſaid bill, ſignifying, "That I A. B. on the —— day of —— at the uſual place of abode of the ſaid C. D. have demanded payment of the bill, of which this is a copy, which the ſaid C. D. did not pay: wherefore I the ſaid A. B. do hereby proteſt the ſaid bill, dated at —— this day of ——:" which proteſt ſhall, within fourteen days after, be ſent, or otherwiſe due notice ſhall be given thereof to the party from whom the bill was received; and who, upon producing ſuch proteſt, ſhall repay the ſaid bill, together with intereſt and charges: and on default of ſuch proteſt (for which only C. D. ſhall be paid) on due notice, the perſon ſo failing ſhall be liable to all coſts, damages, and intereſt accruing thereby, provided that if any ſuch bill be loſt or miſcarried within the time limited for payment, the drawer ſhall be obliged to give another bill, the perſon to whom it is ſent giving ſecurity (if demanded) to the drawer, to indemnify him in caſe the loſt bill ſhall be found again."

Private and fallacious lotteries were at this time become ſo general, not only in London, but in moſt other great cities and towns in England, whereby the lower people, and the ſervants and children of good families were defrauded, that an act was paſſed for ſuppreſſing them; and a penalty of 500 l. was laid on the proprietors of ſuch lotteries, and of twenty pounds on every adventurer in them: notwithſtanding which, the like diſpoſition of fraud on the one part, and of gaming on the other, continued ſtill greatly to prevail.

The parliament likewiſe this ſeſſion applied themſelves with great diligence to diſcover and puniſh a ſet of offenders, who carried on a fraudulent and ſecret commerce with France, by which they had for divers years paſt ſurreptitiouſly brought in great quantities of French ſilks. The firſt occaſion of this diſcovery was a paſs from the admiral of France for an Engliſh ſhip, that ſerved at once for the owling and ſmuggling trades; which paſs, at the breaking out of the late conſpiracy, was intercepted at the Poſt-office, ſince which time it had lain unnoticed in the hands of the ſecretary of ſtate: but this paper coming by ſome accident to the ſight of Mr. Hilary Reneu, an eminent French proteſtant merchant, who was the chief manager and promoter of the luſtring company, he reported the matter to the houſe of commons, who having cauſed the perſons and books of theſe ſmugglers to be ſeized, a full diſcovery was made of their pernicious trade; upon which eight of them were very ſeverely fined, and ordered to be impriſoned in Newgate till ſuch time as they ſhould pay the money; and Mr. Reneu, as a reward for his part in the diſcovery, was gratified with a bill, which paſſed the two houſes and received the royal aſſent, for naturalizing him and his family without paying any charges for the ſame.

But the affair of the greateſt conſequence in the commercial way which came under the cognizance of the commons this ſeſſion, and with which we ſhall cloſe our account of parliamentary affairs, was the election of a new Eaſt India company.

The many complaints which had been made againſt the Engliſh Eaſt India company's proceedings, together with the great loſſes of ſhips and cargoes during the war with France, which had prevented its making any dividends for ſundry preceding years, had by this time occaſioned a general diſlike in the people againſt that company. This broke out more plainly during this ſeſſion, when the houſe of commons again took the ſtate of the company's trade into their ſerious conſideration, although it had three years before appeared to be ſo delicate an affair, that it had been by the parliament referred to the king and council, and by the latter ſent back to parliament again, who after all did nothing material in the main complaints relating to it. The company therefore now thought it prudent to make ſome propoſals that might engage the government in their intereſt: accordingly they offered to advance ſeven hundred thouſand pounds for the public ſervice at four per cent. intereſt, provided the excluſive trade to India might be legally ſettled on them.

The miniſtry ſeemed inclined to accept this offer, when a certain number of merchants, headed by ſir John Ward, ſir Francis Eyles, ſir Gilbert Heathcote, and Mr. Samuel Shephard, and countenanced by Mr. Montagu, chancellor of the Exchequer, propoſed to the houſe of commons to advance two millions at eight per cent. intereſt, provided they might have the ſaid ſole excluſive trade to India ſettled on them. They likewiſe propoſed that theſe ſubſcribers ſhould not be obliged to trade in a joint ſtock, but that if any number of members deſired to be incorporated, a charter ſhould be granted them for that purpoſe. This laſt named propoſal was deemed the moſt eligible; and accordingly a bill was brought into parliament in favour of the new adventurers, which quickly paſſed the commons; but when it was ſent up to the lords, the old company (for ſuch we muſt now begin to call them) followed it thither, where they were heard by their counſel, ſir Thomas Powis and ſir Bartholomew Shower, who pleaded their excluſive charters, which, amongſt other great privileges, ſtiled them lords proprietors of Bombay and St. Helena. They alleged, "That the company had actually acquired, at their own ſole expence, revenues at Fort St. George, Fort St. David, and Bombay, as well as in Perſia and elſewhere, to the amount of about forty-four thouſand pounds per annum, ariſing from cuſtoms and licences for a number of different matters ſet forth in the pleadings *: that they had alſo erected forts

* Such as ſelling of wines, for fiſhings, for farms of tobacco and betel, for quit-rents, for houſe-rents and garden-rents to the natives, paſſes for country ſhips, tonnage, anchorage, ſalvage, &c. alſo a large extent of lands in ſeveral places. This account of the various emoluments of that company in India is materially inſtructing, as it is not only nearly the ſame as the like emoluments of the preſent company in India, but is moreover explanatory of the nature of thoſe emoluments.

and ſettlements, and had procured territories in the iſland of Sumatra, and on the coaſt of Malabar, without which the pepper-trade muſt have been actually loſt to England: that they had alſo a ſtrong fort in the kingdom of Bengal, and alſo many factories, buildings, and ſettlements in divers other parts, having moreover purchaſed of the Indian princes, at high rates, many privileges and immunities; all which they were encouraged to do, out of a firm belief that their ſaid right and inheritance would on all occaſions be objects of the nation's care: that ſince this bill was brought in, the company agreed to ſubmit their preſent ſtock to a valuation of fifty per cent. viz. twenty per cent. for their dead ſtock (that is, their forts, factories, and lands) and thirty per cent. for their quick ſtock, which they were content even to warrant at that rate; and upon theſe terms the company likewiſe offered to raiſe ſubſcriptions for two millions."

To all this the counſel for the new ſubſcribers replied, "That the old company in reciting their charters had forgot to mention the proviſos therein, That the reſpective kings of England who granted them, reſerved a diſcretionary power to make them void on three years warning: that the king could not grant the trade, excluſive of all others, ſolely by his charter, as being directly contrary to poſitive laws; neither had his preſent majeſty in fact granted any ſuch excluſive right: that ſeveral recoveries had been made at law againſt the company for proſecuting ſuch pretended right: that his majeſty's meſſage to the commons in 1692 plainly ſignified that the concurrence of parliament was requiſite for making a complete and uſeful ſettlement of this trade [Here they expatiated on the indirect methods of bribery, &c. carried on by the company's managers to obtain their laſt new charter and regulations, as we have before related.] that it never was eſteemed a breach of public faith, nor a derogation from the great ſeal, or from the honour of our kings, to have their patents annulled by parliament, when it appeared that ſuch grants were either unprofitable, or contrary to the common rights of the ſubject; neither did any kings think themſelves bound in honour or conſcience to refuſe paſſing an act of parliament for the annulling of ſuch grants: that moreover kings having been often deceived in ſuch grants, they have even been frequently annulled by the ordinary courſe of law."

It was on the other hand again farther replied and urged, in behalf of the old company, "That the properties of many families, widows, and orphans, were greatly affected by the bill now depending, which they ſaid made no proviſion for a determined ſtock; inſomuch that it may hereafter happen that the trade may be loſt to the nation for want of a ſufficient capital to carry it on; it appearing by thirty years experience, that it requires at leaſt ſix hundred thouſand pounds per annum to carry on this trade in its full extent: that by this bill the new ſubſcribers are permitted to trade during the three years to Michaelmas 1701, as well as the company, which is directly contrary to the charter, and will create great confuſion, and render the ſaid three years allowed the old company of no benefit, becauſe they are ſtill bound to export to the value of one hundred thouſand pounds annually in our own manufactures, although the new ſubſcribers are under no ſuch obligation. The old company are likewiſe obliged to pay taxes to keep up forts, factories, &c. while the new ſubſcribers are to have an equal benefit of the trade, without either: that ſince the laſt ſubſcription in the year 1693, the company have loſt either by accidents, or by the calamities of war, twelve great ſhips, which with their cargoes would have ſold for near a million and an half ſterling; and yet, notwithſtanding ſuch loſſes, they have paid in cuſtoms ſince that period two hundred and ninety-five thouſand pounds, beſides eighty-five thouſand in taxes: that moreover they had ſupplied his majeſty in Holland, on a preſſing occaſion, with ſix thouſand barrels of gun-powder; and had likewiſe, at a time of great extremity, ſubſcribed eighty thouſand pounds for circulating Exchequer-bills, at the inſtance of the treaſury; and that, in fine, many hundred families have their whole fortunes depending in the ſtock of the preſent company, who muſt be utterly ruined if this bill take effect."

The foregoing pleadings contain ſo many articles relating to the hiſtory and conduct of the old Eaſt India company, and to the nature and legality of excluſive charters not ſupported by parliamentary authority, that I could not paſs them over unnoticed. I ſhall now only ſubjoin what was on this occaſion farther alleged againſt the old company, viz. "That the new ſubſcribers to that company's ſtock in 1693 were deluded into it by a charter then obtained by indirect means, as by the hopes of an act of parliament to confirm it, by the old proprietors having valued their ſtock at ſeven hundred and fifty thouſand pounds, whereby they ſhared three hundred and ſeventy-five thouſand pounds of the new ſubſcribers money amongſt themſelves; and as they had warning ſufficient, by the tranſactions before the king and council, nobody was anſwerable for their loſs but themſelves."

Theſe and ſuch like reaſons weighing with the lords, and ſome of the leaders of the old company being ſuſpected of diſaffection to the ſtate, or perhaps principally becauſe the new ſubſcribers were the favourites of the miniſtry, the lords concurred with the commons in paſſing the bill, which afterwards received the royal aſſent; the ſubſtance whereof, as far as relates to this ſubject, is as follows:

"That every ſubſcriber ſhould have liberty to trade annually, to the amount of his reſpective ſubſcription, or might transfer ſuch liberty to any other perſon: that his majeſty ſhould be empowered to incorporate ſuch of the ſubſcribers as were deſirous of trading in a body: that the powers and privileges of the Eaſt India company ſhould be ſettled by parliament: that the ſubſcribers ſhould enjoy the eight pounds per cent. and the excluſive right of trading to the Eaſt Indies for the term of ten years, or till ſuch time as it ſhould be redeemed by parliament: that every perſon ſubſcribing to the amount of five hundred pounds ſhould have a vote; and that no perſon, let his ſubſcription be ever ſo large, ſhould have more than one: that all ſhips laden in the Eaſt Indies ſhould be obliged to unload in England: that no perſon who ſhould be a member of any corporation trading to the Eaſt Indies ſhould engage in any other trade to that part of the world than what he carried on in the joint ſtock of ſuch corporation: that five pounds ad valorem, upon all returns from the Eaſt Indies, ſhould be paid by the importer, to be placed to the account of the ſubſcribers towards defraying the expence of ſending ambaſſadors, and other extraordinary ſervices; and that beſides the duties now payable, a new impoſition of one ſhilling and tenpence, to be likewiſe paid by the importer, ſhould be laid upon all wrought ſilks imported from India and Perſia."

This law then having impowered the king to incorporate all the ſubſcribers into one excluſive community, named the General Society trading to the Eaſt Indies, their charter was dated on the third of September following; and two days after his majeſty incorporated them as one joint-ſtock excluſive company, and their ſucceſſors, by the name of the Engliſh Company trading to the Eaſt Indies. In this charter was the following remarkable clauſe (which proved the means of afterwards uniting the old and this new Eaſt India company) viz. "That all corporations and perſons who ſhall derive any right or title from any of the ſaid ſubſcribers or their ſucceſſors, ſhall be eſteemed members of this new company, and ſhall be received and admitted as ſuch gratis."

Beſides the Eaſt India trade, the commons took into conſideration that of the African company. It ſeems that the ſeparate traders to the coaſt of Guinea, and other parts of the weſt coaſt of Africa, called interlopers, having a ſuperior advantage over that company, by being at no part of the expence of forts, governors, factors, and other ſervants, had by this time ſo far wormed that company out of the negroe-trade, that they were rendered unable any longer to ſupport the ſaid forts, &c. without the aid of the legiſlature. An act of parliament was therefore paſſed in their behalf, ſetting forth, "That as thoſe forts and caſtles, which are undoubtedly neceſſary for the protection of that trade, have hitherto been maintained at the ſole expence of this company, it is moſt reaſonable that all who trade to that coaſt ſhould contribute towards the ſupport of them: wherefore it was enacted, 1ſt, That for the better enabling the company to ſupport and maintain the ſaid forts and factories, all the king's ſubjects, as well of England as of America, trading to the coaſt of Africa from or between Cape Mount and the Cape of Good Hope, as well as the ſaid company, ſhall pay ten per cent. ad valorem for all the goods and merchandize which they ſhall export to that coaſt, either from England or from America. 2dly, They ſhall pay a like ten per cent. outward, and alſo ten per cent homeward, on all goods ſhipped from or to England or America, and from any part of that coaſt between Cape Blancho and Cape Mount (but red-wood ſhould only pay five per cent.) negroes excepted. 3dly, Gold and ſilver brought from any part of that coaſt ſhould pay no duty at all, but may be freely landed without any entry. 4thly, Separate traders (now no longer to be called interlopers) to enjoy equal protection and aſſiſtance at thoſe forts with the company's own ſhips and people; and they might even (at their own coſt) ſettle factories, and do all other matters there which the company might do."

On the third day of July the king came to the houſe of peers, and cloſed this long and very buſy ſeſſion with a ſpeech; in which he ſaid, "That he entertained the moſt grateful ſenſe of the many marks of zeal and affection which they had ſhown to his perſon and government, particularly in gratifying him with a fixed and ſettled revenue, and enabling him to diſcharge the debts of the crown: that he gladly embraced the preſent opportunity to congratulate them upon the happy ſucceſs of their endeavours for remedying the bad ſtate of the coin, and reſtoring the public credit: that as he had always conſidered the love of his people as his greateſt ſecurity and ſafe-guard, ſo would he ever place his chief glory in promoting their happineſs and welfare; and that he hoped they would be particularly careful, in their reſpective counties, to execute the laws againſt vice and immorality, and effectually to diſcourage irreligion and profaneneſs." The parliament was then prorogued; and as it had now ſat the full period of three years, the term to which, by an act lately paſſed, all future parliaments were limited, it was ſoon after diſſolved.

During this ſeſſion happened ſeveral material occurrences which have been omitted, in order to give the proceedings of the parliament entire.

About the beginning of January this year arrived here the czar or emperor of Ruſſia, Peter Alexowitz, ſince commonly diſtinguiſhed by the name of Peter the Great. This prince having formed a deſign of civilizing his barbarous ſubjects, of introducing arts and ſciences amongſt them, and of rendering the forces of his empire by ſea and land equal to thoſe of his politer neighbours, travelled incognito through moſt countries in Europe for his inſtruction. He was particularly deſirous of eſtabliſhing a marine, and having a fleet in the Baltic Sea: his principal aim therefore was to learn the art of ſhip-building. In the ſummer of the preceding year, 1697, he appointed an embaſſy for Holland, to regulate ſome points of commerce with the States-general, and accompanied his ambaſſadors in diſguiſe as one of their retinue. While he was on this tour he diſcovered himſelf to king William, with whom he had a private interview at Utrecht, and in conſequence of whoſe invitation he now viſited England. He ſtaid here above three months, being lodged and entertained with all the magnificence that could agree with a prince who choſe to remain incognito. He paſſed his time here as he had done in Holland, in viſiting all our dock-yards, and improving himſelf in the knowlege of ſhip-building; to attain which he ſcrupled not to work ſome hours every day as a common ſhip-carpenter, in the various parts of that buſineſs. At his departure king William made him ſeveral magnificent preſents; and among the reſt the veſſel in which he himſelf uſed to go over to Holland, called the Royal Tranſport, a beautiful yacht, and nobly adorned. At the ſame time, in order to cultivate his friendſhip, he was allowed to engage ſeveral Engliſh artificers into his ſervice. He alſo took two of the ſcholars from Chriſt-Church hoſpital (commonly called Blue-coat Boys) and theſe, ſays M. de Voltaire, laid the foundation of the marine academy of Peterſburgh, afterwards founded by the czar. There alſo went with him three captains of ſhips of war, and twenty-five captains of merchant-ſhips, forty lieutenants, thirty pilots, as many ſurgeons, two hundred and fifty gunners, and upwards of three hundred different artificers. This little colony of perſons ſkilful in all branches, ſailed from Holland to Archangel in Ruſſia, and thence were diſtributed into all the different places where their ſervices were neceſſary. We muſt not forget that he found in England ſome mathematicians, which he in vain ſought for amongſt the Dutch. Ferguſon, a Scotchman, an excellent geometrician, entered into his ſervice, and was the firſt perſon who brought arithmetic into uſe in the public offices in Ruſſia, where before that time they made uſe only of the Tartarian method of reckoning with balls ſtrung upon a wire. Captain Perry, an expert engineer, was likewiſe retained by him; and although that gentleman was diſcontented at not being rewarded in a manner he thought due to his ſervices, yet he acknowleges that Peter had an amazing genius, and was indefatigable in his application: he tells us that he ſoon made himſelf a proficient in aſtronomy; and as to the practical part of ſhip-building, he ſays, that from the caſting of cannon to the ſpinning of ropes, there was not any one branch of trade belonging to the conſtruction or fitting out of a ſhip that he did not minutely obſerve, and even put his hand to, whenever he came into the places where theſe trades were carried on *.

In fine, though that prince is eſteemed by ſome a ſavage tyrant, yet if all allowances are made for his education, and the arbitrary conſtruction of his government, he will be looked upon with veneration by poſterity, having in a manner diſpelled the darkneſs that covered that vaſt tract of land under his dominion, and given his ſubjects a taſte at leaſt of the improvements that had been made by the reſt of mankind. Not content with encouraging the mechanic arts only, he promoted the increaſe of other knowlege amongſt his people, by laying the foundations of ſchools, colleges, and academies, and by building and furniſhing of public libraries: in ſhort, in the compaſs of a few years he brought the rude and uncivilized Ruſſians to make a total alteration in their very habits and way of life; and, perhaps, without the arbitrary dominion he exerciſed, and the rough meaſures he took to bind and force a people who had the greateſt averſion to every thing that was polite, he could never have effected that mighty change in the ſhort time of his own ſingle life; and if he had not, they would have returned to their original barbariſm: but we ſee them, on the contrary, improving every day. Peter, after leaving England, propoſed to make the tour of the other polite courts of Europe; but receiving advice from his dominions that his ſiſter was ſtirring up intrigues againſt his government, he returned ſuddenly to Moſcow (the then capital of his empire) and with great ſeverity, though (we repeat it) perhaps not greater than the nature of his government made neceſſary, put a conſiderable number of the conſpirators to the moſt cruel deaths. But to return from this digreſſion, which I thought owing to the memory of ſo extraordinary a man as czar Peter.

On the third of February died Erneſt-Auguſtus, duke elector of Hanover, and biſhop of Oſnabrug, at Herenhauſen, He was born November 10, 1629, being the third ſon of George duke of Luxemburg and Anne-Leonora, daughter of the landgrave Lewis of Heſſe d'Armſtadt. He was married in 1659 to the princeſs palatine Sophia, daughter to James I. of England, by whom he had ſeveral children. He was ſucceeded by his ſon George-Lewis, afterwards king of Great Britain. The houſe of Hanover began now to be held in much conſideration, as it appeared to be next in ſucceſſion to the Engliſh throne after the preſent royal family, according to the act paſſed in the beginning of this reign, whereby no Roman catholic could inherit the crown of England.

In the beginning of this year the earl of Portland ſet out on his embaſſy to France, and made his public entry on the twenty-ſeventh of February with ſuch extraordinary ſplendor as had never been ſeen in that court ſince the duke of Buckingham's embaſſy, when he came to demand the princeſs Henrietta of France for Charles I. It is agreed on all hands that few ambaſſadors ever behaved with greater prudence, honour, and magnificence, than lord Portland, or was ever ſo much careſſed and reſpected, not only by the king, but all the princes of France. Some time after his public audience he went to Verſailles, where he was lodged in the hotel de Bouillon. Here he had a long converſation with Lewis XIV. in which it has been thought that the project for a partition of the Spaniſh monarchy was opened by the French king.

After the concluſion of the late treaty of peace, wherein his concerns were wholly overlooked, king James ſeemed to be abſolutely abandoned, and paſſed his time very indifferently at St. Germains. We are told that the earl of Portland being at a review of the houſhold troops in the Plain of Arches, where the king and the princes of the blood were preſent, king James alſo came thither, and with him his ſon the titular prince of Wales. This laſt, by his father's direction, endeavoured to join converſation with lord Woodſtock, Portland's ſon, who was ordered by his father to avoid him, as the earl himſelf did all thoſe belonging to the court of St. Germains. At the ſame review James himſelf did all he could to engage the lord Cavendiſh, and the other Engliſh noblemen there preſent, to take notice of him, but in vain. This apparent ſlight could not but be a ſenſible mortification to James, who felt it ſtill farther increaſed, by hearing that lord Portland inſiſted upon his being removed from the French king's preſence, which however Lewis would by no means conſent to, nor to grant any indulgence to the French proteſtants, now under a freſh perſecution; and in whoſe behalf the Engliſh ambaſſador, at the expreſs order of his court, warmly interceded: in ſhort, it was obſerved that no ambaſſador was ever more honoured or leſs ſucceſsful than the earl of Portland, who after a ſtay of four months returned home, without having effected one ſingle point of his embaſſy, which coſt the king near an hundred thouſand pounds. Lord Portland had the additional mortification to find, that during his abſence Mr. Keppel, now created earl of Albemarle, had entirely ſupplanted him in the king's favour, whereupon he reſigned his employment in diſguſt; nor could the king ever after prevail on him to reſume any office in the houſhold. His majeſty however ſtill retained a great eſteem for lord Portland, and employed him in the management of moſt foreign affairs, for which he was very capable. On the other hand, it is acknowleged that nobleman carried it ſo well towards the Engliſh, that many of the principal nobility held him in great eſteem, even after king William's death.

This winter proved fatal to that ancient and commodious palace of Whitehall, which was burnt down by accident on the fourth of January in the evening, nothing of it remaining next morning but the Banquetting-houſe.

The lord viſcount Villiers, lately made earl of Jerſey, being appointed ambaſſador to the court of France, in the room of the earl of Portland, on the fourteenth of April, marſhal Tallard, the French ambaſſador, ſoon after arrived here, and made his public entry into London on the ſixteenth of May. On the eighteenth of June the earl of Marlborough was declared governor to the duke of Glouceſter, and Dr Burnet, biſhop of Saliſbury, preceptor to his highneſs, who was then entering into the tenth year of his age.

By this time a ferment had been raiſed in Scotland, by the oppoſition and diſcouragements their new Eaſt India company had ſuſtained. In purſuance of the act of their own parliament for the ſetting up this company, they had begun to take in ſubſcriptions; but as it was not eaſy to find money enough in Scotland for the carrying on ſo expenſive a deſign, the company's agents endeavoured to procure ſubſcriptions abroad, particularly at London, Amſterdam, and Hamburgh, in which they certainly acted under the ſanction both of the royal and legiſlative authority: but as the carrying this ſcheme into execution gave great umbrage both to the Dutch and Engliſh Eaſt India companies, they took, as was very natural for them to do, the beſt meaſures they could to hinder the ſucceſs of ſuch applications. This however had ſome untoward conſequences, ſince theſe companies could effect nothing but by the interpoſition of their reſpective governments; and by this means king William's name, as king of England and ſtadtholder of Holland, was made uſe of to thwart thoſe deſigns, which actually had his ſanction as king of Scotland; and in the ſummer of the preceding year, while his majeſty was in Holland, a ſharp memorial, ſubſcribed by Mr. Creſſet the Engliſh envoy, and ſir Paul Rycaut, our reſident in the city of Hamburgh, was preſented to that city againſt their engaging to furniſh the Scots with the ſubſcriptions they had applied for: to which the Hamburghers returned for anſwer, "That they thought it very ſtrange that the king of Great Britain ſhould offer to hinder them, who were a free people, to trade with whom they pleaſed; but were ſtill more amazed that he ſhould endeavour to prevent their joining with the Scots, who were his own ſubjects, and to whom he had given ſuch large privileges by ſo ſolemn an act of parliament." This, as may eaſily be ſuppoſed, embarraſſed king William prodigiouſly, and forced him to act in a manner little ſuitable to the dignity of his character: for the Scottiſh company having obtained a copy of the above memorial, preſented a long addreſs to the king upon it, who returned for anſwer, "That he would give orders to his envoy at the court of Lunenburgh, and his reſident at Hamburgh, not to make uſe of his majeſty's name or authority for obſtructing their company in the proſecution of their trade with the inhabitants of that city." This anſwer however ſerved only to palliate things for that time, and inſtead of healing the breach, widened it.

For a parliament being aſſembled in Scotland the nineteenth of July this year by the earl of Marchmont, as king's commiſſioner, the company preſented a remonſtrance, containing a detail of their grievances. The parliament having taken their caſe into conſideration, reſolved to ſupport them in their juſt rights, and reſented the oppoſition made to their trade in ſo high a degree, as to vote, "That the honour and independency of the nation, as well as the credit and authority of parliament, was ſtruck at through their ſides." They even came to ſome threatening reſolutions; whereupon the high commiſſioner adjourned them from time to time, which rendered the nation ſtill more incenſed. Nevertheleſs they proceeded under all theſe diſcouragements, and would have maintained it perhaps, if king William had not prohibited the iſland of Jamaica, and all other Engliſh ſettlements in America, to have any intercourſe or correſpondence with the Scots at Darien, or to furniſh them with proviſions of any kind: but I ſhall have occaſion to treat further of this matter the following year *. We are to enter now into the conſideration of an important concern, and ſuch as has had ſince no ſmall influence on the general affairs of Europe; I mean the negotiation of the firſt treaty of partition.

Count Tallard, afterwards famous for his defeat at Blenheim, and impriſonment in England, was the projector of this famous treaty, which laid the foundation of his future fortunes. After the peace of Ryſwick, the thoughts of Lewis XIV. were all turned upon ſecuring the ſucceſſion of the Spaniſh monarchy on the death of Charles II. which was daily expected; as thoſe of king William were employed to prevent any ſuch ſucceſſion from taking place. William had no forces; but Lewis kept up the ſame number as in time of war, that he might ſeize what he claimed upon the firſt occaſion. It was no wonder therefore that the Britiſh monarch was prevailed upon to liſten to a propoſal for dividing thoſe dominions. His majeſty having declared in council, on the ſixteenth of July, that he intended to go over to Holland, and appointed lords juſtices to govern in his abſence, embarked at Margate the twentieth of the ſame month, and arrived at the Hague two days after. Count Tallard, the French ambaſſador, had orders from his court to attend the king abroad, as if the French were jealous that William was about carrying on ſome negotiations contrary to their intereſt: but this, as it afterwards appeared, was only a blind; for after his majeſty arrived in Holland, the earl of Portland by his orders wrote a letter to Mr. ſecretary Vernon, to be by him communicated to the lord Somers; wherein it was mentioned, "That count Tallard having declared to his majeſty that an accommodation might be found out in relation to the Spaniſh ſucceſſion, his majeſty had thereupon ſounded the king of France concerning the terms on which ſuch an agreement might be brought about, and that the conditions imparted to him were to the following effect: that the electoral prince of Bavaria ſhould have the kingdom of Spain, the Indies, and Low Countries, and all that depended on the Spaniſh dominions, except Naples and Sicily, Sardinia, the province of Guipuſcoa on this ſide the Pyrennees, Fontarabia, and St. Sebaſtian, Ferrol, and the places in Tuſcany, of which Spain ſtood then poſſeſſed, in conſideration of which France was abſolutely to renounce the right it pretended to the ſucceſſion, and Milan was to be given to the archduke Charles, ſecond ſon to the emperor.

His majeſty at the ſame time wrote a letter to lord Somers, ſigned with his own hand, deſiring his advice with regard to the propoſitions touching the Spaniſh ſucceſſion, and commanding his lordſhip to ſend over full powers under the great ſeal of England with blanks for the names of commiſſioners to be filled up occaſionally, that he might immediately begin the treaty with count Tallard. At the ſame time his majeſty was pleaſed to order that none but his lordſhip and Mr. ſecretary Vernon, and thoſe to whom my lord Somers and the ſecretary ſhould think proper to communicate the ſame, were to have any knowlege of the matter. Lord Somers immediately returned the earl of Portland's letter to Mr. Vernon, and deſired him to communicate the contents of it to the earl of Oxford and Mr. Charles Montagu, two of the then lords juſtices, and alſo to ſuch others as they and Mr. Vernon ſhould think fit, who, in regard to the king's command to have the affair kept ſecret, imparted it to the duke of Shrewſbury only. Some time after Mr. Montagu and Mr. Vernon went down to Tunbridge, where lord Somers then reſided for his health, to confer with his lordſhip concerning this important matter; and the chancellor wrote an anſwer to the king, as the iſſue of their joint deliberation: by which it appeared that his lordſhip was far from approving of the partition-treaty, though he was afterwards impeached in parliament for having adviſed it: but before this letter, which was dated the twenty-eighth of Auguſt, reached Holland, the firſt treaty of partition was ſigned by the earl of Portland and ſir Joſeph Williamſon. By this treaty it was agreed,

I. That the peace of Ryſwick ſhould be confirmed.

II. That in conſideration of the ill ſtate of the king of Spain's health, and for preſerving the public peace, in caſe the ſaid prince ſhould die without iſſue, the kingdom of Naples and Sicily, with the places then depending upon the Spaniſh monarchy, ſituated on the coaſt of Tuſcany or the adjacent iſlands, comprehended under the name of Santo Stephano, Porto Hercole, Orbitello, Telamone, Portolongo, Piombino, the marquiſate of Final, the province of Guipuſcoa, particularly the towns of Fontarabia and Sebaſtian, and eſpecially the Port Paſſage; and likewiſe all places on the French ſide of the Pyrennees, or the other mountains of Navarre, Alava, or Biſcay, on the other ſide of the province of Guipuſcoa, with all the ſhips and gallies, and other appurtenances belonging to the gallies, ſhould be given to the dauphin, in conſideration of his right.

III. That the crown of Spain, and the other kingdoms and places both within and without Europe, ſhould deſcend to the electoral prince of Bavaria, of whom his father the elector was to be a guardian and adminiſtrator till he came of age.

IV. That the duchy of Milan ſhould be reſtored and allotted to the archduke Charles, the emperor's ſecond ſon.

This treaty was to be communicated to the emperor and the elector of Bavaria by the king of England and the States-general; and if either ſhould refuſe to agree to this partition, his proportion ſhould remain in ſequeſtration till the diſpute ſhould be accommodated; and in caſe the electoral prince of Bavaria ſhould die before his father, then the elector was to ſucceed him in thoſe dominions, and his heirs after him; and if the archduke ſhould reject the duchy of Milan, it ſhould be ſequeſtered and governed by the prince of Vaudemont, and after his death by his ſon prince Charles *.

The deſtiny of a part of Europe, and the one half of America, thus ſettled, Lewis promiſed by this treaty of partition to renounce the entire ſucceſſion to the Spaniſh dominions: the dauphin ſigned the ſame promiſe. France thought to make an addition to her territories. England and Holland had in view to inſure the peace of Europe, by preventing the great Spaniſh monarchy from devolving to the Bourbon family: but all theſe politics were vain. The dying king being informed in what manner his dominions had been torn in pieces during his life-time, was filled with indignation. It was generally expected that upon hearing this news he would declare either the emperor or one of his ſons his ſucceſſor, as a reward for the former not having intermeddled in this ſhameful partition, and that he would make ſuch a will as the houſe of Auſtria ſhould dictate to him. He did indeed make a will, but it was in favour of the electoral prince of Bavaria, whom he deſtined ſole heir to his dominions. The Spaniſh nation, who dreaded nothing ſo much as the diſmembering its monarchy, applauded the diſpoſition its king had made, which ſeemed calculated to ſecure a peace. This hope however proved as vain as the treaty of partition, the prince of Bavaria, who was but an infant, dying at Bruſſels in the beginning of the following year.

The partition-treaty did not ſo entirely ingroſs the attention of William as to make him unmindful of the intereſts of the reſt of Europe; and he exerted his utmoſt endeavours to terminate the war of Hungary, which had raged between the emperor and other powers and the Turks for fifteen years without intermiſſion. About the middle of Auguſt lord Paget and Mr. Colliers, ambaſſadors from England and Holland, arrived in the Turkiſh camp near Belgrade; and a congreſs being opened under their mediation, the peace of Carlowitz was ſigned, in which the Turks ſubmitted to the laws impoſed by the conquerors. The emperor had Tranſilvania; the Venetians had the Morea; the Muſcovites, Aſoph; and the Poles, Caminieck.

All

All Chriſtendom was now happy and tranquil; the ſound of war was no longer heard either in Aſia or Africa; and the whole world was at peace during the two laſt years of the ſeventeenth century: a bleſſing, alas! of too ſhort a duration; for the public calamities were ſoon awakened again. The peace of the North was diſturbed in the year 1700 by two men, the moſt extraordinary the world ever produced, Peter emperor of Ruſſia, and Charles XII. king of Sweden; and that of the South by the death of the king of Spain: but of theſe events in their place.

During his majeſty's abſence the elections for the new parliament were carried on in England with all the appearance of freedom, the miniſtry giving themſelves very little trouble to influence the votes. Nevertheleſs, the returns were generally in favour of perſons of Revolution-principles; but even this parliament, which the court thought they ſhould find ſo much to their ſatisfaction, did not come entirely into their meaſures, as by their proceedings will appear. The parliament ſtanding prorogued to the twenty-ninth day of November, a proclamation had been iſſued by the lords juſtices for its meeting on that day: but his majeſty having been detained by contrary winds and tempeſtuous weather much longer than was expected, did not arrive in England till the third of December, and the parliament met on the ninth, when, going to the houſe, he opened the ſeſſion with a ſpeech, in which he recommended to them the keeping up ſuch a force as might preſerve that weight and influence they had at preſent on affairs abroad, and their making a further progreſs in diſcharging the debt the nation had contracted by the war; and concluded with recommending the three popular articles, the making proviſion for the poor, the advancement of trade, and the diſcouraging vice and prophaneneſs: but it is obſervable he made not the leaſt mention to the two houſes of the partition-treaty he had ſo lately concluded abroad, and which made ſo much noiſe afterwards. This was induſtriouſly concealed both from the privy-council and the parliament.

King William, in all probability, ſuſpected the French king's ſincerity in accepting ſo ſmall a ſhare of the Spaniſh monarchy for the dauphin, and therefore held it extremely proper to keep a body of troops in readineſs, to compel the execution of the late treaty, in caſe of the king of Spain's death: but it ſeems the parliament, not being acquainted with this negotiation, did not apprehend there was any manner of reaſon to have ſo great an army on foot in time of peace: beſides, the king had greatly offended them by a ſtep he took juſt before his going over to Holland. He had left ſealed orders with his miniſtry, directing that ſixteen thouſand men ſhould be retained in the ſervice, notwithſtanding the vote of the commons, by which the ſtanding army was limited to ten thouſand. The new parliament was ſo irritated at this arbitrary act of the king's, that they reſolved to thwart him in all his demands. Accordingly, without ſtaying ſo much as to take his ſpeech into conſideration, they came to the following reſolution: "That all the land-forces in Engliſh pay, exceeding ſeven thouſand men (and all thoſe conſiſting of his majeſty's natural born ſubjects) be forthwith paid off and diſbanded; and that all the forces in Ireland, exceeding twelve thouſand men (and thoſe his majeſty's natural born ſubjects, to be kept and maintained in the ſaid kingdom of Ireland) be likewiſe forthwith diſbanded and paid off." They then ordered a bill to be brought in upon this reſolution, which was eagerly purſued and carried through both houſes; and by it the French proteſtant regiments, and even the king's favourite Dutch guards, were to be removed out of the Britiſh dominions*.

No words can paint the indignation of William at this conduct in his parliament; he was ſo ſenſibly affected with this inſtance of his ſubjects jealouſy of him, that he actually formed a reſolution of abandoning the government, and had even compoſed a ſpeech, which he intended to have made on the occaſion; he was, however, diverted from this raſh ſcheme, and was at laſt perſuaded, how much ſoever it might go againſt the grain, to give his aſſent to the bill for reducing the army: accordingly, on the firſt day of February, 1699, he came to the houſe of peers, and, inſtead of the before-mentioned ſpeech, he delivered himſelf in the following terms: "I am come to paſs the bill for diſbanding the forces, as ſoon as I knew that it was ready for my aſſent. Though the reduction of the army to ſuch an inconſiderable number may, in our preſent circumſtances, be attended with the moſt fatal conſequences; and though I might juſtly complain of the harſh treatment I have received, in being deprived of thoſe guards who accompanied me into this kingdom, and have conſtantly attended me in all my fortunes; yet, as I am convinced that nothing can be more prejudicial to our common intereſt, than to ſuffer any jealouſy or miſunderſtanding to ariſe between me and my people, I am firmly determined to comply with your requeſt.

"Nevertheleſs, after having thus aſſigned my reaſons for paſſing this bill, I muſt likewiſe, in diſcharge of the truſt you have repoſed in me, declare, that, in my opinion, the nation is left too naked and defenceleſs: it is your duty, therefore, to take this matter into your conſideration, and immediately to provide ſuch a ſtrength as may be deemed neceſſary for the ſafety of the kingdom, and the preſervation of that peace which we have ſo lately obtained."

The commons, thinking they had now ſufficiently humbled the king, judged proper to give him ſome inſtance of duty and affection on their ſide; and on the fourth of February preſented an addreſs of thanks, teſtifying "how ſenſible they were of the difficulties and labours he had undergone and ſuſtained, and the hazards he had run in reſcuing their religion and liberties, and giving peace to Chriſtendom: they thanked him for his good-will and affection to his people, and the undeniable

* Proceedings of the Houſe of Commons, iii. 92. During the debates in the houſe of commons on this bill, lord Cutts ſpeaking very contemptuouſly of the militia (which body ſome urged were, or at leaſt might be made, a ſufficient guard for the kingdom alone) among other things ſaid, that he would undertake with ten thouſand regular troops to drive all the militia in the kingdom before him. To which another member replied, If ten thouſand regular troops would be too hard for all our militia, ten thouſand would be ſufficient to enſlave us; and for that very reaſon he would give his vote but for ſeven thouſand; in which both houſes concurred. See Parliamentary Debates, vol. iii.

proof he had given of his readineſs to comply with their deſires in parliament; aſſuring him that he ſhould never have reaſon to think the commons undutiful or unkind to him, but that they would always ſupport his perſon and government." The lords alſo concurred in a like addreſs, promiſing to aſſiſt and defend his majeſty with their lives and fortunes againſt all his enemies, both at home and abroad. To both which addreſſes the king returned this anſwer: "that he took their addreſs very kindly; that he was fully ſenſible of their duty and affection, and did not doubt but they would always act in the manner they had expreſſed on the occaſion."

Hereupon his majeſty gave orders for diſbanding the army in England, and reducing them to ſeven thouſand men, which were to be kept on foot under the name of guards and garriſons: however, not being able to bear with the thought of parting with his Dutch guards, who had conſtantly accompanied him in all his military enterprizes, he tried once more to mollify the hearts of the commons, and, on the eighteenth of March, ſent the lord Ranelagh with the following meſſage to the houſe, all written with his own hand:

"W. R.

"His majeſty is pleaſed to let the houſe know, that the neceſſary preparations are made for tranſporting the guards who came with him into England, and that he intends to ſend them away immediately; unleſs, out of conſideration to him, the houſe be diſpoſed to find a way to continue them longer in his ſervice, which his majeſty would take very kindly."

The commons, however, were altogether inflexible; the king was fain to acquieſce, and the Dutch guards were tranſported to Holland. It muſt be confeſſed, that on this occaſion the houſe of commons ſeems to have been guided by a prejudice againſt the perſon of the king and the foreigners in his ſervice; and ſuch an oppoſition in an affair of very little conſequence (that of retaining the Dutch guards only I mean), ſavoured more of clowniſh obſtinacy than of patriotiſm: the fact ſeems to be, that there were numbers who had been inſtrumental in bringing about the Revolution from the hopes of deriving great perſonal advantages therefrom, either by being admitted to a ſhare in the miniſtry, or having their avarice gratified by lucrative poſts; but finding themſelves not rewarded equal to their ſanguine expectations, they had commenced ſecret enemies to the king and his government. William eaſily diſcovered the true motives of their conduct, and took no pains to diſguiſe his ſentiments: "Had I as many places to beſtow (ſaid he one day to lord Sunderland) as there are members in the houſe of commons, I ſhould not know what it was to have my will diſputed."

Harmony being thus reſtored, at leaſt to outward appearance, between the king and his parliament, the latter proceeded to paſs many good acts; they voted fifteen thouſand men, and a proportionable number of ſhips of war, for the ſecurity of the kingdom; and granted one million four hundred and eighty-four thouſand and fifty-five pounds for the ſervice of the year, to be raiſed by a tax of three ſhillings in the pound upon lands, perſonal eſtates, penſions and offices: and as ſome violent Whigs began to charge the parliament with being Jacobitically inclined, becauſe they would not conſent to the keeping up a greater ſtanding army, the commons, to confute this calumny, addreſſed his majeſty to iſſue his proclamation for removing all papiſts, and others who diſowned his majeſty's government, from the cities of London and Weſtminſter, and to put the laws in execution againſt them.

A fleet was ſent, the latter end of laſt year, under the command of vice-admiral Aylmer, into the Mediterranean, with orders to ſecure the galleons, in caſe the French ſhould attempt to ſeize them, on the death of the king of Spain; but for this the admiral certainly came too late, it being the thirteenth of September before he ſailed from Portſmouth; and though his conduct was liable to no imputation in this reſpect, yet there was great blame laid on the board of admiralty for not fitting this fleet out ſooner; and this, among other things, made up part of a charge againſt the management of the navy, by the houſe of commons, in an addreſs they preſented to the king, on the twenty-ſeventh of March this year (1699), wherein they repreſented, "That it is inconſiſtent with the ſervice of the navy, for the ſame perſon to be one of the commiſſioners for executing the office of lord high-admiral, and treaſurer of the navy:" at the ſame time pointing at Ruſſel, earl of Orford. To which the king returned a ſoft anſwer, which yet was ſatisfactory enough to this charge: it ran in theſe words, "Gentlemen, I will conſider of your addreſs. It is my deſire, that all ſorts of miſmanagements and irregularities ſhould be prevented or redreſſed; you may be aſſured that I will take the beſt care I can in relation to the navy, the right management whereof is of great concern to the kingdom *."

The earl of Orford, who was at that time at the head of the navy, and who, as all our writers agree, governed pretty abſolutely, on a ſuppoſition that bringing over to the court a body of men, who had been formerly looked upon as ſtubborn malecontents, would juſtify every meaſure that he ſhould think neceſſary for ſo ſalutary a purpoſe, ſaw at what the commons were driving, and therefore very prudently reſolved to abate the edge of their reſentment, by laying down his employments, which he did accordingly: and thereupon a new commiſſion of admiralty paſſed, in which the earl of Bridgewater, the lord Haverſham, ſir Robert Rich, ſir George Rooke, and ſir David Mitchel, were conſtituted lords commiſſioners.

On the fourth of May his majeſty came to the houſe of peers, and gave the royal aſſent to the bill for paying the army, providing for the navy, and other occaſions; as alſo to ſeveral other acts, the principal of which were, an act to encourage the trade to Newfoundland †: the act to prevent the exportation of wool out of the kingdoms of Ireland and England into foreign parts; and for the encouragement

* Parliamentary Debates, vol. iii. p. 102.

† Sundry regulations were made concerning the Newfoundland trade and fiſhery, ſuch as, "Its being made perfectly free for all ſubjects alike to trade thither, and to fiſh on its banks. That the firſt ſhip arriving at any of the harbours or creeks of Newfoundland, ſhall be deemed admiral there for that ſeaſon; the ſecond ſhip ſo arriving, ſhall be vice-admiral; and the third rear-admiral; which three admirals ſhall have power to decide controverſies concerning places or ſtations in harbours, ſtages, cook-rooms, &c. there: moreover, every bye-boat keeper ſhall carry two freſh men with him in every fix, viz. one that hath made but one voyage, and one that never ment of the woollen manufactures of the kingdom of England†; an act for making Billingſgate a free market for ſale of fiſh; an act to enable poſthumous children to take eſtates, as if born in their fathers life-time. His majeſty then cloſed the ſeſſion with a ſpeech to both houſes, wherein he tells them they had ſat ſo many months, that the ſeaſon of the year, as well as their own particular affairs, made it reaſonable they ſhould have a receſs: he took it for granted they had finiſhed all the bills they thought neceſſary, and he had given his aſſent to all they had preſented him; if any thing elſe was wanting to their ſafety, the ſecurity of the public credit, diſcharge of the national debt, the advancement of trade, ſuppreſſing of vice, and employing the poor, which were all the things he propoſed to them at their meeting, he did not doubt but effectual care would be taken of them next winter; and he wiſhed no inconvenience might happen in the mean time: then the parliament was prorogued to the firſt of June, and afterwards by further prorogations to November following.

During this ſeſſion of parliament, Henry d'Auverquerque, eldeſt ſon to Henry de Naſſau d'Auverquerque, maſter of the horſe to king William, was created earl of Grantham. On the twenty-eighth of March, 1699, Edward, earl of Warwick, was brought to his trial in Weſtminſter-hall, before the houſe of peers, for the murder of Richard Coote, eſq. and was found guilty of manſlaughter; and on the twenty-ninth of the ſame month, lord Mohun was tried for the murder of the ſame gentleman, and acquitted. The peers ſeemed to be of opinion that lord Warwick was moſt in fault (the affair being a drunken quarrel), by finding him guilty of manſlaughter; and when he claimed the privilege of his peerage (as a commoner does the benefit of his clergy) he was adviſed not to offend again, becauſe he could have the privilege of peerage but once.

The duke of Shrewſbury, ſecretary of ſtate, finding his health decline, reſigned that poſt, in order to travel into Italy, and was ſucceeded, on the fourteenth of May, by the earl of Jerſey; and on the eighteenth of the ſame month the king declared Thomas, earl of Pembroke, lord-preſident of the council, and John, lord viſcount Lonſdale, lord privy-ſeal. On the twenty firſt his majeſty nominated lords-juſtices for the management of public affairs in his abſence, and embarking the day after, at Margate, he landed at Orange Polder, in Holland, on the third of June, from whence he went to his favourite palace at Loo. It does not appear that his majeſty tranſacted any great buſineſs during his ſtay in Holland, unleſs the drawing up memorials, aſſerting his claim to the principality of Neufchatel, in Switzerland, to which the prince of Conti, and ſome others, pretended a prior right.

The Scottiſh company, notwithſtanding the many diſcouragements and repulſes which they had ſuffered in their attempts towards ſettling their foreign trade, were ſtill determined to carry their ſcheme into execution; and accordingly this year they ſent out five ſtout ſhips, and twelve hundred men, with all kinds of implements for war and commerce, in order to effect a ſettlement on the iſthmus of Darien, which is a very narrow tract of country, uniting the two great continents of North and South America, and conſequently very advantageouſly ſituated for trade. As the inhabitants had never been conquered by the Spaniards, and as the new colony ſent thither, was to purchaſe their lands from the native proprietors (the Indians), they apprehended that no diſpute would be raiſed againſt their eſtabliſhment, from whence they promiſed themſelves an immenſe treaſure: and it muſt be owned, that, ſuppoſing all Europe but themſelves to be faſt aſleep, the very advantageous ſituation of their colony, by which they would be enabled to ſupply Peru and Mexico with whatever they wanted from Europe, and in return ſupply Europe with the riches and product of thoſe two opulent empires, ſeemed to promiſe, ſooner or later, the accompliſhment of moſt of the great things they had in view.

Having arrived ſafe at their intended port of Golden Iſland, on the coaſt of Darien, after having treated, on board their ſhips, with the natives, their men, at the requeſt and with the conſent of theſe latter, landed on the fourth of November, 1698, and immediately ſet about erecting a fort, which they called Fort St. Andrew, on a point of land about a league from Golden Iſland, where they found a ſafe capacious harbour; they alſo began to build a new town there, to be named New Edinburgh, as they did the whole country of Darien New Caledonia.

Great were the rejoicings made in Scotland on account of this landing; never conſidering that it would be the evident intereſt of all the commercial nations of Europe to fruſtrate their promiſing plan; for, beſides the then general intereſt of England, conſidered by all men to be in immediate danger from this ſcheme, king Charles II. of Spain was then our ally, and the marquis de Canales, his ambaſſador at London, preſented a very ſharp memorial to king William, on the third of May this year, againſt the Darien ſettlement, which he termed "an inſult of the Scots, in attempting to ſettle themſelves in the very heart of the Spaniſh dominions in America, and what his maſter looked upon as a breach of the alliance between the two crowns." The Dutch likewiſe were extremely uneaſy and jealous of this Scottiſh ſettlement, as tending to ſpoil their contraband trade from Curaçoa, &c. to the Spaniſh and American coaſts; and might in time alſo prove very detrimental to their Eaſt Inwas at ſea before: [this was obviouſly deſigned for the increaſe of our ſailors.] And every inhabitant ſhall employ two ſuch freſh men for every boat kept by them. Alſo every maſter of a fiſhing ſhip ſhall carry with him one that never was at ſea before for every five men he ſhall carry. And for the preſervation of timber on the iſland of Newfoundland, no perſon ſhall rind any of the trees, nor ſhall ſet on fire any of the woods," &c.

† "I. No wool, nor manufactories of wool, were to be exported from Ireland to any part of the world, but to England, and this only to the following ports, viz. Biddeford, Barnſtaple, Minehead, Bridgewater, Briſtol, Milford Haven, Cheſter, and Liverpoole, from the Iriſh ports alone of Dublin, Waterford, Youghall, Kingſale, Corke, and Drogheda; under forfeiture of ſhips and cargoes, and alſo of five hundred pounds penalty.

"II. The like forfeitures are hereby inflicted on ſuch as ſhall export in ſhips, or carry by horſes, into any other place or colony out of the king's dominions, any wool or woollen manufactories of the Engliſh Plantations in America."

This is the firſt mention in our Statute Book of woollen manufactories in our American plantations.

dia company: laſtly, the French were no leſs jealous of this company, on the ſcore of their Weſt India commerce, which at that time began to be conſiderable; and Lewis very modeſtly offered to ſupply the court of Madrid with a fleet to diſlodge the interlopers, though at this very time the French themſelves were juſt beginning to eſtabliſh a colony in the bay of Mexico, at the mouth of the great river Miſſiſſippi, always eſteemed a part of the Spaniſh Florida; and were likewiſe extending their late poſſeſſion of the weſt end of Hiſpaniola, a part alſo of the Spaniſh territory.

Thus was king William teized and preſſed on every ſide for the ſuppreſſion of this new company, and was therefore neceſſitated to comply with the urgent deſires of his own ſubjects of England, of the Dutch (whoſe ſtadtholder he was), and of his other allies, to ſend inſtructions to the governors of all our American colonies, forbidding them, under the ſevereſt penalties, to hold any correſpondence with the Scottiſh planters, or aſſiſt them in any ſhape with arms, ammunition, or proviſion. This was a dreadful blow to the infant colony, who had hitherto received ſupplies both from Jamaica and New York, and had depended upon the continuance thereof, till their own from Scotland ſhould arrive; of which now deſpairing, and the Spaniards advancing againſt them, they were glad to accept of a capitulation, and finally to abandon the enterprize, towards the end of this ſummer: it is generally aſſerted, that, out of ſo many ſtout men who went thither, ſcarce one hundred ever got back to Scotland. The condition alſo of the numerous ſubſcribers to this ſcheme was truly wretched and deplorable; many of them had ſuſtained an irrecoverable loſs, and ſome of them were even reduced to abſolute poverty. All theſe calamities greatly inflamed the Scottiſh parliament and people againſt their neighbours of England *.

Mean while king William enjoyed his favourite diverſions of ſhooting and hunting at Loo, where he was viſited by the old duke of Zell, with whom he had long maintained an intimate correſpondence. During his reſidence in this place, the earl of Portland, the grand-penſionary of Holland, and the French ambaſſador, count Tallard, had frequent conferences upon the ſubject of the Spaniſh ſucceſſion; but the event ſhewed, that William, with all his politics, was made the dupe of the French court in this affair; Lewis having nothing more in view, than to amuſe our king with a treaty, in which he ſhould ſeem to act as umpire in the concerns of Europe, until he ſhould be able to accompliſh his purpoſe of ſecuring that ſucceſſion in his own family. With this view he ordered the marquis d'Harcourt, his ambaſſador at Madrid, to exert his utmoſt endeavours in gaining the conſent of his Spaniſh majeſty; or, in caſe he ſhould fail in his attempt, he ſhould endeavour to hinder the ſucceſſion paſſing to any of the emperor's children, purſuant to the will of Philip IV. At the ſame time the French king cauſed ſixty thouſand of his beſt troops to advance towards Catalonia; whilſt a great number of ſhips and gallies cruized along the coaſt, and entered the Spaniſh harbours.

The queen of Spain having diſcovered the deſigns of France, uſed her utmoſt endeavours to diſappoint them, and ſecure the ſucceſſion for the archduke Charles, ſecond ſon of the reigning emperor Leopold, to whom ſhe was nearly related. With this view, ſhe, in concert with count Harrach, the Imperial ambaſſador, new-modelled the council; beſtowed the government of Milan on prince Vaudemont; appointed the prince of Heſſe Darmſtadt, viceroy of Catalonia; and conveyed the ſick king to Toledo, on pretence that the air of Madrid was unwholeſome; but in reality with a view of depriving the French miniſter of any opportunity of converſing with his majeſty. Harcourt was too well verſed in the arts of courts not to perceive the whole drift of this journey: he quickly followed to Toledo, under pretence of having a memorial to deliver into his catholic majeſty's own hands; but the queen cauſed him to be acquainted, that the king had left the care of all foreign affairs to the cardinal of Corduba, at Madrid, to whom he might communicate his memorial; the king being being come to Toledo only to recover his health, and not to trouble himſelf about buſineſs.

Harcourt, thus baffled, ſet himſelf to form a party in the Spaniſh council: he repreſented that Philip IV. had exerted his power too far, in diſpoſing of the crown; that the dauphin of France was next in blood †; and the duke of Anjou, his ſecond ſon, who was young, and might be moulded as they pleaſed, would be the propereſt perſon to ſucceed; that, ſhould they be averſe to this propoſal, the king his maſter would rather acknowlege the electoral prince of Bavaria, than conſent to the Spaniſh crown's devolving to the houſe of Auſtria, already too powerful by its late conqueſt in Hungary. This able negotiator farther obſerved, that ſhould Charles II. prefer the grandſon of Lewis, this would not be an invalidation of the ſolemn renunciations to the crown of Spain, made by the mother and wife of the French monarch; becauſe theſe had been made only to prevent the elder ſon of their deſcendants from uniting the two kingdoms together under one rule; and here it was not an elder ſon that was choſen: it was at the ſame time doing juſtice to the right of blood, and preſerving the Spaniſh monarchy from a partition. By theſe and the like repreſentations, added to his prodigious magnificence, his great dexterity at treating, and perfect knowlege in the art of pleaſing, by which the marquis d'Harcourt had won all hearts, and changed into eſteem and benevolence that antipathy which the Spaniſh nation had nouriſhed againſt the French, he gained over to his ſide a great number of the Spaniſh miniſters, and among others cardinal Portocarrero, archbiſhop of Toledo, and the count of Monterey, who had great influence in the councils of that nation ‡.

All Europe being now at peace, king William found no buſineſs of ſtate to detain him on the continent, and therefore returned to England this year, about the middle of October, in order to hold a parliament, and receive freſh ſupplies. The parliament meeting on the ſixteenth of November, the king, in his ſpeech to both houſes, obſerved, "That his calling them together ſo early was owing to the abſolute neceſſity of making ſome farther proviſion for the ſecurity of the kingdom by ſea and land; and particularly recommended the repairing the royal navy, and fortifying our harbours: he put them in mind alſo of making good the deficiencies of the funds, diſcharging the national debt, and providing ſupplies for the following year: he hoped (he ſaid) that the nation was already convinced of the good effects of the peace, by the manifeſt increaſe of their trade, which he ſhould uſe his utmoſt endeavours to promote and encourage; nevertheleſs, he thought it might receive a farther advantage, by paſſing a bill for puniſhing the unlawful and clandeſtine running of goods; and by employing the poor, who were now become a burthen to the nation: he declared himſelf to be fully aſſured of the love and affection of his people, which he ſhould endeavour to preſerve, by maintaining their rights and liberties, ſupporting the eſtabliſhed religion, diſpenſing juſtice with clemency and impartiality, by countenancing virtue and diſcouraging vice, and by declining no difficulties nor dangers to promote their welfare and proſperity." He then concluded in theſe words: "Since, therefore, our aims are only for the public good, let us act with confidence in one another, which will not fail, with God's bleſſing, to make me a happy king, and you a great and flouriſhing people."

† Lewis XIV. and the emperor Leopold were in the ſame degree of conſanguinity; they were both grand-ſons to Philip III. and had each married a daughter of Philip IV. therefore the dauphin and Joſeph, king of the Romans, eldeſt ſon to the emperor, were doubly in the ſame degree; but the right of primogeniture was in the houſe of France, the king and the dauphin being ſons of the elder daughters.

The whole of this ſpeech is truly worthy the mouth of a great and good prince; but ſo unaccountably peeviſh was the parliament, ſo bent upon mortifying their ſovereign in every imaginable inſtance, that they ſhewed themſelves diſſatisfied with his ſpeech, and affected to conſtrue that advice of "acting with confidence in each other," into an implication of a diſtruſt or want of confidence in them: inſtead, therefore, of an addreſs of thanks, the commons, on the fourth of December, preſented a ſort of remonſtrance, in which they tell his majeſty, "That being highly ſenſible nothing was more neceſſary for the peace and welfare of the kingdom, the quieting the minds of the people, and the diſappointing the deſigns of their enemies, than a mutual and entire confidence between his majeſty and his parliament, they eſteemed it their greateſt misfortune, that, after having ſo amply provided for the ſecurity of his majeſty and his government, any jealouſy or diſtruſt had been raiſed of their duty and affection: at the ſame time they begged leave to repreſent, that it would greatly conduce to the continuing and eſtabliſhing an entire confidence between his majeſty and his parliament, that he would be pleaſed to ſhew marks of his high diſpleaſure towards ſuch perſons as ſhould preſume to miſrepreſent their proceedings to his majeſty; and they ſhould, on their part, diſcourage all falſe rumours and reports reflecting on his majeſty and his government, whereby any miſunderſtanding might be created between him and his ſubjects §." To this the king replied, "that no perſons had ever yet dared to miſrepreſent the proceedings of either houſe; and if they had, they would immediately have felt the higheſt marks of his diſpleaſure: and he took very kindly the aſſurance they gave him of diſcouraging all falſe rumours and reports reflecting upon him and his government *."

A patriotic jealouſy and timely oppoſition to the firſt encroachments of arbitrary power, exerted upon proper occaſions, cannot be too much applauded: but the misfortune is, that it has ſometimes been aſſumed and exerciſed without any real cauſe, and has often been employed by artful and deſigning men as a cloak to conceal their own ſelfiſh and intereſted purpoſes. The preſent caſe affords an inſtance of this kind, and it were to be wiſhed that the Engliſh hiſtory were not too replete with ſuch examples. As they had found means to put the moſt odious interpretation upon a very harmleſs expreſſion of the king in his ſpeech, ſo the commons ſhewed themſelves not at all inclined to be appeaſed by the ſmooth explanation and kind promiſes he offered them in his anſwer to their addreſs: they determined to diſtreſs him, by proſecuting his miniſters; and an affair happened about this time which furniſhed them with an excellent pretext for effecting their purpoſe.

There had been for many years loud and very juſt complaints of piracies in the Weſt Indies, which for the ſake of the profit made by purchaſing their ill-gotten goods, had met with too much encouragement from the inhabitants of ſeveral of our plantations. This induced king William, in the year 1695, to appoint the earl of Bellamont, an Iriſh nobleman, and a perſon of great worth and honour, governor of New-York and of New-England. The earl, previous to his ſetting out to take upon him this office, thought it neceſſary to enquire into the moſt proper methods for extinguiſhing theſe abuſes, and repreſented the matter to one colonel Livingſtone, a gentleman of conſiderable property in New-York, as what nearly concerned the honour of that plantation. This induced the colonel to mention to his lordſhip one captain William Kidd, who was lately arrived from New York in a ſloop of his own, as a brave bold fellow, who knew moſt of the pirates haunts, and might therefore be employed againſt them with great probability of ſucceſs. The earl readily approved the ſcheme; and knowing how much the king had at heart the ſuppreſſing theſe piracies, he mentioned it to his majeſty, who applauded the deſign, and recommended it to the board of admiralty: but the public affairs being then in a perplexed ſituation, and great difficulties found in manning the fleet, the board, though they ſignified their approbation of the thing, thought fit to lay it aſide for that time †.

Lord Bellamont, diſappointed in this quarter, propoſed that if his majeſty would give his authority, a ſhip might be fitted out by private adventurers, which would ſufficiently anſwer the intended purpoſe. The king reliſhed this propoſal ſo well, and thought it of ſo great conſequence to the public good, that he himſelf became a ſubſcriber, and granted his letters-patent to Kidd, and thoſe who might join in fitting him out for the expedition, for the ſharing of all profits, prizes, &c. after the reſervation of a tenth part to the crown.

§ Proceedings of the Houſe of Commons, iii. 106. * Ibid. † Oldmixon. Burnet.

The ſcheme hereupon was immediately carried into execution: the lord chancellor, the duke of Shrewſbury, the earls of Romney, Orford, and Bellamont, ſir Edward Harriſon, and colonel Livingſtone already mentioned, engaged in the project. Six thouſand pounds were ſubſcribed in a few days; and a ſhip of ſufficient force being equipped, the command of her was given to captain Kidd, whoſe commiſſion was drawn in the common form, viz. "To take and ſeize pirates, and bring them to juſtice," without any ſpecial clauſe or proviſo whatſoever. And more clearly to demonſtrate that there was nothing ſecret or myſterious in this expedition, as the diſcontented part of the parliament affected afterwards to believe, we need only obſerve, from the moſt authentic hiſtories of this affair, and even from the trial of Kidd himſelf, that he had no inſtructions, either public or private, only the earl of Bellamont gave him ſailing orders, in which he was directed to act according to the letter of his commiſſion.

But it happened that this man, inſtead of apprehending the pirates, engaged himſelf in the like ſcandalous practice. After having cruized about for ſome time, he at laſt came to Boſton in New-England, where the earl of Bellamont ſeized him and what goods he had left, and ſent advice of what he had done to England, deſiring that a ſhip might be ſent to bring him home. The Rocheſter was accordingly diſpatched for this purpoſe; but ſhe being diſabled by a ſevere gale of wind, was obliged to return. This gave the diſaffected party a handle to charge the miniſtry with authorizing and encouraging a piratical expedition, which they wanted to ſcreen from the knowlege of the public: and ſuch was the intereſt and influence of parties at this time, that an undertaking which was not only innocent but meritorious, was traduced as a deſign of robbery and illicit plunder. Nay, ſo far was this prejudice carried, that on the ſixth of December ſome hot-headed members in the oppoſition made a motion, "That the letters-patent granted to the earl of Bellamont, and others, of pirates goods, were diſhonourable to the king, againſt the law of nations, contrary to the laws and ſtatutes of this realm, an invaſion of property, and deſtructive to commerce *." This motion however, to the credit of the houſe of commons be it ſpoken, was rejected with indignation by a great majority.

The next attempt the Country Party (as they called themſelves) made, was againſt doctor Burnet biſhop of Saliſbury, whom they now endeavoured to remove from his office of preceptor to the duke of Glouceſter, for which they alleged he was utterly unqualified, as well on account of his being a Scotchman, as by his having written the Paſtoral Letter which had been burned by order of the parliament; and in which he had aſſerted that king William and queen Mary had a right to the crown by conqueſt. A motion was accordingly made for that purpoſe, but it met with the fate of the former. The biſhop about this time had publiſhed his noted work, called, An Expoſition of the Thirty-nine Articles of Religion, of which he himſelf gives a moſt pompous account in the Hiſtory of his own Times; and indeed the good biſhop ſeems, in moſt inſtances that regard himſelf, to have poſſeſſed no common ſhare of vanity and ſelf-complacency.

In the mean time a ſupply was granted for the ſupport of the fleet and army, when it was reſolved to adopt the ſame ſcheme of reduction which had prevailed in the laſt ſeſſion; and it was reſolved on the twenty-firſt of December that ſeven thouſand ſeamen were ſufficient for the naval ſervice of the enſuing year.

But the circumſtance on which the anti-courtiers built their chief hope of diſtreſſing or diſgracing the government, was the Iriſh forfeitures, which the king had diſtributed among his own dependants. This buſineſs had indeed been begun the preceding ſeſſion, and the following perſons had been appointed to take an account of the ſaid forfeited eſtates, viz. the earl of Drogheda, Francis Anneſley, eſq. John Trenchard, eſq. James Hamilton, eſq. Henry Langford, eſq. ſir Richard Leving, and ſir Francis Brewſter.

Upon the report of thoſe gentlemen, made to the houſe of commons on the fifteenth of December this year, it appeared, that the perſons outlawed in Ireland ſince the thirteenth of February 1688, on account of the late rebellion there, amounted in number to three thouſand nine hundred and twenty-one: that all the lands in the ſeveral counties in Ireland belonging to the forfeited perſons, as far as they could reckon, made one million ſixty thouſand ſeven hundred and ninety-two acres, worth about two hundred and eleven thouſand ſix hundred and twenty-three pounds per annum, which by computation of ſix years purchaſe for a life, and thirteen years for the inheritance, came to the full value of two millions ſix hundred eighty-five thouſand one hundred and thirty pounds: that ſome of thoſe lands had been reſtored to the old proprietors, by virtue of the articles of Limerick and Galway, and by his majeſty's favour by reverſal of outlawries and royal pardons, obtained chiefly by gratifications to ſuch perſons who had abuſed his majeſty's royal bounty and pardon. Beſide theſe reſtitutions, which they thought to be corruptly procured, they gave an account of ſeventy-ſix grants and cuſtodiams under the great-ſeal of Ireland. As,

Upon which the commiſſioners obſerved, that after all deductions and allowances, there remained no leſs than a million and an half of money to be raiſed by the ſale of theſe forfeited eſtates. Several animadverſions were made upon this report, and the commiſſioners were charged with very groſs errors and impoſitions, as well in computing the number of acres, as in aſcertaining the value of the eſtates. Indeed it appears that they did not agree among themſelves; for three of them, viz. the earl of Drogheda, ſir Richard Leving, and ſir Francis Brewſter, refuſed to concur with their colleagues in the report, and even ſent a memorial to the parliament, explaining the reaſons of their diſſent; but no regard was paid to their repreſentation: the report of the others was approved, and a bill brought into the houſe of commons "for applying all the forfeited eſtates and intereſts in Ireland, and all grants thereof, and of the rents and revenues belonging to the crown within that kingdom, ſince the thirteenth of February 1688, to the uſe of the public:" and on the eighteenth of January, 1700, it was reſolved, "That the adviſing, procuring, and paſſing the aforeſaid grants, was highly reflecting on the king's honour, and that the officers and inſtruments concerned in the procuring and paſſing theſe grants had highly failed in the performance of their truſt and duty." Then it was voted that this reſolution ſhould be preſented to the king, which was accordingly done on the twenty-firſt of February; to which the king, five days after, returned this anſwer:

"Gentlemen, I was not only led by inclination, but thought myſelf obliged in juſtice to reward thoſe who had ſerved well, and particularly in the reduction of Ireland, out of the eſtates forfeited to me by the rebellion there: the long war in which we were engaged did occaſion great taxes, and has left the nation much in debt; and the taking juſt and effectual ways for leſſening that debt, and ſupporting public credit, is what in my opinion will beſt contribute to the honour, intereſt, and ſafety of the kingdom."

The commons were ſo nettled with this anſwer, that they reſolved, "That whoever had adviſed it had uſed his utmoſt endeavour to create a miſunderſtanding and jealouſy between the king and his people *." They alſo reſolved, on the ſeventh of March, that the following commiſſioners, viz. the earl of Drogheda, Francis Anneſley, eſq. John Trenchard, James Hamilton, Henry Longford, eſqrs. and James Hooper, eſq. their ſecretary, ſhould each of them receive one thouſand pounds for their ſervice; and ſir Richard Leving and ſir Francis Brewſter, the other two commiſſioners, each of them 500 l. only, for their expences. Sir Richard Leving they had before voted to be ſent to the Tower for having, in his proteſt againſt the report given by his colleagues, been the author of ſeveral falſe and ſcandalous aſperſions upon their character, &c.

The commons being apprehenſive that the bill of reſumption, which paſſed their houſe on the ſecond of April, 1700, would meet with a ſtrong oppoſition in the houſe of peers, artfully tacked it to the land tax bill, ſo that the one could not be rejected without defeating the other. When the bill came up to the lords, they did not ſhew any diſpoſition to paſs it, on a double account; firſt, becauſe they looked upon it as a reflection upon his majeſty; and, ſecondly, becauſe this method of tacking it to a money-bill, entirely deprived their lordſhips of conſidering the expediency of it. However, the king being in great want of money, is ſaid to have ſent to the lords, deſiring them to paſs it, which they did immediately after. We cannot forbear obſerving, in relation to this affair, that it was certainly a great blemiſh in king William's character, that he was immoderately partial and laviſh to thoſe whom he perſonally loved, of whom the counteſs of Orkney, and the earls of Portland and Albemarle, were the moſt diſtinguiſhed inſtances. It is poſſible the commons might have noticed this partiality, and could not without reſentment behold ſuch prodigious tracts of land given to foreigners; while the duke of Ormond, the earl of Marlborough, general Douglas, general Talmaſh, Cutts, and other Britiſh officers, who were eminently inſtrumental in the reduction of Ireland, had not a foot of land granted to any one of them. It was this conduct that gave an handle to the enemies of his perſon and government, to repreſent him as confining his affections wholly to foreign favourites, and that he hated the company, and even the ſight of Engliſhmen. Certain it is, the Engliſh were not behind-hand in their endeavours to mortify him, which they never ſo completely effected as by carrying this bill: but yet, as if not ſatisfied with their victory, the commons proceeded to abſurd lengths in their career; for they came to a reſolution to addreſs his majeſty, That no perſon who was not a native of his dominions, except his royal highneſs George prince of Denmark, ſhould be admitted into his councils in England or Ireland. This reſolution was levelled againſt the earls of Portland, Albemarle, and Galway: but before the addreſs could be preſented, the king came to the houſe of peers on the eleventh of April; and having paſſed ſuch bills as were ready for his aſſent †, and

† The bills ſigned by the king this ſeſſion were, An act for taking away the bounty for exporting corn, there having been a great ſcarcity of corn the preceding year. An act for granting an aid to his majeſty by ſale of the forfeited eſtates in Ireland, and by a land-tax in England (which was two ſhillings in the pound). An act for laying further duties on wrought ſilks, muſlins, and other Eaſt India goods; and for purchaſing other reverſionary annuities. An act for the more effectual employing the poor, by encouraging the manufactories of this kingdom. An act for aſcertaining the meaſures for retailing ale and beer. An act to enable his majeſty's natural-born ſubjects to inherit the eſtates of their anceſtors, either lineal or collateral, notwithſtanding their fathers or mothers were aliens. An act for preventing frivolous and vexatious ſuits in the principality of Wales and the counties palatine. An act for the further preventing the growth of popery. An act for the more effectual puniſhment of vagrants, and ſending them whither by law they ought to be ſent. An act to prevent any diſpute that may ariſe by officers and members of corporations having neglected to ſign the aſſociation, and taking the oaths in due time. An act to puniſh governors of plantations in this kingdom, for crimes committed by them in the plantations. An act for the more effectual ſuppreſſion of piracy. An act to repeal an act made in the ninth year of his majeſty's reign, entitled, "An act for rendering the laws more effectual for the preventing the importation of foreign bone-lace, loom-lace, needle-work, point and cut work, three months after the prohibition of the woollen manufactory in Flanders ſhall be taken off." An act for the better aſcertaining the tithes of hemp and flax. An act to enable juſtices of the peace to build and repair gaols in their reſpective counties. An act for continuing ſeveral laws therein mentioned; and for explaining the act, entitled, "An act to prevent the exportation of wool out of the kingdoms of Ireland and England into foreign parts, and for the encouragement of the woollen manufactories of the kingdom of England." An act for the better explanation and execution of former acts touching water-men and wherry-men rowing on the river of Thames; and for the better ordering and governing the ſaid water-men, wherry-men, and lighter-men, and prorogued the parliament to the twenty-third of May.

Among the acts of this ſeſſion a very remarkable one paſſed againſt papiſts, a complaint being received againſt the growth of popery: the ſame was referred to a committee; and when Mr. How the chairman made his report, it was propoſed to bring in a bill to oblige all perſons educated in the Romiſh religion, or ſuſpected to be of it, who ſhould ſucceed to any eſtate before they were of the age of eighteen, to take the oaths of allegiance and ſupremacy, and the teſt as ſoon as they came of that age; and till they did it their eſtate was to devolve to the next of kin that was a proteſtant, but was to return back to them upon their taking the oaths. All popiſh prieſts were alſo baniſhed by this bill, and were adjudged to perpetual impriſonment if they ſhould again return into England; and the reward of one hundred pounds was offered to any perſon who ſhould diſcover a popiſh prieſt, ſo as to convict him. This act obtained the royal aſſent; but as it wanted ſeveral neceſſary clauſes, and was in other reſpects very indefinite, it was not followed nor executed in any ſort *.

Some little time before the prorogation of the parliament, a motion had been made to addreſs his majeſty to remove John lord Somers, lord-chancellor, from his preſence and councils; but upon putting it to the vote, it was carried in the negative. The Tories, however, finding that the king was highly chagrined by the violence of the Whigs during this ſeſſion, had found means to worm themſelves into William's confidence, who indeed ſeems to have been always veering from one party to another, and gave him the moſt poſitive aſſurances, that if he would diſmiſs a few of his Whig miniſters, and admit ſome of their own party, they would ſerve him with greater zeal than ever the Whigs had done. William fell in with their propoſals; and the firſt ſacrifice he made them was the lord Somers, whom they conſidered as the principal leader of the Whig party. Accordingly, the king ſent for that nobleman to court, and told him that it ſeemed neceſſary for his ſervice that he ſhould part with the ſeals, and wiſhed that he would make the doing this appear an act of his own; but that nobleman poſitively refuſed to take any ſtep of that kind, which the world would readily conſtrue into a conſciouſneſs of guilt or miſbehaviour in his office. The king however being determined, the earl of Jerſey was ſent to him on the ſeventeenth of April, with an order to deliver the ſeals, with which he inſtantly complied. Thus was the lord Somers diſmiſſed from this great office, which he had filled with diſtinguiſhed reputation for near ſeven years. The ſeals were committed to the cuſtody of ſir Nathan Wright, one of the king's ſerjeants at law, with the title of lord-keeper.

In the courſe of the late ſeſſion a bill was introduced into the houſe of commons for continuing the old Eaſt India company till the expiration of their charter at Michaelmas 1701. A ſtate of their caſe was at the ſame time publiſhed, in which the equity of their claim was attempted to be proved, and the injuries they had ſuſtained were greatly exaggerated. A violent oppoſition was made to this bill by the members of the new company; but the influence of their great patron Mr. Montagu being upon the decline, the bill was actually carried through both houſes, and at laſt received the royal aſſent; ſo that there were now two rival companies of merchants trading to the Eaſt Indies: and ſuch was at this time the force of party, in a matter which one ſhould imagine ought to be of no party, that theſe two companies divided almoſt the whole nation into the two oppoſite factions of the Old and New Companies; the former generally favoured by the Tories, and the latter by the Whigs, who vented their ſpleen againſt each other in the moſt bitter invectives.

Beſides the affairs of England, the king found himſelf extremely perplexed by the remonſtrances of the Scots in behalf of their India company. The houſe of peers had, during the ſeſſion, addreſſed his majeſty againſt the Scottiſh ſettlement at Darien in America, but the commons did not think fit to join with them in that addreſs. The king anſwered the lords by propoſing a union between the two kingdoms, as the only effectual way to prevent all diſputes of this nature for the future; and the lords accordingly brought in a bill for authorizing commiſſioners of England to treat with commiſſioners of Scotland on that ſubject; but the commons refuſing their concurrence, the bill was dropped. In the mean time, the Scots drew up an addreſs to his majeſty, which was ſent about the Scottiſh kingdom, and ſigned by many thouſands; after which it was preſented to the king on the twenty-fifth of March this year by the lord Roſs, and ſeveral of the principal Scottiſh nobility, who came up for that purpoſe. This addreſs was conceived in a very high ſtrain: it was filled with warm complaints of their having been ſacrificed, and baſely betrayed in that quarter where they were entitled to protection; concluding in this remarkable manner: "Wherefore we in all humble duty moſt earneſtly intreat, and moſt aſſuredly expect, that your majeſty will order your parliament of Scotland to meet as ſoon as poſſible, which we doubt not will tend to the honour of your majeſty, and the general good and ſatisfaction of the nation." Upon the preſenting of this addreſs, the commiſſioners intimated to his majeſty, that they hoped he would look upon it not only as a petition for allowing the parliament to ſit, but likewiſe as a teſtimony of the nation's concern for the intereſt of the Indian and African company. His majeſty returned for anſwer, That it would be beſt known in parliament, which could not ſit before the fourteenth of May; but it ſhould ſit then. Accordingly, againſt that time he ſent down the duke of Queenſberry in the character of his high-commiſſioner, charging him with a letter to the Scottiſh parliament, wherein he tells them, That he had purpoſed to hold that ſeſſion in perſon, but that the preſent circumſtances of affairs abroad would not allow it. He expreſſes great ſorrow for the men, upon the ſaid river, between Graveſend and Windſor. An act for taking away the duties upon the woollen manufactures, corn, grain, bread, biſcuits, and meal, exported. An act for the appointing commiſſioners to take, examine, and determine the debts due to the army, navy, and tranſport-ſervice; and alſo an account of the prizes taken during the late war.

loſſes their nation had ſuffered in its trade: and after recommending to them the furniſhing proper ſupplies, the encouraging manufactures, and other the like matters, he concluded with aſſuring them that he would maintain their laws, liberties, and kirk (that is, preſbyterian) government.

The Scots however looked upon this as only an evaſive anſwer, and they continued ſtill in violent agitation. An addreſs was preſented to the parliament of that kingdom by the ſhire of Haddington, in which the addreſſers enumerated, with great acrimony, the loſſes they had ſuffered in trade; and in particular complained of the grievous hardſhips the nation lay under, by having a numerous body of forces kept on foot, which occaſioned them, in times of peace, heavy and unneceſſary taxes, while their much wealthier neighbours (the Engliſh) were diſbanding their troops. The Scottiſh parliament now adopted the Eaſt India and African company as a national concern: and upon the reading of this addreſs, and ſeveral others of a like tendency ſent in from different parts of the kingdom, it was moved to reſolve, "That the colony of Caledonia in Darien was a legal and rightful ſettlement, and that the parliament would maintain and ſupport the ſame;" which the high-commiſſioner obſerving was likely to be carried in the affirmative, adjourned the parliament for three days; and at their next meeting for twenty days longer: in ſhort, they were not ſuffered to ſit till the winter following: and their ſettlement at Darien being then ſurrendered to the Spaniards, they could only lament their misfortunes (owing in a great meaſure to their own precipitate conduct and over ſanguine hopes) and ſhew their reſentment by angry ſpeeches and abuſive pamphlets *.

By the death of the young electoral prince of Bavaria, which happened on the ſixth of February laſt year, during the ſitting of the parliament, new intrigues began to be revived again in regard to the Spaniſh ſucceſſion. Lewis XIV. king William, and the States-General, diſpoſed once more of that monarchy in idea, and aſſigned to the archduke Charles, the emperor's youngeſt ſon, that part which they had before given to the infant prince lately deceaſed. They gave Milan to the duke of Lorraine; and Lorraine, ſo often invaded and ſo often reſtored again by France, was to be annexed to that crown for ever. This ſecond treaty of partition, which was concluded on the fifteenth of March, N. S. and which ſet the politics of all the princes of Europe at work to ſupport or thwart it, proved as uſeleſs as the firſt. When this treaty of partition was offered to the emperor to ſign, he refuſed, becauſe he was in hopes of having the entire ſucceſſion. This treaty was concealed from the Engliſh parliament and privy-council, as the former had been.

His majeſty having now reſolved to go abroad, was pleaſed on Midſummer-day to conſtitute Edward earl of Jerſey, lord chamberlain; Henry earl of Romney, groom of the ſtole; and the earl of Carliſle was made one of the gentlemen of his bedchamber: the order of the garter was alſo conferred on Keppel earl of Albemarle, the king's new favourite, and on the earl of Pembroke preſident of the council. On the twenty-ſeventh of June his majeſty appointed a regency † to manage the government in his abſence, and on the ſeventh day of July embarked for Holland, where he arrived five days after.

Soon after his majeſty's departure the duke of Glouceſter, the only ſurviving ſon of the prince of Denmark, was taken ill of a fever, occaſioned by overheating himſelf on his birth-day, the twenty-fourth of July, when he entered into the eleventh year of his age. He died on the twenty-ninth of the ſame month, to the inexpreſſible grief of their royal highneſſes, being the laſt of ſeventeen children that had proceeded from this marriage: but the loſs ſuſtained by the death of this young prince was looked upon as irreparable by all who had any concern for their native country, the duke being the laſt of our native princes. It was yet concealed in the myſtic roll of fate, that Britain was to be indebted to the illuſtrious houſe of Brunſwick for every bleſſing and every glory that could make her the envy, admiration, and dread of her ſiſter nations: advantages which ſeem perpetuated to us by the proſpect of a long line of thoſe heroes and fathers of their people.

King William was at Loo when he received the melancholy news of the death of the duke of Glouceſter; ſoon after which the biſhop of Oſnabrug, brother to the duke of Lorraine, the elector of Bavaria, the electoral prince of Brandenburg, the electreſs of Brandenburgh, and the electreſs-dowager of Hanover, attended his majeſty at the Hague, where it was ſuppoſed that the ſtate of the royal family of England by the young duke's death, was taken into conſideration, and the buſineſs of the ſucceſſion to the crown of theſe realms ſo far concerted, as to have it laid before the two houſes at the enſuing ſeſſion of parliament.

In the mean time the peace of the North was greatly affected by a war which had ariſen between the kings of Denmark and Sweden. It will be neceſſary to ſay ſomething as to the grounds of this war, becauſe the part we took in it was very much to the honour of the Engliſh nation, and may ſerve as a laſting leſſon to all our miniſters, that whenever there appears an abſolute neceſſity to ſuccour an ally, it ſhould be done without delay, and proſecuted with vigour, which will not only effectually ſerve him, but ſave ourſelves a very conſiderable expence. Towards the cloſe of the laſt year (1699) ſeveral princes of Germany had entered into a private treaty with the king of Denmark for attacking Charles XII. king of Sweden, at that time a mere lad, and even for diſmembering the Swediſh monarchy. Purſuant to this ſcheme, the king of Denmark (Frederick IV.) was to invade Holſtein; the elector of Brandenburgh was to fall upon Swediſh Pomerania; Auguſtus II. king of Poland, was to attack Livonia; and in caſe the dukes of Zell and Hanover moved to the aſſiſtance of the Swedes, the landgrave of Heſſe and the duke of Wolfenbuttle were to cut out work for them. This was an alliance founded entirely upon intereſt, for the Swedes had done nothing to deſerve this treatment. The duke of Holſtein, who had married the king of Sweden's ſiſter, had built ſome new forts in that duchy, which the king of Denmark complained of as contrary to the Condominium which he and the duke had in that territory; and this, it ſeems, was the only ground upon which he entered into the league againſt Holſtein and Sweden. However that might be, young Charles no ſooner found himſelf likely to be attacked, than he ordered his miniſters at our court and at the Hague, to preſs king William before he went abroad, and alſo the States-general, to act in their capacities of guarantees of the treaties made for ſecuring the tranquility of the North, by preſerving there the proper balance of power. At firſt it was thought requiſite only to interpoſe our good offices: but when the king of Denmark overran Holſtein, and the king of Poland firſt attempted to ſurprize, and then beſieged in form Riga in Livonia, it became neceſſary to take other meaſures, eſpecially as czar Peter of Muſcovy appeared inclinable to enter into the confederacy. Biſhop Burnet tells us, that king William was for ſome time in debate with himſelf, whether or not he ſhould take the proper ſteps agreeable to the treaties he was engaged in with the crown of Sweden, without conſulting the houſe of commons; but weighing well the ill humour they were in, and the meaſures they had taken to thwart all his inclinations, he reſolved, as the executive part of the government lay in him, to proceed according to his own judgment for the preſent, and acquaint the parliament with it at their next meeting.

Agreeable to this reſolution, his majeſty, ſoon after the end of the laſt ſeſſion, ſent over a ſtrong ſquadron into Holland, under the command of ſir George Rooke, who in the latter end of May was joined by a Dutch ſquadron; and taking upon him the command of the united fleet, he ſailed for the Sound, where he arrived on the twentieth of June. Here they were joined by count Wuchtmeiſter, admiral-general of Sweden, with a ſquadron he had under his command; and the combined fleets ſoon afterwards bombarded Copenhagen, to the harbour of which the Daniſh fleet, conſiſting of twenty-eight line of battle ſhips, had retired. A body of Swedes then at Bremen croſſed the Elbe, advanced to the aſſiſtance of the duke of Holſtein, and compelled the Danes to relinquiſh the ſiege of Tonninghen, which they had formed. The young king of Sweden, much about the ſame time, made a deſcent upon Zealand, the largeſt and moſt fruitful iſland in the Baltic, belonging to Denmark, and ſituated at the entrance of that ſea*; which enterprize was executed with equal ſpirit and ſucceſs. Charles was the firſt man that landed; and he here diſplayed ſuch marks of courage and intrepidity as filled his enemies with the utmoſt conſternation. This was greatly increaſed, by the diſpoſition he made for laying ſiege to Copenhagen, which ſtruck the Danes with ſuch a panic, that they were glad to avoid the impending danger by an immediate peace; for which a treaty was ſet on foot, under the mediation of king William, at Travendahl: and this being ſignified to ſir George Rooke, he refuſed to let the combined fleets any longer cover the deſcent of the Swedes; and a peace was concluded on the eighteenth of Auguſt 1700, between Denmark, Sweden, and Holſtein, which left Charles at liberty to act againſt the czar and the king of Poland, who had both invaded his dominions at this critical juncture †.

King William's conduct in this whole affair was greatly applauded, and indeed with juſtice; for he at once effectually protected the Swedes, and yet obliged them to accept of reaſonable terms of peace, by which the balance of power was properly preſerved; which, if Copenhagen had been taken, would have inclined too much the other way. Hoſtilities being now at an end, the combined fleets of England and Holland returned to their reſpective ports; and the States-general were ſo ſenſible of the prudent and ſpirited conduct of ſir George Rooke, that they thanked his majeſty for having entruſted him with the command ‡.

About this time the new partition-treaty was communicated by the miniſters of the contracting parties to the other powers of Europe, from whom it generally met with a very unfavourable conſtruction: the people of Spain in particular were exaſperated to the higheſt degree at the inſolence of the three foreign powers who pretended to parcel out their dominions. They had a ſettled hatred to the houſe of Auſtria: the young archduke Charles uſed never to mention the Spaniards but with ſome opprobrious appellation. He ſoon experienced how incumbent it is on princes, as well as private men, to weigh all their words. The biſhop of Lerida, who was ambaſſador from the court of Madrid to that of Vienna, on ſome occaſion of diſlike againſt the Germans, collected thoſe expreſſions, and tranſmitted them with conſiderable exaggerations to his court in his diſpatches. They were made public; and the biſhop of Lerida being ſoon after recalled, on his return to Madrid he doubly increaſed the averſion which his countrymen had to the Germans. The French had engaged in their intereſts the cardinal Portocarrero, the marquis of Monterey, and the marquis de las Balbaſes, with many other perſons of family and diſtinction in Spain: theſe joined together to prevent the diſmembering of the monarchy. Their hatred to the Auſtrian government added a double weight to reaſons of ſtate in their breaſt. They perſuaded the Spaniſh monarch to prefer the grandſon of Lewis XIV. (the duke of Anjou) to a prince who was at ſo great a diſtance from them, and incapable of defending them. The ſcrupulous king cauſed all his divines to be conſulted on this head, who were unanimouſly of opinion with the council; and ill as he was, Charles wrote a letter with his own hand to pope Innocent XII. propoſing the caſe to him. The pope, who thought the liberty of Italy depended upon weakening the houſe of Auſtria, wrote back for anſwer, "That the laws of Spain, and the good of Chriſtendom, required of him to give the preference to the houſe of Bourbon." This letter of the pope was dated July 16, N. S. 1700. Here, obſerves M. de Voltaire, the pope treated a caſe of conſcience propoſed by a ſovereign as an affair of ſtate, while the king of Spain made a caſe of conſcience of an important affair of ſtate *.

The pope's opinion was ſtrongly ſupported by the remonſtrances of Portocarrero; and the weak prince complied with the propoſal, and made a freſh will in the beginning of October, N. S. by which he bequeathed all his dominions to the duke of Anjou. It was generally thought in Europe that this will of Charles II. had been forged by the cardinal; but if it be obſerved how generally the Spaniards came into this project, and that they delivered up all the Spaniſh territories to the duke of Anjou voluntarily, without any compulſion, it may ſurely be inferred with ſome appearance of truth, that it was the act of the whole nation: but however that was, the king of France ſtill ſeemed to act heartily as a principal in the treaty of partition. His miniſters at foreign courts ceaſed not to ſollicit, in conjunction with thoſe of the maritime powers, the acceſſion of the other powers of Europe. When count Zinzendorf, the imperial miniſter at Paris, preſented a memorial, deſiring to know what part France would act, ſhould the king of Spain voluntarily offer the throne to a grandſon of Lewis; the marquis de Torcy anſwered in writing, That his moſt Chriſtian majeſty would never liſten to ſuch a propoſal.

The partition-treaty was no ſooner known in England, than it excited various and even oppoſite ſentiments in the nation. Some approved of it as the only poſſible means of preventing the Spaniſh monarchy from becoming an acceſſion to the crown of France; and it was on this principle that William engaged in the treaty. Others condemned it as a meaſure which would increaſe the power of France to a dangerous height, and maintained that it was our buſineſs to compel Lewis to adhere to the renunciation which he and his queen had formerly made. The Jacobites greedily laid hold of this circumſtance to render the king odious to his ſubjects; and the general diſtraction that prevailed throughout the kingdom filled them with hopes of being able to eſtabliſh the ſucceſſion upon the perſon of the pretended prince of Wales; nay, ſo ſanguine were their expectations on this head, that they are ſaid to have diſpatched Mr. Graham, a brother of lord Preſton, to St. Germains with an overture for this purpoſe, and an aſſurance that the houſe of commons would not ſtand by king William in the execution of the partition-treaty.

In this violent criſis of affairs king William left Holland, and arrived in England on the eighteenth day of October, not a little chagrined at the perplexities in which he found himſelf involved; and in the beginning of the next month he received advice that the king of Spain was actually dead. This was an event he hourly expected, but it was attended with a circumſtance he had little foreſeen; I mean the laſt will of that monarch, by which he had declared the duke of Anjou (afterwards Philip V.) ſecond ſon of the dauphin of France, ſole heir of the Spaniſh monarchy. In caſe this prince ſhould die without iſſue, or inherit the crown of France, he willed that Spain ſhould devolve to the duke of Berry; in default of him and children, to the archduke Charles and his heirs; failing of whom, to the duke of Savoy and his poſterity. He likewiſe recommended a match between the duke of Anjou and one of the archducheſſes.

This will had been kept ſo ſecret, that the count de Harrache, the emperor's ambaſſador, ſtill flattered himſelf that the archduke would be acknowleged Charles's ſucceſſor. He waited a long time for the breaking up of the great council, which was held immediately upon the king's death. At length, ſeeing the duke of Abrantes coming towards him with open arms and a ſmiling countenance, he made ſure that the archduke was king; when Abrantes, embracing him, accoſted him thus; "Vengo ad expeder me de la caſa de Auſtria: I am come to take my leave of the houſe of Auſtria †."

When this teſtament was firſt notified to the French court, Lewis ſeemed for ſome time undetermined whether he ſhould ſtill abide by the treaty of partition, which was very profitable for France, or whether he ſhould accept the will, which was ſo advantageous to his family; and to carry the farce on with the ſame dexterity he had begun it, he cauſed an extraordinary council of ſtate to be ſummoned; the reſult of which was, that Lewis accepted the will. The duke of Anjou was hereupon declared king of Spain in the court of France on the ſixteenth of November, N. S. was proclaimed at Madrid, by the direction of Lewis, the twenty-fourth of the ſame month; and on the fourth of December the new king ſet out for Spain, in company with his two brothers, who attended him as far as the frontiers of France.

Some little time before the deceaſe of the Spaniſh king, pope Innocent died, and was ſucceeded by cardinal Albani, who took the name of Clement XI. This pope was the youngeſt that had for many years been inaugurated, and ſat longer than moſt had done in the liſt of Roman pontiffs, not dying till the year 1721. He was but little acquainted with public affairs, but was very learned; and in ſo critical a time, a pope of courage and ſpirit was thought the fitteſt perſon to fill the Roman ſee.

Lewis XIV. by accepting of the king of Spain's will in favour of his grandſon, had acted ſo directly contrary to his engagements with England and Holland, that he found ſome difficulty in juſtifying his conduct to thoſe two powers. However, he ſent his miniſter the marquis de Torcy to wait on the earl of Mancheſter, the Engliſh ambaſſador at Paris, with orders to repreſent that his moſt Chriſtian majeſty had duly weighed the occaſion and intent of the late treaty with England, &c. which was to prevent a war with Europe; but finding that the emperor had refuſed to accede thereto, and the duke of Savoy abſolutely rejected the accepting of Naples and Sicily, and there having appeared diſcontentments both in England and Holland againſt the French being maſters of thoſe two kingdoms, in relation to the trade of the Levant; and moreover, none of the princes that the treaty had been communicated to having promiſed more than a bare neutrality, his moſt Chriſtian majeſty, upon conſideration of the premiſes, could not but think there was a neceſſity for his accepting what the will of the king of Spain had declared in favour of the duke of Anjou, which ſhould he have refuſed, he ſaid the archduke would have had a double title, viz. from the will of Philip IV. and that of the deceaſed king: that the Spaniards were ſo unwilling to ſee their monarchy diſmembered, that they would defend their whole kingdom to the laſt province, rather than ſuffer the partition-treaty to be executed: that the ſhips which were to be furniſhed by Great Britain and Holland would not be ſufficient for effecting ſuch a purpoſe: that it was certain the treaty was more advantageous to France than the will, which the moſt Chriſtian king had accepted, merely from a deſire of preſerving the peace of Chriſtendom; and that his majeſty hoped that theſe reaſons would ſo far prevail with the king of England, that there might ſtill be the ſame good underſtanding as ever between the two crowns, which was ſo neceſſary for the good and tranquility of Europe.

* Voltaire's Age of Lewis XIV.

† Ibid. This author alſo gives us the following character of Charles II. of Spain. "This prince was from his birth as weak in mind as body; and this weakneſs had ſpread itſelf through his dominions. It is the fate of monarchies to have their proſperity depend upon the diſpoſition of a ſingle man: Charles II. had been brought up in ſuch profound ignorance, that when the French were beſieging Mons, he thought that place belonged to the king of England. He neither knew whereabouts Flanders lay, nor what places belonged to him there. This king left the duke of Anjou all his dominions, without knowing what he had given him.

The ſame topics were employed by monſieur Briord, the French ambaſſador at the Hague: but the States-general ordered Heemſkerke, their envoy at Paris, to preſent a memorial, wherein they teſtified their great ſurprize at his moſt Chriſtian majeſty's having accepted the will of the late king of Spain, in direct contravention to the ſolemn engagements he had entered into with them and the court of England: adding, that as the time limited for the emperor to accede to the treaty was not yet expired, they could never have doubted but that his moſt Chriſtian majeſty would have adhered to his treaties in every article. Lewis in anſwer to this ſent a letter to the States, in which he replied, that the principal deſign of the treaty being to prevent the union of the two kingdoms of France and Spain under one ſovereign, this was effectually provided for by the will, the heirs of the duke of Anjou being rendered incapable of the crown of Spain if they ſucceeded to that of France; ſo that he had ſtill adhered to the ſpirit and intent of the partition-treaty, though he might have departed from the letter *. A memorial to the ſame purpoſe was diſpatched to all the courts of Europe. Soon after, Don Bernardo, the Spaniſh ambaſſador at the Hague, preſented their High Mightineſſes with a letter from his new maſter, notifying his acceſſion. The States however declined giving any anſwer to this, or the French king's preſſing remonſtrances for them to acknowlege his grandſon's title, on pretence that they could not declare themſelves upon affairs of ſuch conſequence without conſulting their reſpective provinces.

The emperor loudly complained againſt the French king for having accepted the will; but in his preſent circumſtances he could do nothing more than complain. The Spaniards, however, fearful that his imperial majeſty might prevail on the maritime powers to join with him in a league to ſet aſide the ſucceſſion of the duke of Anjou, and bring them under the hated dominion of the houſe of Auſtria; and well conſidering their own inability to defend their territories againſt ſuch a confederacy, ſhould it be formed, took the reſolution of throwing themſelves into the arms of France, and depending upon her for protection. In purſuance of this reſolve, the duke of Bavaria, governor of the Spaniſh Netherlands, had orders to yield up all the towns and fortreſſes in that country to the French, and admit their troops into the garriſons: the ſame was done in the duchy of Milan. A French fleet was received into the harbour of Cadiz, and another diſpatched to the Spaniſh ſettlements in the Weſt Indies. Thus Lewis XIV. ſaw the kingdom of Spain, America, one half of Italy, and the Low-Countries, fall under his orders, without his having been at the trouble of ſtriking a blow; while all Europe at firſt ſeemed loſt in ſurprize, and unable to beſtir itſelf, when it ſaw the Spaniſh monarchy become ſubject to France, whoſe rival it had been for three hundred years; and the proſpect was the more alarming, becauſe the duke of Burgundy had then no children, and by this means the king of Spain was in time likely to ſucceed to the crown of France. A great part of the Dutch army lay ſcattered up and down in the garriſons of the Spaniſh Netherlands, particularly in Luxembourg, Namur, and Mons; and upon the ceſſion of theſe to the French, and the refuſal of the Dutch troops to acknowlege the new king of Spain, they were made priſoners of war. This ſtroke filled the States with terror and diſmay: they were in a defenceleſs condition, and without an army to oppoſe the progreſs of the French and Spaniſh troops, ſhould they attempt to invade their territories. Theſe conſiderations determined their High Mightineſſes to avert the impending danger, by acknowleging the duke of Anjou as king of Spain; and they accordingly wrote a letter to the French king for that purpoſe; which was no ſooner received than orders were diſpatched for ſending back their battalions †.

France ſeemed now advancing with haughty ſtrides towards an univerſal monarchy; and to add to the calamity of Europe, England, who was the only power capable of protecting and defending the reſt, was at this period weakened and enervated by inteſtine factions and home-bred broils. William burned with indignation at finding himſelf thus outwitted by the French king; and in all probability, had he been able to engage in a new war, he would have revenged himſelf on that perfidious monarch: but, conſcious of his own inability to take a ſuitable revenge, he wiſely diſſembled his chagrin until he ſhould have ſounded the opinion of the other powers of Europe. In the mean time, being heartily wearied with the factious and turbulent ſpirit of the Whigs, he threw himſelf into the arms of the Tories. He now gave his confidence to the earl of Rocheſter, who was the head of that party, and had undertaken for their ſubmiſſion and compliance with the king's will. This nobleman was now appointed lord lieutenant of Ireland; the privy-ſeal was delivered to the earl of Tankerville, who ſucceeded lord Lonſdale; ſir Charles Hedges was made ſecretary, in the room of the earl of Jerſey; and the lord Godolphin was appointed firſt commiſſioner of the treaſury, in the room of Mr. Charles Montagu, who was created earl of Halifax; the management of the commons was entruſted to Mr. Robert Harley, who, tho' of a preſbyterian family, and educated in Whiggiſh principles, had hitherto oppoſed the court with great warmth and ability, on a diſguſt he had taken at not being conſidered at the Revolution in the manner he thought he deſerved.

This new miniſtry, however, upon comparing notes, ſoon found that they had not ſufficient weight of intereſt to carry their points in the preſent parliament, which had been ſummoned to ſit on the twenty-firſt of November, and afterwards prorogued to the fifteenth of January: they therefore perſuaded his majeſty to diſſolve this parliament by proclamation, and to iſſue writs for convoking a new one, which was appointed to meet on the ſixth of February following.

Before the meeting of the Engliſh parliament, that of Scotland, which, agreeable to the king's promiſe, had been convened this winter, notwithſtanding the heats they were in about the miſcarriage of their ſettlement at Darien, and ſome other matters, at length came to this ſalutary reſolve, "That in memory of the great and never to be forgotten deliverance, which it had pleaſed God to give that kingdom by his majeſty; and for that their ſafety and happineſs depended, under God, upon the preſervation of his perſon, and the ſecurity of his government, they would ſtand by and ſupport his majeſty and his government to the utmoſt of their power, and maintain ſuch forces as ſhould be neceſſary for theſe ends." Accordingly, an act paſſed for keeping on foot three thouſand men till the firſt of December, 1702, and another for a land-tax to maintain theſe troops: which done, the commiſſioner produced the king's letter, wherein his majeſty deſired that he might have one thouſand one hundred men on his own account to the firſt of June following, which the parliament readily complied with, and then were prorogued to the ſixth of May. The duke of Queenſberry and the earl of Argyle had exerted themſelves with ſo much ſucceſs in calming the minds of the Scottiſh aſſembly, and rendering them more amicable to the deſires of the government, that king William thought himſelf under a neceſſity of rewarding their ſervices: accordingly, Queenſberry had a garter, and Argyle was made a duke *.

We cannot take our leave of this year without making mention of a glorious victory obtained by the young king of Sweden, Charles XII. over Peter czar of Muſcovy, who had advanced towards Narva with an army of one hundred thouſand men, in order to cruſh the young monarch. At the ſame time the king of Poland inveſted Riga, the capital of Livonia. The old count d'Alberg defended this place with incredible valour, inſomuch that Auguſtus was glad of an honourable pretext for raiſing the ſiege. Riga was full of merchandize belonging to the Dutch: the States general ordered their ambaſſador at the court of Auguſtus to repreſent the matter to his majeſty. The king of Poland did not long reſiſt their importunities, and agreed to raiſe the ſiege, rather than occaſion the loſs of ſo many valuable commodities to his allies: the latter, however, were at no loſs for the real cauſe of this ſtretch of complaiſance. The only thing that Charles of Sweden had now to do, was to march againſt the czar; with whoſe conduct he was the more exaſperated, as at that very time there was an ambaſſador from him reſiding at Stockholm, who had lately ſworn to the renewal of an inviolable peace. The emperor of Muſcovy had indeed publiſhed a manifeſto, which it would have been more to his honour to have ſuppreſſed. He there alleged, as the reaſon of the war, ſome diſreſpect which had been ſhewn him when he was upon his travels incognito, and the extravagant prices his ambaſſadors had been obliged to pay for proviſions. Such were the mighty injuries for which he was about to ravage a whole kingdom with eighty thouſand men! at the head of which he appeared before Narva † on the firſt of October (1700) and immediately laid ſiege to it. Narva was very weakly fortified. The baron de Hoorn, who commanded there, had not above one thouſand regular troops, and yet this immenſe army could not reduce it in ten weeks: indeed the Muſcovites were at that time little better than a body of undiſciplined ſavages forced from their foreſts, and ignorant of all the manœuvres of war.

Charles XII. having croſſed the Baltic Sea with his army, about twenty thouſand ſtrong, advanced with haſty marches to the relief of the beſieged. The czar, who was far from deſpiſing his enemy, employed every art in order to cruſh him: with this view he reſolved to ſhut up Charles between two armies. Nor was this all; a detachment of thirty thouſand men from the camp before Narva were poſted at a league's diſtance from that city, directly in the king of Sweden's road; another body of twenty thouſand was placed at a greater diſtance upon the ſame road; and five thouſand others compoſed an advanced guard; through all which troops Charles muſt neceſſarily force his way before he could reach the camp, which was itſelf ſtrongly fortified. The king of Sweden had landed at Pernau, in the gulph of Riga, from whence he made a flying march to Revel ‡, followed by only four thouſand horſe, and the ſame number of foot. He always marched in the van of his army, without waiting for the rear. He ſoon found himſelf, with his eight thouſand men only, before the advanced poſts of the enemy. He reſolved without heſitation to attack them, the one after the other, before they could poſſibly learn with what a ſmall number they had to encounter. The Muſcovites ſeeing the Swedes advance with ſuch an appearance of confidence, imagined that the whole army was coming upon them. The advanced guard of five thouſand men fled at their

It is not large, but a rich trading place, and ſurrounded with high walls, deep ditches, and ſtrong baſtions; and it is further defended by a caſtle, with ſeveral towers, ſtanding on a rock. firſt approach. The twenty thouſand that lay behind them, perceiving the flight of their fellow-ſoldiers, took the alarm, and carried their terror and confuſion with them into the camp. Charles quickly carried all the poſts, and at length appeared with his eight thouſand men, exhauſted by their fatigues, before the camp of the Muſcovites, conſiſting of eighty thouſand men, and defended by one hundred and fifty pieces of cannon; and ſcarce allowing himſelf any time to reſt, he inſtantly gave orders for the attack, which began about noon, on the thirtieth of November, 1700. The Ruſſians ſtood the ſhock for ſome time without flinching; but after an engagement of three hours, the entrenchments were forced on all ſides. Charles purſued the right of the enemy as far as the river Neva, near forty thouſand of the Ruſſians flying like ſheep before four hundred Swedes only, detached in purſuit. The bridge broke under the fugitives, and the river was filled with dead carcaſſes. The reſt returned to their camp, without knowing whither they went: there they defended themſelves for a while; but at laſt their generals ſurrendered to the king, and laid their arms at his feet *.

The left wing of the enemy was not yet entirely routed; but general Waad, who commanded that wing, having heard of the gracious reception the king had given to the other generals, and of his having diſmiſſed with their liberty all the ſubaltern officers and ſoldiers, ſent a meſſage to him, requeſting the ſame favour for the corps under his command. The conqueror granted him his requeſt; and the general, with his Muſcovites, to the number of thirty thouſand, marched uncovered through leſs than ſeven thouſand Swedes. The ſoldiers as they paſſed the king, threw their arms upon the ground, and the officers preſented him with their enſigns and colours. Charles cauſed the whole of this multitude to be conducted over the river. Had he detained them, the number of priſoners would have been at leaſt five times greater than that of the conquerors. After this, he entered the city of Narva in triumph. The czar was not preſent at this battle: it ſeems he had given orders for the march of about thirty thouſand men, who were advancing from Pleſkow. Peter, impatient for their arrival, left his camp to go in queſt of this reinforcement; which having joined, he was advancing by long marches, in full hopes of ſurrounding his enemy on all ſides: but before he had proceeded half way, he received intelligence of the battle of Narva, and of the diſperſion of his whole army. Peter was too prudent to think of attacking, with his thirty thouſand raw and undiſciplined troops, a conqueror who had ſo lately defeated eighty thouſand men in their entrenchments. He returned home with a determined reſolution to diſcipline his troops: in which he ſucceeded ſo well, that at laſt, by long exerciſe, they grew even ſuperior to the enemy †. I flatter myſelf the reader will not be diſpleaſed at this digreſſive account of ſo glorious an action, part of a campaign hardly to be paralleled in hiſtory, in which a king of eighteen years of age only, marched in perſon with a handful of troops againſt three powerful monarchs who had invaded his dominions with formidable armies, and totally defeated all their cruel and perfidious deſigns. But to return to the affairs of England.

The new parliament meeting on the ſixth, was prorogued to the tenth of February, 1701, when Mr. Harley was choſen ſpeaker; and the next day king William made a ſpeech to both houſes, wherein he took notice of the great misfortune the nation had ſuſtained in loſing the duke of Glouceſter, which, he obſerved, had made it abſolutely neceſſary that there ſhould be a farther proviſion for the ſucceſſion of the crown in the proteſtant line; and therefore earneſtly recommended it to their early and ſerious conſideration. The death of the king of Spain, he ſaid, with the declaration he had made with regard to his ſucceſſor, had alſo made ſo great an alteration in affairs abroad, that it required their particular attention; and he did not doubt but their reſolutions thereupon would be ſuch as ſhould moſt conduce to the intereſt and ſafety of England, the preſervation of the proteſtant religion, and the peace of Europe. He deſired ſupplies for the current year, and put them in mind of the deficiencies and public debts which were yet unprovided for; at the ſame time recommending to them the putting the royal navy in a good condition, and of fortifying the ſea-ports for its ſecurity. He alſo recommended the improvement of trade, and making proviſion for the poor; and concluded with exhorting them to proceed in their reſolutions with ſuch vigour and unanimity, as ſhould convince the world that they were united among themſelves, than which, in his opinion, nothing could contribute more to preſerve tranquility at home, and render the nation reſpected abroad.

The elections had gone generally in favour of the Tories, ſo that their party had now a great majority in the houſe: and in order to ſecure their ſuperiority, they took care to expel a great number of Whig members, who had been guilty of corruption in procuring their elections; a practice from which they themſelves, it may be preſumed, were not totally clear. However, the power being in their own hands, their friends were not ſo ſtrictly examined.

The commons having taken the king's ſpeech into conſideration, attended his majeſty with an addreſs, ſignifying their reſolution to ſtand by and ſupport him and his government, and to take ſuch effectual meaſures as might beſt conduce to the intereſt and ſafety of England, the preſervation of the proteſtant religion, and the peace of Europe ‡.

His majeſty having communicated to the houſe a memorial he had received from the States-general, wherein, after having ſet forth their apprehenſion of being attacked by the arms of France and Spain, and the urgent neceſſity they ſhould have in ſo great a danger of the aſſiſtance of England, they requeſted his majeſty to get the ſuccours ſtipulated by treaty in readineſs, that they might rely on them, if occaſion required §. The commons deſired that the treaty between England and the States,

States, in the year 1677, might be laid before them; which being done, and they having gone through the ſame, addreſſed his majeſty to enter into ſuch negotiations with the States-general and other potentates, as might moſt effectually conduce to their mutual ſecurity, and the preſervation of the peace of Europe, aſſuring him they would enable him to perform the treaty of 1677 with the States *.

On the ſeventeenth of February Mr. ſecretary Vernon produced a letter in the houſe of commons, that had been intercepted, from the earl of Melfort to his brother the earl of Perth, then governor to the pretended prince of Wales, which ſuggeſted that there were men and arms provided by the papiſts and Jacobites to aſſiſt the French king, if he would make a deſcent in favour of king James. The commons took but little notice of this letter, as no particular perſons were mentioned as concerned in ſuch a conſpiracy: but the lords, to whom the letter was alſo imparted, ordered it to be printed, and then waited on his majeſty with an addreſs, thanking him for his care of the proteſtant religion; deſiring all the treaties made ſince the laſt war might be laid before them; requeſting him to engage in ſuch alliances as he ſhould think moſt proper for preſerving the balance of power in Europe; aſſuring him of their concurrence; expreſſing their acknowlegement for his having communicated to them Melfort's letter; deſiring he would give orders for ſeizing the arms of diſaffected perſons, for removing papiſts from London, and for ſearching after thoſe arms and proviſions of war mentioned in the letter: finally, they requeſted him to equip ſpeedily a ſufficient fleet for the defence of himſelf and his kingdom †.

The credit of Exchequer-bills was ſo lowered by the change of the miniſtry, and the lapſe of the time allotted for their circulation, that they fell near twenty per cent. to the prejudice of the revenue, and the diſcredit of the government in foreign countries. The commons having taken this affair into conſideration, voted that proviſion ſhould be made from time to time for making good the principal and intereſt due on the parliamentary funds; and afterwards paſſed a bill for renewing the bills of credit, commonly called Exchequer-bills.

We have already obſerved that this was a Tory parliament. The king had, in his ſpeech of the eleventh of February, earneſtly preſſed the houſe to provide for the ſucceſſion of the crown, after the demiſe of himſelf and the princeſs of Denmark. Nevertheleſs, no notice was taken of this affair, though of ſo great importance, till the third of March. At laſt Mr. Harley propoſed, that before they ſhould proceed to the nomination of any perſon to ſucceed to the crown, certain conditions ſhould be ſettled as preliminaries, in order to ſecure the privileges of the people. A committee was accordingly appointed to deliberate on this matter; and on the twelfth of March Mr. Conyers reported the reſolution of the committee, when the houſe did then reſolve and agree to the following preliminaries, as heads of the bill of ſucceſſion ‡.

I. That whoever ſhall hereafter come to the poſſeſſion of this crown, ſhall join in communion with the church of England, as by law eſtabliſhed.

II. That in caſe the crown and imperial dignity of this realm ſhall hereafter come to any perſon not being a native of this kingdom of England, this nation be not obliged to engage in any war for the defence of any dominions or territories which do not belong to the crown of England, without the conſent of parliament.

III. That no perſon who ſhall hereafter come to the poſſeſſion of the crown, ſhall go out of the dominions of England, Scotland, or Ireland, without conſent of parliament.

IV. That from and after the time that the further limitation by this act ſhall take effect, all matters and things relating to the well governing of this kingdom, which are properly cognizable in the privy-council by the laws and cuſtoms of this realm, ſhall be tranſacted there; and all reſolutions taken thereupon ſhall be ſigned by ſuch of the privy-council as ſhall adviſe and conſent to the ſame.

V. That after the limitation ſhall take effect, no perſon born out of the kingdoms of England, Scotland, or Ireland, or the dominions thereunto belonging, altho' he be naturalized or made a denizen (except ſuch as are born of Engliſh parents) ſhall be capable to be of the privy-council, or a member of either houſe of parliament; or to enjoy any office or place of truſt, either civil or military; or to have any grants of lands, tenements, or hereditaments, from the crown to himſelf, or to any others in truſt for him.

VI. That no perſon that has any office or place of profit under the king, or receives a penſion from the crown, ſhall be capable of ſerving as a member of the houſe of commons.

VII. That after the limitation ſhall take effect, judges commiſſions be made, quamdiu ſe bene geſſerint, and their ſalaries aſcertained and eſtabliſhed; but upon the addreſs of both houſes of parliament, it may be lawful to remove them.

VIII. That no pardon under the great-ſeal of England be pleadable to an impeachment by the commons in parliament.

Having ſettled theſe preliminaries, the nomination of a perſon as next in ſucceſſion to the crown was naturally to follow. The commons on this occaſion gave a ſtriking proof of the little liking they had to this affair; for they employed ſir John Bowles, who was then diſordered in his ſenſes, and ſoon after became a downright lunatic, to name the electreſs-dowager of Hanover as next in ſucceſſion to the crown. Upon this a committee was appointed to conſider of the bill, and ſir John was of courſe put into the chair: the matter was treated with great coldneſs and indifference for ſeveral weeks; but at length the committee reported their reſolutions, which were, "That the princeſs Sophia, ducheſs-dowager of Hanover, be declared next in ſucceſſion to the crown of England in the proteſtant line, after his majeſty and the princeſs of Denmark, and the heirs of their bodies reſpectively:" and, "That the further limitation of the crown be to the ſaid princeſs Sophia and the heirs of her body, being proteſtants." A bill was formed upon theſe reſolutions, which was ſent up to the houſe of lords, where it was expected to meet with great oppoſition. Some objections were indeed made by the marquis of Normanby, and a proteſt was entered againſt it by the earls of Huntingdon and Plymouth, and the lords Guildford and Jefferies. It however paſſed by a great majority, and on the twelfth day of June received the royal aſſent; and ſoon after the earl of Macclesfield was ſent to notify the tranſaction to the electreſs Sophia, who likewiſe received from his hands the order of the garter.

The popiſh branches of the royal family, who were more nearly allied to the crown than the houſe of Hanover, looked upon this ſettlement as a very great hardſhip on them; particularly the ducheſs of Savoy, daughter to the late duke of Orleans, and grand-daughter of Charles I. by the mother's ſide, who was neareſt in blood to the crown after the princeſs of Denmark and king William. She ordered count Maffei ambaſſador of Savoy, therefore, to make the following proteſt in her behalf:

"That Anne of Orleans, ducheſs of Savoy, &c. princeſs of the blood-royal of England by the royal princeſs of Great Britain Henrietta her mother, put ſo high a value upon that prerogative, that ſhe gladly made uſe of the opportunity that then offered to ſet it forth before the eyes of the whole Engliſh nation, as an evidence ſhe drew from thence of having a right to that auguſt throne: that therefore, being informed that it had been reſolved in the parliament then ſitting, having the order of ſucceſſion under conſideration, ſhe repreſented to the king and to the ſaid parliament, that being the only daughter of the late princeſs-royal Henrietta her mother, ſhe was the next in ſucceſſion after his majeſty William the Third, and the princeſs Anne of Denmark, according to the laws and cuſtoms of England, which always preferred the neareſt to the remoteſt line: that her title being thus notoriouſly known and indiſputable, ſtood in need of no farther proof: however, that ſhe thought fit to proteſt againſt all reſolutions and deciſions contrary thereunto, in the beſt and moſt effectual manner that might be practiſed in ſuch a caſe; wherein ſhe complied rather with cuſtom than neceſſity; becauſe ſhe had ſo great an idea of the wiſdom and juſtice of the king and parliament, that ſhe had no cauſe to fear they would do any thing prejudicial to her and her children *."

No regard, however, was paid to this declaration, which was looked upon at St. Germains as an affront to king James, his queen, and the pretended prince of Wales, as no notice was taken of their right; but the ducheſs was ſubſtituted immediately after the princeſs of Denmark; a pretenſion which tended greatly to confirm the ſuſpicion of the pretender's illegitimacy.

His majeſty coming to the houſe on the thirteenth of March, gave the royal aſſent to ſome few acts; and on the ſixteenth, ſecretary Hedges delivered a meſſage ſigned by the king to the commons, whereby they were informed, "That his majeſty having directed Mr. Stanhope, his envoy-extraordinary and plenipotentiary at the Hague, to enter into negotiations in concert with the States-General of the United Provinces, and other potentates, for the mutual ſecurity of England and Holland, and the preſervation of the peace of Europe, according to an addreſs of their houſe; and that the ſaid Mr. Stanhope having tranſmitted his majeſty copies of the demands made by himſelf and the deputies of the States upon that ſubject to the French ambaſſador there; his majeſty had thought fit to communicate the ſame to them, it being his intentions to acquaint them from time to time with the ſtate and progreſs of thoſe negotiations into which he had entered, purſuant to their addreſſes before-mentioned †."

The propoſals inſiſted on by Stanhope and the States-general with France were in ſubſtance as follow: "That the French king ſhould immediately withdraw his troops from the Spaniſh Netherlands: that for the ſecurity of England, the cities of Oſtend and Nieuport ſhould be delivered into the hands of his Britannic majeſty: that no kingdoms, provinces, cities, lands, or places appertaining to the crown of Spain, ſhould ever be yielded or transferred to the crown of France, on any pretence whatever; that the Engliſh ſhould retain the ſame rights, privileges, and immunities, with regard to navigation and commerce in the dominions of Spain, which they enjoyed at the death of his late Catholic majeſty; as alſo all ſuch immunities, rights, and franchiſes, as the ſubjects of France, or any other power, either poſſeſs for the preſent, or may enjoy for the future: that all treaties of peace and commerce between England and Spain ſhould be renewed, and that a treaty formed on theſe demands ſhould be guarantied by ſuch powers as one or other of the contracting parties ſhould ſollicit and perſuade to undertake that office."

The States-general joined in the above propoſals, with this difference, that they demanded as cautionary towns, Venlo, Ruremond, Stevenſwaert, Luxembourg, Namur, Charleroi, Mons, Dendermonde, Damme, and St. Donas, with all their fortifications and appurtenances.

The French, however, having now gotten poſſeſſion of the Spaniſh Netherlands, haughtily rejected theſe propoſals, equitable and reaſonable as they certainly were: and Mr. d'Avaux, the French ambaſſador at the Hague, where theſe negotiations were carried on, returned for anſwer, That the king his maſter had no other reply to return to the demand of the States-general of the United Provinces, than that he was ready to renew the treaty of Ryſwick, which was all the ſecurity the States were to expect. He added, that he had no orders to give any anſwer to his Britannic majeſty's envoy; but if that king had any thing to demand, it might be done by his ambaſſador at Paris, or the French miniſter; and that he had no commiſſion to treat with any but the States.

This being communicated to the commons, they, inſtead of reſenting the treachery and injuſtice of the French monarch, ſeemed to think of nothing but thwarting and perplexing their own; and with this view they began to wreak their vengeance on all thoſe who had any hand in concluding the treaty of partition, which they now took under conſideration *. Accordingly, upon receiving his majeſty's meſſage, they drew up an addreſs, which was preſented to the king on the twenty-firſt of March; wherein they thanked him for his gracious meſſages, and at the ſame time begged leave to lay before his majeſty the ill conſequences of the treaty of partition (paſſed under the great-ſeal of England during the ſitting of parliament, and without the advicce of the ſame) to this kingdom and the peace of Europe, whereby ſuch large territories of the Spaniſh monarch were to be delivered to the French king.

This addreſs greatly chagrined the king: however, he thought proper to diſſemble his reſentment; and without taking notice of that part of it which related to the partition-treaty, he returned for anſwer, that he was glad the commons were pleaſed with his communicating to them the ſtate of the negotiations, which he ſhould continue to inform them of, and always be ready to receive their advice thereupon, being perſuaded nothing could contribute more to the happineſs of the kingdom and the peace of Europe, than the concurrence of the parliament in all his negotiations, and a good underſtanding between him and his people.

The topic of the partition-treaty had, it ſeems, been taken up by the lords ſome few days before the commons had aſſumed the conſideration of that affair: the debate was begun by Sheffield marquis of Normanby, and ſome others of the Tory party; and after canvaſſing the ſubject for two or three days, they on the twentieth of March preſented an addreſs to his majeſty, which, as it conveys a full idea of the ſenſe of one part of the nation concerning this famous treaty, we ſhall inſert it here, though it is ſomewhat long.

Their lordſhips therein repreſent to his majeſty, that after having read and conſidered the ſaid partition-treaty of the third of March, 1700, N.S. made with the French king, together with the ſeparate and ſecret articles which he had been pleaſed to communicate to them, they had to their great ſorrow found the matters thereof would be of very ill conſequence to the peace and ſafety of Europe; for that beſides the occaſion it might have given to the late king of Spain to have made his will in favour of the duke of Anjou, if that treaty had taken effect, the prejudice to his majeſty and his ſubjects, and indeed to all Europe, by the addition of Sicily, Naples, ſeveral ports of the Mediterranean, the province of Guipuſcoa, and the duchy of Lorraine to France, had been not only very great, but contrary to the pretence of the treaty itſelf, which was to prevent any umbrage that might have been taken by uniting ſo many ſtates and dominions under one head: that by all the informations they had had of the fatal treaty, they could not find that the verbal orders or inſtructions (if any were given to his majeſty's plenipotentiaries) were ever conſidered in any of his majeſty's councils, or that the draught of that treaty had ever been laid before his majeſty at any meeting of his council; much leſs that it was adviſed or approved of by any council or committee of council: wherefore they thought themſelves bound in duty to his majeſty, and juſtice to their country, moſt humbly to beſeech him, that for the future he would be pleaſed to require, and admit in all matters of importance, the advice of his natural-born ſubjects, whoſe known probity and fortunes might make him and his people entertain a juſt aſſurance of their fidelity to his ſervice; and that in order thereunto he would be pleaſed to conſtitute a council of ſuch perſons, to whom his majeſty might be pleaſed to impart all affairs both at home and abroad, which might any way concern him and his dominions: for as intereſt and natural affection to their country would incline them to wiſh the welfare and proſperity of it, much more than others who had no ſuch ties upon them; and as their experience and knowlege of their country would alſo render them more capable than ſtrangers of adviſing his majeſty in the true intereſt of it; ſo they were confident, that after ſuch large and repeated demonſtrations of his ſubjects duty and affection, his majeſty could not doubt of their zeal in his ſervice, nor want the knowlege of perſons fit to be employed in all his moſt ſecret and arduous affairs; and that ſince it appeared the French king's accepting of the king of Spain's will was a manifeſt violation of that treaty, they humbly adviſed his majeſty in future treaties with that prince to proceed with ſuch caution as might carry a real ſecurity †.

The king being at Hampton-court when this addreſs was voted, the lord-keeper waited on him with it in the name of the upper houſe, when his majeſty was pleaſed to return an anſwer, conceived in the following general terms: "That their addreſs contained matters of very great moment, and he would always take care, that all treaties he made ſhould be for the honour and ſafety of England."

It will however be but fair to preſent the reader with ſome of the arguments on the other ſide of the queſtion, that he may be enabled to form a ſuitable judgment on this important controverſy. The advocates for the partition-treaty alleged, that conſidering the weakneſs of Spain, which had been ſo fully proved in the affair of Barcelona, that crown could not be ſuppoſed capable of making any reſiſtance againſt the arms of France, when freed from a war; ſince, at the time that kingdom was preſſed on all ſides, it had been able with a ſmall army to take that place. If then France, with ſo ſmall a force, could make ſuch a conqueſt, what could be expected from Spain, ſhould he ſend his whole ſtrength againſt them? A fleet before Cadiz, and two ſmall armies marching through Navarre and Catalonia, might without much difficulty make the conqueſt of Spain. The emperor had, by abandoning all other conſiderations to his project of ſubduing the Turks, both exhauſted his own ſtrength, and diſguſted his allies during the war; and at the concluſion of the peace of Ryſwick, he had ſhewn ſo little regard to the honour and intereſts of a prince to whom he was ſo much indebted

* The debates in the commons on this ſubject were carried on with a degree of warmth which ſeemed to have baniſhed all regard to decency or common good breeding. Sir Edward Seymour compared the diviſion which had been made of the Spaniſh territories, to a robbery on the highway; and Mr. Howe had even the inſolence to call it a felonious treaty: an expreſſion which incenſed the king to ſuch a degree, that he is reported to have ſaid, he would have demanded perſonal ſatisfaction with his ſword, had he not been reſtrained by the diſparity of condition between himſelf and the perſon who had offered ſuch an outrageous inſult to his honour. as he was to king William, that very few of the Engliſh ſeemed willing to engage in a new war for him and his family. We were become ſo weary of taxes, and ſo jealous of a ſtanding army, that we had very conſiderably reduced both our land and ſea-forces; and the dangers of the progreſs the French might make, had the Spaniſh king died ſome months before, were too obvious and alarming to require exaggeration. Things being in this ſtate, might it not be fairly inferred that king William, in concluding the partition-treaty, had ſolely in view the preſervation of the peace of Europe? It was aſſerted, that how bad ſoever the partition-treaty might be, it ſeemed ſtill more deſirable to yield up ſome parts of the Spaniſh monarchy than to let France conquer it, or rather take all. It was obſerved, that Spain itſelf, the Weſt Indies, and Flanders, being the branches of that monarchy in which we were chiefly concerned, while theſe were kept entire in the ſame hands, our intereſts could not be ſuppoſed in any great danger. As to the dominions in Italy, though very valuable, it was ſaid that the naval power yet belonging to them were not now ſo conſiderable as they had been ſome years before: nor was it certain that, notwithſtanding the partition-treaty, they would have become a ſure acquiſition to the crown of France, which perhaps would have found as much oppoſition to it as ſhe was like to receive now to her taking poſſeſſion of the whole. The Spaniards had never before this time been guilty of betraying their country; and their coming ſo tamely under the French yoke was ſo little looked for, that till all ſaw it, none could believe it. In fine, the friends of this treaty and of the court ſtrenuouſly inſiſted, that it was the only means to prevent the impending deſtruction of Europe; and that in the making it the intereſt of the houſe of Auſtria was ſincerely eſpouſed, and a ſolicitous care uſed that the balance of Europe ſhould not be entirely broken; and at the ſame time England and Holland did not neglect themſelves, but made ſuch a diſtribution as might be leaſt prejudicial to their intereſt *.

On the laſt day of March the king imparted to the commons the French king's declaration that he would grant no other ſecurity than a renewal of the peace of Ryſwick; ſo that the negotiation ſeemed to be at an end. He likewiſe communicated two reſolutions of the States-general, with a memorial from their envoy in England, relating to the ſhips they had equipped with a view to join the Engliſh fleet, and the ſuccour ſtipulated in the treaty concluded in the year 1677, which they deſired might be ſent over with all convenient expedition. The houſe having taken this meſſage into conſideration, on the ſecond of April unanimouſly reſolved to deſire his majeſty would carry on the negotiations in concert with the States-general, and take ſuch meaſures therein as might moſt conduce to their ſafety, aſſuring him they would effectually enable him to ſupport the treaty of 1677.

Though William was by no means pleaſed with that part of this addreſs, which, by confining him to the treaty, implied their diſapprobation of a new confederacy, he received it with his uſual unconcern: he thanked them for the aſſurances they had given him, and ſaid he did not doubt but the readineſs they had ſhewn on this occaſion would very much contribute to the procuring ſuch a ſecurity as they deſired.

On the nineteenth day of April, N. S. the marquis de Torcy delivered to the earl of Mancheſter, at Paris, a letter written in Latin, from the king of Spain to king William, notifying his acceſſion to that throne, and expreſſing a deſire of cultivating a mutual friendſhip between the two crowns. This letter was by the king's orders read in the cabinet-council, where there was a ſhort debate about it; but it was never brought to any farther deliberation there; for king William obſerving, that although the nation were very ready to aſſiſt both the Dutch and the emperor to obtain a ſufficient barrier againſt France, yet they did not at all incline to enter into a war for recovering the kingdom of Spain from the duke of Anjou; therefore his majeſty thought proper, after he had thoroughly weighed all circumſtances, to acknowlege the duke's title to the crown, and congratulate him on his acceſſion, which he accordingly did in a very complaiſant anſwer to his Catholic majeſty's letter, dated from Kenſington, April 17, 1701, O. S.

The emperor was not a little alarmed at this incident: he loudly exclaimed at being thus abandoned by his allies: nevertheleſs he was determined to aſſert his right by force of arms, and had propoſed to ſend prince Eugene with an army into Italy, to take poſſeſſion of the duchy of Milan, as a fief of the empire. The new pope Clement XI. was attached to the French intereſt, while the Venetians favoured the emperor; but they refuſed to declare themſelves at this juncture.

In the mean time, the French king laboured hard, by his ambaſſador count d'Avaux, to perſuade the States-general what a cordial kindneſs he bore them; and ſeveral memorials paſſed between the one and the other: but the Dutch had too dearly experienced the French monarch's pretended love to their republic, to give a ready credence to his profeſſions; and therefore they exerted themſelves in providing for their own ſecurity, by reinforcing their garriſons, and ſolliciting ſuccours from foreign potentates. They alſo wrote a letter to king William, in which they expreſſed the moſt ſincere zeal for the intereſt of England, and earneſtly preſſed that the ſtipulated number of troops ſhould be immediately ſent to their aſſiſtance †. Hereupon the three Scottiſh regiments which

† In this letter we meet with the following lively deſcription of the double dealings and treacherous proceedings of Lewis, at the very time he was profeſſing the moſt cordial amity for the States: "We will tell you, ſir, in what condition France puts itſelf, and your majeſty will judge by that if our fear, which re-animates our demands, be ill founded. France, not contented with having taken poſſeſſion of all the places in the Netherlands that remained to Spain, has thrown into them, and cauſes actually every day formidable forces to march thither: they draw a line from the Scheld, near Antwerp, to the Maeſe: they are going to begin to draw ſuch a line, according to our advices, from Antwerp to Oſtend: they ſend a numerous artillery into the places that are neareſt our frontiers: they make, with great diligence, many magazines in Flanders, in Brabant, in Guelderland, and at Namur, which they fill up with all ſorts of ammunition for war and ſubſiſtence; beſides the great ſtores of forage which they gather from all parts: they which the king had retained in his own pay, were tranſported from Scotland, and the king communicated the letter of the States-general to the houſe of commons, who having taken the ſame into conſideration, came to the following reſolution, "That they will effectually aſſiſt his majeſty to ſupport his allies in maintaining the liberty of Europe; and will immediately provide ſuccours for the States-general, according to the treaty of 1677.

The houſe of peers, to whom the letter was alſo communicated, addreſſed his majeſty thereupon in a very warm and affectionate manner, requeſting that his majeſty would not only perform the articles of any former treaty with the States-general, but that he would enter into a league offenſive and defenſive with them for their common preſervation, and invite into it all the princes and ſtates that were concerned in the viſible danger ariſing from the union of France and Spain. They furthermore exhorted him to enter into ſuch alliances with the emperor as his majeſty ſhould think fit, purſuant to the ſpirit of the treaty of 1689, aſſuring him of their reſolution to aſſiſt him in the moſt effectual manner. They concluded, however, with this ſtinging reflection (proceeding from that ſpirit of party which now took poſſeſſion of every breaſt) that it was with great grief they humbly repreſented to his majeſty, that the danger to which his kingdom and allies had been expoſed, were chiefly owing to the fatal counſels which had prevented his majeſty's ſooner meeting his people in parliament. His majeſty was ſo well pleaſed with this diſpoſition in both houſes to concur with his views, that he expreſſed his ſatisfaction in an anſwer to each apart.

The commons, in the mean time, reſumed the conſideration of the partition-treaty, determined to proſecute in the ſevereſt manner the adviſers of it. They had appointed a committee to examine the Journals of the Houſe of Lords, and to report their proceedings in relation to the treaty of partition. Sir Edward Seymour, a violent Tory, was appointed chairman of this committee; and on his report the houſe came to a reſolution, "That William earl of Portland, by negotiating and concluding the treaty of partition, which was deſtructive to the trade of this nation, and dangerous to the peace of Europe, was guilty, and ſhould be impeached of high crimes and miſdemeanours:" and ſir John Leviſon Gower was ſent up to impeach the earl at the bar of the houſe of lords and at the ſame time to acquaint that houſe, that the commons would in due time exhibit articles againſt him. Immediately after which the commons had a conference with the lords; when they deſired their lordſhips to communicate to them what informations they had received of any tranſactions relating to the negotiations or treaties of partition of the Spaniſh monarchy: whereupon their lordſhips delivered to them the two Latin commiſſions of powers granted to the earls of Portland and Jerſey, for negotiating the ſaid treaties, the one dated the firſt of July, 1699, the other the ſecond of January, 1700; as alſo a private paper of lord Portland's, in which ſecretary Vernon adviſes him to negotiate the firſt treaty. The houſe afterwards ordered that Mr. ſecretary Vernon ſhould lay before them all the letters which had paſſed between the earl of Portland and him, in relation to thoſe treaties. Vernon at firſt declined complying with this order, alleging, that this affair containing matters of private import tranſacted by his majeſty, he did not dare reveal the ſecrets of his royal maſter without his permiſſion. The commons growing warm upon this, king William thought proper to order Vernon to comply with their demand, and the papers in queſtion were accordingly laid before them.

It muſt be acknowleged that the conduct of the commons on this occaſion is chargeable with the moſt barefaced partiality. They reſolved to ſcreen the earl of Jerſey, Sir Joſeph Williamſon, and Mr. Vernon, who had been as deeply concerned as any others in this tranſaction, and pointed all their vengeance againſt the earls of Portland and Orford, and the lords Somers and Halifax (Charles Montagu, late chancellor of the Exchequer): nay, ſome of the members had even the mean wickedneſs to tamper with Kidd, who was then a priſoner in Newgate for his piratical practices, in order to perſuade him, through the hopes of pardon, to accuſe lord Somers as having been concerned with him in his enterprize. Kidd, however, as weak and as bad a man as he was, could never be prevailed upon to charge any of the noble perſons who were his owners, with having any thing to do with his proceedings. The other party, therefore, finding him unfit for their purpoſe, left him to the courſe of the law, and he with ſome of his crew were hanged.

In the mean time, the lord Somers underſtanding that the commons were in debate about impeaching him for having adviſed the treaty of partition, his lordſhip deſired to be heard before that houſe, previous to their coming to any reſolution in regard to him. The commons thought proper to grant his requeſt, and on the fourteenth of April his lordſhip was admitted and heard in his defence, when he delivered the copies of two letters to the houſe; the firſt of which he received from the king while in Holland (in 1698) deſiring his advice in the firſt treaty of partition; and the other was his lordſhip's anſwer to it, in which he objected to ſeveral particulars in that treaty, and propoſed other articles, which he thought were for the intereſt of his country. He then obſerved, in his own vindication, that when the treaty was concluded, he conceived himſelf bound to put the great-ſeal to it, by his majeſty's command, in which he had, as chancellor, executed his office according to his duty; and by his letter he had, as a privy-counſellor, offered ſuch advice as to him appeared beſt. His lordſhip then withdrawing, the houſe fell into a long and warm debate upon the juſtification he had offered: at length, however, the Tory party prevailed, and a reſolution paſſed, "That John lord Somers, by adviſing his majeſty to conclude the treaty of partition, whereby large territories of the Spaniſh monarchy were to be delivered up to France, was guilty of a high crime and miſdemeanour *. The houſe next ordered ſir Simon Harcourt to go up to the lords and impeach him. Immediately after, they paſſed votes to the like effect againſt Edward earl of Orford, and Charles lord Halifax, and the general impeachment was brought up next day (April 15) againſt all three to the houſe of lords.

Not content with theſe proofs of their hatred and diſlike to theſe lords, and perhaps apprehenſive that they ſhould not be able to make out the charge againſt them, the commons reſolved to go a ſpeedier way to work; and by a proceeding altogether unprecedented, they, ſome few days after the impeachment, drew up an addreſs to his majeſty, which was preſented on the twenty-third of April; wherein, after repreſenting the great ſatisfaction they had to obſerve, in their enquiry concerning the treaty of partition, the great care his majeſty had taken in not entering into that negotiation without the advice of his Engliſh counſellors; and finding that John lord Somers, on whoſe judgment his majeſty chiefly relied in that important affair, did, in concert with Edward earl of Orford, and Charles lord Halifax, adviſe his majeſty to enter into that treaty of ſuch dangerous conſequence, without the advice of his council: "That they might no longer be able to deceive his majeſty, and abuſe his people, they requeſted he would be pleaſed to remove the ſaid John lord Somers, Edward earl of Orford, and Charles lord Halifax, from his council and preſence for ever; as alſo William earl of Portland, who tranſacted thoſe treaties: and concluded with repeating their aſſurances to ſtand and ſupport his majeſty to the utmoſt of their power †."

An addreſs of this nature, after an impeachment formally preferred, was not only againſt all precedents in parliamentary proceedings, but even contrary to the common laws of ſociety, inaſmuch as it was puniſhing before trial. His majeſty ſeems to have ſeen it in its proper light; for he returned the following ſoft and evaſive anſwer; "That he would employ none in his ſervice, but ſuch as ſhould be thought moſt likely to improve the mutual truſt between him and his parliament, which was ſo neceſſary in that conjuncture, both for their own ſecurity, and the defence and preſervation of their allies."

The lords were greatly incenſed at this ſtep of the commons, which they conſidered as an inſult upon their tribunal, and a violation of common juſtice: and although they had themſelves ſaid very harſh things of the treaty of partition, and the manner of tranſacting it, in their addreſs; yet they now thought it neceſſary to preſent a counter-addreſs to that of the commons, wherein they beſeech his majeſty not to paſs any cenſure on thoſe lords, until they were tried upon the impeachment the commons had preferred againſt them.

In fine, that I may not weary my readers with a minute detail of this affair, which laſted for near three months, and the particulars of which may be ſeen in the State Tracts, the Debates of Parliament, and other publications of thoſe times, I ſhall content myſelf with obſerving, that the commons, fearing that they might fall into diſgrace with the nation, for having preferred impeachments which they could not properly ſupport, uſed every art to delay the trials of the four lords. With this view, they endeavoured to excite a quarrel between the two houſes, by laying claim to a number of unuſual privileges, which they were certain the upper houſe would not allow, and by affecting to cavil at an expreſſion of lord Haverſham at one of their conferences: this circumſtance they laid hold of as a pretext for abſenting from the trial, when a day was at laſt appointed; ſo that the four lords having no proſecutors to appear againſt them, were acquitted, and the impeachments diſmiſſed on the twenty-fourth day of June; and at the ſame time the lords diſcharged an impeachment which had been lodged againſt the duke of Leeds ſome years before by the commons, which they had not proſecuted.

While theſe matters were upon the carpet, the Whig party omitted no endeavours to vilify and depreciate their adverſaries in the minds of the people: they openly charged them with being penſioners to the French king, whoſe intereſt they eſpouſed on all occaſions: they repreſented them as implacable enemies to the preſent government; and that all their views and actions tended ultimately to the reſtoration of the abdicated king and his family. They even went ſo far as to try to procure petitions from the city of London, and ſeveral of the principal counties in England, to expreſs their diſſatisfaction at the proceedings of the houſe of commons and the preſent miniſtry; by which they hoped to have procured a revolution in behalf of their own party. Their endeavours in this reſpect, however, failed in general: the county of Kent alone could be prevailed on to ſend up an addreſs, or petition, as it was ſtiled, which being a very extraordinary one in its kind, I ſhall here inſert a copy.

"We the gentlemen, juſtices of the peace, grand jury, and other freeholders, at the general quarter-ſeſſions of peace at Maidſtone in Kent, deeply concerned at the dangerous eſtate of this kingdom, and of all Europe; and conſidering that the fate of us and our poſterity depends upon the wiſdom of our repreſentatives in parliament, think ourſelves bound in duty humbly to lay before this honourable houſe the conſequences in this conjuncture, of your ſpeedy reſolution and moſt ſincere endeavour to anſwer the great truſt repoſed in you by your country.

"And in regard that from the experience of all ages, it is manifeſt that no nation can be great or happy without union, we hope that no pretence whatever ſhall be able to create a miſunderſtanding among ourſelves, or the leaſt diſtruſt of his moſt ſacred majeſty, whoſe great actions for this nation are writ in the hearts of his ſubjects, and can never, without the blackeſt ingratitude, be forgot.

"We moſt humbly implore this honourable houſe to have regard to the voice of the people, that our religion and ſafety may be effectually provided for; that your loyal addreſſes may be turned into bills of ſupply; and that his moſt ſacred majeſty (whoſe propitious and unblemiſhed reign over us we pray God long to continue) may be enabled powerfully to aſſiſt his allies before it is too late."

This petition, which it muſt be confeſſed was a moſt indecent reflection upon the houſe of commons, was ſigned by the deputy-lieutenants of the county, ſeveral juſtices of the peace, all the grand-jury, and other freeholders, and was boldly delivered to the houſe of commons on the eighth of May, by David Polhill, William Colepepper, Thomas Colepepper, Juſtinian Champney, and William Hamilton, eſquires. Upon being called in, and queſtioned at the bar of the houſe, they owned the petition, and their hands to it: after which they were ordered to withdraw; and the houſe taking the petition into conſideration, voted it to be a ſcandalous, inſolent, and ſeditious libel, tending to deſtroy the conſtitution of parliaments, and to ſubvert the eſtabliſhed government of theſe realms; and ordered the five perſons who had preſented it to be taken into cuſtody, as promoters of the ſaid petition *.

Loud were the outcries raiſed by the Whigs at this tyrannical exertion of power, as they called it, in the commons; and the impriſoned gentlemen were viſited in their confinement by all the leading men of that party, who affected to treat them as martyrs to the liberties and privileges of the people; though, as Dr. Drake very juſtly obſerves, in his Hiſtory of this Parliament, the commons would have been wanting in their duty to the people, whoſe repreſentatives they are, if they had tamely put up with ſuch an inſult upon their authority, without ſhewing their reſentment, and thereby deterring others from following an example of ſo dangerous conſequence.

The confinement of the preſenters, however, added fewel to the flame which had been blown up among the people; and ſoon after a paper came out, ſuppoſed to have been drawn up by one Daniel de Foe, a ſcurrilous party-writer of thoſe times, entitled, A Memorial from the Gentlemen, Freeholders, and Inhabitants of the Counties of —— in Behalf of themſelves, and many thouſands of the good People of England. It was ſigned, Legion; and ſent with a letter to the ſpeaker, commanding him, in the name of two hundred thouſand Engliſhmen, to deliver it to the houſe of commons. The letter and the memorial are both of them too extraordinary for us to with-hold from the reader: the former was conceived in the following terms:

Mr. Speaker,

"The incloſed memorial you are charged with, in behalf of many thouſands of the good people of England.

"There is neither popiſh, Jacobite, ſeditious, court or party intereſt in it, but honeſty and truth.

The memorial was in ſubſtance as follows. It began with this maxim, "That whatever power is above law, is burthenſome and tyrannical, and may be reduced by extrajudicial methods." It charged the commons with breach of faith, in not paying the public debts contracted on the ſecurity of their acts: with impriſoning gentlemen who were none of their members, and who, at the command of the people (whoſe ſervants the commons were) came to put them in mind of their duty, declaring that it was the undoubted right of the people of England, in caſe their repreſentatives in parliament did not proceed according to their duty and the people's intereſt, to inform them of their diſlike, diſown their actions, and direct them as they thought fit: it particularly cenſured the commons for voting the partition-treaty fatal to Europe becauſe it gave too great a part of the Spaniſh dominions to the French; and yet taking no ſteps to prevent their poſſeſſing the whole, &c. &c. It likewiſe contained a new clauſe of rights, digeſted under ſeven heads; and the commons were admoniſhed to act according to their duty, as ſpecified in this memorial, on pain of incurring the reſentment of an injured nation. This ſtrange expoſtulation concluded thus; "For Engliſhmen are no more to be ſlaves to parliaments than to kings: our name is LEGION, and we are many †."

On the twelfth day of June his majeſty came to the houſe, and gave the royal aſſent to the act of ſucceſſion, intitled, An act for the farther Limitation of the Crown, and better ſecuring the Rights and Liberties of the Subject; and to ſome other acts ‡. On this occaſion his majeſty made a ſpeech, wherein he expreſſed his warm acknowlegements to both houſes, for the care they had taken to eſtabliſh the ſucceſſion of the crown in the proteſtant line, and for their repeated aſſurances of ſupporting him in ſuch alliances as ſhould be for the preſervation of the liberty of Europe, and the ſecurity of England and Holland; and putting them in mind that the ſeaſon of the year required his preſence abroad, recommended diſpatch in the buſineſs before them.

The commons, though exceedingly provoked by the remonſtrance lately preſented them, thought it beneath their dignity to take notice of it in the houſe; but in order to guard againſt conſequences, ‡ Viz. An act for preventing the inconveniencies that may happen by privilege of parliament. An act for continuing the acts therein mentioned for preventing theft and rapine upon the northern borders of England. An act for appointing wardens and aſſay-maſters for aſſaying wrought plate in the cities of Exeter, York, Briſtol, Cheſter, and Norwich. An act for continuing a former act to prevent falſe and double returns of members to ſerve in parliament. they drew up an addreſs to his majeſty, repreſenting, That ſeveral diſaffected and evil-minded perſons having gone about to raiſe tumults in ſeveral parts of the kingdom to diſturb the public tranquility, they therefore humbly beſought his majeſty to provide for the public peace and ſecurity. They appear however to have been not a little intimidated by the ſpirit of this remonſtrance; for they almoſt inſtantly altered their meaſures. In their former addreſs they had reſtricted the king to the alliance concluded with the States general in 1677, which would have been of very little uſe in the preſent emergency; but now they preſented an addreſs in anſwer to his ſpeech, wherein they thanked him for having approved of their proceedings; declared they would ſupport him to the utmoſt; and deſired him to engage in ſuch new alliances with the emperor and other ſtates as he ſhould deem neceſſary for bridling the exorbitant power of France, and maintaining the independency of Europe. They likewiſe proceeded in earneſt upon the buſineſs of ſupplies; they granted the ſum of a million and a half for the public expences, to be raiſed by a land tax, certain duties upon merchandize, and a weekly deduction from the exciſe, ſo as to bring down the civil liſt to ſix hundred thouſand pounds, as the duke of Glouceſter was dead, and James's queen had refuſed her allowance. They voted thirty thouſand ſeamen, and reſolved that ten thouſand troops ſhould be ſent to the aſſiſtance of the States-general. They likewiſe paſſed a bill for taking away all privilege of parliament in legal proſecutions during the intermediate prorogations; and they introduced another for appointing commiſſioners to examine and ſtate the public accounts *.

By this time, however, the miſunderſtanding between the two houſes was become ſo great, on occaſion of the impeachment of the four lords, and the liberty the peers took of making amendments to ſome public bills, by which the commons had thrown the management of the greateſt part of the national affairs into the hands of the Tories, that the king, fearing ſome fatal conſequences from their diſputes, in which however he had never interfered, reſolved to put an end to the ſeſſion. For this purpoſe he came to the houſe on the twenty-fourth of June, the very day the lords had ordered the impeachments abovementioned to be diſmiſſed; and having ſent for the commons, they attended accordingly, when their ſpeaker, on preſenting the money-bills, made the following ſpeech:

"Sir, It is with great joy and ſatisfaction that I attend your majeſty at this time, ſince your commons have complied with all your majeſty was pleaſed to deſire at their meeting: they have paſſed the bill of ſucceſſion, which has ſettled the crown in a proteſtant line, and continued the liberty of England, which your majeſty hath ſettled and preſerved: they have paſſed a bill for taking away thoſe privileges which might have proved burthenſome and oppreſſive to your ſubjects: they have given your majeſty thoſe ſupplies, which are more than ever were given in a time of peace, to enable your majeſty, when you are abroad, to ſupport your allies, procure either a laſting peace, or to preſerve the liberties of Europe by a neceſſary war."

Then his majeſty gave the royal aſſent to the ſeveral acts to be found in the notes †; and afterwards made a ſpeech, wherein he returned both houſes his hearty thanks for the great zeal they had expreſſed for the public ſervice, and their ready compliance with what he recommended to them at the opening of the parliament; and particularly thanked the commons for the ſupplies, and for the encouragement they had given him to enter into alliances for the preſervation of Europe ‡.

The king now ſeemed to have wholly abandoned the Whigs, and given himſelf up to the Tory party; at leaſt ſo much may be gathered, from the promotions he made ſoon after the breaking up of the parliament: for he beſtowed the command of the ten thouſand auxiliaries voted by the commons for the ſervice of the States-general, on the earl of Marlborough, univerſally eſteemed the chief of the Tory party, with the title of commander in chief of his majeſty's forces in Holland. A new commiſſion of admiralty was made out, at the head of which was placed the earl of Pembroke. The command of the fleet was beſtowed upon ſir George Rooke; and his majeſty having declared his deſign of going to Holland, he was pleaſed to appoint the archbiſhop of Canterbury, the lord-keeper (ſir Nathan Wright) the earl of Pembroke, the dukes of Devonſhire and Somerſet, the earl of Jerſey, and lord Godolphin, lords juſtices during his abſence: and at the ſame time the earl of Marlborough was appointed (over and above his poſt of commander in chief) his majeſty's ambaſſador-extraordinary and plenipotentiary for the negotiations at the Hague: Edward Southwell, Chriſtopher Muſgrave, and James Vernon, eſqrs. were conſtituted commiſſioners of the privy-ſeal, vacant by the death of Ford Grey, earl of Tankerville; ſir Thomas Trevor, attorney-general, was made lord chief-juſtice of the Common-pleas, in the room of ſir George Treby, deceaſed; and Edward Northy, eſq. was made attorney-general. All or moſt of theſe gentlemen were Tories.

King William having ſettled the regency, and other matters relating to domeſtic government, embarked for Holland, July 1ſt. On his arrival at the Hague he aſſiſted at an aſſembly of the States-general, whom he addreſſed in a very affectionate ſpeech, wherein he ſaid, "He always came into that country with joy, but eſpecially in this dangerous conjuncture, becauſe he foreſaw his preſence would be neceſſary for the ſervice of the ſtate. He hoped to have paſſed the reſt of his days in repoſe and peace, and to have left that ſtate in a flouriſhing condition; but there had happened ſuch great alterations in the affairs of Europe, that he knew not what might be the conſequences. However, he could aſſure their High Mightineſſes, that whether things were accommodated amicably, or whether they ſhould be obliged to have recourſe to arms, he perſiſted in the ſame zeal he ever had for their ſervice and proſperity. He could aſſure them the whole Engliſh nation were ready to aſſiſt the States, and ſtrongly to contribute towards their defence, and to whatever might tend to the common ſecurity *."

The States in their anſwer, which was equally affectionate, told his majeſty, "That they could not omit to thank him for his aſſurances, not only in his own, but in the name of the Engliſh nation, in favour of themſelves and the common cauſe, well knowing how much they might rely upon a people, whoſe courage had gained ſo much reputation in the world, and were always of opinion that their intereſts were inſeparable from thoſe of England †."

After this the king, as his health would permit him, which indeed ſeemed to decline apace, ſpent a good part of his time in reviewing the frontier garriſons of the States, and gave ſuch orders as he judged neceſſary for the better defence and ſecurity of the country. On his return to the Hague, he found that the count d'Avaux, the French ambaſſador, had delivered a letter from the French king to the States, accompanied with a memorial of his own, to notify his being called home by his maſter. In the memorial there were ſeveral ſtrokes, very much reflecting upon king William, and that ſhewed the malignity of Lewis' heart, who no doubt was well apprized of the contents of his miniſter's paper: particularly, the ambaſſador ſaid, "That he ſhould abuſe his maſter, ſhould he write to him that any ſucceſs was to be expected from the conferences: that his maſter had too diſcerning a judgment, after the king of Great Britain had, by his envoy, openly declared that he would never depart from the intereſt of the emperor: that he would not liſten to any propoſals of accommodation till ſatisfaction were given to that prince. His excellency then obſerved, that the ties between their High Mightineſſes and the king of England were too ſtrict, and they had too well made known their blind ſubmiſſion to the ſentiments of that monarch; and no doubt but that they had already taken a reſolution to make the ſame declaration to the moſt Chriſtian king's ambaſſador ‡."

To this memorial the States-general returned a very ſpirited anſwer on the firſt of Auguſt; in one part of which they expreſs themſelves to this effect: "They could not comprehend, they ſaid, why the effect of the union between them and the king of Great Britain ſhould be rather war than peace, ſince his Britannic majeſty on all occaſions had given ſufficient proofs of his inclination to peace: that they did not blindly follow the king of Great Britain's ſentiments, but had great deference for his advice; although they acknowleged themſelves to be ſtrictly united to him by alliances many years ago, for their mutual ſecurity: that he was one of the chief parties in the treaty of partition; and that they had declared, previous to their having entered upon theſe negotiations, that they thought his conſent neceſſary, as well for thoſe reaſons as for his private relation to the republic §."

Thus all the pretenſions of the French to give the States a reaſonable ſecurity went off with the count d'Avaux, and every thing ſeemed to tend towards a new war between France and Holland; the latter exerted their utmoſt endeavours in making preparations for their own defence: they repaired their fortifications, augmented their army, and hired auxiliaries from various quarters. An alliance had been already formed ‖ between king William and the king of Denmark; which latter engaged to furniſh three thouſand horſe, one thouſand dragoons, and eight thouſand foot, in conſideration of receiving a ſubſidy of three hundred thouſand crowns a-year during the war. Great endeavours were alſo uſed to bring about a peace between Sweden and Poland, but without effect. Lewis XIV. had alſo interpoſed his mediation between theſe powers, with a view of ſecuring the young king of Sweden in his intereſts; and the court of Vienna had ſollicited the aſſiſtance of the king of Poland; but the dyet of that kingdom being ſuſpended, and king Auguſtus conſequently delivered from its intrigues, he reſolved to perſiſt in the proſecution of the war.

We have already obſerved that the emperor, as being the perſon more immediately affected by the acceſſion of the duke of Anjou to the crown of Spain, had reſolved to do himſelf juſtice by force of arms: with that view he aſſembled an army, the command of which he beſtowed on prince Eugene. As this general will make ſo diſtinguiſhed a figure in the ſubſequent part of this hiſtory, the following account of him, as given us by M. de Voltaire in his Age of Lewis XIV. cannot fail to be acceptable.

"The firſt general who put a check to the ſuperiority of the French arms was a Frenchman; for ſo we ſhould call prince Eugene, though he was the grandſon of Charles Emanuel duke of Savoy: his father the count de Soiſſons had ſettled in France, where he was lieutenant-general of the king's armies, and governor of Champagne: he married Olympia Mancini, one of the nieces of cardinal Mazarine. From this match, unfortunate in other reſpects, was born this prince, who afterwards proved ſo dangerous an enemy to Lewis XIV. though hardly known to that monarch in his youth. He was known in France by the name of the Chevalier de Carignan; but afterwards taking the Petit Collet, he was called the abbot of Savoy. It is ſaid that he aſked Lewis for a regiment, which was refuſed him, on account of his being too much connected with the princes of Conti, who were then in disgrace for having written some indecent letters, reflecting upon the king and madame de Maintenon. Disappointed in this application, he went to serve the emperor against the Turks in Hungary in 1684, together with the princes of Conti. The campaign being ended, Lewis sent an order to these princes, and all who had accompanied them in this expedition, to return home. The abbot of Savoy was the only one who refused to comply with this mandate, openly declaring he renounced France for ever. When Lewis XIV. was told of this, he said to his courtiers with an air of contempt, "Don't you think I have had a great loss?" This prince, however, who was held in so much contempt at the court of France, was born with all the qualifications which form the hero in war, and the great man in peace: he had a just and lofty turn of thinking, and a becoming presence of mind both in the field and in the cabinet: he was guilty of faults, as all generals have been; but these were lost in the number of his great actions. He shook the power of Lewis XIV. and the Ottoman Porte: he governed the empire; and in the course of his victories and ministry, shewed himself equally superior to vain-glory and avarice. He cherished, and even protected learning, as much as could be done at the court of Vienna."

* It is ſomewhat difficult to reconcile this declaration of king William, with regard to the diſpoſition of the Engliſh, with the repreſentation Dr. Burnet gives of the Engliſh miniſtry and parliament at this time, in his ſecond volume; wherein he peremptorily charges them with being Jacobites, and penſioners to France: but indeed that prelate is ſo contradictory to himſelf in different parts of his work, that it is not very eaſy to unriddle his meaning.

At this time he was about thirty-seven years of age, and had the experience of his own victories over the Turks, and the faults which he had seen committed by the Imperialists in the late wars, in which he served against France. He entered Italy at the head of the imperial army, consisting of thirty thousand men, in the month of July, by the way of Vicenza, in the territories of Venice, the entrance towards Verona being blocked up by the French army under marshal Catinat, having made a feint of passing the Po near Ferrara: and having thus amused the French, he passed the Adigi near Carpi, where he surprized and cut in pieces a body of five thousand French, commanded by M. St. Fremont. After this success the Imperialists having the command of all the country between the Adigi and the Adda, penetrated into the territory of Bresciano, while Catinat and the duke of Savoy retreated behind the Oglio. This retreat was approved of by many good officers: but Catinat's enemies represented it so much to his disadvantage at the court of France, that mareschal Villeroy was sent over about the latter end of August, to supersede Catinat in his command, and with orders to attack the Imperialists at all events. The duke of Savoy still preserved the title of generalissimo; but Villeroy was in fact commander in chief. He accordingly gave immediate orders for attacking prince Eugene in the post of Chiari, near the Oglio. The duke of Savoy and most of the general officers were of opinion, that it was against all the rules of war to attack this post, for these very essential reasons; first, That it would answer no valuable end; secondly, That the entrenchments were inaccessible; and lastly, If they failed, the reputation of the whole campaign would be lost. Villeroy however told the duke of Savoy that he must march, and sent an aid de camp to order marshal Catinat in his name to begin the attack: upon which that general marched directly up to the entrenchments. Prince Eugene however gave the French such a reception, that they were obliged to retire with the loss of five thousand men. Towards the end of the campaign, the prince took possession of all the Mantuan territories, except Mantua itself and Goits, which he blocked up. He reduced all the places on the Oglio, and continued in the field during the whole winter of 1701, where he gave daily proofs of the most intrepid courage, indefatigable vigilance, and consummate prudence.

In the month of January following he formed a design of surprising Cremona; an attempt which, had it succeeded, would have been a decisive blow in favour of the Imperialists. He found means, by the assistance of a priest called Bozzoli, provost of St. Mary le Nova, to introduce four hundred men through the common sewer of the town into this priest's house. They immediately killed the guard at the two gates, which were flung open, and prince Eugene entered the city with four thousand men. All this was done before the governor, who was a Spaniard, had the least suspicion: the whole affair was conducted with the greatest secrecy, order, and diligence. The Spanish governor, on the first alarm, appeared in the street with a few soldiers, but was presently shot dead; and all the general officers were either killed or made prisoners. Marshal Villeroy, who was at that time in Cremona, was awakened with the noise of the firing, and ran out into the streets, when he was immediately made prisoner, and led out of the town without knowing any thing that had passed, and unable to conceive the cause of so extraordinary an event: in short, the place must have been infallibly reduced, had prince Eugene been supported by another body of troops which he had ordered to advance from the Parmesan to secure the bridge: but these not arriving in time, an Irish regiment in the French service took possession of the bridge, and the prince was obliged to retire with his prisoners, including mareschal Villeroy, and several other persons of distinction. This enterprize, tho' unsuccessful, added great lustre to the military fame of prince Eugene *.

Lewis XIV. alarmed at the progress of the Imperialists, sent the duke of Vendôme to command his forces in Italy. He likewise pressed the duke of Savoy to assist him with a body of auxiliary troops; but that prince having obtained all he could from France, became very indifferent to her interests: it is said that he was greatly disgusted with that court for having sent over Villeroy to take the command, who had behaved with insupportable arrogance towards the duke. Philip V. the new king of Spain, had lately been married to the duke's daughter, whom he went to meet at Barcelona, where he found himself involved in a very troublesome dispute with the states of Catalonia, who refused to pay a tax he had imposed, until he should confirm their privileges; a concession which he was obliged to make, after a long and violent contest.

A misunderstanding arising about this time between the estates of Cologne and prince Clement of Bavaria, their elector, the French king laid hold of this opportunity to strengthen his interest on the Rhine, and for that purpose laboured hard to engage that prince in his cauſe; and he ſo far prevailed by his artful negotiations, and heightening ſome apprehenſions the elector had, that the Eſtates might be too powerful for him, that when king William ſent the earl of Galway to endeavour to bring him over to the intereſt of England, Holland, and the empire, he appeared wholly engaged to France; which afterwards was more apparent, by his admitting French troops into ſeveral places, and committing ſome violences upon the conſtitution of his electorate. Lewis alſo found means to form ſuch a ſtrong party in the Portugueſe councils, that his moſt Faithful majeſty, though perſonally attached to the Auſtrian family, was obliged to agree to a treaty of alliance with the French monarch.

Every thing now tending to a war, our fleet became his majeſty's chief care, which he reſolved ſhould be much ſuperior to that of the enemy, being very ſenſible of the ill conſequences that followed the want of this ſalutary precaution at the beginning of the laſt war. By the latter end of July we had a fleet of forty-eight ſhips of the line, beſides frigates, fire-ſhips, and ſmall veſſels, ready for ſea at Spithead, under the command of ſir George Rooke, who ſailing from thence overawed the French coaſt during the remainder of the ſeaſon. About the latter end of Auguſt vice-admiral Benbow was detached with a ſtrong ſquadron to the Weſt Indies: the French expected that this fleet would have proceeded to the Mediterranean; and in order to confirm them in this belief, and cover its true deſtination, king William made a formal demand of the court of Spain of the free uſe of their harbours, which however was civilly evaded, though the French ſhips had free admittance. After the ſending of the fleet to ſea, his majeſty thought proper to revoke his letters-patent to the commiſſioners of the admiralty, and to appoint the earl of Pembroke, a nobleman univerſally beloved and eſteemed, lord high-admiral of England. The deſign of this promotion was to be rid of the diſadvantages attending a board, and this end it anſwered perfectly well; for his lordſhip immediately ſent away captain Edward Loades to Cadiz, to bring home the ſea-ſtores and the merchants effects before the war broke out; which piece of ſervice was ſucceſsfully performed. The Whig party made a violent outcry, becauſe our grand fleet did not perform any thing of conſequence this ſummer; and ſevere cenſures were paſſed upon ſir George Rooke, as if he had purpoſely continued idle: but the ill-nature and falſity of theſe cenſures will ſufficiently appear, when we conſider that this was a fleet of amuſement only, the war not being declared; and therefore the longer ſir George could keep the French and their allies in ſuſpence, the greater ſervice he did; but how often do we find parties making uſe of any thing that will ſerve a turn, without conſidering or caring whether it is founded either on juſtice or truth!

King William being well apprized of all the proceedings of Lewis, exerted himſelf with uncommon diligence, in order to render his ſchemes abortive. With this view he projected the grand alliance between the emperor Leopold, England, and Holland, againſt France, for recovering the Spaniſh monarchy to the houſe of Auſtria, and for the ſecurity of England and Holland in point of their commerce and navigation, and of the Hanover ſucceſſion to the crown of Great Britain, as well as for a ſafe barrier to the Dutch. This treaty, which was concluded at the Hague, September 7, O. S. was framed in the nature of propoſals, upon which France might come in; and accordingly the ſame was communicated to the Spaniſh ambaſſador; and on their being rejected, it was determined to have recourſe to arms. For the particular articles of this treaty, the reader is referred to the notes *.

Thus were the French and the confederates upon the point of entering into the war, which ſeemed only to be deferred till each ſide could prepare for action; and poſſibly it might not have been declared till the next ſummer, if an accident had not happened which brought things to a criſis ſomewhat ſooner: this was the death of that weak and unfortunate prince James II. who being ſeized with a vomiting of blood, departed this life at St. Germain's on the ſixteenth of September, N. S. 1701, in the ſixty-eighth year of his age, and of his exile the thirteenth. His character has already been touched upon at the end of his unhappy reign. Since the miſcarriage of his laſt attempt for recovering his throne, he had laid aſide all thoughts of worldly affairs, and devoted his whole attention to the concerns of his ſoul. The jeſuit Le Bretonneau, who attended him in his laſt moments, relates, that he did not only forgive all his enemies, but ſaid, "He thought himſelf more obliged to the prince of Orange than to all the world; becauſe by taking from him three crowns, that prince had put him in a way to purchaſe one infinitely more precious than all." His corpſe was carried to Paris, and repoſited in the church of the Benedictines, in the ſuburbs of St. James, where it now lies, not interred, but in a hearſe; together with the body of his daughter, who died before him; in the fond hopes, perhaps, that ſome convenient time may offer for the tranſporting it to England, in order to its being interred in Weſtminſter-abbey among his royal anceſtors and relations: an event which, to the unſpeakable happineſs of this country, appears very unlikely to happen.

Immediately after his death, a queſtion was ſtarted in the French council, what ſteps ſhould be taken with regard to his ſon? Lewis was inclined to give him the titles his father had borne; but the miniſtry adviſed their maſter to remain paſſive, and allow him to aſſume what title he pleaſed. They enforced their advice with ſuch arguments of ſound policy, that Lewis reſolved not to acknowlege the ſon of James II. as king. The ſame day, however, Mary of Modena, widow to the deceaſed James, went to Madam de Maintenon's apartments to ſpeak to the French king. She found him there; and with a flood of tears conjured him not to treat her ſon, herſelf, and the memory of a king he had protected, with ſo much indignity as to refuſe a title, the only remains of their former greatneſs. She obſerved, that as her ſon had always received the honours of prince of Wales, he ought to be treated as king after the death of his father; and that even William himſelf could not complain of this, provided he was left to enjoy the throne of which he had deprived him. To theſe arguments ſhe added others which concerned the intereſt and glory of Lewis: ſhe repreſented to him, that whether he acknowleged the ſon of James II. or not, the Engliſh would nevertheleſs declare war againſt France, and that he would only feel the regret of having ſacrificed the moſt noble ſentiments to a fruitleſs precaution. The repreſentations and tears of the royal widow were powerfully ſeconded by Madam de Maintenon. The king reſumed his former ſentiments. In a word, the pretended prince of Wales was proclaimed king of England, Scotland, and Ireland, by the name of James III. the very day it had been determined in council not to acknowlege him. M. de Voltaire, from whom we have taken this remarkable anecdote *, ſays, That the marquis de Torcy frequently owned it, though he has not inſerted it in his Memoirs, becauſe he thought it was not to the honour of his maſter to be prevailed on by two women to alter a reſolution which he had taken in his council. The pretender's title was likewiſe recognized by the king of Spain, the duke of Savoy, and the pope.

William was no ſooner informed of this tranſaction, than he diſpatched a courier to the king of Sweden, as guarantee of the treaty of Ryſwick, to complain of this manifeſt violation of that treaty. At the ſame time, he recalled his ambaſſador, the earl of Mancheſter, from Paris, with orders to return without taking leave; and monſieur Pouſſin, the French reſident in England, was ordered to depart the kingdom. This action of Lewis, in acknowleging as their king a perſon whom they had baniſhed, appeared a violent inſult offered to the nation, and an attempt towards exerciſing an abſolute authority over Europe. The ſpirit of freedom which then prevailed among us, and which was not a little increaſed by the hatred the people bore to Lewis, on account of his ambition and power, produced every effect that king William could deſire: the city of London, and moſt of the counties of England, tranſmitted addreſſes to his majeſty in Holland, declaring their ſenſe of the indignity offered him, and promiſing to ſupport his government againſt the Pretender and all his enemies. Lewis endeavoured to vindicate his own conduct in a long manifeſto, which he diſperſed throughout Europe; in which he pretended to aſſert, that there was nothing in what he had done contrary to the treaty of Ryſwick, which he explained by ſaying, he did not intend to aſſiſt the pretender (king James III. as he ſtiled him) in recovering his crown during the life-time of his preſent majeſty king William. Lewis alſo prevailed on the pope to preſs the emperor, and other Roman catholic princes, to acknowlege the pretended king, but without effect.

Our king having concluded alliances with ſeveral foreign princes againſt France, particularly that with the emperor and Holland, uſually ſtiled the Grand Alliance, of which we have already given an account, began to prepare for his return to England; but being detained in Holland, partly by his ill ſtate of health, and partly in concerting meaſures with the States to attack the French frontiers the next campaign, he did not arrive in his Britiſh dominions till the fifth of November, when the firſt thing that engaged the attention of his majeſty and his council was, whether the preſent parliament ſhould be continued or diſſolved, and a new one called? It was, after ſome debate, carried for the latter meaſure; and on the eleventh the king iſſued a proclamation for diſſolving the parliament, and calling another to meet on the thirtieth of December. The reaſon alleged for the diſſolution of this parliament was, that his majeſty might have the ſenſe of the nation in this extraordinary conjuncture: but it is more than probable that the chief inducement to this ſtep was to prevent a revival of the heats and animoſities between the two houſes, whereby the ſupplies neceſſary for the approaching war might have been delayed.

Never did the two parties proceed with ſuch zeal and activity in influencing the elections: the Whigs, however, on this occaſion gained an inconteſtable majority. The city of London, and ſome other places, gave their repreſentatives inſtructions for their conduct in the enſuing ſeſſion; in which they preſſed them to aſſiſt his majeſty vigorouſly in maintaining his title to the crown, to make good his alliances, and reduce the power of France, recommending above all things a union between the two houſes.

make

Notwithſtanding the returns being generally made in favour of the Whig intereſt, when the parliament met on the thirtieth of December, the choice of ſpeaker fell upon Harley, who was deemed the principal leader of the former oppoſition, and who was ſet up againſt ſir Thomas Lyttleton, recommended by the court.

On the laſt day of the year 1701, king William made a ſpeech to his new parliament; in the framing of which he was ſuppoſed to have been aſſiſted by the lord Somers, and which was ſo acceptable to the well-wiſhers of the Revolution, and their friends abroad, that it was printed with decorations in Engliſh, Dutch, and French, and hung up in frames in almoſt every houſe in England and Holland. As this was the laſt ſpeech king William ever made in parliament, and might have paſſed for a model of future ſpeeches, I ſhall, after the example of almoſt every other hiſtorian of thoſe times, inſert it at full length.

My lords and gentlemen,

"I promiſe myſelf you are met together, full of that juſt ſenſe of the common danger of Europe, and the reſentment of the late proceedings of the French king, which has been ſo fully and univerſally expreſſed in the loyal and ſeaſonable addreſſes of my people.

"The owning and ſetting up the pretended prince of Wales for king of England, is not only the higheſt indignity offered to me and the nation, but does ſo nearly concern every man who has a regard for the proteſtant religion, or the preſent and future quiet and happineſs of his country, that I need not preſs you to lay it ſeriouſly to heart, and to conſider what further effectual means may be uſed for ſecuring the ſucceſſion of the crown in the proteſtant line, and extinguiſhing the hopes of all pretenders, and their open and ſecret abettors.

"By the French king's placing his grandſon on the throne of Spain, he is in a condition to oppreſs the reſt of Europe, unleſs ſpeedy and effectual meaſures be taken. Under this pretence he is become the real maſter of the whole Spaniſh monarchy: he has made it to be entirely depending on France, and diſpoſes of it as his own dominions; and by that means he has ſurrounded his neighbours in ſuch a manner, that though the name of peace may be ſaid to continue, yet they are put to the expence and inconveniencies of war.

"This muſt affect England in the neareſt and moſt ſenſible manner, in reſpect to our trade, which will ſoon become precarious in all the variable branches of it; in reſpect to our peace and ſafety at home, which we cannot hope ſhould long continue; and in reſpect to that part which England ought to take in the preſervation of Europe.

"In order to obviate the general calamity with which the reſt of Chriſtendom is threatened by this exorbitant power of France, I have concluded ſeveral alliances, according to the encouragement given me by both houſes of parliament, which I will direct ſhall be laid before you, and which I doubt not you will enable me to make good.

"There are ſome other treaties ſtill depending, that ſhall be likewiſe communicated to you as ſoon as they are perfected.

"It is fit I ſhould tell you the eyes of all Europe are upon this parliament: all matters are at a ſtand till your reſolutions are known, and therefore no time ought to be loſt.

"You have yet an opportunity, by God's bleſſing, to ſecure to you and your poſterity the quiet enjoyment of your religion and liberties, if you are not wanting to yourſelves, but will exert the ancient vigour of the Engliſh nation: but I tell you plainly, my opinion is, if you don't lay hold on this occaſion, you have no reaſon to hope for another.

"In order to do your part, it will be neceſſary to have a great navy, and to provide for the ſecurity of our ſhips in harbour; and alſo that there be ſuch a force at land as is expected in proportion to the forces of our allies.

Gentlemen of the houſe of commons,

"I do recommend theſe matters to you with that concern and earneſtneſs which their importance requires: at the ſame time, I cannot but preſs you to take care of the public credit, which cannot be preſerved but by keeping ſacred that maxim, that they ſhall never be loſers that truſt to a parliamentary ſecurity.

"It is always with regret when I do aſk aids of my people; but you will obſerve, that I deſire nothing which relates to any perſonal expence of mine: I am only preſſing you to do all you can for your own ſafety and honour, at ſo critical and dangerous a time; and am willing, that what is given ſhould be wholly appropriated to the purpoſes for which it is intended.

And ſince I am ſpeaking on this head, I think it proper to put you in mind, that during the late war I ordered the accounts to be laid yearly before you, and alſo gave my aſſent to ſeveral bills for ſtating and examining the public accounts, that the ſubjects might have the ſatisfaction to know how the money given for the war was applied; and I am willing that matter may be put in any other way or examination, that it may appear whether any miſapplications and miſmanagements, or whether the debt that remains upon us has really ariſen from the ſhortneſs of ſupplies, or the deficiency of the funds.

"I have already told you how neceſſary diſpatch will be for carrying on that great public buſineſs whereon our ſafety, and all that is valuable to us, depends. I hope what time can be ſpared will be employed about thoſe other very deſirable things which I have recommended from the throne; I mean the forming ſome good bills for employing the poor, for encouraging trade, and the ſuppreſſion of vice.

My lords and gentlemen,

"I hope you are come together determined to avoid all manner of diſputes and differences, and reſolved to act with a general and hearty conſent for promoting the common cauſe, which alone can make this a happy ſeſſion.

"I ſhould think it as great a bleſſing as could befal England, if I could obſerve you as much inclined to lay aſide thoſe unhappy fatal animoſities which divide and weaken you, as I am diſpoſed to make make all my ſubjects ſafe and eaſy as to any, even the higheſt offences committed againſt me.

"Let me conjure you to diſappoint the only hopes of your enemies, by your unanimity. I have ſhewn, and will always ſhew, how deſirous I am to be the common father of all my people: do you in like manner lay aſide parties and diviſions: let there be no other diſtinction heard amongſt us for the future, but of thoſe who are for the proteſtant religion and the preſent eſtabliſhment, and of thoſe who wiſh for a popiſh prince and a French government.

"I will only add this, if you do in good earneſt deſire to ſee England hold the balance of Europe, and to be indeed at the head of the proteſtant intereſt, it will appear by your right improving the preſent opportunity."

In anſwer to this excellent and patriotic ſpeech, the two houſes preſented ſeparate addreſſes to his majeſty, but agreed in returning him thanks for his ſpeech, and in their reſolutions to maintain and ſupport his title and the proteſtant ſucceſſion, and to enable him to make good all his alliances for the preſervation of the liberties of Europe, and reducing the exorbitant power of France *: which addreſſes were graciouſly received by the king, with aſſurances of the great ſatisfaction he conceived of their duty and affection. In a word, every thing was carried on to the high ſatisfaction of the nation in general. Care was taken to expedite forces by ſea and land, forty thouſand men being appointed for the naval ſervice, and as many to make up the complement, already in good forwardneſs, by land; and the commons, in order to raiſe his majeſty a preſent ſum of money for thoſe purpoſes, reſolved, that whoever ſhould advance or lend the ſum of 600,000 pounds for the ſervice of the fleet, and fifty thouſand pounds for the preſent ſubſiſtence of the land-forces, ſhould be repaid with intereſt at ſix per cent. out of the firſt aids.

His majeſty was pleaſed, on the fourth of January 1702, to conſtitute the earl of Mancheſter principal ſecretary of ſtate; and on the eighteenth the duke of Somerſet was made preſident of the council, in the room of the earl of Pembroke, now lord high-admiral of England.

Both houſes now ſeemed to vie with each other in their zeal for the government. It was unanimouſly reſolved to addreſs his majeſty, that he would inſert an article in all his treaties of alliance, importing, that no peace ſhould be made with France, until his majeſty and the nation have reparation for the great indignity offered by the French king, in owning and declaring the pretended prince of Wales king of England, Scotland, and Ireland. A bill was alſo brought into the houſe of commons for attainting the pretended prince of Wales; which being carried up to the other houſe, paſſed, with the additional clauſe of attainder againſt the late king James's queen, who now aſſumed the character of queen-regent during her ſon's minority. This however was not carried without great oppoſition in the houſe of lords; and when the bill was ſent back to the commons, they excepted to the amendment as irregular, and propoſed that the queen ſhould be attainted in a ſeparate bill; to which the lords aſſented: however, this was afterwards neglected in the lower houſe.

But the longeſt and warmeſt debates of this ſeſſion were produced by a bill which was brought into the houſe of lords for abjuring the pretended prince of Wales, and ſwearing to king William, by the title of Rightful and Lawful, and his heirs, according to the act of ſettlement. It was propoſed that this oath ſhould be voluntary, and ſhould only be tendered to all perſons, and their ſubſcription or refuſal recorded, without any other penalty †. Though the Whigs poſſeſſed an evident majority in both houſes, yet there was in each a conſiderable number of Tories, who uſed their endeavours to traverſe the meaſures of their rivals; and being headed by the earl of Nottingham in the houſe of peers, made ſtrong efforts to throw out this bill, on pretence that the government was firſt ſettled with another oath, which was like an original contract, and that it was neither juſt nor honourable to add a new obligation. Oaths, they ſaid, relating to mens opinions, had ever been conſidered as levere impoſitions; and that a voluntary oath was in its own nature unlawful, ſince no man could ſwear lawfully, unleſs required to it by a ſuperior authority.

During theſe diſputes another bill of abjuration was brought into the houſe of commons by ſir Charles Hedges, which was to be obligatory on all perſons who enjoyed employments in church or ſtate: it likewiſe included an obligation to maintain the government in the king, lords, and commons, and to maintain the church of England; together with the toleration for diſſenters. A long debate enſued upon the queſtion, "Whether the oath ſhould be impoſed, or voluntary?" and at length it was carried for impoſition, by the majority of one voice. They agreed to an additional clauſe, declaring it equally penal to compaſs or imagine the death of her royal highneſs the princeſs Anne of Denmark, as to compaſs or imagine the death of the king's eldeſt ſon and heir.

This bill was ſtrenuouſly oppoſed in the houſe of peers: the Whigs rejected with indignation the clauſe to maintain the government in the king, lords, and commons, inſiſting that the lords and commons were no part of the government or the executive power, but only of the conſtitution or legiſlative authority: beſides, they ſaid, that as the extinguiſhing the hopes of the pretended prince of Wales was the only object of the preſent bill, it was improper to crowd it with any foreign matters. The clauſe in favour of the church and the toleration was likewiſe laid aſide, and for the ſame reaſon; and when, after long debates, the bill paſſed, ten lords entered a proteſt againſt it as an unneceſſary and ſevere impoſition ‡.

The king came to the houſe on the tenth of February, and gave the royal aſſent to a bill for reviving and continuing the act for ſtating and examining the public accounts: after which the commons took into conſideration the conduct of the Kentiſh petitioners who inſulted the laſt parliament ‖; and there happening to be a controverted election for the borough of Maidſtone in Kent, between Thomas Bliſſe and Thomas Colepepper, eſquires (the latter one of the Kentiſh petitioners). The houſe, on examining into the ſame, reſolved, That the ſaid Thomas Colepepper had been guilty of corrupt, ſcandalous, and indecent practices, in endeavouring to procure himſelf elected burgeſs for that town; and that he had promoted that ſcandalous and ſeditious petition in the houſe of commons, commonly called the Kentiſh Petition, containing groundleſs reflections on the houſe of commons, by aſperſing the members with receiving French money, and being in the intereſt of France; for which offence he ſhould be committed to Newgate, and the attorney-general ſhould proſecute him for the ſaid crimes. And on the twenty-ſixth of February they came to theſe further reſolutions, That to aſſert that the houſe of commons were not the only repreſentative of the commons of England, tended to the ſubverſion of the rights and privileges of the houſe of commons, and the fundamental conſtitution of the government of this kingdom: That to aſſert that the houſe of commons have no power of commitment but of their own members, tends to the ſubverſion of the conſtitution of the houſe of commons: that to print or publiſh any books or libels reflecting on the proceedings of the houſe of commons, or any member thereof, for or relating to his ſervice therein, is a high violation of the rights and privileges of the houſe of commons. It was determined, however, to take due care of the rights and privileges of the ſubject, while the houſe was maintaining its own dignity; and accordingly it was reſolved by a conſiderable majority, That it was the undoubted right of the people of England to petition or addreſs the king for the calling, ſitting, or diſſolving of parliaments, and for the redreſſing of grievances; and that every ſubject under an accuſation, either by impeachment or otherwiſe, had a right to be brought to a ſpeedy trial.

Theſe matters, however intereſting, did not prevent the commons from attending to others of a more public and important nature: they addreſſed the king to engage his allies to increaſe their quotas of land-forces, to put on board the fleet, in proportion to the numbers which his majeſty ſhould embark. At the ſame time they ſettled the ſums appropriated to the ſeveral uſes of the war. The ſupplies were raiſed by an impoſition of four ſhillings in the pound upon land, annuities, penſions, and ſtipends, and on the profits ariſing from the different profeſſions; by a tax of two and a half per cent. on all ſtock in trade, and money at intereſt; of five ſhillings in the pound on all ſalaries, fees, and perquiſites; a capitation-tax of four ſhillings; an impoſition of one pound per cent. on all ſhares in the capital ſtock of any corporation or company which ſhould be bought, ſold, or bargained for; a duty of ſix-pence per buſhel on malt; and a further duty on mum, cyder, and perry.

The party humours were by this time become very fierce between the two Eaſt India companies: both ſtrove to gain the court, as well as the new members of the houſe of commons. The ſpirit of this time may in ſome meaſure be ſeen by many warm pamphlets then publiſhed; and at the two coffee-houſes near the Royal Exchange, which ſtill retain the names of Garraway's and Jonathan's, theſe matters were made ſo important, as to be ſaid then to prepare and direct the greateſt buſineſs of the nation. Both companies were at this time reckoned to have no fewer than ſixty ſhips at ſea; and great was the emulation at their public ſales. Theſe conſiderations made the government ſee the abſolute neceſſity of compoſing their fierce contentions by a coalition, which was at length complied with, though not formally concluded, before king William died.

The ſame fate attended a moſt excellent and patriotic ſcheme, projected by that monarch, and which failed ſolely through the unhappy diſſentions which prevailed in the northern parts of the iſland. This was an union of the two kingdoms of England and Scotland. The king had this affair ſo much at heart, that even when he was diſabled from going to the parliament in perſon, he ſent a letter to the commons, expreſſing an earneſt deſire that a treaty for this purpoſe might be ſet on foot: but as the ferment in Scotland, in relation to the Darien affair, was not yet thoroughly ſubſided, it was thought dangerous to riſk the calling a new parliament there; and therefore this project was poſtponed to a more favourable opportunity.

The whole nation now ſeemed to join in the cry for a war with France; and his majeſty iſſued out a proclamation for the better encouragement of ſeamen and able-bodied landmen, in which he offered a conſiderable gratuity by way of bounty-money, to ſuch as ſhould enter themſelves on board the fleet by a fixed time: and after that, another proclamation was iſſued, to give farther time for ſuch who were at any great diſtance, to come and partake of the like bounty. Accordingly, a great number very chearfully entered themſelves, as directed by theſe proclamations. His majeſty had, before his return from Holland, engaged in a negotiation with the prince of Heſſe d'Armſtadt, who aſſured him, that if he would lay ſiege to and take Cadiz, the admiral of Caſtile, and divers other grandees of Spain, who were moſt heartily diſguſted with the inſolence and foppery of their new maſters the French, would declare for the houſe of Auſtria. The emperor and the Dutch had alſo determined upon the ſiege of Keyſerſwaert, which the elector of Cologne had delivered into the hands of the French. The elector of Hanover had reſolved to diſarm the prince of Wolfenbuttle and Saxe-Gotha; the king of the Romans and prince Lewis of Baden undertook to inveſt Landau; and the emperor promiſed to ſend a powerful reinforcement to prince Eugene in Savoy. The great elector of Brandenburgh and duke of Pruſſia (Frederic-William) who for his ſervices and attachment to the common intereſts of the German empire, was, by the intereſt of our king, who was his relation, inveſted with the regal dignity, and recognized by moſt of the princes and ſtates of Europe as king of Pruſſia, in the preceding year had agreed to furniſh a certain number of troops on having a fixed ſubſidy paid him: in a word, every thing appeared in the greateſt forwardneſs by ſea and land to humble the enemies of theſe kingdoms, when, in the midſt of our flattering proſpects, a cloud of ſorrow overſpread the land, upon the news of the king's indiſpoſition.

His majeſty, who had for ſome time been viſibly declining in his health, had retired to Hampton-court, where he amuſed himſelf with his favourite diverſions of riding and hunting. On the twenty-firſt of February, as he was taking the air in the park of Hampton-court, he had the misfortune to fall from his horse, and broke his right collar-bone. He was immediately carried into the palace, where the bone was set, and the same evening he returned to Kensington. He seemed to be in a fair way of recovery till the first of March, when a defluxion fell upon his knee, with such symptoms as gave his physicians and surgeons very alarming apprehensions. Finding himself unable to go in person to the parliament-house as he intended, and yet being very sollicitous about the great national affairs then depending, he was pleased to grant a commission under the great-seal to several peers, for passing the bills then lying ready for the royal assent; which were, a bill for the attainder of the pretended prince of Wales; and an act, that the solemn affirmation and declaration of the people called Quakers shall be accepted instead of an oath, in the usual form.

On the fourth day of March his majesty was so well recovered, that he took several turns in the gallery at Kensington; but at length, being somewhat fatigued, he sat down on a couch and fell asleep: soon after which he was seized with a shivering fit, which was succeeded by a fever and a violent looseness. Sir Thomas Millington, sir Richard Blackmore, Dr. Brown, Dr. Hutton, and several other physicians, were immediately sent for, who administered such remedies as they thought most like to give him relief: but he continued very ill till Friday the sixth of March, when, being so weak that he could not write his name, he, in the presence of the lord-keeper and the clerks of parliament, applied a stamp, prepared for the purpose, to three bills; one of which was, the act of abjuration and settlement, to which we owe the security of a protestant succession in the august family now reigning. On Saturday morning his majesty found himself somewhat easier, though still extremely weak, and continued so all the morning: towards the evening he was again more faint, and in the night was attacked by three violent fits; during the intervals of which he sent for several noblemen, and spoke to them about private affairs. On Sunday morning early, being the eighth of March, his majesty received the holy sacrament from the hands of Tennison, archbishop of Canterbury, who, with Dr. Burnet bishop of Salisbury, prayed by him, he himself assisting with great devotion. The lords of the council and many of the nobility attended all the while in an outer room. About eight o'clock in the morning the agonies of death overtook him; and just as he was expiring, he faintly asked for his great favourite the earl of Portland, who was immediately introduced to the bed-side; but the king being by that time speechless, he grasped his hand, and laid it to his heart with marks of the most tender affection. He had before delivered to lord Albemarle the keys of his closet and scrutore, telling him he knew what to do with them. He was sensible to the last moment, and died in the arms of Mr. Sewel, one of the pages of the Back-stairs, sitting up in bed in his night-gown, being kept alive five or six hours merely by the help of cordials. Thus departed William III. in the fifty-first year, fourth month, and fourth day of his age, after having reigned thirteen years and one month, wanting five days.

The remains of king William were deposited in Westminster-abbey on Sunday night the twelfth of April, with all the magnificence a private funeral would admit of. Soon after his will was opened in Holland: in this he had declared his cousin John-William-Henry Friso, prince of Nassau-Dietz, and hereditary stadtholder of Friezland, his sole and universal heir, appointing the States-general his executors. By a codicil annexed, he bequeathed the lordship of Breevert, and a legacy of two hundred thousand guilders, to the earl of Albemarle.

William III. according to bishop Burnet's description of him, was in his person of the middle stature, a thin body, and delicate constitution; subject to an asthma and continual cough from his infancy. He had an aquiline nose, sparkling eyes, a large forehead, and a grave and solemn aspect, but very little majesty in it. He spoke very little; and when he did, his conversation was dry, and his manner disgusting.

The character of William III. has shared the same fate which commonly attend the characters of those who act in exalted stations. By his friends he has been represented as adorned with every virtue; by his enemies, as deformed by every vice; but neither the one nor the other seem to have drawn their portraits from truth: the greatest eulogium upon this prince's memory, is the frantic joy which his enemies shewed at his death. Tho' we might count his disgraces by the number of battles he fought against the French, and by the sieges which they compelled him to raise, yet can we not in justice refuse him the title of a great general and a great king: though repeatedly beaten, he could never be said to be defeated, the victors being generally as great losers as the vanquished. William had inspired his troops with a confidence and courage that, like his own, was superior to all danger and ill success. Fortune indeed seems to have taken a delight in traversing all his military projects, if we except his campaign in Ireland, and the taking of Namur; but she could never get the better of his courage, fortitude, and equanimity, in which he rivalled the most eminent warriors of antiquity.

In the government of his dominions he discovered an exquisite discernment, and consummate prudence. Almost all the powers of Europe considered him as a friend; one in whom they could repose an unlimited confidence; a distinction never before possessed by any king of England, and which William maintained by the most inviolable attachment to the interests of his allies, and an unwearied application to business. He checked the alarming progress of the French arms in Flanders and Germany: he was the prop of Europe, when ready to crouch beneath the power of Lewis XIV. To him the English are indebted for the knowlege of their own strength as a maritime and commercial nation. Though he was himself seldom cordially treated by his parliaments, who much embarrassed and obstructed him in his undertakings, yet he suffered not this treatment to get the better of his sollicitude for the glory and welfare of these kingdoms. In a word, now that party prejudices have given way to reasons of justice and equity, William III. is deservedly considered as one of the greatest kings that ever filled the English throne.

QUEEN ANN.

It muſt be acknowleged, however, that with all his virtues, this prince was not free from vices, or more properly ſpeaking, from imperfections; the chief of which was ambition. This was the diſtinguiſhing part of his character, as may appear in moſt part of the ſteps he took at the time of the Revolution, but particularly in his refuſing to accept the ſovereign power in conjunction with his queen, whoſe priority of title could never be diſputed. Other cauſes have indeed been aſſigned for this refuſal of a conjunct reign, but they do not ſeem ſatisfactory; in particular, when they would aſcribe this ſtep rather to prudence than ambition, to preſerve queen Mary from the odium of ſwaying the ſceptre of her living father. William ſtands juſtly blameable for that impolitic, and indeed ungrateful bias, which he on all occaſions diſcovered towards his foreign favourites. This occaſioned the diſtruſt between him and his people, and is an example that all princes would do well to conſider, when they are called to the government of a ſtrange people.

It is not to be wondered at, that a prince bred up from his cradle amidſt the noiſe of battle and a camp, ſhould not have poſſeſſed any great taſte for the arts and ſciences, nor have ſhewn himſelf the patron or encourager of learning and learned men. Generoſity indeed was on few occaſions one of his moſt ſhining virtues: military merit, which he beyond all other things admired, experienced ſeveral inſtances of it. However, upon a candid review of this prince's conduct and character, we may with juſtice ſay, that his virtues and accompliſhments were greater, and his failings leſs numerous, and much more excuſable, than moſt of his predeceſſors, whoſe lives and actions we have recorded in the courſe of this work; nor can Engliſhmen think of him but with gratitude, as an illuſtrious inſtrument in the hand of Providence for reſcuing theſe nations from popery and ſlavery.

King William was the poſthumous ſon of William of Naſſau prince of Orange, by the princeſs Mary, eldeſt daughter of king Charles I. On the fourth of November, 1677, he married his firſt couſin the princeſs Mary, eldeſt daughter of James duke of York (afterwards king James II.) by whom he had no iſſue; nor did he ever marry again after her death, which happened on the twenty-eighth of December, 1694.

ANNE, the laſt Sovereign of ENGLAND of the Name of STUART.

A. D. 1702.

UPON the death of king William, the crown, purſuant to the act of ſucceſſion, devolved to the princeſs Anne of Denmark. This princeſs was ſecond daughter of James duke of York, afterwards king James II. by Mrs. Anne Hyde, eldeſt daughter of ſir Edward Hyde, earl of Clarendon. The duke was privately married to this lady during his firſt exile in the year 1659; and upon that great turn of affairs at the Reſtoration, there did not want thoſe who would have had him deny the marriage, ſuggeſting the advantages he might make by another choice; but he could never be brought to liſten to their advice; and in the year 1660 ſhe was, by an order of council, declared ducheſs of York, and to have the precedency of the princeſs of Orange and the queen of Bohemia. The ducheſs was a lady of a very fair character, and a conſtant member of the church of England till her laſt long indiſpoſition, when ſhe was prevailed upon to embrace the faith of the church of Rome, in which ſhe died, to the unſpeakable grief of her father, who expoſtulated with the duke as well as herſelf on that ſubject. The ducheſs of York died in the palace of St. James, on the thirty firſt of March, in the year 1671. She had iſſue by the duke four ſons and four daughters, viz. Charles, James, Charles, and Edgar; Mary, Anne, Henrietta, and Catherine. Charles, James, Charles, and Henrietta, died in her life-time, and Edgar and Catherine did not ſurvive her a year; but her two daughters Mary and Anne lived to be queens of England.

The latter of theſe princeſſes, whoſe reign I am now entering upon, was born at St. James's, on the ſixth of February 1665. As the lady Anne grew up, ſhe was found not to be ſo healthy as could have been wiſhed; wherefore ſhe was, by the advice of the phyſicians, ſent over to France when about five years of age. This gave occaſion to many people to ſuſpect that ſhe was ſent thither to be bred a catholic: but theſe fears were quieted by her return to England ſome months afterwards, having received conſiderable benefit in her conſtitution from the change of air. When her ſiſter the princeſs Mary was married to the prince of Orange, the duke of York was very preſſing with his brother (Charles II.) to leave him the diſpoſal of his other daughter the princeſs Anne; but the king judged it moſt prudent to fall in with the views and remonſtrances of his parliament, and give her hand to a proteſtant prince. When the princeſs was in the twentieth year of her age, the prince of Hanover (afterwards king George I. of England) arriving here, it was the general talk that a treaty of marriage was on foot between him and the lady Anne, and that he came over purpoſely to ſee her. However this might be, he returned without making any propoſals of the kind. Two years after prince George of Denmark, ſecond ſon of Frederick III. a younger brother of Chriſtian V. king of Denmark, came into England on purpoſe to pay his addreſſes to the young princeſs, and on the twenty-eighth of July 1683, they were ſolemnly married by Dr. Henry Compton, Compton, biſhop of London (who had the charge of her highneſs's education) in the chapel-royal of St. James, in the preſence of the king and queen, their royal highneſſes the duke and ducheſs of York, and all the principal nobility of the land.

Upon the death of king Charles II. the princeſs Anne became a degree nearer to the crown. However, during all the time of her father's reign, ſhe kept her court as private as ſhe could, conſiſtent with her ſtation. A very good correſpondence had all along ſubſiſted between her royal highneſs and her ſiſter the princeſs of Orange; but the birth of the pretended prince of Wales tending to remove them at a greater diſtance (and perhaps for ever exclude them and their iſſue) from the crown, togther with the report of his being a prince impoſed upon the nation gaining ground every day, a greater intimacy grew between the two ſiſters, who carried on a ſecret correſpondence for ſome time. When at length the prince of Orange landed in England, and was preparing to march to the capital, in order to bring the infatuated James to a proper ſenſe of his paſt ill conduct, and that numbers of the nobility and gentry crowded to enliſt under his banners, the banners of liberty; Prince George of Denmark, her highneſs's conſort, quitted king James, his father-in-law, whom he had accompanied as far as Saliſbury, and went off to the prince of Orange at Torbay. He left behind him a letter for the king; wherein, among other things, he excuſed himſelf in the following expreſſions: "My juſt concern for that religion wherein I have been ſo happily educated, which my judgment truly convinces me to be the beſt, and for the ſupport whereof I am highly intereſted in my native country; and is not England now become ſo by the moſt endearing tye!" by which he meant her royal highneſs, who, upon the news of her huſband's having left the king, and that the latter was upon his return to London, was thrown into great agonies and perplexities; and ſo apprehenſive was ſhe of her father's diſpleaſure, that ſhe told the lady Churchill (afterwards ducheſs of Marlborough) then her lady of the bed-chamber and chief confident, that rather than ſee the king, ſhe would jump out at the window, not knowing but ſhe might be ſent away into France, or put under ſuch reſtraint as might endanger her life. Accordingly, by the help of lady Churchill and lady Berkeley, ſhe left the court in the dead of the night before the day of her father's arrival; and attended by theſe two ladies, went to the biſhop of London's houſe in the city, and there taking coach with all imaginable ſecrecy, the biſhop and the earl of Dorſet conducted her royal highneſs ſafely to Nottingham, where the earl of Devonſhire was in arms, who furniſhed her with ſome money, gave her two hundred men for a guard, and ſhe from thence went to Oxford, where ſhe ſoon after met with her huſband with a detachment of the prince of Orange's forces *.

The ſucceſs of the prince of Orange's expedition has already been fully related: I ſhall therefore only obſerve, that her royal highneſs finding the parliament inclined to ſettle the crown on king William for life, ſhe readily gave her conſent to it; and during the whole of that king's reign, ſhe took care that no diſturbance ſhould be raiſed by her friends, who had preſſed her earneſtly to form an oppoſition. The return ſhe met with for this behaviour has been already enlarged upon in the hiſtory of the laſt reign; it was indeed ſuch as few princeſſes of her expectations could have brooked ſo patiently and ſubmiſſively as herſelf. However, king William's death put an end to her diſagreeable ſituation, and placed her on the throne in the thirty-third year of her age.

The late king dying on Sunday the eighth of March, about eight in the morning, the privy-council that was then aſſembled waited upon her majeſty, and recognized her right and title to the throne: upon which occaſion ſhe made them a ſhort ſpeech, which was delivered with a majeſty and ſweetneſs peculiar to this princeſs in all her public orations: therein ſhe expreſſed her deep ſenſe of the loſs which the nation had ſuſtained by the death of his late majeſty, and of the great weight and burden which it brought upon herſelf in particular: but the ſincere regard ſhe had to the religion and liberties of her country, ſhe ſaid, would influence her to leave nothing undone on her part to preſerve them inviolable, to maintain the ſucceſſion in the proteſtant line, and the government in church and ſtate as by law eſtabliſhed. She alſo declared her firm reſolution to carry on the preparations for oppoſing the exorbitant power of France, and that ſhe would loſe no time in giving her allies all aſſurances that ſhe would purſue the true intereſt of England, together with that of the confederates, for the ſupport of the common cauſe.

As by an act paſſed in the late reign, the parliament continued ſitting even after the king's death, both houſes met immediately; and the lords having deſired a conference with the commons, acquainted them with the death of king William, declaring, that on the demiſe of his late majeſty,

* Her royal highneſs thought it prudent, before ſhe left the court, to write a letter of excuſe to the queen for her ſo ſudden retreat, which was in theſe words:

"Madam, I beg your pardon if I am ſo deeply affected with the ſurpriſing news of the prince being gone, as not to be able to ſee you, but to leave this paper to expreſs my duty to the king and yourſelf, and to let you know that I am going to abſent myſelf, to avoid the king's diſpleaſure, which I am not able to bear either againſt the prince or myſelf; and I ſhall ſtay at ſo great a diſtance as not to return before I hear the happy news of a reconciliation: and as I am confident the prince did not leave the king with any other deſign than to uſe all poſſible means for his preſervation, I hope you will do me the juſtice to believe that I am not capable of following him for any other end. Never was any one in ſuch an unhappy condition; ſo divided between duty and affection, between a father and a huſband; and therefore I know not what to do but to follow one to preſerve the other. I ſee the general defection of the nobility and gentry, who avow to have no other end than to prevail with the king to ſecure their religion, which they ſaw ſo much in danger by the violent counſels of the prieſts, who to promote their own religion did not care to what danger they expoſed the king. I am fully perſuaded that the prince of Orange deſigns the king's ſafety and preſervation, and hope all things may be compaſſed without more bloodſhed, by the calling of a parliament. God grant a happy end to theſe troubles, that the king's reign may be proſperous, and that I may ſhortly ſee you in perfect peace and ſafety: till when, let me beg your majeſty to continue the ſame favourable opinion you have hitherto had of, &c."

the princeſs Anne was the only rightful queen of theſe realms, and that orders had been given for proclaiming her majeſty. The commons readily joined with their lordſhips in recognizing her majeſty's title, and unanimouſly voted an addreſs of condolance and congratulation. In the afternoon the queen was proclaimed with the uſual ceremony, amidſt the loud acclamations of the people; and indeed the joy expreſſed by the whole nation on the acceſſion of queen Anne was obſerved to be greater and more general than had appeared on any other occaſion ſince the Reſtoration of the church and monarchy under king Charles II. The ſame day her majeſty was pleaſed to iſſue a proclamation, by which all magiſtrates and officers civil and military, were continued in the exerciſe of their reſpective functions till further orders.

The queen alſo ſummoned all the late king's miniſters of the kingdom of Scotland who were then in London, to attend her, before whom ſhe took the coronation-oath appointed to be taken by the laws of Scotland, on the acceſſion of a new ſovereign. After which ſhe ſent a commiſſion to the earl of Marchmont, lord-chancellor of that kingdom, to be her commiſſioner in the general aſſembly of the kirk that was then ſitting; and likewiſe diſpatched a letter to the privy-council there, authorizing them to act as her council, and to iſſue proclamations, requiring all officers, civil and military, to continue the exerciſe of their ſeveral offices, declaring her reſolution to protect them in their religion, laws, and liberties; and the like orders were ſent to Ireland, where the joy of the people appeared no leſs ſincere on her majeſty's aſcending the throne than in England.

The next day, being the ninth of March, each houſe of parliament attended her majeſty ſeparately, with an addreſs of condolance and congratulation. The peers, who firſt preſented theirs, aſſured her majeſty of their firm reſolution to ſupport her undoubted right and title, and the ſucceſſion in the proteſtant line, againſt all her enemies whatſoever, being fully ſenſible, they ſaid, that the great loſs they had ſuſtained was no otherwiſe to be repaired but by a vigorous adherence to her majeſty and her allies, in the proſecution of the meaſures already entered into to reduce the exorbitant power of France: that they would exert themſelves to the utmoſt to maintain the balance of Europe, and deſired no time might be loſt in communicating to the allies her majeſty's reſolution of adhering to the alliances already made, which they would exert their utmoſt endeavours to enable her to maintain.

Her majeſty returned the lords her thanks for the aſſurances they gave her, and told them her endeavours ſhould always be very ſincere to promote the true intereſt of England, and ſupport the common cauſe.

The ſame day in the evening, the commons in a body attended her majeſty with their addreſs, in which they condoled with her for the loſs of the late king; but, they ſaid, her majeſty's zeal for their religion and eſtabliſhment gave them a certain proſpect of future happineſs, and moderated their grief, and engaged them unanimouſly to aſſure her, that they would aſſiſt and maintain her majeſty on the throne where God had placed her againſt all her enemies; and alſo that they were firmly reſolved to maintain her majeſty's alliances, and the ſucceſſion of the crown in the proteſtant line, and effectually provide for and make good the public credit of the nation *.

Her majeſty thanked the commons for their aſſurances, and told them they could not be more agreeably confirmed than by giving diſpatch to their preparations for the public ſervice and for the ſupport of the allies. The lord archbiſhop of Canterbury and the other biſhops alſo attended her majeſty with an addreſs of condolance and congratulation, as did the lord-mayor and aldermen of the city of London, and afterwards all the counties and corporations of England.

On the eleventh of March the queen went to the houſe of peers with the uſual ſolemnity, where ſhe delivered this her firſt ſpeech to the parliament:

My lords and gentlemen,

"I cannot too much lament my own unhappineſs in ſucceeding ſo immediately after the loſs of a king, who was the great ſupport not only of theſe kingdoms, but of all Europe; and I am extremely ſenſible of the weight and difficulty it brings upon me.

"But the true concern I have for our religion; for the laws and liberties of England; for the maintaining the ſucceſſion to the crown in the proteſtant line, and the government in church and ſtate, as by law eſtabliſhed, encourages me in this great undertaking, which I promiſe myſelf will be ſucceſsful, by the bleſſing of God, and the continuance of that fidelity and affection of which you have given me ſo full aſſurance.

"The preſent conjuncture of affairs requires the greateſt application and diſpatch; and I am very glad to find in your ſeveral addreſſes ſo unanimous a concurrence in the ſame opinion with me, that too much cannot be done for the encouragement of our allies to reduce the exorbitant power of France.

"I cannot but think it very neceſſary upon this occaſion to deſire you to conſider of proper methods towards obtaining an union between England and Scotland, which has been ſo lately recommended to you as a matter that very nearly concerns the peace and ſecurity of both kingdoms.

Gentlemen of the houſe of commons,

"I need not put you in mind that the revenue for defraying the expences of the civil government is expired.

"I rely entirely upon your affections, for the ſupplying it in ſuch manner as ſhall be moſt ſuitable for the honour and dignity of the crown.

My lords and gentlemen,

"It ſhall be my conſtant endeavour to make you the beſt return for that duty and affection you have expreſſed to me, by a careful and diligent ad-miniſtration for the good of all my ſubjects; and as I know my own heart to be entirely Engliſh, I can very ſincerely aſſure you there is not any thing you can expect or deſire from me which I ſhall not be ready to do for the happineſs and proſperity of England; and you ſhall always find me a ſtrict and religious obſerver of my word."

This ſpeech was extremely agreeable to the parliament, and the two houſes unanimouſly joined in a warm addreſs of thanks to her majeſty for the ſame; and on the fourteenth of March voted, That the ſame revenue which had been ſettled on king William ſhould be ſettled on her majeſty for life *. The ſame day the duke of Bedford and the earl of Marlborough were elected knights companions of the moſt noble order of the garter, and on the 15th the earl was declared captain-general of all her majeſty's forces in England, and of thoſe which were employed abroad in conjunction with her allies. Her majeſty wrote a letter to the States-general to notify the death of king William, and to aſſure them of her reſolution to concur with them in all the meaſures that ſhould be found neceſſary to preſerve the common liberty of Europe, and to reduce the power of France within due bounds. This letter Mr. Stanhope, the Engliſh envoy in Holland, delivered to the States, who immediately publiſhed it, to refute thoſe reports that had been raiſed that the queen would not proſecute the meaſures concerted by king William and the confederates. This letter greatly revived the drooping ſpirits of the States, who had been ſeized with the moſt dreadful conſternation on the firſt news of king William's death: but animated by her majeſty's aſſurances, they now reſolved to proſecute vigorous meaſures; and their reſolutions were ſtill more inſpirited by the arrival of the earl of Marlborough on the twenty-eighth of March, in the quality of her majeſty's ambaſſador extraordinary and plenipotentiary to their High Mightineſſes.

After ſeveral conferences with the penſionary Fagel, and the other miniſters, he was on the thirty-firſt of March, conducted to his public audience of the States General, with great ſolemnity, to whom he made a ſpeech, wherein, after having condoled their mutual loſs, and aſſured them of her majeſty's ſincere deſire to entertain the ſame union, friendſhip, and correſpondence, as had ſubſiſted between the two nations in the preceding reign, he alſo told their High Mightineſſes, that he was farther ordered to aſſure them, that the queen his miſtreſs would not only faithfully obſerve the treaties and alliances already made with them, but was ready to renew and confirm them, and to concur in all the meaſures taken by the late king, in purſuance of the ſaid alliances; that ſhe was alſo willing to aſſiſt the allies with all her forces, by ſea and land, for the preſervation of the liberties of Europe, and reducing the exorbitant power of France; and had ordered him to concur with them in the neceſſary operations for effecting theſe ends †. This ſpeech was anſwered by Dyckvelt, preſident of the week, who, in the name of the States, expreſſed their hearty thanks to her majeſty, and their reſolution of concurring with her in a vigorous proſecution of the common intereſt: to which the preſident added, "that his excellency's perſon would be highly acceptable to them, not only for the queen's choice of him, and for the ſake of king William, who had firſt inveſted him with that character, but alſo for his own merit."

The French king, on the news of William's death, which had filled the court of Verſailles with a joy they could hardly reſtrain within the bounds of common decorum, diſpatched credentials to the ſieur de Barré, whom the count d'Avaux had left at the Hague to manage the affairs of France, together with inſtructions to renew the negotiations with the States, in hope of detaching them from the alliance. De Barré accordingly preſented a memorial to the States, offering them his maſter's friendſhip, which he ſaid he did not doubt they would be ready to cultivate, "now they were no longer under the influence of the deceaſed king:" but gave them to underſtand, at the ſame time, that his maſter's forces were ready to enter upon action, and they muſt now determine whether they would chuſe quiet and liberty, or war and ruin, and the ruin of their trade, ſacrificed to foreign intereſts ‡.

The States, in their anſwer to this memorial (both which they made public), ſaid, "That they had always a high eſteem for his moſt Chriſtian majeſty's friendſhip, and had never done any thing to incur his diſpleaſure; but that the preparations for war upon their frontiers, laid them under the neceſſity of putting themſelves in a poſture of defence, and of aſking aſſiſtance from their allies: that the reſident was miſtaken, if he thought their High Mightineſſes had not as much liberty during the life-time of his Britannic majeſty, to debate and take ſuch reſolutions as they judged neceſſary for their preſervation, as they had at preſent: that they could not indeed enough deplore their misfortune, in being deprived of his wiſe conduct and counſels, whoſe deſerts the republic could never forget; and they were reſolved to follow the ſame principles, and continue the ſame alliances they had entered into in his life-time; and make uſe of ſuch other means as God had put into their hands for maintaining their liberties and religion." Upon this anſwer, the ſieur de Barré diſpatched an expreſs to France; and the earl of Marlborough, having concerted meaſures for beginning the military operations, returned to England.

In the mean time the Engliſh parliament having gone through ſeveral bills, her majeſty came to the houſe on the thirtieth of March, and gave the royal aſſent to the act for the better ſupport of her majeſty's houſhold, and the honour and dignity of the crown; to an act for ſtating the public accounts; and to ſome other acts, which may be ſeen in the notes ‖. After which her majeſty made a ſpeech to both houſes, wherein ſhe told them, it was with great pleaſure that ſhe gave her aſſent to the act for ſtating the public accounts, as ſhe thought it highly reaſonable that her ſubjects ſhould be ſatisfied how the large ſums they had granted her had been expended, eſpecially when their common ſafety ſtill required the continuance of great taxes: at the ſame time ſhe returned the commons thanks for having continued to her, during her life, the ſame revenue they had granted to the late king; telling them, that although it would, in all probability, fall ſhort of what it had formerly produced, ſhe would nevertheleſs give directions that one hundred thouſand pounds thereof ſhould be applied this year to the public ſervice; being willing, ſhe ſaid, to ſtraiten herſelf in her own expences, rather than not contribute all ſhe could to the eaſe and relief of her people, with a juſt regard to the honour and dignity of the crown.

‖ An act for explaining a clauſe in an act made in the parliament begun and holden at Weſtminſter the twenty-ſecond of November, in the ſeventh year of the reign of our ſovereign lord William III. intitled, An act for the better ſecurity of his majeſty's royal perſon and government.

An act for reviving an act, entitled, An act for exempting apothecaries from ſerving the offices of conſtable, ſcavenger, and other pariſh and ward-offices, and from ſerving upon juries.

An act for continuing the act made in the eighth year of his late majeſty's reign, for the better preventing the counterfeiting the current coin of this kingdom.

This popular and generous declaration ſo won upon the parliament, that both houſes preſented her majeſty addreſſes of thanks, in which they took notice of her unparalleled grace and goodneſs, in contributing out of her own revenue to the eaſe and relief of her ſubjects *.

The queen being ſettled in the throne, began to think of forming her miniſtry, wherein ſhe gave evident proofs of her partiality for the Tories: ſhe had, indeed, from her infancy, imbibed ſtrong prejudices againſt the Whigs, whom ſhe conſidered as filled with a republican ſpirit, and by no means friends to the church of England, to which ſhe was moſt zealouſly devoted. The treatment ſhe had met with from her ſiſter and king William, had not a little confirmed her in her diſlike to the Whigs, to whom ſhe imputed that treatment; and her conſort prince George, who had found himſelf equally ſlighted during the preceding reign, encouraged her in her reſentments againſt that party: beſides, the Tories had engaged very warmly in her intereſts in the affair of her revenue, which, though it might have been done principally out of oppoſition to king William, was charged to the account of their affection to her. Theſe circumſtances conſidered, the reader will not be ſurprized to find that the Tories were chiefly conſidered.

On the fourteenth of April, the duke of Devonſhire was conſtituted lord-ſteward of the houſehold; the earl of Jerſey, lord-chamberlain; the earl of Bedford, treaſurer; ſir Edward Seymour, comptroller; and Peregrine Bertie, eſq. vice-chamberlain: two days after, her majeſty, in council, declared his royal highneſs the prince of Denmark generaliſſimo of all her forces by ſea and land. It had been debated, on her majeſty's acceſſion to the throne, whether her princely conſort ſhould have any higher title than he had before: ſome alleged, he ſhould have the name, if not the authority, of King; and inſtanced the examples of Philip of Spain, who married our queen Mary I. and of Henry, lord Darnley, who eſpouſed Mary queen of Scots. As to the firſt, the emperor Charles V. had, before his ſon's marriage, conferred on him the title of king of Naples, Jeruſalem, &c. and not long after reſigned to him all his hereditary dominions; but for the other, he never had any ſovereignty, and ſo was more parallel to the preſent caſe; perhaps the main reaſon that induced the Scots to proclaim him king, was his near relation to the crown of Great Britain. It might alſo have been obſerved, that Francis, dauphin of France, the queen of Scots firſt huſband, had the title of king of Scotland, though in France he was ſtyled only Roy Dauphin (King Dauphin †.) However, the prince of Denmark contented himſelf with the ſame titles and character as before, and was the firſt who did homage to her majeſty at her coronation, which was ſolemnized on the twenty-third of April, as duke of Cumberland. The duke of Ormond was now made commander in chief of all her majeſty's land forces on board the fleet; and the lord Somers, and ſome others of the Whig party, being diſmiſſed from the council-board, the marquis of Normanby, the earl of Abingdon, ſir John Leveſon Gower, ſir Edward Seymour, and John How, eſq. (the ſame who had expreſſed himſelf in ſo indecent terms about the partition-treaty in the laſt reign), were ſworn of the privy council. The privy ſeal was delivered to the marquis of Normanby, and ſir John Leveſon Gower was appointed chancellor of the duchy of Lancaſter; the earl of Rocheſter was continued lord-lieutenant of Ireland, and enjoyed a great ſhare of her majeſty's confidence; and Dr. John Sharpe, archbiſhop of York became her ghoſtly director and counſellor in all eccleſiaſtical affairs. Soon after the earl of Nottingham and ſir Charles Hedges were appointed ſecretaries of ſtate.

There were however ſeveral of the Whig party at this time in the miniſtry: theſe had been admitted in order to gain them over; but the Tories were the preponderating party. When it came to be debated in council, whether England ſhould enter into the war as principals, or only as auxiliaries, the Tories, with the earl of Rocheſter at their head, were for the latter, alleging, that in the late war the emperor and ſome other allies had been very remiſs in furniſhing their quotas, and bringing their troops early into the field, whereby many advantages had been loſt, and the burthen of the war in a manner thrown upon the Engliſh; that their deficiencies were conſtantly ſupplied by England; and when they were put in mind of what they had ſtipulated and engaged for, their inability to perform their parts was accepted as an excuſe; while the Engliſh, from a nice notion of honour, anticipated their revenues, and mortgaged their country in the quarrel: whereas, had they acted only as auxiliaries, they would have had no more to do but to pay the troops ſent to their aſſiſtance, and the ſtreſs and burden of the war muſt have been borne, as it ought to be, by thoſe who were moſt nearly concerned in the event.

The Whigs, however, the chief of whom were the dukes of Devonſhire and Somerſet, inſiſted upon the expediency of our acting as principals: in this opinion they were joined by the earl of Marlborough, between whom and the earl of Rocheſter there was at this time a rivalſhip for the queen's favour: the intereſt of the latter however prevailed; Marlborough was not only the better courtier, but by the canal of his counteſs actually directed the queen in all her reſolutions. He obſerved on this occaſion, that the honour of the nation was concerned to fulfil the king's engagements, and affirmed that France could never be reduced within due bounds unleſs the Engliſh would enter as principals in the quarrel. This allegation was ſtrongly ſupported by the two dukes above-mentioned and the earl of Pembroke, who at length drew over the majority of the council to their ſide, and a declaration was ordered to be prepared againſt France and Spain. Her majeſty, however, thought proper to lay the matter before the houſe of commons, and accordingly Mr. Comptroller, by her command, communicated to them the convention between her majeſty, the emperor, and the States-general; whereupon the commons addreſſed her majeſty with thanks for having condeſcended to adviſe with them before ſhe declared war, and aſſured her that they would to the utmoſt aſſiſt and ſupport her majeſty in carrying on the ſaid war. The queen having the concurrence of the commons, cauſed the following declaration of war againſt France and Spain to be ſolemnly proclaimed on the fourth day of May.

ANNE R.

"Whereas it hath pleaſed Almighty God to call us to the government of theſe realms, at a time when our late dear brother William III. of glorious memory, had, in purſuance of the repeated advice of the parliament of this kingdom, entered into ſolemn treaties of alliance with the emperor of Germany, the States-general of the United Provinces, and other princes and potentates, for preſerving the liberty and balance of Europe, and for reducing the exorbitant power of France; which treaties are grounded upon the unjuſt uſurpations and encroachments of the French king, who had taken, and ſtill keeps poſſeſſion of a great part of the Spaniſh dominions, exerciſing an abſolute authority over all that monarchy, having ſeized Milan and the Spaniſh Low-countries by his armies, and made himſelf maſter of Cadiz, of the entrance into the Mediterranean, and of the ports in the Spaniſh Weſt Indies by his fleets, everywhere deſigning to invade the liberties of Europe, and to obſtruct the freedom of navigation and commerce: and it being provided by the third and fourth articles of the fore-mentioned alliance, That if in the ſpace of two months, which are ſome time ſince expired, injuries complained of were not remedied, the parties concerned ſhould mutually aſſiſt each other with their whole ſtrength: and whereas, inſtead of giving the ſatisfaction that ought juſtly to be expected, the French king has not only proceeded to farther violences, but has added thereunto a great affront and indignity to us and our kingdoms, in taking upon him to declare the pretended prince of Wales king of England, Scotland, and Ireland; and has alſo influenced Spain to concur in the ſame affront and indignity, as well as in his other oppreſſions: we find ourſelves obliged, for maintaining the public faith, for vindicating the honour of our crown, and for preventing the miſchiefs which all Europe is threatened with, to declare, and we do hereby accordingly declare war againſt France and Spain; and placing our entire confidence in the help of Almighty God in ſo juſt and neceſſary an undertaking, we will, in conjunction with our allies, vigorouſly proſecute the ſame by ſea and land, being aſſured of the ready concurrence and aſſiſtance of our ſubjects in a cauſe they have ſo openly and ſo heartily eſpouſed; and we do hereby will and require our lord high-admiral of England, our general of our forces, our lieutenants of our ſeveral counties, governors of our forts and garriſons, and all other officers and ſoldiers under them by ſea and land, to do and execute all acts of hoſtility in the proſecution of this war againſt France and Spain, their vaſſals and ſubjects, and to oppoſe their attempts, willing and requiring all our ſubjects to take notice of the ſame, whom we henceforth ſtrictly forbid to hold any correſpondence or communication with France, Spain, or their ſubjects: but becauſe there are remaining in our kingdoms many of the ſubjects of France and Spain, we do declare our royal intention to be, that all the ſubjects of France and Spain who ſhall demean themſelves dutifully towards us ſhall be ſafe in their perſons and eſtates."

Given at our court at St. James's, the fourth day of May, 1702, in the firſt year of our reign.

Two days after the iſſuing of this declaration lord Godolphin was conſtituted lord high-treaſurer. This office his lordſhip had for ſome time refuſed, until he was over-ruled by the perſuaſions of the earl of Marlborough, to whoſe eldeſt daughter his ſon was married. This nobleman refuſed to command the forces abroad unleſs the treaſury was put into the hands of Godolphin, on whoſe punctuality in point of remittances he knew he could depend. The ſame day her majeſty was pleaſed to appoint George prince of Denmark lord high-admiral, though to do this it was requiſite to remove the earl of Pembroke, then lord high-admiral, who was actually preparing to go to ſea. It is true a large penſion was offered him; but his lordſhip anſwered with a generoſity and ſpirit not often to be met with, That however convenient it might be for his private intereſt, yet the accepting ſuch a penſion was inconſiſtent with his principles; and ſince he could not have the honour of ſerving his country in perſon, he would endeavour to do it by his example *. The new lord high-admiral had a council appointed him by his commiſſion, viz. ſir George Rooke, ſir David Mitchel, George Churchill, eſq. and Richard Hill, eſq. who were to aſſiſt him with their advice, and alſo in the execution of his office.

The two houſes now joined in an addreſs to her majeſty, that ſhe would prevail with the emperor, the States-general, and the reſt of her allies, to prohibit all trade and correſpondence with France, and enter into meaſures with the Dutch for protecting the foreign trade of both nations. The Lords alſo addreſſed her majeſty to encourage privateers and adventurers who ſhould endeavour to poſſeſs themſelves of the Spaniſh dominions in America, this being the only part of the world where the nation could gain any advantage by the war on the terms of the grand alliance; but unfortunately this advice was neglected. Her ma-jeſty having been pleaſed, by order of council, to require that the princeſs Sophia, electreſs-dowager of Hanover (by act of parliament appointed next in ſucceſſion to her majeſty, in caſe ſhe ſhould leave no iſſue behind her) ſhould be prayed for in churches, &c. both lords and commons voted her thanks for her great zeal for the ſucceſſion of the crown in the proteſtant line, expreſſed in her ſaid order.

And now the violent Tories in the lower houſe, who were moſt of them Jacobites, perceiving that every thing was conducted with vigour and diſpatch, reſolved to ſtart ſome ſubject which might, if not defeat, at leaſt retard the proſecution of the war. With this view they moved for an addreſs, "That no perſon who was not a native of England, Scotland, or Ireland, or at leaſt of Engliſh parents, unleſs they were formerly in half pay, ſhould be an officer in her majeſty's new-raiſed forces." This motion was ſuppoſed to be meant as a reflection on the memory of the late king, who was accuſed of an immoderate attachment to foreigners: the motion however was ſilenced, and the enemies of the government for this time put to confuſion. This however was but a ſmall part of the inſults aimed at the character of the late king; for about this time a report was induſtriouſly ſpread, that he had formed a deſign to exclude the princeſs Anne from the crown, and to get the elector of Hanover declared his immediate ſucceſſor; a report which gained ſo much credit, that the city of Norwich, in their addreſs to the queen, printed in the Gazette of the thirtieth of April, congratulated her majeſty's happy acceſſion to the throne, "notwithſtanding the malicious deſigns and contrivances uſed to defeat her majeſty of her undoubted right."

Hereupon ſeveral peers, friends to the Revolution and the memory of the late king, inſiſted that a proper ſcrutiny ſhould be made into the matter; and after a ſtrict and ſcrupulous ſearch among the papers his majeſty had left behind him, nothing appeared on which ſuch a ſtory could with truth be founded. The houſe of lords therefore voted the ſaid report to be a villainous attempt to diſhonour the late king's memory, and humbly beſought her majeſty to cauſe the authors or publiſhers of ſuch a report to be proſecuted by the attorney-general; and Dr. Drake being charged with having ſuggeſted ſomething of this kind in a pamphlet he publiſhed, entitled, The Hiſtory of the laſt Parliament, he was brought before the houſe, when he ſeemed to be under a ſtrange ſurprize and abſence of thought at his examination: for being aſked, if he had heard any perſons ſay that they could charge any perſons whatever with ſuch ſpeeches? he anſwered, he did not know of any ſuch perſon: and on being aſked farther, if in any of the pamphlets he had cited as obnoxious, there was any thing ſaid about ſetting aſide her preſent majeſty? the doctor anſwered, he did not remember there was: and yet it appears, that about the ſame time there was a pamphlet cited by the doctor under their lordſhips conſideration, entitled, "Reaſons for addreſſing his majeſty to invite into England their highneſſes the electreſs-dowager and the electoral prince of Hanover;" written by Toland: wherein it was expreſsly ſaid, that it appears from hiſtory, "That all free people have ſet aſide the children of tyrants, for reaſons of eternal and univerſal force, as inheriting the principles and deſigns of their parents, bearing an affection to their friends, and owing revenge to their enemies." And their lordſhips were ſo well ſatisfied of the drift of this clauſe, and others of the like nature, that they paſſed their cenſures on theſe pamphlets, and ordered the authors to be proſecuted for the ſame: and indeed thoſe gentlemen and their zealous brethren were much leſs forward in giving credit to ſuch a report, when they had ſeen his majeſty make the earl of Rocheſter, uncle to the princeſs Anne, his prime miniſter, and the earl of Marlborough, who was her principal confidant, general of his armies, and ambaſſador and plenipotentiary to his allies *. But to proceed:

As the queen in her ſpeech had recommended an union between England and Scotland, a bill was introduced into parliament to empower her majeſty to name commiſſioners to treat with the Scots on that ſubject. The Tories endeavoured all in their power to defeat this bill; but the meaſure was ſo plainly conducive to the intereſt of England, and the ſupport of the preſent government, that notwithſtanding all their efforts it paſſed through both houſes, and at laſt received the royal aſſent. The buſineſs of the ſeſſion being finiſhed, on the twenty-fifth of May the queen went to the houſe of peers; and after giving her aſſent to ſeveral public and private bills, prorogued the parliament to the ſeventh day of July †, after having in a ſhort ſpeech thanked them for their zeal, recommended unanimity, and declared ſhe would carefully preſerve and maintain the act of toleration.

In the beginning of June her majeſty was pleaſed to appoint Simon Harcourt, eſq. to be ſollicitor-general, and to confer the honour of knighthood both upon him and Mr. Northey, attorney-general. In the ſame month great alterations were made of general officers, viz. the earl of Rivers and Charles Churchill, eſq. were made lieutenants-general; ſir Charles O'Hara, William Selwyn, and Richard Ingoldſby, eſq. majors-general; and the earl of Arran, the lord Windſor, Cornelius Wood, Hatton Compton, William Lloyd, Guſtavus Hamilton, and William Seymour, brigadiers-general; and William Matthews, eſq. brigadier-general of her majeſty's guards. The prince of Denmark was conſtituted conſtable of Dover-caſtle, and lord-warden of the Cinque-ports. The honourable John Granville was appointed lord-warden of the ſtannaries; and the earl of Carberry, governor of Milford-haven. His royal highneſs was pleaſed to appoint Charles earl of Winchelſea lieutenant of

† In this ſhort ſeſſion the queen gave her aſſent to the following acts, viz. an act obliging the Jews to maintain and provide for their proteſtant children. By this act, if any Jewiſh parent, with a view to compel his proteſtant child to change his religion, ſhould refuſe ſuch a child maintenance ſuitable to the ability of the parent, and the age and education of the child, the lord-chancellor was empowered to make ſuch an order for the maintenance of the child as to him ſhould ſeem moſt proper and convenient. An act for continuing the impriſonment of Counter, and other conſpirators againſt king William. An act for the relief of the proteſtant purchaſers of the forfeited eſtates in Ireland. An act for enlarging the time for taking the oath of abjuration. By this act it was declared treaſonable for any one to attempt the hindering any perſon who was or ſhould be next in ſucceſſion, according to the act of ſettlement for ſucceeding to the crown on the death of her majeſty.

Dover-caſtle and the Cinque-ports; and the lord viſcount Weymouth, the lord Dartmouth, ſir John Trevor maſter of the Rolls, ſir Thomas Trevor lord chief-juſtice of the Common-pleas, and the honourable John Granville, eſq. were ſworn of her majeſty's privy-council; the earl of Marlborough was alſo made maſter of the ordnance.

In the mean time William Fuller, an infamous impoſtor, who had repeatedly abuſed the patience both of the lords and commons, on pretence of making ſome important diſcoveries concerning the birth of the pretended prince of Wales, was brought to his trial at the bar of the Queen's Bench, upon an information for contriving and publiſhing ſeveral ſcandalous libels, particularly one, entitled, "Original Letters from the late King James," &c. It appeared at this trial, that Fuller had been cenſured by the houſe of commons in the year 1691, for crimes of the like nature, for which he was proſecuted at common law, and puniſhed; notwithſtanding which he ſtill perſiſted in his villainous practices. It appeared alſo, that he had applied himſelf to ſome of the miniſtry, pretending to make diſcoveries, as above-mentioned; and though the ſtories were ſo very fooliſhly laid together, that they could never obtain any credit with reaſonable people, yet the commonalty gave great credit to them. Fuller would have trifled with the court of Queen's Bench, as he had formerly done with the two houſes of parliament, pretending, that if they would allow him time, he would produce witneſſes to the truth of what he had affirmed; but the impoſture was ſo notorious, that the jury found him guilty without withdrawing, and the lord chief-juſtice Holt ſentenced him to ſtand thrice in the pillory; to be ſent to the houſe of correction, there to be whipped, and kept to hard labour for five months; to pay a fine of one thouſand marks, and to remain in priſon till it was paid.

It is now time to ſhift the ſcene, and take a view of the affairs of Scotland, where a warm conteſt had ariſen between the Revolutioniſts and thoſe in the oppoſition, concerning the exiſtence of the preſent parliament. I have already taken notice that the queen, on her acceſſion, ſent a letter to the privy-council of that kingdom, to continue to act till farther orders. Her majeſty, not long after, thought fit to ſend them another letter, in anſwer to one the late king had received, concerning their trade to Africa and the Indies, and the union with England, wherein her majeſty tells them, ſhe would maintain the ſovereignty and independency of that her antient kingdom, and be as tender of their rights as of her kingdom of England; that ſhe would govern each kingdom according to their reſpective laws, and endeavour to avoid all misunderſtandings and differences between them; to that end ſhe would endeavour to eſtabliſh an union between them. That the parliament of England having ſhewn ſuch an inclination towards an union, ſhe hoped the parliament of Scotland would not obſtruct the deſign. That the late king had ordered, that none of the ſubjects of Scotland ſhould be impreſſed for the Engliſh ſea-ſervice, and ſhe would continue to protect them in this matter. She regretted their loſſes and diſappointments in their trade to Africa and the Indies; and in ſettling a colony in America, which was now a misfortune to the whole kingdom: ſhe would concur in any propoſals for their reparation and aſſiſtance; and ſhe would encourage not only the trade of that company, but of the whole kingdom, and to the utmoſt of her power promote the welfare of her people *.

Notwithſtanding theſe aſſurances, and that her majeſty had taken the coronation oath of that kingdom, in the preſence of twelve Scottiſh counſellors, then in London, thoſe who wanted to embroil affairs, affirmed that this was an irregular way of proceeding, and that the oath ought to have been tendered by perſons deputed for that purpoſe, either by the parliament, or the privy-council of the kingdom: they alſo clamoured loudly for the calling a new parliament; while the preſent miniſtry, conſiſting of the duke of Queenſberry, the earls of Marchmont, Melvil, Seafield, Selkirk, and Hyndford, who were ſtaunch Revolutioniſts, were deſirous that the preſent parliament ſhould continue, in purſuance of a late act for continuing the parliament that ſhould be then in being, ſix months after the death of the late king, and that it ſhould aſſemble in twenty days after that event: but the queen having, by ſeveral adjournments, deferred the meeting almoſt three months after the king's deceaſe, the Antirevolutioniſts therefore affirmed it was diſſolved; and the duke of Hamilton, who was at the head of this party, together with the marquis of Tweddale, the earls Mariſchal and Rothes, and many other gentlemen, repaired to London, in order to make the queen acquainted with their objections to the continuance of the preſent parliament. The duke of Queenſberry, however, having warmly repreſented to the queen and her Engliſh miniſtry, that the calling another parliament at this juncture might occaſion tumults in Scotland; and, moreover, that it could not be convened time enough for her majeſty's ſervice, which required immediate ſupplies of men and money for the war; he carried his point, and orders were ſent from England for the parliament of Scotland to meet, according to their laſt adjournment, on the ninth day of June, Queenſberry himſelf being appointed high-commiſſioner for holding the ſame.

Duke Hamilton finding himſelf baffled in his deſigns haſtened back to Scotland, and, on the day of the parliament's meeting, deſired to be heard before the queen's high-commiſſion was read, which being granted, his grace, in behalf of himſelf and the other members who adhered to him, objected, in a long ſpeech, againſt the legality of their meeting; after which he read a paper, containing theſe words:

"Foraſmuch as by the fundamental laws and conſtitutions of this kingdom, all parliaments do diſſolve by the death of the king or queen, except in ſo far as is innovated by the ſeventeenth act of the ſixth ſeſſion of king William's parliament, impowering the parliament laſt in being at his majeſty's death to meet and act what ſhould be needful for the defence of the true proteſtant religion, as now by law eſtabliſhed, and maintaining the ſucceſſion to the crown as ſettled by the claim of rights, and for preſerving and ſecuring the peace and ſafety of the kingdom; and now ſeeing that the ſaid ends are fully ſatisfied by her majeſty's ſucceſſion to the throne, whereby the religion and peace of the kingdom are ſecured, we conceive ourſelves not warranted by this law to meet, ſit, or act; therefore do diſſent from all that ſhall be done, and thereupon take inſtrument*."

The duke having accordingly taken inſtruments, he went out of the houſe, but without giving in his paper; thereupon the clerk-regiſter and ſeventy-nine of the members declared that they adhered to duke Hamilton's paper, and likewiſe took inſtruments and withdrew. But nevertheleſs the duke of Queenſberry, having a greater number remaining with him in the houſe, his commiſſion to be her majeſty's high-commiſſioner was read, and afterwards a letter from her majeſty to the parliament, wherein ſhe told them, that it would have been a great ſatisfaction to her, at her acceſſion, to have met them in perſon; but the multiplicity of weighty affairs deprived her of that opportunity: however, ſhe gave them full aſſurance, that ſhe was firmly reſolved to maintain and protect them in the full poſſeſſion of their religion, laws, and liberties, "and of the preſbyterian government of the church:" that ſhe had been obliged, in purſuance of an expreſs article of treaty entered into by the late king and her allies, to declare war againſt France and Spain, wherein ſhe expected their hearty concurrence and aſſiſtance: and laſtly, ſhe earneſtly recommended to their conſideration an union of the two kingdoms.

The queen's letter being read, the duke of Queenſberry and the earl of Marchmont, in ſeparate ſpeeches, enforced the ſeveral points therein; and the parliament meeting again on the eleventh of June, proceeded to appoint committees for the ſecurity of the kingdom; for controverted elections; for drawing up an anſwer to her majeſty's letter; and for reviſing the minutes: then they paſſed an act for recognizing her majeſty's authority; another for declaring the preſent parliament to be a lawful parliament; and another for ſecuring the proteſtant religion and preſbyterian church-government, upon which there happened great debates and ſeveral warm ſpeeches; and among the reſt one of ſir Alexander Bruce, in which he had given vent to ſuch ſtinging reflections againſt rigid preſbytery as drew upon him the ſevere cenſure of the houſe, which ended in his expulſion; and, notwithſtanding all the oppoſition thoſe of the epiſcopal communion could make, the act paſſed; and the parliament tranſmitted an anſwer to the queen's letter, wherein, after expatiating on the bleſſings for which they were indebted to the late king, by the preſervation and ſettlement of their religion, laws, and liberties, they lamented their misfortune of being deprived of her majeſty's royal preſence, who had ſhewn herſelf diſpoſed to adopt the gracious reſolutions of their late ſovereign in regard to them, and particularly the preſbyterian government as then eſtabliſhed. That the growing power and unbounded ambition of the French king, and his owning the pretended prince of Wales as king, having engaged her majeſty in a juſt and neceſſary war, they promiſed to raiſe ſupplies for the defence of their kingdom; and aſſure her, that the groundleſs ſeceſſion of ſome members ſhould increaſe and ſtrengthen their care and zeal for her majeſty's ſervice, and what ſhe had recommended to them: and as the union of the kingdoms had been ſo long deſired by all good men, they were reſolved to make ſuch a ſuitable return to the advances already made by the parliament of England, as might beſt contribute to accompliſh this great deſign.

In the mean time, however, the duke of Hamilton and his party had prepared an addreſs to the queen, to juſtify their withdrawing themſelves, ſhewing, that, by the conſtitution of Scotland, the convention or parliament was diſſolved by the death of the late king. This addreſs they ſent up to London by the lord Blantyre; but her majeſty refuſed to receive it, and adhered to the parliament; to which ſhe ſent the following Letter:

Anne R.

"My lords and gentlemen,

"Being informed, that at your firſt meeting, by virtue and warrant of the ſeventeenth act of the ſixth ſeſſion of this parliament, and of our proclamation of adjournment agreeable thereto, ſeveral members of parliament, after prayers ſaid, and declining to wait the reading of our commiſſion granted to James, duke of Queenſberry, repreſenting our royal perſon in this meeting of parliament, did preſume to declare openly, that they did not conceive themſelves warranted to meet and act in this preſent ſeſſion of parliament, and therefore diſſented from any thing that ſhould be done or acted therein, and thereupon did take inſtruments, and withdrew and removed from their attendance; we have thought fit to ſignify to you our juſt reſentment of that irregular and unuſual proceeding, and our reſolution to own and maintain this preſent ſeſſion of parliament, and the dignity and authority of the ſame, and of our high-commiſſioner thereto, againſt all oppoſers: and this we thought fit to declare for your better encouragement, that you may proceed vigorouſly in your work, for the defence of the true proteſtant religion, and the maintaining the poſſeſſion of the crown, and for the preſerving and ſecuring of the peace and ſafety of the kingdom. And ſo we bid you heartily farewell.

"Given at our court at St. James's, the ſeventeenth day of June, 1702, and of our reign in the firſt year."

On the twenty-fifth of June, the high-commiſſioner gave the royal aſſent to an act for enabling her majeſty to appoint commiſſioners for treating of an union between the two kingdoms; after which it was propoſed to ſettle the ſucceſſion of the Scottiſh crown in the houſe of Hanover, as had been done in England; but there appearing a majority againſt ſettling the ſucceſſion at this time, and the debates running very high, the lord-commiſſioner thought fit to adjourn them on the thirtieth of June, having firſt commended their unanimity and chearfulneſs in recognizing her majeſty, ſecuring the proteſtant religion and preſbyterian church-government, and diſpatching the other acts for her majeſty's ſervice.

Soon

Soon after, the queen, in conſequence of the power given her by the acts of parliament of both kingdoms, appointed commiſſioners for treating of an union between England and Scotland.

The commiſſioners for England were,

The archbiſhop of Canterbury,
Lord keeper Wright,
The earl of Pembroke,
The marquis of Normanby,
The duke of Devonſhire,
The duke of Somerſet,
The earl of Jerſey,
The earl of Burlington,
The earl of Nottingham,
The earl of Rocheſter,
The earl of Marlborough,
The earl of Scarborough,
The biſhop of London,
Sir Charles Hedges,
The chief juſtice Holt,
The chief juſtice Trevor,
Sir John Leveſon Gower,
Sir Chriſtopher Muſgrave,
Sir John Cook, L L. D.
Robert Harley,
Charles Godolphin,
Samuel Clarke,
Stephen Waller, LL. D.

The commiſſioners of Scotland were,

The duke of Queenſberry,
The duke of Argyle,
The marquis of Annandale,
The marquis of Lothian,
The earl of Seafield,
The earl of Hyndford,
The earl of Leven,
The viſcount Tarbat,
The viſcount Stair,
The lord Galloway,
The lord Boyle,
Sir James Stuart,
Sir George Maxwell,
Sir James Smollet,
Sir Alexander Douglas,
Sir David Dalrymple,
Sir Patrick Johnſtown,
Mr. Montgomery,
Mr. Scrimſer,
The provoſt of Aberdeen.

Dr. Davenant was appointed ſecretary to the Engliſh commiſſioners, and Robert Pringle to thoſe for Scotland *.

On the twenty-ſecond of October, the commiſſioners met, for the firſt time, at the Cockpit, where, after both commiſſions had been read, the lord-keeper Wright made a ſhort ſpeech on the ſubject, and was anſwered by the duke of Queenſberry. On the thirtieth of the next month they adjuſted the preliminaries, which imported, "that nothing agreed on among themſelves ſhould be binding, unleſs it be ratified by her majeſty and the reſpective parliament of both nations; and that, unleſs all the heads propoſed for the treaty were agreed to, no particular thing agreed ſhall be binding." The lord-keeper then propoſed on the part of England, "That the two kingdoms ſhould be inſeparably united in one monarchy, under her majeſty, her heirs and ſucceſſors; and under the ſame limitations as provided by the act of ſettlement." This propoſal met with the ready acquieſcence of the Scots. The duke of Queenſberry then propoſed, "That both nations ſhould be united under one monarchy and one parliament, with a mutual communication of trade and privileges." In the mean time the queen, willing to quicken their deliberations, came to the aſſembly, and made them a ſpeech, wherein ſhe ſaid, "ſhe was ſo fully perſuaded that a union of the two kingdoms would prove the happineſs of both, and render this iſland more formidable than ever, that ſhe wiſhed the treaty might be brought to a ſpeedy concluſion." Some days after, the Scots gave in ſix propoſals; but they were ſo extravagant, eſpecially one, by which they demanded the preſervation of the rights and privileges of their company trading to Africa and the Indies, that the Engliſh commiſſioners could not comply with them, and nothing more was done upon this commiſſion, which was annulled by the new Scottiſh parliament called by the queen. The tranquility of Ireland ſuffered no interruption at this time. The earl of Rocheſter, who, though lord-lieutenant of that kingdom, continued to reſide wholly in England, committed the government of it to lords-juſtices: the earl of Mount Alexander, major-general Erle, and Thomas Knightley, eſq. were appointed lords-juſtices in the room of the archbiſhop of Dublin and the earl of Drogheda.

We are now entering upon a war, the moſt glorious to England and her allies, if we conſider her almoſt uninterrupted ſucceſſes for the ſeveral years it laſted, that ever was known. The emperor and the States-general publiſhed their reſpective declarations of war againſt France and Spain much about the ſame time that queen Anne iſſued her's. The emperor's declaration turned chiefly upon the flagrant injury which had been done to the Auſtrian family by the French king's accepting the will made by the late king of Spain, Charles II. in favour of his grand-ſon the duke of Anjou. That of the States ſet forth in ſubſtance, "That Lewis had long ſince caſt his eyes upon their provinces: that he had twice attacked their republic (namely, in the years 1672 and 1688) by a moſt unjuſt war, in order to make his way to univerſal monarchy: that ſo far was he from deſigning to obſerve the treaty of Ryſwick, that he thereby ſolely aimed at lulling the allies aſleep, by making them lay down their arms, and particularly by ruining the commerce of the Dutch, to enervate them, ſince that treaty was ſcarcely ratified before he began manifeſtly to encroach on their trade, which is the great ſinew of their ſtate, by openly refuſing the tariff promiſed by that treaty †.

The French king affected to be greatly incenſed at theſe declarations, eſpecially that of the States, of whom he ſpoke in the moſt contemptuous terms; but, notwithſtanding all his vapouring, he was not ready to publiſh his declaration of war till the beginning of July, when it came forth to the following effect:

By the King.

"Although the treaty concluded at Ryſwick, at a time when the king, by the ſuperiority of his forces, was in a condition to have given laws to the neighbouring princes, that were jealous of his power, was a certain proof of the ſincere deſire that his majeſty had always to give peace to his ſubjects, and to reſtore peace to Europe; his majeſty nevertheleſs finds that the emperor, without any lawful right to the Spaniſh monarchy, hath put himſelf in a condition, by the augmentation of his troops, by treaties and alliances with ſeveral princes, and particularly with England and the States-general of the United Provinces, to trouble the repoſe of Europe by a new war, as unjuſt as it is ill-grounded. They have begun hoſtilities on all ſides, againſt and contrary to the treaties ſo ſolemnly ſworn to. All Europe is witneſs of his majeſty's moderation; he hath ſeen places attacked, advantageous poſts ſeized, convoys ſtopped, and priſoners taken, before any declaration of war, and at a time when his majeſty was endeavouring, by his ambaſſadors and envoys, to preſerve the peace. All theſe ſteps being ſo contrary to ſincere dealing, and their own intereſts, and the manifeſtos and declarations of war of the emperor, England, and the States-general, having been publiſhed, his majeſty finds himſelf under an indiſpenſible neceſſity (in order to preſerve his own and the king his grand-ſon's dominions) to arm on his ſide, and to make levies ſufficient to oppoſe the undertakings of the common enemies; and for that end his majeſty is reſolved to employ all his forces, by ſea and land, and (by the help of divine protection, which he implores on the juſtneſs of his cauſe) to declare war againſt the emperor, England, the States-general of the United Provinces, and the princes their allies: his majeſty orders all his ſubjects, vaſſals, and ſervants, to cruize upon the ſubjects of the emperor, England, and Holland," &c. &c.

In the mean time, Lewis obſerving what a formidable confederacy was forming againſt him, left no ſtone unturned to draw over the German princes to his intereſt, and did not only ſucceed in his attempts upon the electors of Bavaria and Cologne, but prevailed alſo with the two dukes of Wolfenbuttle, Rodolphus and Anthony, to raiſe forces in the empire in his favour: whereupon the old duke of Zell, by the emperor's direction, made an incurſion into their country, in order to compel them by force of arms to abandon the intereſts of the common enemy. This ſucceeded ſo well, that, after the duke of Zell had made himſelf maſter of ſeveral ſtrong holds in the ſaid principality, he blocked up Wolfenbuttle itſelf *. The two brothers, Rodolphus and Anthony, then held the regency together: Anthony, whether out of generoſity, not to forſake his friend and ally, who had ſo well paid him, and from whom, perhaps, he expected greater advantages, or out of obſtinacy, ſhewed no inclination to quit the French intereſt; and though the duke of Holſtein-Ploen uſed all his endeavours to perſuade him to underſtand his own good, he could never bring him to hearken to reaſon. But Rodolphus, either terrified by the impending danger, or deſirous to have the regency to himſelf, began to incline to a compoſition: accordingly, a negociation was ſet on foot, which ended in an agreement between the duke of Zell and the elector of Hanover, his nephew, and Rodolphus Auguſtus of Wolfenbuttle, to this effect: "That duke Anthony Ulric ſhould be excluded from the regency; that Rodolphus ſhould take the government into his own hands, and quit all his engagements with France: on the other ſide, that the elector of Hanover and the duke of Zell ſhould take into their ſervice a thouſand horſe, and two thouſand four hundred foot, of the troops of Wolfenbuttle, which had been raiſed with French money, and withdraw their own forces out of the principality."

The war was begun in the name of the elector Palatine, with the ſiege of Keyſerſwaert †, a ſtrong town on the Rhine, which the elector of Cologne had put into the hands of the French. The place was inveſted, in the month of April, by the prince of Naſſau Saarburgh, mareſchal du camp to the emperor: under this officer the Dutch troops ſerved as auxiliaries, becauſe war had not yet been declared by the States-general; at the ſame time prince Lewis of Baden aſſembled an army upon the Upper Rhine, in the neighbourhood of Crooh Weiſſemberg and Lauterburg, to cut off the communication between Landau and Straſburgh, and the country of Alſace. The badneſs of the weather and the overflowing of the Rhine retarded the beſiegers ſo much, that Keyſerſwaert was not taken till the ſeventeenth of June; and marſhal Boufflers, who commanded the French army under the duke of Burgundy, eldeſt grand-ſon of France, was very near ſurprizing the city of Nimeguen, while the allies were engaged in the ſiege: the earl of Athlone, who commanded a ſeparate army of the Dutch, arrived ſcarce an hour before the French, and poſted his army under the walls of Nimeguen, whereby he prevented the loſs of that important place; for which he received the thanks of the States-general. Coehorn, with a detachment of ten thouſand men, broke into Flanders, forced and demoliſhed the French lines between the two forts of St. Donat and Iſabella, which the enemy had been for many months raiſing, with great labour and expence, and laid the greateſt part of the Chatellany of Bruges under contribution: but, upon the approach of the marquis of Bedmar and count de la Motte, he was obliged to retire under the walls of Sluys*; and, to prevent their taking fort St. George, he laid the country under water.

The unſucceſsful attempt upon Nimeguen, and the reduction of Keyſerſwaert, were not the only mortifications which the French ſuffered; for their army in Germany being weak, and drawing together but ſlowly, under the command of marſhal de Catinat, prince Lewis of Baden ſeized this advantage, and laid ſiege to Landau †, on the ſixth of June; but the place being ſtrong, and defended by a numerous garriſon, held out till the beginning of September, when prince Lewis informed the king of the Romans that the town was upon the point of ſurrendering, who came unto the Imperial army, and was preſent when the garriſon beat a parley, on the tenth of September, and conſequently had the honour of that conqueſt ‡.

The States-general had now completed their levies, and waited only for the Engliſh to begin jointly with them the operations of the campaign in Flanders, while the combined ſquadrons of both nations prepared to carry terror and deſtruction on the coaſt of France and Spain. With this view they ſent to preſs the coming over of the earl of Marlborough, to take upon him the ſupreme command of the allied army. It is ſaid, that the queen was at firſt deſirous, out of her affection to her conſort, the prince of Denmark, to inveſt him with that high character, and had actually propoſed this meaſure to the States-general; which, however, was not received in the manner ſhe wiſhed and expected. Thoſe people thought that a war of ſuch importance as that which they were going to enter upon, required a general to conduct it, who poſſeſſed the confidence of both nations, and had already diſtinguiſhed himſelf in a military capacity; now this advantage was wanting in the prince of Denmark, while the earl of Marlborough poſſeſſed it in an eminent degree: the queen, therefore, very prudently gave up this point to her allies, and, to make the prince ſome amends for his diſappointment, had created him (as we have ſeen) lord high-admiral of England, one of the moſt honourable and lucrative poſts in the ſtate; and the earl of Marlborough was confirmed in the ſupreme command of the Britiſh forces in Germany, to which he had been appointed by the late king. Accordingly, on the twelfth of May, his lordſhip ſet out for Holland, in order to aſſume the command. The earl of Athlone, who enjoyed the rank of veldt (or field) marſhal, was requeſted by ſome of the Dutch officers to inſiſt upon an equal command with the Engliſh general; but the States obliged him to yield that point in favour of Marlborough, whom they declared generaliſſimo of all their forces. As this nobleman became afterwards the greateſt general of the age, it will not be improper to give a brief account of his life and character.

John Churchill, earl (afterwards duke) of Marlborough, was ſecond ſon of ſir Winſton Churchill, of Wotton Baſſet, in Wiltſhire, by Elizabeth, daughter of ſir John Drake, of Aſhe, in Devonſhire, at which place he was born, on the twenty-fourth of June, 1650 §. He was brought young to court, and made a page of honour to the duke of York, who, upon his diſcovering a natural inclination to a military life, procured him, at the age of ſixteen, an enſign's commiſſion in the guards. He afterwards went to ſerve in the French armies abroad, where he diſtinguiſhed himſelf in a particular manner; and, upon his return to England, the fame of his bravery, and his ſiſter's intereſt ‖, raiſed him to be a lieutenant-colonel, gentleman of the bed-chamber and maſter of the robes to the duke of York, whom he attended in his retirement to Bruſſels, and afterwards to Scotland. In 1681, he married Sarah, daughter and co-heireſs of Richard Jennings, of Sandridge, in Hertfordſhire, who was then in great favour with the princeſs Anne, the duke of York's ſecond daughter. Upon the duke's return from Scotland, colonel Churchill was created baron Churchill, of Aymouth, in Scotland, and appointed captain of the third troop of horſe-guards. When the duke of York came to the crown, lord Churchill was made lieutenant-general, and ſent ambaſſador to the court of France, to notify that prince's acceſſion to the throne. In 1685, he was created an Engliſh peer, by the title of baron Churchill, of Sandridge, in Hertfordſhire. We have taken notice of the part he acted at the Revolution, when he left his old maſter and benefactor, and went over to the prince of Orange, who, as ſoon as he aſcended the throne, created him earl of Marlborough. The new earl commanded the Engliſh forces that ſerved, in the year 1689, in Flanders, under prince Waldeck; and next year he reduced the city of Cork and town of Kingſale for king William. This town was the great magazine where the French, after they had plundered moſt of the towns of the Palatinate in 1688, laid up the booty, all which was burnt by an accidental fire in May, 1689. It was now taken from the French by the Germans, but they retook it in 1703, as will be ſeen in the hiſtory of the next campaign. § His origin is traced up to Roger de Courcil, a younger branch of the illuſtrious houſe of Leon, in France, who attending William the Conqueror into England, received for his ſervices a conſiderable eſtate in land; was grandfather to ſir Bartholomew de Courcil, by corruption called Currichel, and ſo Churchill, who held the caſtle of Briſtol for king Stephen; and whoſe deſcendant, Otho de Churchill, was the founder of a ſpreading family in Devonſhire, Somerſetſhire, and Wiltſhire. Of this laſt county, and of the town of Wotton Baſſet, was Winſton Churchill, eſq. who having had a liberal education at St. John's college, Oxford, aſſerted and ſuffered for the cauſe of king Charles I. but upon the Reſtoration was choſen member of parliament for Weymouth, admitted fellow of the Royal Society, ſoon after knighted and appointed commiſſioner of the claims in Ireland, where he began to retrieve his broken fortune; and afterwards, by the favour of the duke of York, made one of the clerk comptrollers of green-cloth to the king. She was afterwards married to colonel Godfrey, and by him had two daughters, Charlotta, wife of Hugh Boſcawen, viſcount Falmouth; and Elizabeth, wife of Edward Dunch, eſq.

1692, he was ſuddenly removed from all his employments, for reaſons which have been already related under that year, and continued out of favour till 1698, when he was appointed governor to the duke of Glocester. In 1701, the laſt of king William's reign, he was declared commander in chief of the Engliſh forces in Holland, and ambaſſador extraordinary and plenipotentiary for the negotiations at the Hague, in which employments he was continued by queen Anne ‡.

The earl of Marlborough, ſays a late hiſtorian in his Life of Queen Anne, was by nature deſigned for a FAVOURITE, by fortune and perſonal merit raiſed to be a GENERAL, and by his own obſervation and long experience of court-intrigues, made a STATESMAN. His perſon was lofty and well made; his features manly, yet beautiful; his looks gracious and open; his mien great; his parts quick; his memory faithful and exact; his penetration deep; his judgment ſolid; his courage undaunted.

Although Marlborough had not yet ſhone at the head of armies, yet he had ſo far diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the ſeveral actions in which he had been engaged, or had borne a ſhare in the command, that he was thought the moſt proper perſon to fill the place of king William. Trained up to arms in the military ſchool of the great Turenne, he had more than once received the approbation and thanks of that conſummate maſter in the art of war for his gallant behaviour; and his after-conduct ſhewed how well he had profited by his leſſons. Equally ſkilled in the intrigues of the cabinet and of the field, he poſſeſſed the happy art of gaining upon the minds of all thoſe he dealt with: endowed with an exquiſite diſcernment, he diſcovered a lucky moment the inſtant it preſented itſelf, and failed not to avail himſelf of it with ſucceſs, both in negotiating and fighting: as a ſoldier, he was a man of nice honour, punctual, vigilant, and indefatigable: as a ſtateſman, he managed variety of buſineſs, either ſingle or in concert with the prime miniſter, with great eaſe, dexterity, and ſufficiency. As he perfectly well underſtood the intereſts of the powers he ſerved, and ſeldom failed to penetrate into the deſigns of the enemy; and as he in a particular manner enjoyed the confidence of the troops he headed, he could always avert impending dangers by his prudence and foreſight, or combat and overcome them by preſence of mind and courage. Theſe eminent qualities procured him the eſteem and admiration of the allies, and even of the enemy, as well as of his own countrymen, till carried away by an unbounded ambition, and an inſatiable thirſt for riches, and intoxicated with the great reputation and credit he had acquired by his unparalleled ſucceſſes *, he endeavoured to perpetuate to himſelf the ſupreme command, by perpetuating the war, forgetting what he owed to his royal miſtreſs and benefactreſs; by which he loſt her friendſhip, and with it all the high offices he occupied. In a word, the duke of Marlborough was a compound of many vices and many virtues; but, as lord Bolingbroke obſerves, the latter were ſo great, that they made thoſe who knew him forget his failings.

Such was the perſon the allies caſt their eyes upon to command their armies, and check the conqueſts of the French arms, nor could they at that time have made a more happy choice. Marlborough was not one of thoſe generals who tamely receives from a firſt miniſter the plan of a campaign, and after having executed his orders, and put his troops into winter-quarters, returns back to ſollicit a renewal of his command. This general, on the contrary, governed his ſovereign, as well from the neceſſity ſhe had for his ſervices, as by the great influence his wife poſſeſſed over her affections †. He managed the parliament as he pleaſed, by his own great credit with the nation, and the intereſt of Godolphin the high-treaſurer, whoſe ſon had married one of his daughters. Thus, maſter of the court, the parliament, the army, and the treaſury, with more power in the kingdom than ever king William poſſeſſed, whom he equalled as a politician, and excelled as a general, he did greater things than the allies had preſumed to hope from him.

His firſt actions this campaign gained him univerſal admiration, and were a pleaſing earneſt of his future good fortune. Having regulated all things with the deputies of the States, he left the Hague on the thirtieth of June, and repaired to the army, which was now encamped under the command of the earl of Athlone, in the neighbourhood of Nimeguen, and which, after calling in the detached parties, he found to amount to about ſixty thouſand men. As with this force he was ſuperior to the French under the duke of Burgundy and marſhal Boufflers, the earl of Marlborough paſſed the Maeſe on the ſixteenth of July, and made ſeveral attempts to bring the enemy to an engagement; but rather than expoſe themſelves to the hazard of a battle, they choſe to abandon the Spaniſh Guelderland, and leave it entirely to the diſcretion of the allies. Thus the Dutch, who were ſo lately in the deepeſt conſternation upon the retreat of their army under the cannon of Nimeguen, before the earl of Marlborough's arrival, had now the pleaſure to ſee the French fly

* It is ſaid of the duke of Marlborough, "That he never ſat down before a town which he did not take, nor ever fought a battle which he did not win."

† The beginning of this lady's favour with her royal miſtreſs had a much earlier date than her entrance into her ſervice: they had uſed to play together when children, and the princeſs Anne even then expreſſed a particular fondneſs for her: as they grew up this attachment became ſtill ſtronger; and ſo deſirous was ſhe of having her always near her, that upon her own marriage with the prince of Denmark, in 1683, lady Churchill (for ſhe was then married) was, at the princeſs's own requeſt, made one of the ladies of the bedchamber, and was at length diſtinguiſhed by ſo high a place in her favour, as perhaps no perſon arrived at a higher with queen or princeſs. She had an aſcendant over the mind of Anne in every thing, who ſeemed to think and act only in conformity to her confidant's ſentiments. Lady Churchill, afterwards ducheſs of Marlborough, was a woman of very contracted knowlege, but of a clear apprehenſion, and a true judgment; a warm and hearty friend; violent and ſudden in her reſolutions, and impetuous in her way of ſpeaking. She has been charged, and not without ſome appearance of reaſon, of growing proud and inſolent on her favour, and with keeping the queen in a kind of ſubjection to her will. Nevertheleſs, it does not appear that ſhe had ever recourſe to the common arts of a court to maintain her credit with her miſtreſs, for ſhe did not beſet or flatter her. in their turns; and thus were the United Provinces preſerved by the earl's prudence and vigilance, whilſt the duke of Burgundy, who came to the army to be taught how to fight, returned home, having learned nothing but how to avoid an engagement; and the French king was ſo diſſatisfied with the conduct of marſhal Boufflers, that he never after repoſed any confidence in him.

The earl of Marlborough not being able to bring the French to an engagement, the deputies of the States in the army repreſented to him, that it would be much to the advantage of Holland to diſpoſſeſs the enemy of the places they held in the Spaniſh Guelderland, whereby the navigation of the Maeſe would be opened; and accordingly preparations were made for the ſiege of Venlo, which was inveſted on the twenty-ninth of Auguſt. On the ſeventh of September the trenches were opened, and on the twenty-fifth of the ſame month the town ſurrendered. I ſhall not take upon me to give a diary of every ſiege during this long war; but there are ſome heroic actions which hiſtory ought not to paſs by unnoticed: ſuch was that performed by the lord Cutts before this place. On the eighteenth of September his lordſhip was commanded to attack Fort St. Michael, between the baſtion that is next the plain and the ravelin that lies on the north ſide of it, having under his command brigadier-general Hamilton, with the royal regiment of Ireland, and general Hukelem's regiment, one hundred and ſeventy-two grenadiers, and one hundred fuſileers, moſtly Engliſh, under a lieutenant-colonel; and alſo three hundred workmen, with a competent number of engineers under colonel Blood. His lordſhip's orders were to make a lodgment from the point of the ravelin to the baſtion, leaving him at liberty to proceed farther if he found it practicable: and at the ſame time the prince of Anhalt, with the ſame number of troops, was to make an attack between the baſtion and the ravelin on the north ſide, with the like diſcretionary orders. The ſignals for both attacks, which was to be the blowing up a ton of powder, and the diſcharge of all the batteries of the beſiegers, was accordingly made a little before ſix in the evening.

The attack was made with inexpreſſible vigour; the grenadiers cleared the covered-way of the enemy, and being ſuſtained by freſh numbers, attacked the ravelin ſword in hand, encouraging and aſſiſting one another upon the aſſurance of being ſeconded, which lord Cutts perceiving, he marched with all his forces, engaged the enemy, and was ſoon maſter of the ravelin. The French then made a great fire upon the Engliſh from the rampart of the fort; whereupon his lordſhip ſent orders to the officers that were at the head of the grenadiers to throw in their granadoes, and attack the fort ſword in hand, if it were poſſible to find a paſſage, which they did, by charging and following the enemy ſo cloſe, that they had not time to break the bridge, though it was hotly diſputed by fire and puſh of pike, and eſpecially by the enemy's grenadiers: but the bravery of the Engliſh grenadiers, encouraged by the example of their own and ſome other officers of diſtinction, was inexpreſſible: ſome of them attacked the bridge, and ſome clambered up the ramparts, after having thrown in their granadoes, and forced their way into the fort. The enemy, however, continued to defend themſelves, till the Engliſh poured in ſo faſt upon them, that they were no longer able to reſiſt, which as ſoon as lord Cutts perceived, he checked the fury of the ſoldiers, and put a ſtop to the ſlaughter. The Engliſh took above two hundred priſoners, whereof thirty were officers, with a brigadier-general, and the governor: but all the reſt that were in the fort, to the number of ſix hundred, were killed or drowned endeavouring to eſcape, except twelve who luckily paſſed the Maeſe in ſmall-boats. On the twenty-fifth the town of Venlo beat a parley, and the garriſon ſurrendering upon honourable terms, were conducted to Antwerp. While this ſiege was carrying on, the earl of Marlborough detached general Schultz, with a body of troops, to attack the town and caſtle of Wertz, which were both ſurrendered after a ſlight reſiſtance.

In the month of October the general inveſted Ruremonde, which he took after a very obſtinate defence, together with Stevenſwaert, both ſituated on the Maeſe. The army then marched towards Liege *, and upon its approach mareſchal Boufflers (to whom the duke of Burgundy had now left the command of the French army) thought fit to retreat from thence to Tongeren, on the river Jecker; after which he went towards Brabant, to defend ſuch places as at that time were not intended to be attacked.

When our army came before Liege, they found the city abandoned, whereupon the earl took poſſeſſion of it; but the citadel, and another ſtrong fort called the Chartreuſe of Liege, held out till the end of October. The citadel of Liege, in which were eight French battalions, was taken by ſtorm the twenty-third; of which the earl of Marlborough tranſmitted to our court the following account: all things being prepared, and the ſignal given, † Liege is a populous wealthy city, in the biſhopric of the ſame name, in Germany, ſituated on the Maeſe, fourteen miles ſouth of Maeſtricht, and twenty-eight north-eaſt of Namur. It is about four miles in circuit; two branches of the Maeſe, with other rivulets or canals, run through many of the ſtreets, forming little iſlands. It exceeds all the cities of Germany or France for fine churches and convents; of the former are no leſs than a hundred of all ſorts, with a very numerous body of eccleſiaſtics belonging to the churches and monaſteries. The city is ſo pleaſantly ſituated, and has ſuch rich endowments, that it is ſtiled the Paradiſe of the Clergy. Among other religious foundations here is one of Engliſh nuns; and here is alſo a famous univerſity. The fortifications are not conſiderable, being overlooked and commanded by the contiguous hills; but the citadel is ſtrong, and capable of making a good defence. It was taken this year by the earl of Marlborough; and the French inveſting it in 1705, were by the ſame general obliged to raiſe the ſiege, upon his expeditious return from the Moſelle. The magiſtrates of Liege have ſometimes pretended that it is an imperial city; but they have been ſeverely handled for diſputing the authority of their biſhop, who is in effect abſolute ſovereign both of the city and biſhopric: he is choſen by the ſixty major canons, who are generally of noble extraction. The biſhop of Liege is one of the moſt conſiderable eccleſiaſtical princes of the Germanic body, there being within his dioceſe fifty-two baronies, eighteen walled towns, and four hundred villages, all well peopled, with a yearly revenue of three hundred thouſand ducats or nobles; and he can maintain a ſtanding body of eight thouſand troops, without oppreſſing his ſubjects, the bulk of whom are Roman catholics. Liege lies in latitude fifty degrees forty-ſix minutes north; longitude five degrees twenty eight minutes eaſt. Buſching.

our troops were out of their trenches, and marched towards the enemy without firing a ſhot, and with an order and intrepidity hardly to be paralleled. They then attacked the counterſcarp with ſuch fury, that the enemy were conſtrained to abandon the poſt: but our men, inſtead of lodging therein, got into the covert-way, paſſed the mount, and aſcended the breach: whereupon the governor, who did not look for ſo vigorous an attack, beat a parley: our troops, however, being already in the place, would not hearken to it, and had cut the whole garriſon in pieces, if they had not thrown down their arms and called aloud for quarter, which was granted them. In this glorious action the hereditary prince of Caſſel ſignalized his courage: he went volunteer in the attack at the head of the grenadiers, and was the firſt man who mounted the breach, and with his own hands wreſted the colours from a French officer. Mr. Wentworth, brother to the lord Raby, alſo ſerved as a volunteer in this action, and had the glory of dying in the bed of honour. Monſieur Vivlane the governor and the duke of Charôt were made priſoners. Three hundred thouſand florins in gold and ſilver were found in the citadel, beſides notes for about one million two hundred thouſand florins more, drawn upon ſubſtantial merchants in Liege, who paid the money. The whole booty was ſo conſiderable, that an Engliſh grenadier is ſaid to have gotten one thouſand louis d'ors for his own ſhare. Thus ended the campaign, equally to the advantage of the allies, and the honour of the earl of Marlborough, who had now eſtabliſhed his military character beyond all controverſy, and entirely ſecured the affection and confidence of the States.

On the third of November the confederate army being ſeparated, the earl of Marlborough went to Maeſtricht, where he embarked that evening on the Maeſe for Holland, in company with Mynheer Gueldermanſel, one of the deputies of the States, and the baron d'Opdam, general of the Dutch horſe, taking with him twenty-five ſoldiers under the command of a lieutenant, by way of guard: next morning he was joined at Ruremonde by Mynheer Coehorn, a famous engineer in the ſervice of the States; and having dined with the prince of Holſtein-Beck, commander of that garriſon, continued his voyage, eſcorted by fifty troopers, who rode along-ſide of the river; but the boats being ſeparated in the night, a party of fifty-three men of the garriſon of Guelder (the only place the French now retained in that province) who lay ſkulking on the banks of the Maeſe, near three leagues on this ſide of Venlo, in wait of prey, obſerving the boat, ſeized the rope by which it was drawn * by ſurprize, and hauling it on ſhore, immediately made a diſcharge of their ſmall arms upon the boat wherein their Excellencies were, and then entering ſeized upon the boat; and having examined the ſeveral paſſports, without knowing my lord Marlborough, they afterwards ſearched the trunks and baggage, from whence they took what plate they could find, and made their Excellencies guard priſoners. About five in the morning they retired with their booty, leaving the earl and his companions to purſue their voyage.

The governor of Venlo hearing of this tranſaction, took it for granted that the earl of Marlborough was made priſoner, and carried into Guelder, whereupon he marched out with his whole garriſon to attack that place. The ſame account being carried to the Hague, filled all minds with the utmoſt conſternation: the ſtates forthwith aſſembling, reſolved that all their forces ſhould march inſtantly, and threaten the garriſon with the utmoſt extremity, unleſs they would immediately releaſe the general: but before theſe orders could be diſpatched the earl arrived at the Hague, to the no ſmall joy of the people, and was complimented on his happy eſcape by the penſionary Heinſius, in the name of the States †.

In the mean time the duke of Bavaria, who had hitherto profeſſed a neutrality, having declared for France, had ſurpriſed Ulm, an imperial city, and the capital of Suabia: whereupon the Imperial Diet aſſembled at Ratiſbon, and by a plurality of voices reſolved to declare war againſt the French king and the duke of Anjou (as they ſtiled the new king of Spain) and they deſired his imperial majeſty to act againſt the duke according to the conſtitution of the empire, and uſe his authority for recovering the city of Ulm, and to require the ſaid duke to abſtain from all attempts of the like nature for the future. Hereupon the duke (elector) of Bavaria publiſhed a manifeſto, giving the circles of Suabia and Franconia to underſtand, that he expected they ſhould obſerve a ſtrict neutrality in this war, which did not concern the empire in general, but only the houſe of Auſtria: but ſeveral diſpatches having been intercepted, by which it appeared that the Bavarians deſigned to penetrate into the territories of Briſgaw with ten thouſand men, and to have poſted themſelves upon the Rhine near Hunninguen, the princes of the empire were incenſed to ſuch a degree, that they forbade the miniſters of the elector of Bavaria and Cologne to appear any more in the general diet. The emperor uſed all means to reduce the elector of Bavaria to his duty; but neither promiſes nor threats had any effect: for having made himſelf maſter of Ulm, he marched towards the foreſt-towns, with a deſign to join the French army: but not ſucceeding in that attempt, the Switzers having ſecured the paſſes, he was obliged to return to his own country; and the declaration of war by the empire was publiſhed and notified to the cardinal Lamberg, the emperor's commiſſioner at the diet, on the thirtieth of September, by the direction of the elector of Mentz, in the name of the diet. The reaſons aſſigned were, "That France had attacked the empire by invading in his own and the duke of Anjou's name, ſeveral fiefs of the empire in Italy, the archbiſhopric of Cologne, and the biſhopric of Liege; as alſo by diſturbing the trade on the Rhine, and committing ſeveral other hoſtilities, which rendered this a neceſſary defenſive war on the part of the empire ‡.

In the mean time, prince Lewis of Baden being weakened by ſeveral detachments he had made to prevent the junction of the French and Bavarians, had reduced his army to eight thouſand men; in which ſituation he was ſurprized and attacked by marſhal Villars on the 13th of October, near Friedlinguen *, where was fought a ſharp and doubtful battle, in which both ſides claimed the victory: Villars, becauſe he took Friedlinguen the next day; and the prince, becauſe he had gained his point in preventing the junction of the French and the Bavarians.

And now the empire having declared war againſt France, the diet came to a reſolution to maintain an army of one hundred and twenty thouſand men, but fell miſerably ſhort, as will be too evident in the enſuing hiſtory.

The elector of Bavaria's declaring for France had ſo embarraſſed the emperor, that he was unable to ſend thoſe reinforcements into Italy which he had promiſed prince Eugene; and his army, the beſt by far the emperor had, was ſuffered to moulder away for want of recruits. The prince thus neglected, had the mortification to behold the duke of Vendôme relieve Mantua, without being able to interrupt his operations; nay, he was himſelf obliged to relinquiſh ſome other places he had taken: nor was this all; for Philip V. the new king of Spain, being deſirous of finiſhing the Italian war in perſon, had ſet ſail for Naples; and after ſome ſtay there joined the duke of Vendôme in Lombardy. However, prince Eugene attacked their united forces, though forty thouſand ſtrong, on the fifteenth of Auguſt, and, according to the German account, obtained the victory, though the French gave out that their army gained the day, and ſung Te Deum for it as well as the Germans. It was certainly a very bloody battle, and both ſides had ſo much of it that they did not chuſe to renew the fight the next day. The French however made themſelves maſters of the town of Luzzara, and prince Eugene on his ſide maintained all the reſt of his poſts. There happened no farther action in Italy this campaign †.

The north of Germany was now united in the intereſt of the confederates; and the princes would have been in a condition to aſſiſt them effectually, had not the neighbourhood of the war in Poland determined them from parting from their forces. England and the States-general in vain endeavoured this year to mediate a peace between the kings of Sweden and of Poland. Charles XII. was now become enamoured of war, and his ambitious ſoul was continually meditating freſh conqueſts. He threatened to invade Saxony through the dominions of Pruſſia. Auguſtus retired to Cracow, while Charles penetrated to Warſaw, and even ordered the cardinal primate to ſummon a diet for chuſing a new king ‡. The elector of Saxony was too hard preſſed by Charles to ſpare his full proportion of troops to the allies, and the king of Pruſſia was overawed by the vicinity of the Swediſh conqueror; ſo that although this war did not ſo immediately concern the confederacy as thoſe already mentioned, it had an ill effect by the Swedes and Saxons not ſending their quota of troops for ſervice.

Another war broke out this year in the Cevennes mountains of Languedoc, chiefly inhabited by French proteſtants, who being grievouſly oppreſſed by the government on the ſcore of their religion, had recourſe to arms, and defended themſelves for ſeveral years. This inſurrection was ſo far advantageous to the allies, that it obliged the French king to keep ten or twelve thouſand men in that province to obſerve their motions. It remains to obſerve, that towards the latter end of October count Tallard and the marquis de Lomarie, with a body of eighteen thouſand men, reduced Triers ‖ and Traerbach §, while the prince of Heſſe-Caſſel, with a detachment from the allied army at Liege, retook from the French Zinch, Lintz, Briſac, and Andernach, towns on the Rhine.

While theſe things were tranſacting on the continent, the allies were not wanting in a proper attention to their naval preparations. The late king, a little before his death, had formed a deſign to reduce Cadiz; and this ſcheme was now propoſed to be reſumed, as the moſt likely means, if it ſucceeded, of putting an end to all the French deſigns, and obliging them to compromiſe matters to the ſatisfaction at leaſt of the maritime powers. The plan was certainly very well laid, and conducted with ſurpriſing ſecrecy; for though the preparing ſo great an armament could not be hid, yet the intent of it was ſo effectually concealed, that France, Spain, and Portugal too, then in alliance with France and Spain, had equal cauſe to be alarmed, which had conſequences very favourable to the grand alliance in thoſe countries, as will hereafter more fully appear.

After the queen's acceſſion, ſir George Rooke was declared admiral of the fleet, and the duke of Ormond general of the land-forces to be employed on this expedition; and the Dutch having joined our fleet with their ſquadron, which had alſo its quota of troops on board, the admiral hoiſted the Union flag on board the Royal Sovereign on the thirtieth of May; and on the firſt of June his royal highneſs the prince of Denmark dined on board the admiral, and took a view of the fleet and army, which was ſoon in a condition to ſail. It conſiſted of fifty ſhips of the line, thirty Engliſh, and twenty Dutch; the former commanded by ſir George Rooke, who had under him the admirals Fairborne, Hopſon, and Graydon; the latter, by the vice-admirals Allemond, Callemburgh, Vandergoes, Pieterſon, and Waſſenaer. The tranſports had on board about fourteen thouſand land-forces; the Engliſh headed by the generals Bellaſis, O'Hara, and lord Portmore, the colonels Seymour, Hamilton, and Matthews; and the Dutch commanded by baron Sparre and brigadier Pa-

Palandt *. The direction of the whole, as I have before obſerved, was committed to the duke of Ormond, who acted as commander in chief.

It was the firſt of July before the fleet ſet ſail: on that day they put to ſea, and ſtanding to the weſtward, were joined off Plymouth by five other men of war; ſo that the whole fleet, including the tranſports, amounted to two hundred ſail. On the ſeventh the fleet meeting with contrary winds, were forced to bear away for Torbay, where they loſt their chief engineer colonel Brown. On the tenth of July they ſet ſail again, and on the eighth of Auguſt they made the Rock of Liſbon; whereupon the admiral ſent the Kent and Pembroke into the harbour, and the prince of Heſſe d'Armſtadt, and Mr. Methuen the envoy's ſon, came into the fleet from Liſbon. They brought advice that there were in that harbour ſix French men of war and two gallies, and that the French commodore had deſired leave of the governor to ſearch her majeſty's ſhips the Adventure and Leoſtoff, that brought the prince of Heſſe and Mr. Methuen thither; but the governor anſwered, that the Engliſh were not their enemies, and they were obliged to protect them while they lay under their cannon. At the approach of the confederate fleet the Portugueſe fired their beacons to alarm the country, being under ſome apprehenſions. Their fears however were ſoon quieted; for on the eleventh of Auguſt a council of ſea and land officers was held on board the admiral, and the next day ſir George Rooke ſteered away for Cadiz, where the whole fleet arrived about five in the afternoon, and caſt anchor in the bay of Bulls, about two leagues diſtance from the city.

In order to furniſh the reader with a clearer idea of the operations of the fleet and army in this expedition, I ſhall here ſubjoin a deſcription of the city and port of Cadiz, with its environs.

Cadiz is a famous trading city and ſea-port of Andaluſia, in Spain, on the north-weſt extremity of a long neck of land in an iſland extending from ſouth-eaſt to north-weſt, the weſt part of which is Cadiz, and the ſouth-eaſt the iſland of Leon, oppoſite to Port St. Mary's, being joined to the main land, from which it is ſeparated by a narrow channel of the ſea, by the bridge Suaco; both extremities of which are defended by redoubts and other works. This iſland, from fort St. Catherine's to the iſle St. Pedro, is five miles long, and from the ſouth point near the latter, to the north near Suaco bridge, two miles broad. The neck of land extending from this quadrangular iſland is at firſt very ſmall, afterwards it becomes broader, has ſeveral windings and angles, and terminates in two capes, the principal of which, namely that to the weſt, is called St. Sebaſtian's. The iſland on which Cadiz ſtands and the oppoſite ſhore form a bay twelve miles long, and about ſix in breadth; but near the middle of the bay are two points of land, one on the continent and the other the iſland, five hundred fathoms aſunder, on which are the forts Puntal and Matagorda, commanding the paſſage; and within the points is a large and very good harbour, which no enemy can enter till theſe forts are taken. This city contains about five thouſand houſes and fifty thouſand inhabitants; it is the center of all the American trade, where the galleons take in their loadings, and return with the treaſures and rich merchandize of Peru and Mexico. Cadiz, which is of a pretty large circuit, is ſurrounded with walls and irregular baſtions, and moſtly inacceſſible, by reaſon of a ſteep coaſt, rocks, and ſand-banks.

An hour before day, on the thirteenth of Auguſt, the duke of Ormond ſent ſir Thomas Smith, quarter-maſter-general, with colonel Carls, chief engineer, and ſome other officers, to take a view of the back part of the iſland of Leon (on which Cadiz ſtands), next the ocean, and to ſound the ſhore, propoſing to have landed on that ſide. The admiral alſo ſent out to get intelligence, and having gained what information they could, a council of war, conſiſting of all the admirals and generals, was held the next day, being the fourteenth. In this council the duke of Ormond ſtrenuouſly inſiſted upon landing on the iſland (where, according to report, there were very convenient bays to make a deſcent), in order to a ſudden and vigorous attack of the town, where the conſternation was ſo great, that, in all probability, the enterprize would have ſucceeded; but ſeveral of the council, eſpecially the ſea-officers, oppoſed the duke's motion, upon information they had received, that the enemy had about four thouſand well-diſciplined foot in the town, and a thouſand horſe (veteran troops), beſides the militia that was aſſembled for the guard of the coaſt; and as the fleet could give no aſſiſtance to the land-forces after they were on ſhore, nor even ſupply them with proviſions, if it ſhould prove blowing weather, the landing directly on the iſland of Leon was repreſented as an impracticable attempt: it was therefore reſolved by the majority of the council, that the army ſhould firſt take the fort of St. Catherine and the town and port of St. Mary's, on the oppoſite ſhore of the continent, which would facilitate a nearer approach to Cadiz. This reſolution being agreed to, the ſame evening a boat was ſent to Cadiz from the admiral, with a flag of truce and ſome declarations; and the next day the duke of Ormond ſent a trumpet with a letter to the duke of Brancaccio, governor of fort St. Catherine's, ſummoning him to ſurrender, declaring, that if he did not accept his terms, he ſhould be hanged, and none of his ſoldiers receive any quarter. To this the governor anſwered, with great ſpirit and juſtice, "That if he muſt be hanged, it was all one to him whether by the duke of Ormond or the governor of Cadiz, and therefore deſired leave to ſend to him for his orders," which was refuſed †. Theſe harſh meaſures, with the ſubſequent behaviour of the Engliſh troops, inſtead of drawing the Spaniards to declare for the houſe of Auſtria, rendered them averſe to it.

On the fifteenth of Auguſt, the duke of Ormond landed his forces in the Bay of Bulls, about a mile on the left of St. Catherine's fort, the cannon of which fired on his men, but with little execution. The firſt that landed were twelve hundred grenadiers, led by brigadier Palandt and the earl of Donnegal; but the wind was ſo high, and the ſea beat on the ſhore with ſuch violence, that ſeveral men were drowned, and the reſt were obliged to wade up to their neck, which the enemy's horſe obſerving, came down, and furiouſly attacked the Engliſh; but they were ſo warmly received, that they ſoon retired, leaving their general and ſeveral of their companions dead upon the place, and a Spaniſh captain and cornet, with ſome others, were made priſoners. Our foot were all happily landed that day, and marched within two miles of Rota, lying all night upon their arms in the field. Early the next morning the duke of Ormond continued his march towards Rota, and was met near the town by the alcaide, or chief magiſtrate, with the principal inhabitants, who offered to put it into his hands; whereupon the duke took up his quarters in the caſtle of Rota, while the army encamped before the town.

The duke now publiſhed a declaration, inviting the Spaniards to join the allies; and the prince of Heſſe Darmſtadt alſo publiſhed one, in the emperor's name, to the ſame purport, which he cauſed to be diſtributed in the neighbouring towns. The duke's declaration ſet forth, That the queen of Great Britain having been pleaſed to confer on his grace the command of her forces (in conjunction with thoſe of the States-general), for aſſerting the rights of the houſe of Auſtria, in purſuance of their treaties of alliance with the emperor, his grace judged it neceſſary, before he made uſe of force, to declare that he did not come thither to poſſeſs himſelf of any place in Spain in the name of her majeſty and the States general, or to introduce the calamities of war by way of conqueſt, but rather to defend the good and loyal ſubjects of the ſaid monarchy, and free them from the inſupportable ſlavery of France, to whom they had been ſold by ſome diſaffected perſons; concluding with an invitation of the Spaniards to join him, and they ſhould thereupon be protected in their perſons, eſtates, privileges, and religion; but if, contrary to expectation, they did not concur with the good intention of her majeſty and the States, the hoſtilities committed by their forces muſt be aſcribed to the Spaniards themſelves, who having ſo fair an opportunity to ſhew their loyalty and purſue their own intereſts, refuſed to embrace it *."

While his grace continued at Rota, he ſummoned the governor of Port St. Mary's to ſurrender; to which the haughty Spaniard returned for anſwer, "Nos otros Eſpagnoles no mudamos de religion ni de rey.—We Spaniards neither change our religion nor our king." However, on the duke's advancing to Port St. Mary's on the twenty-firſt, the governor and his garriſon, with moſt of the inhabitants, thought fit to abandon the city: the governor of St. Catherine's fort alſo retired out of the place, leaving only an enſign and a ſmall party in it, which ſurrendered at diſcretion. Although the duke of Ormond, before the army reached Port St. Mary's had given ſtrict orders againſt plundering, yet it was not in the power of the officers to reſtrain their famiſhed and thirſty ſoldiers from forcing open the houſes where they expected to find refreſhments; nor was it long before they made their way to the cellars, which they found ſtored with rich and ſtrong wines, where they carouſed all the firſt night. The next day, their licentiouſneſs being heightened by the fumes of their liquor, they proceeded to rifle and pillage the houſes, and commit every other ſpecies of outrage; and even ſome of the officers, being intoxicated, joined with their men, and, calling in the ſailors to their aſſiſtance, carried the ſpoils of the place on board the fleet, which are ſaid to have amounted in value to above a million of money; for they even plundered the churches and altars of their plate and ornaments. Theſe hoſtilities ſo enraged the Spaniards, that many, who before deſigned to have joined the confederates and declared in favour of the houſe of Auſtria, now adhered firmly to Philip V. The duke of Ormond was ſo incenſed at theſe violences, committed in open defiance of his orders, that he commanded ſir Henry Bellaſis, and ſir Charles O'Hara, who had the command of thoſe troops that took poſſeſſion of the place, to be put under arreſt; and would have proceeded with greater ſeverity, if the criminals had been leſs numerous.

The garriſon of Cadiz having by this time recovered their conſternation, and ſunk three galleons at the entrance of the paſſage of Puntal, to prevent the confederate fleet from entering the harbour, and the marquis de las Fillidarias, governor of Andaluſia, having received great reinforcements, and drew down his army between Xeres and Port St. Mary; hereupon the duke of Ormond marched his forces out of the latter on the twenty-fifth, and encamped at Santa Victoria, where he cauſed his declaration to be ſolemnly read through the town, and at the head of every regiment, whereby he forbad plundering on pain of death. But as the late exceſſes had made the Spaniards ſo much our enemies, that it was evident nothing could be expected in Spain, but what could be obtained by pure force, baron Sparre, the Dutch general, was ordered to inveſt the fort of Matagorda, which defended the entrance into the harbour of Cadiz; but the ground was ſo looſe and ſwampy, that the batteries, which were raiſed without any madriers, or faſcines, to ſupport them, ſunk at every diſcharge, and the taking that fort was found impracticable. The Spaniſh army alſo being daily augmented, and that of the confederates diminiſhed by the flux, and proviſions growing ſcarce, and the admiral being of opinion that the ſeaſon was ſo far advanced, that he could not remain longer in thoſe ſeas without great hazard to her majeſty's fleet, it was determined to reinbark the troops, which was performed with little or no loſs; and the fleet ſet ſail for England, full of vexation for the diſappointment they had met with *. Providence, however, put it in their power to do their country a more ſignal and effectual ſervice than even the taking of Cadiz would have been.

Captain Hardy, commander of the Pembroke, having been detached with ſome ſhips to Lagos (a harbour on the Portugueſe coaſt), to fetch water for the fleet, there heard that M. Chateau Renauld with a ſquadron of French men of war and the Spaniſh flota were put into Vigo, a ſea-port of Galicia, in Spain, ſituated in Bayonne Bay, at the mouth of a ſpacious harbour. Upon this news he ſailed back to the grand fleet, and having fallen in with it on the ſixth of October, gave the admiral an account of what he had learned. Sir George, delighted with the information, ſent notice of it to the Dutch admiral, and declared it his opinion that they all ſhould ſteer directly for Vigo; to which purpoſe, the next day he called a council of flag and general-officers; when the admiral's propoſal being unanimouſly approved, orders were given for bending their courſe to the ſaid port with all the ſpeed that might be. But the wind proving very contrary, it was the eleventh of the month before they could gain the port; and though it was not to be entered without great difficulty, that work was performed without any conſiderable diſaſter. The weather proved ſo hazy, that the town of Vigo never diſcovered the fleet till they were juſt upon it; and though they fired very ſmartly upon our ſhips, we took very little notice of it, but bore up for the harbour, where the French fleet and the galleons lay,

The paſſage into the harbour, which was not above three quarters of a mile over, was defended by batteries, forts, and breaſt-works, on each ſide; by a ſtrong boom, conſiſting of iron chains, topmaſts, and cables, moored at each end to a ſeventy-gun ſhip; within this boom were moored five ſhips of the ſame force, with their broadſides to the entrance of the paſſage, ſo as to fire at any ſhip that ſhould attempt to approach the boom, forts, and platform *.

As ſoon as the fleet came to an anchor, the admiral called a council of war of the general ſea and land-officers, wherein it was concluded, that ſince the paſſage into the harbour was ſo narrow, that the whole fleet could not attempt the enemy's ſhips and galleons without running foul of each other, a detachment of fifteen Engliſh and ten Dutch men of war, with all the fire-ſhips, ſhould be ſent to take and deſtroy the enemy's fleet; that the frigates and bomb-veſſels ſhould follow the rear of this detachment; and that the great ſhips ſhould move after them, and go in if there was occaſion: it was reſolved alſo, that the land-forces ſhould be put on ſhore at the ſame time, and attack the forts that defended the entrance of the harbour; and to give the better countenance to the ſervice, it was farther reſolved, that all the flag-officers ſhould go in with the ſquadrons; but as the firſt and ſecond rates of the combined fleets were too large to enter, the admirals ſhifted their flags into ſmaller ſhips.

On the twelfth of October, the duke of Ormond, purſuant to the reſolution of the council of war, landed early in the morning, in a ſandy bay, about ſix miles from Vigo, with two thouſand five hundred men; and not meeting with any oppoſition, he ordered the grenadiers to march, under the command of lord Shannon, directly to the fort that guarded the entrance of the harbour, where the boom lay, which he performed with the moſt intrepid gallantry; and though there appeared at the ſame time about eight thouſand Spaniſh foot between the fort and the hills, they only made a ſhew, retiring, after ſome ſlight ſkirmiſhes with the grenadiers, who alſo drove before them another party of the enemy, followed them to the fort, and made themſelves maſters of the lower battery; whereupon lieutenant-general Churchill's (brother to the earl of Marlborough) regiment advanced upon the left, and took their poſts. After the two batteries were taken, the enemy retired into an old caſtle, or ſtone tower, and fired from thence upon the Engliſh for ſome ſmall time; but opening the gate in order to make a ſally, the grenadiers forced their way into the place ſword in hand, and obliged the garriſon, conſiſting of French and Spaniards, in number about three hundred and fifty, to ſurrender priſoners of war. This was a conqueſt of great importance in reſpect to the fleet, ſince our ſhips would have been exceſſively galled by the fire from the platform and fort †.

As ſoon as the land-forces were on ſhore, the admiral made a ſignal to weigh, which was accordingly done, the line formed, and the ſquadron was briſkly bearing up to the boom; but when the van was got within cannon-ſhot of the batteries, it fell calm, ſo that they were under a neceſſity to caſt anchor; but a freſh gale ſpringing up ſoon after, they cut their cables, and ſtood directly for the boom. Vice-admiral Hopſon, in the Torbay, broke through at once; but the reſt of his diviſion, and vice-admiral Vandergoes with his detachment, who ſailed abreaſt to add a greater weight to the ſhock, all ſtuck, and were obliged to cut their way through. The paſſage being thus opened, the whole ſquadron entered the harbour through a terrible fire from the enemy's ſhips and batteries, which, however, in a little time they ſilenced, though vice-admiral Hopſon narrowly eſcaped from a fire-ſhip, by which he was boarded: ſeveral of his men, during the firſt conſternation, having thrown themſelves into the ſea, were drowned; and his ſhip was ſo much damaged, that he was obliged to ſhift his flag on board the Monmouth.

After a moſt deſperate engagement, the French, finding themſelves unable to contend againſt the ſuperior force and valour of the aſſailants, reſolved to ſet fire to their ſhips and galleons, to prevent their falling into the hands of the victors. They accordingly burnt eight ſhips and as many advice-boats; but ten French ſhips of war were taken, together with eleven galleons, though they had ſecured a conſiderable part of their plate and merchandize, on the appearance of the combined fleet. The value of fourteen millions of pieces of eight, in plate and rich commodities, was deſtroyed in ſix galleons that periſhed, but about half that value was brought off by the conquerors; ſo that this was a dreadful blow to the enemy, and a noble acquiſition to the allies. When the action was over, the duke of Ormond propoſed to have made himſelf maſter of Vigo, and to have wintered in Spain, if the admiral could have ſpared him a ſquadron of men of war and proviſions for his troops; but the admiral declaring he could not furniſh the troops with proviſions for more than two months, the land-forces were reimbarked, and, on the nineteenth of October, ſir George Rooke, with twenty ſail of men of war, ſet ſail for England, leaving ſir Cloudeſley Shovel, who joined the fleet two or three days before, to convoy home the prizes; whereupon ſir Cloudeſley, having burnt the ſhips that could not be got off, and taken one hundred and ten braſs cannon out of the enemy's ſhips and batteries, followed the grand fleet a few days after, which arrived ſafely in the Downs on the ſeventh of November; from whence the great ſhips were, about the middle of the month, ſent up to Chatham ‡.

Among the ſucceſſes of this year muſt not be forgot thoſe we gained under that brave ſea-officer commodore Leake, who took, in the French harbours in Newfoundland, this ſummer, twenty-nine ſail of the enemy, and burnt twenty-two more, deſtroying all the ſtages and ſettlements of the French in and near Newfoundland. Admiral Bembow alſo protected the Engliſh trade in the Weſt Indies, harraſſed the Spaniſh ſettlements, and made ſeveral prizes; but, unhappily, the glory of our arms was tarniſhed by the behaviour of a few treacherous miſcreants, who owed their advancement to intereſt, without any perſonal merit.

The admiral underſtanding that monſieur du Caſſe, with a French ſquadron, was expected at Hiſpaniola, determined to go in queſt of him. On the nineteenth day of Auguſt he came up with the enemy, near St. Martha. The French ſquadron conſiſted of ten ſail, viz. four of ſeventy guns, one of forty, and the reſt ſmall frigates: admiral Bembow had with him ſeven ſail, viz. the Breda (his own ſhip) of ſeventy guns; the Defiance of ſixty-four; the Ruby, of fifty-four; the Pendennis, Greenwich, Windſor, and Falmouth, of fifty each. The admiral, in the Breda, with the Falmouth, captain Vincent, and Ruby, captain Walton, began the engagement; but the other four ſhips fell aſtern, and ſcarce fired a ſhot: however, admiral Bembow purſued the enemy, and continued a running fight for five days, when one of the enemy's men of war appeared quite diſabled. But the French by this time diſcovering that the admiral was not ſeconded by the reſt of his captains, fell furiouſly upon him, and he had the misfortune to have his leg ſhattered to pieces by a chain-ſhot; however, he ordered his cradle to be brought upon deck, and ſtill continued the fight, till the captains who had ſo baſely deſerted him, coming on board, and alleging the French were too ſtrong, and therefore deſiring him to deſiſt, the admiral, apprehenſive, from what he had ſeen of their conduct, that if he withſtood their importunities, they might deſert to the enemy, returned to Jamaica; where, enraged at the treachery of his captains, he iſſued a commiſſion to rear-admiral Whetſtone, and other officers, to hold a court-martial, and try them for cowardice. Hudſon, of the Pendennis, died before the trial; Kirby, of the Defiance, and Wade, of the Greenwich, were convicted, and ſentenced to be ſhot; Conſtable, of the Windſor, was caſhiered and impriſoned; Vincent, of the Falmouth, and Fogg, the admiral's own captain, were convicted of having ſigned a paper that they would not fight on the preſent occaſion; but as they had behaved gallantly in the action, the court inflicted on them no other puniſhment than that of a ſuſpenſion, nor was that to take place till the lord high-admiral's pleaſure ſhould be known. Wade and Kirby were ſent home in the Briſtol, and, upon their arrival at Plymouth, ſhot on board the ſhip, by order of a dead-warrant for their immediate execution, which had lain there for ſome time. Bembow himſelf was ſo deeply affected by this miſcarriage, that he became melancholy, and his grief co-operating with the fever occaſioned by his wound put a period to his life. The boiſterous manners of Bembow had produced this baſe confederacy, which deprived England of one of the braveſt ſea-officers that ever ſhe produced *. When Du Caſſe arrived at Carthagena, he wrote a letter to admiral Bembow to this effect:

"Sir,

"I had little hope on Monday laſt, but to have ſupped in your cabin, but it pleaſed God to order it otherwiſe: I am thankful for it. As for thoſe cowardly captains who deſerted you, hang them up, for by G---d they deſerve it.

Your's,

Du Casse."

The laſt ſea adventure I ſhall mention, is that in which admiral ſir John Munden was engaged; and indeed, in point of time, it ought to have been taken notice of ſooner. This gentleman, while the grand fleet lay at Spithead preparing for the Cadiz expedition, was detached, with a ſquadron of men of war, to intercept the ſame Du Caſſe whom Bembow afterwards ſo unfortunately engaged in the Weſt Indies. Sir John Munden came up with the French admiral off the Groyn, on the coaſt of Spain, but did not think fit to attack him, for which he was tried by a court-martial; and though he was acquitted by his brethren the officers of the fleet, there appeared ſuch marks of cowardice and treachery in his conduct, that the queen thought proper to caſhier him. But notwithſtanding, in ſome inſtances, we fell ſhort of ſucceſs in our ſea-enterprizes this year, yet the advantages we gained furniſhed ſufficient proofs how much it was the intereſt of this nation to make the ſea the principal theatre of our martial efforts, both in Europe and America. Our ſucceſſes in Flanders, however, were ſo dazzling, that we neglected the ſea-war too much, to maintain vaſt armies in the Netherlands, where we were rather loſers by the conqueſts we made for the Dutch and Germans on that ſide, our charges annually increaſing in proportion to the acquiſitions of our confederates.

Thus having ſurveyed the ſeveral ſcenes of war abroad, it is time now to return to England, where we find, that although the parliament ought regularly to have ſat for ſix months after the king's deceaſe, the queen diſſolved it by proclamation on the ſecond of July, and iſſued writs for calling another, which was to meet in the beginning of Auguſt. Her majeſty's attachment to the Tories was ſo well known, and theſe latter had, by their writings and ſpeeches, ſo prejudiced the nation againſt their adverſaries the Whigs, that they obtained a conſiderable majority in the new parliament, which was afterwards prorogued to the eighth of October, and at laſt to the twentieth of that month.

In the mean time the queen was employed in ſecuring the affections of her ſubjects: with this view ſhe made a progreſs to Oxford, Bath, and Briſtol, accompanied by her conſort, prince George of Denmark, and was received with uncommon marks of loyalty and affection by the people in every place through which ſhe paſſed. Her majeſty, before her ſetting out on this progreſs, gave a public audience † to the count de Platens, envoy extraordinary from the elector of Hanover; and about the ſame time ſhe made ſome promotions in the army, and diſpoſed of ſeveral places and preferments: and on the nineteenth of July her majeſty, in council, made an order againſt ſelling of offices and places in the houſhold and family.

On Wedneſday the twentieth of October the new parliament (the firſt of this reign) met, and the commons having choſen Mr. Robert Harley for their ſpeaker, the queen made a ſpeech to both houſes, wherein ſhe obſerved, that ſhe had called them together to aſſiſt her in carrying on the juſt and neceſſary war in which the nation was engaged; that ſhe was willing the commons ſhould examine the accounts of the public receipts and payments; that if any abuſes or miſmanagements had been committed they might be detected, and the offenders brought to condign puniſhment. She told them, that the funds aſſigned by the laſt parliament, had fallen ſhort of the ſums propoſed to be raiſed by them; although ſhe had already paid and applied to the public ſervice the ſum of one hundred thouſand pounds, which ſhe had promiſed the laſt parliament; which, however, had not made up the deficiency. It was with great concern, ſhe ſaid, that ſhe took notice to them of the diſappointment of the expedition againſt Cadiz, as well as the abuſes committed at Port St. Mary's, which had obliged her to give directions for an enquiry into the particulars. She expreſſed her deſire that the parliament would find time to conſider of ſome better and more effectual method to prevent the exportation of wool, and improve that manufacture, which ſhe was determined to encourage. She declared herſelf fully convinced, that the affections of her ſubjects were the ſureſt pledge of their duty and obedience; that ſhe was reſolved to maintain the church as by law eſtabliſhed, and protect her ſubjects in the full enjoyment of their rights and privileges, conſidering their intereſt and her own as inſeparable; and that ſhe would always exert her utmoſt endeavours to make them a happy and flouriſhing people *.

The lords returned the uſual addreſs of thanks to this ſpeech, congratulating her majeſty on the ſucceſs of her arms under the earl of Marlborough. The commons were more particular, and in their addreſs made ſeveral invidious reflections on the late reign. Among other things, they remarked, "that the wonderful progreſs of her majeſty's arms, under the earl of Marlborough, had ſignally retrieved the ancient honour and glory of the Engliſh nation †." The word retrieved in this part of the commons addreſs, occaſioned ſevral warm debates in the houſe, it being ſaid to carry an evident reflection on the memory of the late king, as if the honour of the nation had been loſt, or had greatly ſuffered, in his reign; and the word maintained was propoſed to be inſerted in the room of it: but the Tories, who introduced and ſupported the firſt expreſſion, gained their point, and, upon a diviſion, retrieved was carried, one hundred and eighty againſt eighty.

This being the firſt year of her majeſty's reign, ſhe was pleaſed to honour the city of London with her preſence at dinner, on the Lord-mayor's day, where ſhe was received with all poſſible demonſtrations of joy and loyalty: and the next day, being the thirtieth of October, the lord Shannon arrived from the confederate fleet, with the news of its ſignal ſucceſs over the French and Spaniards at Vigo. The houſe of commons, very unanimouſly and with great diſpatch, agreed to all the demands of the court, and voted all the ſupplies that were neceſſary for carrying on the war: they decreed forty thouſand men to the ſea-ſervice; and that the proportion of forces for England, to act in conjunction with thoſe of the allies, ſhould be thirty-three thouſand foot and ſeven thouſand horſe and dragoons; and that three hundred and fifty thouſand pounds be granted for guards and garriſons for the year 1703: they alſo voted ſeventy thouſand nine hundred and thirty-three pounds for ordnance; eight-hundred thirty-three thouſand eight hundred and twenty-ſix pounds for the pay of the land-forces; and fifty-one thouſand eight hundred and forty-three pounds for ſubſidies to the allies: at the ſame time, however, the commons ſhewed ſo much regard to their own rights, that they reſolved, that juſtice had not been done them upon the impeachments of the earl of Orford, and other three lords, before the houſe of peers, in the thirteenth year of the late reign; but this reſolution was not followed by a revival of thoſe proſecutions. The next thing that came under their conſideration, was a complaint, exhibited by ſir John Packington, againſt the biſhop of Worceſter and Mr. Lloyd, his ſon, for certain undue practices to prevent his election for the county of Worceſter; and the houſe, having examined into that matter, reſolved, "that ſir John Packington had, by evidence, fully made out the charge he had brought againſt the lord biſhop of Worceſter." Whereupon the houſe addreſſed her majeſty to remove the ſaid biſhop from being almoner to her majeſty, and gave directions to Mr. Attorney-general to proſecute Mr. Lloyd, the biſhop's ſon, for his ſhare in that offence ‡.

The lords, alarmed at theſe proceedings of the commons, which they looked upon as an infringement of the privileges of their houſe, preſented a counter-addreſs to her majeſty, beſeeching her not to remove the biſhop of Worceſter from his place of lord-almoner, until he ſhould be found guilty of ſome crime by due courſe of law, it being the undoubted right of every lord of parliament, and of every ſubject of England, to have an opportunity of making his own defence, before he ſuffer any kind of puniſhment. This addreſs being preſented to the queen, ſhe returned for anſwer, "that ſhe had not as yet received any complaint againſt the biſhop of Worceſter, but that ſhe looked upon it as her undoubted right to continue or diſplace any ſervant attending upon her own perſon, when ſhe ſhould think proper." The lords, piqued at this reply, reſolved the ſame day unanimouſly, "That no lord of their houſe ought to ſuffer any kind of puniſhment by any proceedings of the houſe of commons, otherwiſe than according to the known and ancient rules and methods of parliament ‖." But ſir Edward Seymour attending her majeſty with the reſolution of the houſe of commons for removing the biſhop of Worceſter, the queen anſwered, "that ſhe was very ſorry there was occaſion for this addreſs againſt the biſhop; and ſhe would direct that he ſhould no longer continue to fill the office of almoner:" for which anſwer the commons returned her majeſty their moſt humble thanks. Thus did the Tories triumph over all oppoſition; but, like moſt parties when uppermoſt, they made a very partial and arbitrary uſe of their power, of which I ſhall preſent the reader with the following glaring inſtance: Mr. John Howe, knight of the ſhire for Glouceſter, had drawn up an addreſs for that county to the queen on her acceſſion, in which were the moſt bitter reflections on the memory of the late king. By this act, and his ſubſequent behaviour in the houſe of commons, he had incurred the cenſure and diſguſt of the more moderate and unprejudiced part of his conſtituents, inſomuch that when, on the election for this new parliament, he ſtood for the ſhire, he was thrown out by a great majority: yet ſuch was his credit in the houſe, that the return in favour of his competitor was adjudged illegal and inſufficient, and Mr. Howe was declared duly elected.

The twelfth of November being appointed for a public thankſgiving for the ſucceſſes of the campaign, the queen went to St. Paul's, attended by both houſes of parliament and the great officers of ſtate. The duke of Ormond, now returned from his expedition, happening to be one of the ſtaff-officers in waiting, rode in one of the queen's coaches with the duke of Somerſet, and was hailed with the loudeſt acclamations by the innumerable ſpectators aſſembled on this occaſion; and from that day may be dated the great popularity which he afterwards acquired, and which in the end proved fatal to him. His grace coming into the houſe of lords the next day, the lord-keeper (ſir Nathan Wright) in the name of the houſe, returned him thanks for his ſignal ſervices performed at Vigo. On the other hand, the commons drew up an addreſs to the queen, deſiring ſhe would cauſe the duke of Ormond and ſir George Rooke to lay before them an account of their proceedings, a requeſt with which her majeſty complied: but at the ſame time they gave thoſe two officers the thanks of their houſe for their gallant atchievements at Vigo. Sir George Rooke was afterwards, by the queen's order, ſworn of the privy-council.

On the twenty-firſt of November the queen ſent a meſſage to the houſe of commons by Mr. ſecretary Hedges, importing, That her majeſty, conſidering that there was but a very ſlender proviſion made for the prince her huſband if he ſhould ſurvive her; and that ſhe was reſtrained from increaſing the ſame by the late act of parliament for ſettling the revenue, thought it neceſſary to recommend the making a further proviſion for the prince to their conſideration. The commons having taken the meſſage into conſideration, it was unanimouſly reſolved, That the yearly ſum of one hundred thouſand pounds be ſettled upon his royal highneſs, in caſe he ſhould ſurvive her majeſty. About this time Thomas Colepepper, eſq. one of the Kentiſh petitioners who had been ſo troubleſome to the houſe in the late reign, preſented a petition of another nature, acknowleging the juſt offence he had given to the houſe of commons, declaring his ſorrow for the ſame, and humbly praying that the houſe would be pleaſed to interpoſe with her majeſty in his behalf, to give orders to her attorney-general to ſurceaſe farther proceedings in the proſecution againſt him. Upon this petition and his publicly acknowleging his offence, and craving pardon for the ſame at the commons' bar, that houſe was pleaſed to addreſs the queen to ſtop the proſecution againſt him, which had been ſet on foot at their deſire; and thus this matter ended.

And now the earl of Marlborough being returned from Holland, he alſo received the thanks of both houſes for his ſignal ſervices this campaign: and on the ſecond of December her majeſty declared in the committee of council, that ſhe was ſo ſatisfied of the eminent ſervices of lord Marlborough to the public and herſelf, both in the command of the army, and the entire confidence he had ſettled between her majeſty and her allies the States-general, that ſhe intended to create him a duke; and on the tenth of the ſame month ſhe ſent the following meſſage to the houſe of commons:

ANNE R.

"The earl of Marlborough's ſervices to her majeſty and to the public have been ſo eminent, both in his command of the army and in his having eſtabliſhed an entire confidence and good correſpondence between her majeſty and the States-general, that ſhe has thought fit to grant the title of a duke of this kingdom to him and to the heirs-male of his body, and alſo a penſion of five thouſand pounds per annum upon the revenue of the Poſt-office, for the ſupport of his honour during her majeſty's life: if it had been in her majeſty's power, ſhe would have granted the ſame term in the penſion as in the honour; and ſhe hopes you will think it ſo reaſonable in this caſe as to find ſome proper methods of doing it."

This meſſage occaſioned great debates in the houſe; and one member in particular ſaid, that he would not derogate from the duke's eminent ſervices, but inſiſted that he was very well paid for them, and then took notice of the profitable employments enjoyed by him and his ducheſs. The reſult was an addreſs, ſhewing their inexpreſſible grief that her majeſty's moſt dutiful and loyal commons ſaw any inſtances where they were unable to comply with what her majeſty propoſed to them; but they begged leave humbly to lay before her majeſty the apprehenſion they had of making a precedent for the future alienation of the revenue of the crown, which had been ſo much reduced by the exorbitant grants of the laſt reign, and which had been ſo lately ſettled and ſecured by her majeſty's unparalleled grace and goodneſs: they however declared themſelves infinitely pleaſed to obſerve, by her majeſty's late gracious acceptance of the duke of Marlborough's ſervices, that the only way to obtain her majeſty's favour was to deſerve well of the public; and begged leave to aſſure her majeſty, that whenever ſhe ſhould think fit to reward ſuch merit, it would be to the entire ſatisfaction of her people *. To this addreſs, which in many parts of it highly reflected on the late king's perſon and reign, the queen only anſwered, That ſhe ſhould always think herſelf much concerned to reward thoſe who had deſerved well of her, and that on this account ſhe had beſtowed ſome favours on the duke of Marlborough, and was glad to find they thought them well placed. As this proceeding of the queen demonſtrates the great influence the duke and dutcheſs of Marlborough had then over her, ſo it is thought the refuſal of the commons began to alienate the duke from the Tories. It is very remarkable, that neither biſhop Burnet nor the dutcheſs of Marlborough, in the vindication of her conduct, make the leaſt mention of this circumſtance.

I muſt here obſerve, that a clauſe having been added to the bill for ſettling the prince of Denmark's revenue, exempting that prince from that part of the act of ſucceſſion, by which ſtrangers, though naturalized, were rendered incapable of holding employments, it occaſioned very warm debates. The clauſe related only to thoſe who ſhould be naturalized in a future reign, and was calculated as a reſtriction on the houſe of Hanover. Many members argued againſt this clauſe of exemption, becauſe it ſeemed to imply that perſons already naturalized would be excluded from employments in the next reign, though already poſſeſſed of the right of natural-born ſubjects; a conſequence plainly contradictory to the meaning of the act. Others oppoſed it, becauſe the lords had already reſolved by a vote, that they would never paſs any money-bill ſent up from the commons, to which a clauſe foreign to the bill ſhould be tacked; and this clauſe they affirmed to be a tack, as an incapacity to hold employments was a circumſtance altogether different from a ſettlement in money. The queen expreſſed uncommon eagerneſs in behalf of this bill; and the court-influence was managed ſo ſucceſsfully, that it paſſed through both houſes, though not without an obſtinate oppoſition, and a formal proteſt entered by ſeven-and twenty peers *.

The commiſſioners for ſtating the public accounts having, by order of the houſe of commons, examined the accounts of the earl of Ranelagh, pay-maſter of the army, laid them before the houſe, with their own obſervations, in which they bore very hard upon that earl. The commons, after a full hearing of all parties, came to the following reſolutions, viz. 1. That it appeared to the houſe, that the commiſſioners appointed by act of parliament for taking, examining, and ſtating the public accounts of the kingdom, had very good grounds for making the obſervations in their narrative or repreſentation laid before the houſe. 2. That all monies iſſued to the pay-maſter-general of the army ought to be applied to the uſe of the army and forces only, and to no other purpoſe whatſoever. 3. That all privy-ſeals, orders of the Treaſury, or other warrants to the pay-maſter-general of the army, to apply the money in his hands to other than the uſe of the army and forces, are illegal and void. 4. That all privy-ſeals or warrants of the auditors of the impreſt to paſs accounts without proper vouchers, or to make any allowances other than according to the law and courſe of the Exchequer, are illegal and void. 5. That the ſaid commiſſioners had made good the allegations in their narrative: and, 6. That the pay-maſter-general of the army had miſapplied ſeveral ſums of the public money.

The earl of Ranelagh, to avoid any farther animadverſions on his management, thought fit to reſign his place, which was afterwards ſupplied by ſir Stephen Fox and Mr. Howe as joint pay-maſters: but it appears that the noble lord's reſignation was not ſufficient to appeaſe the commons; for they expelled him their houſe, of which he was a member, and even addreſſed her majeſty to order the attorney-general to proſecute him. Herein, however, her majeſty did not chuſe to oblige them. The commons alſo reſolved, that the borrowing of money and ſtriking of tallies, with intereſt, before the public occaſions required, had been one cauſe of the great debt which the nation had incurred, and that the applying of the public money to the uſe of the civil liſt, which was otherwiſe provided for, was another cauſe of that debt.

This enquiry into the public accounts produced moſt violent animoſities between the two houſes; for the commons having paſſed ſeveral ſevere reſolutions againſt Charles lord Halifax, auditor of the receipts of the Exchequer, as having been guilty of a breach of truſt, and thereupon addreſſed the queen to direct her attorney-general to proſecute him for the ſaid offence ‡; which her majeſty, as in the other inſtance, refuſed to comply with; the lords, exaſperated at the proceedings of the commons, which diſplayed ſo much party-rancour and malice, appointed a committee to examine all the obſervations which the commiſſioners of accounts had offered to both houſes. The reſult was, that their lordſhips reſolved, That Charles lord Halifax, auditor of the receipts of the Exchequer, had performed the duty of his office according to the antient cuſtom of the Exchequer and the late act of king William III. and that he had not been guilty of any breach of truſt: at the ſame time, they ordered their proceedings to be printed and publiſhed. This difference blew up a fierce flame of diſcord between the two houſes, which manifeſted their mutual animoſity in ſpeeches, votes, reſolutions, and conferences. The commons affirmed, That no cognizance the lords could take of the public accounts would enable them to ſupply any deficiency, or appropriate any ſurpluſage of the public money: that they could neither acquit nor condemn any perſon whatſoever upon any enquiry ariſing originally in their own houſe; and that their attempt to acquit lord Halifax was unparliamentary. The lords inſiſted on their right to take cognizance originally of all public accounts: they affirmed, that in their reſolutions with reſpect to lord Halifax, they had proceeded according to the rules of juſtice: they owned, however, that their reſolutions did not amount to any judgment or acquittal; but that, finding a vote of the houſe of commons reflected upon a member of their houſe, they thought fit to give their opinion in their legiſlative authority. The queen interpoſed by a meſſage to the lords, deſiring they would diſpatch the buſineſs in which they were engaged; but the diſputes between the two houſes ſtill continuing, with a warmth that left little hopes of an accommodation, the queen reſolved to check their farther progreſs by putting an end to the ſeſſion *.

† The particulars of the reſolutions againſt this noble peer were as follow, viz, "That Charles lord Halifax, auditor of the receipts of the Exchequer, had neglected his duty, and was guilty of a breach of truſt in not tranſmitting the impreſt-rolls half-yearly to the king's remembrancer, according to the late ſtatute made in the reign of king William III. that the auditors of the impreſt had been guilty of great neglect in not certifying the king's remembrancer of the neglect of the ſeveral annual accountants, and that proceſs ought to go againſt them: that it appeared to the houſe that there had been a general miſmanagement of the public money, by not obliging the accountants to make up their accounts in due time, which was another cauſe of the national debt: that Charles lord Halifax had been guilty of a breach of truſt in not examining, every three months, the tellers vouchers for the payments upon the annuities which he allowed in his weekly certificates, according to the late act.

Another thing had occaſioned a miſunderſtanding between the two houſes, and took up a great deal of time this ſeſſion: this was a bill for preventing Occaſional Conformity. The Tories affected to diſtinguiſh themſelves as the only true friends of the church and monarchy, and vehemently inveighed againſt the diſſenters, who conſtituted great part of the Whig faction, as encroaching ſchiſmatics, that diſgraced and endangered hierarchy; and in order effectually to humble them, on the fourth of November, Mr. Bromley, Mr. St. John, and Mr. Anneſley, were ordered by the houſe of commons to bring in the abovementioned bill †, in the preamble to which all proſecution for conſcience ſake was condemned. Nevertheleſs it was enacted, "That all thoſe who had taken the ſacrament and teſt for offices of truſt, or the magiſtracy of corporations, and afterwards frequented any meeting of diſſenters, ſhould be diſabled from holding their employments, pay a fine of one hundred pounds, and five pounds for every day in which they continued to act in their employments, after having been at any ſuch meeting." They were alſo rendered incapable of holding any other employment till after one whole year's conformity, and upon a relapſe the penalties and time of incapacity were doubled.

The promoters of this bill alleged in ſupport of it, that it was intended only to reſtrain a very ſcandalous practice, which is a reproach to religion, gives offence to all good chriſtians, and to the beſt amongſt the diſſenters themſelves: that this bill enacted nothing new, and was only intended to make the laws in being more effectual: that thoſe laws were thought ſufficient to ſecure our eſtabliſhment; but ſince the invention and iniquity of men had found out ways to elude them, it was proper to let thoſe men ſee the legiſlature would not be wanting on their parts to prevent thoſe miſchiefs which muſt prove deſtructive to the church and monarchy; both which the commons declared themſelves reſolved to maintain and ſupport. It was affirmed, That an eſtabliſhed religion and a national church are abſolutely neceſſary, when ſo many ill men pretend to inſpiration, and when there are ſo many weak men to follow them: that if a national church be neceſſary, the only effectual way to preſerve it is by keeping the civil power in the hands of thoſe whoſe practices and principles are conformable thereto: that when the corporation-act was made, the parliament had freſh in their minds the confuſion and calamities that had been brought upon the nation, by ſuch as pretended to be at the ſame time in the intereſt of religion and of their country: that the parliament by that act, and afterwards by the teſt-act, thought it had ſecured our eſtabliſhment both in church and ſtate, and that they had provided a ſufficient barrier to defeat and diſappoint any attempt againſt them, never imagining that a ſet of men would riſe up, "whoſe conſciences were too tender to obey the laws, but hardened enough to break them:" that as upon the Revolution the laſt reign had begun with an act in favour of the diſſenters, ſo the commons did deſire that in the beginning of her majeſty's auſpicious reign, an act might paſs in favour of the church of England; that the laws which had been evaded might now be effectually enforced; and that thoſe men might be kept out of offices, who have ſhewn they never wanted the will, when they had the power, to deſtroy the church; and that nothing had been more miſrepreſented than this bill, which did not in any reſpect encroach on the act of toleration, or take from the diſſenters any one privilege they have by law, or give any one privilege to the church of England which was not at leaſt intended her by the laws as they now ſtand. It was moreover ſaid, that a ſeparation from the church, to which a man's conſcience will allow him occaſionally to conform, is a mere ſchiſm, which in itſelf was ſinful, without the ſuperaddition of a temporal law to make it an offence, and that conforming and nonconforming were contradictions; for nothing but a firm perſuaſion that the terms of communion required are ſinful can juſtify the one, and this plainly condemns the other.

The members who oppoſed the bill argued, That the diſſenters were generally well-affected to the preſent conſtitution: that in the laſt and greateſt danger to which the church was expoſed, they zealouſly aſſerted her againſt the papiſts, their common enemies, and have ever ſince continued to ſhew every mark of affection and ſubmiſſion to the government in church and ſtate: that to bring any real hardſhip upon them, or give riſe to jealouſies and fears at ſuch a juncture, might be attended with dangerous conſequences: that the toleration had greatly contributed to the ſafety and reputation of the church, and plainly proved that liberty of conſcience and gentle meaſures were the moſt effectual means for encreaſing the votaries of the church, and diminiſhing the number of diſſenters: that the diſſenters could not properly be termed ſchiſmatics without bringing a heavy charge upon the church of England, which had not only tolerated ſuch ſchiſm, but even allowed communion with the reformed churches abroad: that the penalties of this bill were even more ſevere than thoſe impoſed by law upon the papiſts for aſſiſting at the moſt ſolemn act of their religion: in a word, that toleration and tenderneſs had been always productive of peace and union, whereas perſecution had never failed to excite diſcord and extend ſuperſtition.

The bill paſſed the lower houſe by a conſiderable majority, but met with a very warm oppoſition from the peers, many of whom were in the Whig

* Proceedings of the Houſe of Commons, iii. 247, 260.

† The bill began thus: "As nothing is more contrary to the perſuaſion of the Chriſtian religion, and particularly to the doctrine of the church of England, than perſecution for conſcience only, and in due conſideration of it, an act paſſed in the firſt year of king William and queen Mary, for the exempting their majeſty's proteſtant ſubjects diſſenting from the church of England, from the penalties of certain laws; which act ought inviolably to be obſerved, and eaſe given to conſciences truly ſcrupulous.

intereſt. Apprehenſive that the commons would tack it to ſome money-bill, they voted, That the annexing any clauſe to a money-bill was contrary to the conſtitution of the Engliſh government and the uſage of parliament. Their lordſhips, upon peruſal of the bill, made ſeveral amendments, as, That Jacobite meetings ſhould be included: that one hundred pounds penalty ſhould be reduced to twenty pounds; and that the whole incapacitating clauſes ſhould be omitted. They alſo ſhortened the terms for information and proſecution, exempted diſſenters from holding offices for which they could not be qualified without taking the ſacrament, provided that the act ſhould not extend to the univerſity-churches, or to the French and Ducth-churches, or to the governors of hoſpitals, or the aſſiſtants of corporations or work-houſes for relieving or employing the poor. The commons taking their lordſhips amendments into conſideration, agreed to ſome of them, but diſagreed to others, which occaſioned ſeveral conferences between the two houſes, the managers on the part of the commons being Mr. Bromley, Mr. St. John, Mr. Finch, Mr. Sollicitor-general, and ſir Thomas Powis. On the part of the lords, the duke of Devonſhire, the earl of Peterborough, the biſhop of Saliſbury, the lords Somers and Halifax. After long debates the lords adhered to their amendments: the commons perſiſted in rejecting them; ſo that conferences broke up, both parties publiſhing their proceedings as a vindication of their conduct. The court put their whole ſtrength to carry this bill; even prince George came and voted for it, though he was himſelf an occaſional conformiſt, for he had received the ſacrament as lord high-admiral, and yet kept his chapel in the Lutheran way; but when it came to the final vote, the biſhops made in the laſt reign, to the ſurprize of every one, fell with their whole weight into the ſcale of the Whigs, and the bill was loſt by one voice only *.

A bill was now brought into the lower houſe, granting another year's conſideration to thoſe who had taken the oath abjuring the pretended prince of Wales. This being ſent up to the lords, they added three clauſes, importing, 1. That thoſe perſons who ſhould take the oath within the limited time might return to their benefices and employments, provided they were not already filled. 2. That any perſon endeavouring to defeat the ſucceſſion to the crown, as now limited by law, ſhould be deemed guilty of high-treaſon. 3. That the oath of abjuration ſhould be impoſed upon the ſubjects of Ireland. Theſe amendments occaſioned ſome warm debates in the houſe of commons, where it was carried only by one voice to agree with the lords, and the bill paſſed both houſes, by which a new ſecurity was provided both in England and Ireland for a proteſtant ſucceſſor.

I muſt not forget that the duke of Ormond having, at his return from the Cadiz expedition, thrown out ſome reflections upon ſir George Rooke's conduct, and hinting a deſign to ſubject him to a public accuſation, the houſe of lords ordered the admiral's inſtructions and journals to be laid before a committee apointed for that purpoſe; and the majority of the houſe afterwards voted, That ſir George Rooke had done his duty, purſuant to the councils of war, like a brave officer, to the honour of the Britiſh nation. On the other hand, ſir Henry Bellaſis was tried by a court-martial of general officers, broke, and diſmiſſed the ſervice: but major-general O'Hara was acquitted by the ſame court, and his ſuſpenſion thereupon taken off by her majeſty.

About this time the earl of Rocheſter, finding himſelf out-weighed in the council by the intereſt of the duke of Marlborough and lord Godolphin, had become ſullen and untractable; upon which the queen thought fit to order him to his government of Ireland, which he had never viſited ſince his having been appointed lord-lieutenant. The earl, however, choſe rather to reſign than comply with this injunction, and that office was beſtowed upon the duke of Ormond, who had now acquired great popularity, and was indeed a very accompliſhed nobleman.

In the beginning of January the queen gave the houſe of commons to underſtand, that the States-general had preſſed her to augment her forces, as the only means to render ineffectual the great and early preparations of the enemy. The commons immediately reſolved that ten thouſand men ſhould be hired as an augmentation of the forces to act in conjunction with the allies: but at the ſame time, in an addreſs, they intreated her majeſty would make it a point with the States-general that they ſhould put an immediate ſtop to all commerce and correſpondence with France and Spain, which the commons ſaid was ſo abſolutely neceſſary for carrying on the war, to the interrupting the enemy's trade, and reducing them to the greateſt ſtraits, that they deſired England might not be charged with the pay of ſuch additional troops, but from the day that ſuch ſtep ſhould be made by the States. The lords alſo addreſſed her majeſty to the ſame effect, who readily acknowleged the juſtneſs of their precautions, and promiſed to comply with their requeſts. She was as good as her word, and the States-general, ſore againſt their will, were obliged to publiſh a prohibition of all commerce with the ſubjects of France and Spain.

The public buſineſs being now diſpatched, her majeſty came to the houſe of peers the twenty-ſeventh of February, and gave the royal aſſent to the land-tax (four ſhillings in the pound); to the act for enabling her majeſty to ſettle a revenue (one hundred thouſand pounds per annum) on the prince of Denmark, in caſe he ſurvived her; to the malt-tax; to an act for continuing the duties upon coals; to an act for granting an aid to her majeſty by the ſale of annuities (by this act every contributor was to have fourteen pounds per annum, for ninety-nine years, for every two hundred and ten pounds paid in); to an act for preventing eſcapes out of the King's-Bench and Fleet priſons; to an act for finiſhing and adorning the cathedral of St. Paul's; to an act for the puniſhment of acceſſories to felonies, and the receivers of ſtolen goods; to an act for enlarging the time for taking the abjuration-oath, and for the future ſecuring the ſucceſſion in the proteſtant line, and extinguiſhing the hopes of the pretender; to an act for ſtating and examining the public accounts; and to an act for advancing the ſale of the forfeited eſtates in Ireland, with ſome others. After which her majeſty made a ſpeech to both houſes, thanking them for the diſpatch they had given to the public affairs, for the large ſupplies that had been granted, and the proviſion that had been made for the prince. She ſaid, ſhe hoped the diſſenters would reſt ſatisfied with the act of toleration, which ſhe was reſolved to maintain; and that thoſe of the church would conſider ſhe had her education in it, and had run great hazards for it; and that therefore they ought to be ſure ſhe would make it her peculiar care to encourage and maintain the church, and tranſmit it ſecurely ſettled to poſterity. She thought ſome farther laws were neceſſary for reſtraining the licence of the preſs, and hoped they would endeavour to ſuppreſs pernicious libels; but above all ſhe recommended union among themſelves; and concluded with acquainting them, that ſhe would apply her ſhare of the prizes taken during the war to the public ſervice.

Then the lord-keeper, by her majeſty's command, prorogued the parliament.

To the tranſactions of this ſeſſion it may not be improper to ſubjoin an account of the proceedings of the convocation, which ſat at the ſame time as the parliament, and which was diſtracted by the ſame feuds and animoſities that prevailed in that aſſembly.

It had been cuſtomary for a convocation to be ſummoned with every new parliament; but after the firſt convocation in 1689, had, as I have already related, diſcovered their averſion to the ſcheme of comprehenſion ſet on foot by king William; the king had ordered the convocation to be regularly prorogued, and never ſuffered them to ſit till February 1701, when they were, after a vacation of ten years, allowed to meet and act. Then the conteſts about the right of adjourning were revived between the higher and lower houſes, and ſo continued till William's death. When the convocation determined in conſequence of that event, the advocates for the new claims ſet up by the lower houſe affected to call themſelves a parliamentary body, and therefore inſiſted they had a right to ſit as long as the parliament; but the archbiſhop and biſhop affirmed, that the convocation being aſſembled by the biſhop's mandate, in obedience to the king's writ, could no longer ſubſiſt than while the royal writ remained in force, and ſo the convocation broke up.

On the queen's acceſſion, and the calling a new parliament, the convocation was again ſummoned, and Dr. Aldrich, dean of Chriſt-church, was choſen prolocutor; when the lower houſe, in imitation of the commons, propoſed an addreſs, reflecting on the memory of the late king, and even glancing obliquely at the conduct of the biſhops; but the upper houſe refuſing to concur, the lower receded, and both at length agreed in a joint addreſs to her majeſty, in which they congratulated her acceſſion to the throne, thanked her for the aſſurances ſhe had given of her fixed reſolution to ſupport the church of England as by law eſtabliſhed, and to maintain the ſucceſſion in the proteſtant line; and expreſſed their hopes, that whatever was wanting to reſtore the church to its juſt rights and privileges would be ſupplied by her majeſty, and would be tranſmitted ſafe to the lateſt poſterity. The queen in her anſwer told them, that ſhe was highly pleaſed with this dutiful addreſs, and conſidered their concurrence in this particular as a good preſage of their union in every thing that ſhould come before them.

Her majeſty however found herſelf diſappointed in her expectations; their former conteſts were immediately revived. The biſhops offered to grant the lower houſe any thing that could poſſibly be granted without giving up their character and authority: they propoſed, that in the intervals of ſeſſion, the lower houſe might appoint committees to prepare matters; and when buſineſs ſhould be regularly brought before them, the archbiſhop would regulate the prorogation in ſuch a manner, that they might have ſufficient time to ſit and deliberate upon the ſubject. The lower houſe were not ſatisfied with this anſwer: they had many friends among the miniſtry, and therefore they reſolved upon an addreſs to the queen, which was preſented on the twenty-third of December, 1702, begging ſhe would call the queſtion into her royal audience, and award ſuch a ſentence as to her ſhould ſeem proper. Orders were hereupon given to the queen's counſel to examine how the matter ſtood in point of law between the two houſes, which was thus ſtated to them, and from whence the reader will be beſt informed of the true nature of the diſpute between the two houſes of convocation. The conſtant practice, as far as there were books or records, was, That the archbiſhop prorogued the convocation by a ſchedule: of this the form was ſo fixed, that it could not be altered but by act of parliament. There was a clauſe in the ſchedule that continued all matters before the convocation in the ſtate they were, to the day to which he prorogued them. Hence it was evident that there could be no intermediate ſeſſion; for a ſeſſion in the lower houſe could, by paſſing a vote in any matter, alter the ſtate that matter was in.

The lower houſe on their part did not pretend to queſtion the archbiſhop's power to prorogue the whole convocation, that is, to appoint a further day, on which the whole body ſhould attend; but they conceived that ſuch power was no ways inconſiſtent with the right claimed by the lower houſe, viz. the right of holding their aſſemblies, and continuing to act as an houſe, in the intervals of his grace's ordinary prorogations; which right, in their opinion, was ſo indiſputably neceſſary to the being of the lower houſe, that they could not anſwer the truſt repoſed in them, unleſs they continued to inſiſt on the claim of it. What the report made by the judges was, is not known; but it ſhould ſeem, however, that it was unfavourable to the lower houſe, for the queen made no anſwer to their addreſs. The diſpute ſtill ſubſiſted, when the ſeſſion was finiſhed by the prorogation of the parliament *.

Thoſe conteſts, however, gave riſe to diviſions through the whole body of the clergy, who ranged themſelves into different parties, diſtinguiſhed by the names of HIGH CHURCH and LOW CHURCH, who branded each other with the moſt invidious epithets: the former branded the latter with the appellation of Preſbyterians and Republicans; and thoſe in return ſtigmatized their adverſaries as enemies to the Revolution, Jacobites, and Schiſmatics. Upon the whole, I cannot more aptly diſtinguiſh them than by giving to the former the term of Eccleſiaſtical Tories, and to the latter that of Eccleſiaſtical Whigs.

The latter end of February ſeveral promotions were made in the army; and on the ſeventh of March ſir John Leviſon Gower, baronet, was created baron Gower of Sittenham, in the county of York; John Granville, eſquire, baron Granville of Potheridge, in the county of Devon; Heneage Finch, eſquire, baron of Guernſey, in the county of Hants; Francis Seymour Conway, eſq. younger ſon of ſir Edward Seymour by a ſecond venter, baron Conway of Ragley, in the county of Warwick; and John Harvey, eſquire, was created baron Harvey of Ickworth, in the county of Suffolk. At the ſame time, Sheffield marquis of Normanby was created duke of that name, and afterwards honoured with the additional title of duke of Buckinghamſhire.

I ſhall cloſe the tranſactions of this year with an account of ſome occurrences relating to our trade, which could not ſo conveniently be introduced in the courſe of the former pages.

In this year an attempt was made by the Engliſh from Carolina, under colonel Moore, governor of that ſettlement, againſt St. Auguſtine, the capital of Spaniſh Florida; but although we took and held the town for a whole month, we were not able to reduce the caſtle for want of mortars (which certainly ſhould have been duly conſidered before) and were therefore obliged to withdraw, on the arrival of two Spaniſh men of war, and abandon the ſhips, ammunition, &c. to the enemy *.

In this year alſo the land-proprietors of the two provinces of Eaſt and Weſt New-Jerſey, in Engliſh America, who had purchaſed of the firſt proprietors, not readily finding purchaſers of under ſhares thereof, and being likewiſe at variance amongſt themſelves, agreed to ſurrender into the queen's hands both the charters for thoſe two ſeparate governments, reſerving their particular rights and properties of the lands and ſettlements therein: whereupon her majeſty conſolidated the ſaid two provinces into one, and appointed the lord Cornbury to be the firſt regal governor. This colony of New-Jerſey has ſince proſpered very well, and has been extremely uſeful in ſupplying our ſugar-colonies with proviſions, lumber, &c. Its two beſt towns are Burlington and Elizabeth town; but that of Perth-Amboy is reckoned to have the beſt harbour, and moſt commodious in point of ſituation †.

General Codrington, governor of the Leeward-Iſlands, having received advice that war was declared by England againſt France, attacked the French iſland of Guadaloupe, where, after ſome loſs, he made himſelf maſter of the great town called Baſſe-terre, and forced the enemy to retire into the caſtle and fort, which they defended for ſome time, and then blowing them up, retired to the mountains; after which the Engliſh burnt the town to the ground, razed the fortifications, took the beſt of the guns on board, and made their retreat without the loſs of a man; then embarking, they returned to St. Chriſtopher's ‡.

We have ſeen, under the preceding reign, the indiſpenſible neceſſity there was for uniting the old and new Engliſh Eaſt India companies, even if it had been for no other reaſon but the ſake of public tranquility. This coalition was finally effected this year under an act of arbitration, wherein lord Godolphin and Mr. Harley, afterwards earl of Oxford, were for the old company, and Charles Montagu lord Halifax for the new; and on the twenty-ſecond of July, an indenture tripartite was entered into by the queen and the ſaid two companies, in ſubſtance as follows, viz. That the old company's ſtock in the funds ſhould be transferred to the new, and that the old company ſhould purchaſe of the new as much of their ſtock as, with that which was transferred by the old, ſhould make up a moiety of the whole capital of the united companies. The old company was likewiſe to give an equivalent for the new company's dead ſtock. During ſeven years, each company was to have an equal power in the adminiſtration of the fund and trade, and to that end twelve perſons were to be yearly appointed by the general court of each company reſpectively, who were to be ſtiled Managers of the United Trade to India; and after thoſe ſeven years were expired, the old company were to ſurrender their charter, and the new company was henceforward to change its ſtile, and to be called "The United Company of Merchants of England trading to the Eaſt Indies," whoſe affairs were afterwards to be conducted by their own ſole directors, agreeable to the charter of the tenth of king William. Thus a prudent ſtop was put to much contention on account of thoſe two bodies of traders; and this agreement was the foundation of that company which has ſubſiſted, with ſo great credit to themſelves and benefit to the nation, ever ſince §.

The order of time leads me now to take a view of what paſſed in Scotland and Ireland, at the beginning of the ſecond year of queen Ann's reign.

A change had been made in the miniſtry of Scotland, which ſeemed favourable to the epiſcopalians and antirevolutioniſts of that kingdom. The earls of Marchmont, Melvil, Selkirk, Leven, and Hindford, were laid aſide: the earl of Seafield was appointed chancellor, and the duke of Queenſberry and the lord viſcount Tarbat were declared ſecretaries of ſtate; the marquis of Annandale was made preſident of the council, and the earl of Tullibardin lord privy-ſeal. The epiſcopal clergy, encouraged by theſe proceedings, which appeared ſo favourable to them, drew up an addreſs to the queen, imploring her protection, and humbly beſeeching her to allow thoſe pariſhes in which there was a majority of epiſcopal freeholders, to beſtow the benefices on miniſters of their principles. This petition was preſented to the queen on the thirteenth of March, 1703, by Dr. Skeen and Dr. Scot, introduced by the duke of Queenſberry and lord Tarbat: her majeſty, in her anſwer, aſſured them of her protection and endeavours to ſupply their neceſſities as far as conveniently ſhe could, and recommended to them to live in peace and chriſtian love with the clergy who were by law inveſted with the church-government in her ancient kingdom of Scotland*.

The convention of eſtates that had met in Scotland at the Revolution, had been continued as a legal parliament all the reign of king William, the preſbyterians not daring to hazard the eſtabliſhment of their kirk by a new election. The continuance of this convention was complained of as a great grievance, as unprecedented in that nation, and an invaſion of their old conſtitution, by which a parliament was annually to be choſen: her majeſty was pleaſed, therefore, this year, 1703, to gratify the people of Scotland by calling a new parliament; but, previous to relating its tranſactions, it will be neceſſary to preſent the reader with a ſhort ſketch of the ſtate of parties in Scotland at this time.

A proclamation of indemnity having been lately publiſhed, a great number of Jacobites returned from France and other countries, pretending to have changed their ſentiments, and took the oaths, that they might be qualified to ſit in parliament: theſe joined with the more rigid epiſcopalians and the antirevolutioniſts, who by this acceſſion of ſtrength, hoped to ſecure ſuch a majority as might be able to vote down preſbytery, and to reſtore patronages, or at leaſt to carry a toleration ſo as their own clergy might be called to benefices as well as the preſbyterians. This, however, proved to be an union without harmony, and conſequently poſſeſſed of very little real ſtrength. The preſbyterians and revolutioniſts were headed by the duke of Argyle; the earl of Hume declared himſelf the chief of the antirevolutioniſts; the country-party of malecontents, which took its riſe from the diſappointments of the Darien ſettlement, acted under the management of the duke of Hamilton and the marquis of Tweddale. The majority of the country-party were friends to the Revolution, and endeavoured only a redreſs of the grievances which the nation had ſuſtained during the late reign. The antirevolutioniſts, though declared enemies to the name or memory of king William, yet thought all parties were ſafe under the ſhelter of the queen's indemnity. The Jacobites, even thoſe who had taken the oaths, made no ſcruple openly to confeſs, that they had ſworn to her only as tutrix or regent during the minority of the prince of Wales her brother. By this it will appear, that the whole kingdom of Scotland was in a ferment at the ſitting down of the parliament †.

In this diſpoſition of affairs the new parliament met at Edinburgh on the ſixth of May, 1703, and the duke of Queenſberry, who had been appointed her majeſty's high-commiſſioner, having taking his ſeat on the throne, the queen's letter was read, in which ſhe demanded a ſupply for the maintenance of the forces; adviſed them to encourage trade, and exhorted them to proceed with wiſdom, prudence, and unanimity. After the queen's letter was read, the high-commiſſioner and the earl of Seafield, lord-chancellor, each of them made a ſpeech of the ſame purport with the letter. Then the duke of Hamilton offered the draught of an act for recognizing her majeſty's authority, and her undoubted right and title to the imperial crown of Scotland, according to the declaration of the eſtates of the kingdom, containing the claim of right. This was immediately received; and at the ſecond reading, the queen's advocate offered an additional clauſe, denouncing the penalties of treaſon againſt any perſon who ſhould quarrel (diſpute) her majeſty's right and title to the crown, or the exerciſe of her government from her actual entry on the ſame. This clauſe duke Hamilton and his party warmly oppoſed, alleging, that the miniſtry only propoſed it as being conſcious they had, contrary to law, been inſtrumental in adviſing her majeſty to exerciſe ſome acts of adminiſtration, ſuch as calling together the parliament which had continued all the late reign, and promoting in it ſome commiſſions, laws, and powers, which determined the being of the parliament, and circumſcribed its powers. After a long and warm debate, however, it was carried to add the advocate's clauſe, by the concurrence of the antirevolutioniſts.

The earl of Hume, after this, offered the draught of a bill for the ſupply; and immediately after it was read, the marquis of Tweddale moved, that, previous to entering upon any other buſineſs, the parliament would eſtabliſh ſuch conditions and regulations reſpecting the conſtitution of the kingdom, to take place after the deceaſe of her majeſty and the heirs of her body, as ſhould be thought moſt likely to tend to the ſecurity and preſervation of their liberty and religion. This overture and the bill were ordered to lie upon the table. In the mean time, however, the high-commiſſioner found himſelf greatly perplexed how to proceed. He had been told by the duke of Argyle and the other chiefs of the preſbyterian party, that they were determined to obtain an act for ratifying the Revolution, and confirming the kirk-government, before they would enter upon the buſineſs of a ſupply, intimating at the ſame time, that they were certain of a majority in their favour. This was a confounding explanation to the commiſſioner, who now plainly ſaw he muſt either give up the ſupplies, which were at this time particularly needful, or abandon the antirevolutioniſts, with whom he had hitherto been connected: he clearly perceived, that on this occaſion the Whigs would throw all their weight into the ſcale of duke Hamilton and the country-party, which would then outweigh that of the antirevolutioniſts. He had nothing then left, but to endeavour to cajole both parties, in which, however, he found himſelf unſucceſsful. He deſired in parliament, that the act for the ſupply might be read, promiſing that he would allow the houſe ſufficient time afterwards to diſcuſs all other ſubjects. The marquis of Tweddale inſiſted on his overture or motion; and, after ſome warm debates, it was carried in favour of the overture. The marquis of Athol preſented the heads of a bill for the ſecurity of the kingdom, in caſe of her majeſty's deceaſe; but before they were read, Argyle offered his draught of a bill for ratifying the Revolution, and all the acts conſequent thereupon. Mr. Fletcher, of Saltoun, alſo produced an act for limiting the ſucceſſion after the death of her majeſty, and the heirs of her body; as did the earl of Rothes another, importing, that no perſon coming to the crown of Scotland after her majeſty's death, and the failure of iſſue, and being at the ſame time king or queen of England, ſhould, as king or queen of Scotland, have power to make peace or war without the conſent of the Scottiſh parliament. The earl of Marchmont moved for an act to ſecure the true proteſtant religion and preſbyterian government, the heads of which he recited: and ſir Patrick Johnſton propoſed another for admitting the importation of wines and other foreign liquors. All theſe bills were ordered to lie upon the table.

After this the earl of Strathmore propoſed an act for the toleration of all proteſtants in the exerciſe of religious worſhip; whereupon a moſt violent remonſtrance was offered againſt it, in the name, and at the appointment of the general aſſembly of the kirk, wherein they inſiſt there could be no juſt ground to grant a toleration to the epiſcopal perſuaſion, ſince there was no ſinful communion required of them; and difference in opinion about church-government was not a ſufficient reaſon for ſeparation in worſhip: they likewiſe inſiſted, that in the preſent caſe and circumſtances of that nation, to enact a toleration in favour of the epiſcopalians, would be to eſtabliſh iniquity by law. And here it might be demanded of theſe tenacious gentlemen, whether the Engliſh might not, with equal juſtice, be ſaid to have eſtabliſhed iniquity by a law, in tolerating the diſſenters among them at the Revolution? I ſhall leave it to others to determine how far this indulgence on our parts was wicked or laudable; but ſurely, to an unprejudiced mind, it will appear equally juſt and innocent to have tolerated epiſcopacy in Scotland, as it was to tolerate preſbytery in England. But to proceed: the kirk ſo managed matters, that the act of toleration was dropped. Some time after the parliament paſſed the act for preſerving the true reformed religion, and confirming preſbyterian church government; as alſo the duke of Argyle's act for ratifying and perpetuating the firſt act of king William's parliament, for declaring it high-treaſon to diſown the authority of the then parliament, or to alter or innovate the claim of right, or any article thereof. The queen's high-commiſſioner, the duke of Queenſberry, giving the royal aſſent to thoſe acts, ſo far embroiled him with the cavaliers, or antirevolutioniſts, that they renounced his intereſt, reſolving to ſeparate from the court, and jointly purſue ſuch meaſures as might be for the intereſt of their party, which was now ſtrengthened by the acceſſion of the marquis of Athol and the viſcount Tarbat, who had proteſted againſt the foregoing acts.

But of all the bills that were produced in the courſe of this remarkable ſeſſion, no one raiſed ſuch a violent diſpute as the act of ſecurity, propoſed by the duke of Argyle and his party, in which it was provided, in order to ſecure the ancient independency of the Scots, that in default of iſſue of her majeſty, the ſame perſon ſhould in no event be capable to be king or queen both of England and Scotland, unleſs a free communion of trade, the freedom of navigation, and the liberty of plantations, &c. were fully agreed to by the parliament of England; and ſeveral other proviſions were likewiſe made therein, all calculated to abridge the prerogative of the crown, to limit the ſucceſſor, and throw a vaſt additional power into the hands of the parliament. It would be equally tireſome and ungrateful to the reader, was I to go about to recite the many inflammatory ſpeeches and bitter ſarcaſms that were bandied between party and party on this occaſion; let it then ſuffice to ſay, that notwithſtanding the moſt obſtinate oppoſition from the miniſtry and the antirevolutioniſts, the bill was paſſed on the thirteenth of Auguſt, by a majority of fifty-nine voices, and the commiſſioner was warmly importuned to give it the royal aſſent; but he declined from time to time to give any anſwer: at length, on the tenth of September, he made a ſpeech to the houſe, in which he gave them to underſtand, that he had received her majeſty's orders, impowering him to give the royal aſſent to all the acts voted in this ſeſſion, except the act of ſecurity, which they might eaſily believe required her majeſty's farther conſideration; at the ſame time her majeſty expected they would mind their own ſafety, in making the neceſſary proviſions for the troops, and that they would put the trade and cuſtoms upon that foot, that the civil liſt might be ſupported; and he intreated them to finiſh theſe matters as ſoon as poſſible. The earl of Marchmont afterwards propoſed the ſettling the ſucceſſion in the houſe of Hanover; but his motion was rejected, not ſo much it ſhould ſeem from any averſion the majority in parliament entertained to the ſaid ſucceſſion, as that they were reſolved to avoid a nomination, until ſuch conditions of government ſhould be previouſly ſtipulated, as might ſecure them againſt the influence of an Engliſh miniſtry. Some members of the houſe, among whom Mr. Fletcher of Saltoun, a man of profeſſed republican principles, was the chief, began to queſtion, whether the crown had a negative or not: they ſaid till of late a negative had never been interpoſed, and that but in very few caſes; and in the end the majority peremptorily refuſed to go upon the ſupply till the act of ſecurity had received the royal aſſent: in ſhort, the ferment grew ſo high, that the commiſſioner, apprehenſive of the moſt fatal conſequences, called for ſuch acts as he was impowered to paſs, and then, on the ſixteenth of September, adjourned the parliament to the twelfth of October following.

Although the queen refuſed to paſs the act of ſecurity, the royal aſſent was granted to an act of limitation on the ſucceſſor, in which it was declared, that no king or queen of Scotland ſhould have power to make peace or war without conſent of parliament. Another law was enacted, to allow French wines and other liquors to be imported in neutral bottoms; it being alleged, that without this expedient the revenue would have been inſufficient to maintain the government. An act paſſed in favour of the company trading to Africa and the Indies; another for a commiſſion concerning the public accounts; another for puniſhing ſlanderous ſpeeches and writings: the commiſſion for treating of an union with England was vacated, with a prohibition to grant any other commiſſion for that purpoſe without conſent of parliament. As no ſupplies had been provided for before the adjournment, the pay of the army, with the charge of the government, was left to run upon credit; and ſuch was the national humour among the Scots at this period, to render themſelves a free and independent people, that they ſeemed capable of the moſt extravagant things that could be ſuggeſted to them.

Thus

Thus ended this famous ſeſſion of parliament, in which the greateſt part of the miniſtry had abandoned the duke of Queenſberry, and particularly the earl of Seafield, lord-chancellor, the marquis of Athol, lord privy-ſeal, and the viſcount of Tarbat, ſecretary of ſtate, with all their followers. Nevertheleſs, the queen thought proper to confer honours upon ſeveral who appeared to have influence in the nation, and who, though in oppoſition to her miniſtry, were thought to have an attachment to her perſon and government: the marquis of Athol was made a duke, and the lord Tarbat earl of Cromarty; the marquis of Douglas, though a minor, was alſo created a duke; the viſcounts of Stair and Roſeberry were created earls of the ſame name; the lord Boyle, earl of Glaſgow; James Stewart, of Bute, earl of Bute; Charles Hope of Hoptoun, earl of Hoptoun; John Crawford, of Kilbruce, viſcount of Garnock; and ſir James Primroſe of Carrington, viſcount of Primroſe. Soon after, her majeſty revived the order of the Thiſtle, which had been dropped by the late king; it was to be carried in a green ribbond, as the George is in a blue; the glory was in the form of a St. Andrew's croſs. The dukes of Argyle and Athol, the marquis of Annandale, the earls of Orkney and Seafield, were the firſt who had it, the number being limited to twelve *.

Whilſt things were in this ſituation in Scotland, there were alſo high diſcontents in Ireland, where an animoſity now came to be raiſed, as well as in England, between Whig and Tory. The duke of Ormond having been conſtituted lord-lieutenant of that kingdom, as has been obſerved already, held a parliament there the latter end of the year, when it appeared that this nation looked upon themſelves to be under very great hardſhips; for the commons having choſen Alan Broderick, eſq. ſolicitor-general, to be their ſpeaker, one of the firſt things they did, was to reſolve, "That all the proteſtant freeholders of that kingdom had been falſely and maliciouſly traduced, miſrepreſented, and abuſed, in a repreſentation made of them in a book entitled, "The Report of the Commiſſioners appointed to enquire into the Iriſh Forfeitures," in which it is aſſerted, that the ſaid freeholders, through length of time, and by contracting new friendſhips with the Iriſh, or by inter-purchaſing with one another, but chiefly through a diſlike of the diſpoſitions of the forfeitures, are ſcarce willing to find any perſon guilty of the late rebellion, even upon the fulleſt evidence." And it appearing to the houſe, that Francis Anneſley, a member of the houſe, John Trenchard, Henry Langford, and James Hamilton, were authors of that book, they farther reſolved, that Anneſley ſhould be expelled the houſe: Hamilton was dead, and Trenchard had returned to England. It ſeems they had finiſhed the enquiry about the forfeitures before the meeting of this parliament, and had ſold the beſt of the eſtates to the Sword-blade company of London, at an under-value; and that company had petitioned for a bill to enable them to take poſſeſſion, make conveyances in conſequence thereof, &c. but the parliament refuſed to confirm the bargain, and expelled John Aſgill, one of their members, who, as agent to the ſaid company, had offered to lend the Iriſh government money, on condition an act was procured to confirm the company's purchaſe of the forfeited eſtates.

The commons purſued the truſtees of the forfeited eſtates ſtill farther, for they reſolved to offer a repreſentation of the ſtate and grievances of the nation to the queen, in which they gave her majeſty to underſtand, "that the conſtitution of the kingdom of Ireland had been of late greatly ſhaken, and the lives, liberties, and eſtates, of the ſubjects called in queſtion, and tried in a manner unknown to their anceſtors: that the charge they had been put to by the truſtees for forfeited eſtates, in defending their juſt rights (which, after many and expenſive delays, had been allowed by the ſaid truſtees) exceeded the value of the current caſh of that kingdom: that they could not, without the greateſt grief of heart, reflect on the loſs of their trade, and of being deprived of the means of earning their livelihood, and maintaining their own manufactures, whereby their poor were become very numerous, eſpecially the poor induſtrious proteſtants: that very many proteſtant families had been forced to leave the kingdom, and remove into foreign countries: that their foreign trade was under ſuch reſtrictions and diſcouragements, that it became in a manner unprofitable: that the want of frequent parliaments had given encouragement to evil men, who minded nothing but their own gain, though tending to the ruin and oppreſſion of her majeſty's ſubjects: that the rapacious covetouſneſs of ſome civil officers was inſupportable, who amaſſed together vaſt eſtates in a ſhort time, in that poor country: that others reſided for the moſt part out of the kingdom, and neglected their duties, to the great detriment of her majeſty's ſubjects, and failure of juſtice: and that it was from her majeſty's gracious interpoſition alone in their favour, that they hoped for relief from theſe their manifold griefs and oppreſſions."

The commons afterwards voted the neceſſary ſupplies, and granted one hundred and fifty thouſand pounds to make good the deficiencies of the neceſſary branches of the eſtabliſhment. They alſo voted a proviſion for the half-pay officers, and aboliſhed penſions to the amount of ſeventeen thouſand pounds a year, as unneceſſary branches of the eſtabliſhment. They paſſed an act for ſettling the ſucceſſion of the crown after the pattern ſent them from England. A very ſevere bill was alſo paſſed againſt the papiſts, by which it was enacted, that all eſtates of papiſts ſhould be equally divided among their children, notwithſtanding any ſettlement to the contrary, unleſs the perſons to whom they might be ſettled, ſhould qualify themſelves by taking the oaths, and communicating with the church of England. They were proceeding with great zeal againſt popery and the pretender, when they were ſuddenly adjourned by the command of the lord lieutenant, and broke up greatly irritated againſt that nobleman, whom they ſeverely reflected upon as the adviſer of this meaſure; though in truth his excellency, on the bill "to prevent the growth of popery" being offered to him by the houſe, had tranſmitted it to the Engliſh miniſtry, warmly recommended by himſelf; but the latter, being in expectation of very conſiderable preſents from the papiſts, ſtrenuouſly oppoſed the ſending back the bill with the royal aſſent, on pretence that as the queen was then earneſtly interceding with the emperor for favour to the proteſtants in his dominions, it ſeemed not ſeaſonable, and was ſcarce decent, to paſs ſo ſevere a law againſt thoſe of his religion *. It is now time to return to the military operations of this year.

The emperor had agreed with the allies, that his ſon, the archduke Charles, ſhould aſſume the title of king of Spain, by the name of Charles III. demand the infanta of Portugal in marriage, and undertake ſome enterprize of importance in conjunction with the maritime powers. Leopold had likewiſe promiſed to ſend ſuch an army into the field, as would in a little time be able to expel the elector of Bavaria from his dominions; but he was ſo dilatory in his preparations, that the French king broke all his meaſures by ſending powerful reinforcements to the elector; accordingly marſhal Villars, who lay with an army of thirty thouſand men at Straſburgh, had orders to join the elector. The marſhal paſſed the Rhine, and inveſted Kehl, an important fort, over-againſt Straſburgh, which was ſurrendered to him after a ſhort reſiſtance. The emperor, alarmed at this event, ordered count Schlick to enter Bavaria on the ſide of Saltzburgh, with an army; and count Stirum, on the ſide of Newmark, with another. The Imperial generals committed great ravages in the electorate, but were frequently met with and defeated by the elector's troops, who, encouraged by theſe ſucceſſes, advanced to Ratiſbon †, where the diet of the empire was aſſembled, and demanded that he ſhould be immediately put in poſſeſſion of the bridge, and one of the gates of the city. The burghers, overawed by ſo powerful a force in their neighbourhood, thought proper to comply, and on the eighth of April his electoral highneſs entered the town; however, he ſigned an inſtrument, by which he engaged to withdraw his forces as ſoon as the emperor ſhould ratify the reſolution of the diet for the neutrality of Ratiſbon.

In the mean time marſhal Villars having received orders to join the elector at all events, and being reinforced by a body of troops under count Tallard, determined to break through the lines which prince Lewis of Baden had formed at Stolhoffen, which he at laſt effected, after having been repulſed ſeveral times, and penetrating through the vale of Kintzig, he joined the elector in the beginning of May; and it was reſolved between them, that the marſhal ſhould watch the motions of the prince of Baden, whilſt the elector invaded the county of Tyrol, in order to open a communication with the French in Italy. Bavaria's motions were ſo ſwift, and ſuch his ſucceſs, that it alarmed the court of Vienna; for in ſix days time he made himſelf maſter of the whole Tyroleſe, and took as many ſtrong places as might have ſtopped a numerous army for as many months, had they been in ſuch a condition as they ought: at length the elector made a triumphant entry into Inſpruck, the capital of that country, from which he demanded homage, and a monthly contribution of one hundred and twenty thouſand florins. But the elector marching afterwards to the mountain Brenner, in order to join the duke of Vendoſme in Italy, upon which junction the ruin of the houſe of Auſtria would have probably followed; the boors in Tyrol roſe, and retook ſeveral of the places he had reduced, and cut in pieces the garriſons he had left to guard them; and though the elector afterwards revenged himſelf upon the peaſants, yet underſtanding that ſome of the Imperial generals were marching againſt him, and that his country had ſuffered very much during his abſence, he was obliged to abandon Tyrol, and his deſign of joining Vendoſme, and return to Munich. Being afterwards rejoined by marſhal Villars, they both together fell upon Stirum, who, with a conſiderable body of the Imperialiſts, was marching to join prince Lewis of Baden, and defeated him near Hochſtet. In the mean time count Tallard beſieged and took Old Briſac ‡; and on the ſeventh of October inveſted Landau. The defence made by the governor of Briſac was ſo ſlender, that he was condemned in a council of war to be beheaded, and all the officers who ſigned the capitulation were puniſhed.

The confederates, ſenſible of what importance the preſervation of Landau was, after they had diſpoſed the reſt of the army into winter-quarters, ordered the hereditary prince of Heſſe Caſſel to attempt the raiſing of the ſiege; to which purpoſe he ſet forward from the Netherlands with twelve battalions and twenty-nine ſquadrons; and having reached Altzey, in the Palatinate, by means of very long marches, was there met by the prince of Naſſau Weilburg, general of the Palatinate forces, in order to concert proper meaſures for the relieving of Landau. The French having notice of this march immediately detached M. Pracontal, with a body of ten thouſand men, to follow the prince cloſely, or rather, if poſſible, to get before him. Pracontal uſed ſuch diligence that he joined count Tallard before the confederates had any notice of his march. The prince of Heſſe being arrived at Spires, within four leagues of Landau, the French generals ſurprized him on the 15th of November, and obtained a complete victory, after a very bloody and obſtinate engagement, in which the prince of Heſſe behaved with exemplary courage and conduct; he had three horſes killed under him, and ſlew a French officer with his own hand: but after

* This parliament, beſides the bills already mentioned, paſſed an act for an additional exciſe on beer, ale, and other liquors; another encouraging the importation of iron and ſtaves; a third for preventing Popiſh prieſts from coming into the kingdom; a fourth for ſecuring the liberty of the ſubject, and for preventing impriſonment beyond ſeas; and a fifth for naturalizing all proteſtant ſtrangers. Burnet. Hiſt. of Europe, vol. vii. Oldmixon. Tindal.

† Ratiſbon is a very large and ſtrong city of Germany, in the circle and dukedom of Bavaria, and a biſhopric, under the archbiſhop of Saltzburg. It is free and imperial; famous for the general diets of the empire. Although it was ſeized by the elector of Bavaria this campaign, he loſt it (as well as his own dominions), in 1704, ſoon after the action of Schellenberg, near Donawert. It has a fair ſtone bridge over the Danube, one thouſand and ninety-one feet long, and thirty-two feet broad, ſupported by pillars, and adorned with three towers; here is alſo a magnificent old cathedral, and a ſtately caſtle, where the imperial diets are commonly held.

‡ Briſac is a very conſiderable city and caſtle of Germany, and eſteemed one of the ſtrongeſt places in Europe, whether its ſituation upon a high hill be conſidered, or what art has contributed to render it regular. The fortifications are a French league in compaſs; the baſtions are filled with earth, faced with brick, and ſecured with a large broad ditch full of water, and it will require (in time of war) eight or ten thouſand men to defend it. It ſtands on the river Rhine, twenty-ſix miles north of Baſil, and thirty ſouth of Straſburg.

incredible efforts, he was obliged to retreat, with the loss of some thousand men. The French, however, gained not a bloodless victory; Pracontal, and several other officers of distinction, being slain in the action; nevertheless they resumed the siege of Landau, which the count de Frize, its governor, despairing of relief, surrendered on the nineteenth, upon honourable terms. Count Marsin being sent, about the same time, to command the French army in conjunction with the elector of Bavaria, in the room of marshal Villars, whose haughty and assuming behaviour the elector could not bear, they invested the city of Augsburg *, with their united forces, on the sixth of December, which was surrendered on the fourteenth.

To add to the distractions of the empire, this winter the Hungarians broke out into open rebellion, under prince Ragotski, who published a declaration, setting forth, that, provided they might enjoy their religion, liberties, and estates, and the government of Hungary might be put into the hands of a native, they would return to their allegiance. The emperor hereupon sent prince Eugene to Presburgh, to give the necessary orders for the security of the frontiers, and to endeavour to bring the malecontents to some accommodation †. Having thus given some account of the state of the war in Germany, let us now turn to the Netherlands where the arms of the allies were attended with better success.

The duke of Marlborough's departure from England had been delayed for some time by the death of his only son, the marquis of Blandford, who died of the small-pox in the beginning of the year: so equally are good and evil intermixed. The duke no sooner saw himself happy in his sovereign's favour, and confessed by all the power in Europe one of the greatest generals of his age, than he found himself deprived of the only heir of his wealth and grandeur, by whom he hoped to transmit his great name down to posterity. His grace, however, having somewhat recovered this heavy stroke of fate, crossed the sea about the middle of April, 1703, and, assembling the allied army, opened the campaign in Flanders with the siege of Bonne, which was invested on the third of May, N. S. This town is situated on the Lower Rhine ‡, about fourteen miles south of Cologne, the usual residence of that elector, and the only place of strength he had left, so fatal was his alliance with France. This place was attacked in three different quarters; in one by the prince of Hesse Cassel, in another by general Coehorn, the celebrated Dutch engineer, and in the third by lieutenant-general Fagel. The garrison made a stout and vigorous defence, and continued to hold out for a week, when the fort having been taken by assault, and the breaches being practicable, the marquis d'Alegre, the governor, ordered a parley to be beat; hostages were immediately exchanged, and two days after, the garrison marched out, and were sent to Luxemburgh.

While the greatest part of the confederate army was employed before Bonne, the French king, imagining that city would make a longer resistance, sent orders to the marshals Boufflers and Villeroy to lay siege to the city of Liege; which they were preparing to do, when they received advice from the marquis d'Alegre, that he could no longer defend Bonne. Hereupon the two marshals advanced suddenly into the neighbourhood of Tongeren ||, with an army of forty thousand men, which they surprized, and made the garrison prisoners. Bonne being surrendered, the duke of Marlborough marched towards the French army, with a design to have given them battle; but, upon his approach, marshal Villeroy thought proper to retire within the lines, having first blown up the works about Tongeren. Hereupon it was resolved to attack the French lines; which service was effectually performed by general Coehorn and baron Spaar, though not without considerable loss in the attack.

The joy for this success was not a little abated by the arrival of an express from general Opdam, with an account that the French, under marshal Boufflers, had come out of their lines, near Antwerp, and being joined by a considerable detachment from the grand army, had surrounded the confederate forces under his command, and entirely routed them, and that he had escaped to Breda, with only thirty horse: but while the States were under some consternation at this misfortune, another express arrived from mynheer Hop, treasurer-general of the States, and their deputy in that army, giving an account, that the army was indeed surrounded by a superior force, but had repulsed the enemy, and effected an honourable retreat to Lillo. The truth was, that general Opdam had the misfortune to be cut off from the rest of his army at the beginning of the engagement, and looking upon all as lost, fled with precipitation to Breda: the rest of the Dutch generals, however, behaved themselves with such bravery and conduct, that the French were repulsed. General Schlangenburg, who commanded in the absence of Opdam, gained immortal honour in this action, and received the thanks of his masters for saving their army, when it had been given over for lost. On the other hand, general Opdam, though he had served his country above thirty years without any imputation on his courage, and his being cut off from his army was purely accidental, yet could he never afterwards recover any tolerable reputation in the field. This battle, which was extremely bloody, was called the Battle of Eckeren, from the name of the place where it was fought.

The duke of Marlborough finding it impossible to bring the French to an engagement, sat down before Huy §, of which he made himself master in about ten days time, the garrison capitulating to be

The tenth of September, the confederates inveſted Limburgh †, and on the twenty-eighth of the ſame month the garriſon ſurrendered, and were made priſoners of war. Thus ended the campaign in Flanders. The town of Gueldres ſurrendered on the ſeventeenth of December following, having been blocked up for ſome months by a detachment of the Pruſſian troops, by the ſurrender whereof the Dutch became maſters of all the Spaniſh Guelderland, as they were before of Limburgh, another of the provinces of the Spaniſh Netherlands; ſo that their frontiers were now ſufficiently enlarged, and the enemy removed to a convenient diſtance ‡.

The naval operations of this year were not attended with all the ſucceſs that might have been wiſhed. The making prince George lord high-admiral proved, in many inſtances, very unhappy to the nation: men of bad deſigns impoſed upon him; he underſtood ſea-affairs very little; and they ſheltered themſelves under his name, to which great ſubmiſſion was paid: but the complaints roſe the higher for that our main fleet was ready to go to ſea in May, but the Dutch fleet was not yet come over to join us; and therefore ſir George Rooke was ordered on a cruize upon the French coaſt, in order to keep the enemy in an alarm. The admiral, however, being taken ill, George Churchill, eſq. admiral of the blue, was ſent to take upon him the command of the fleet; but he not arriving in time, and ſir George Rooke finding himſelf better, put to ſea, and continued out for ſomething more than a month. Sir George had propoſed a ſcheme for diſtreſſing the enemy, by ſailing very early into the bay of Biſcay, where he thought, if they had any men of war without Port Louis and Rochefort, they might be ſurprized and taken; but by the unavoidable delays in our fleet putting to ſea, the French had got notice of the deſign, and moſt of their ſquadron had ſailed. Sir George therefore perceiving that he could do the nation no ſervice by remaining longer on the French coaſt, returned home about the middle of June, but not till he had firſt taken and ſent in a French Eaſt India ſhip, worth one hundred thouſand pounds, one of their men of war of thirty-ſix guns, and a Weſt India merchant-ſhip worth forty thouſand pounds, with ſeveral other prizes of inferior value. Biſhop Burnet, indeed, is pleaſed to aſſert, that ſir George's illneſs was only a pretence to avoid going to ſea; and that when he did, he at laſt returned without attempting any thing. As the above facts are related from the beſt authorities §, I ſhall leave the reader to comment upon the candour and veracity of this right reverend hiſtorian, who has been too implicitly followed by ſeveral of our late writers.

In the ſpring of this year vice-admiral Graydon was ſent to the Weſt Indies with a pretty ſtrong ſquadron to attack the iſland of Placentia, and expel the French from the Newfoundland fiſhery. In his paſſage he fell in with monſieur Du Caſſe, as he was returning from Carthagena, with four ſhips only, and thoſe very foul, having on board a large treaſure. The Montagu, one of Graydon's ſquadron, engaged the ſternmoſt of thoſe ſhips; but he was called off by the admiral, who ſaid he had orders not to loſe any time by chaſing or ſpeaking with any ſhip whatſoever. This affair drew very heavy reproaches on the admiral: the admiralty, however, took the whole blame upon themſelves, and inſerted a paragraph in the Gazette to juſtify this officer's conduct, by declaring his orders to have been what he ſaid they were, aſſigning for a reaſon, that the contrary winds having kept him in port much longer than was intended, and the ſervice upon which he was bound very much requiring his preſence, with the regiment that was with him, it was thought proper to lay him under ſtrict reſtrictions from loſing any time in his paſſage, by chaſing or engaging any veſſels he might meet at ſea. After this rencounter admiral Graydon proceeded with all imaginable diligence on his voyage; but when he came off the coaſt of Newfoundland, about the beginning of Auguſt, he received certain advice that the enemy at Placentia were not only ſuperior in number, and conſequently able to make a good reſiſtance, but that the avenues to the place were extremely difficult, the grounds marſhy, and that there were no planks or other materials for mounting the guns on the batteries. Theſe circumſtances being duly weighed, together with the aſſiſtance the enemy might receive from their privateers and other ſhipping then at Placentia, a council of war, which was held on board the admiral, were unanimouſly of opinion, that it would be in vain to make any attempt on the place with the ſhips and forces at ſuch an advanced ſeaſon of the year: and that inſtead of ſucceſs, they ſhould only ſubject her majeſty's arms to diſgrace and defeat; upon which it was reſolved to return to England *.

Sir George Rooke, on his return home, was again attacked by his diſorder, which rendered him ſo weak and infirm, that he aſked and obtained leave to go to Bath, and the command of the grand fleet this year was beſtowed upon ſir Cloudeſley Shovel. It conſiſted of 35 ſhips of the line, and the admiral had under him ſir Stafford Fairborne, vice-admiral of the red; ſir George Byng, rear-admiral of the red; and ſir John Leake, vice-admiral of the blue. One principal deſign of ſending out this fleet was, to encourage the king of Portugal (who, as we ſhall ſee, had by this time joined the grand alliance) to remain firm to the confederates, and to protect his coaſts againſt the French. Another was, to make a deſcent in Spain, and try the affections of the Spaniards for the emperor's family;

* This account is taken from Campbell, who ſays, that he had it from a MS. defence of admiral Graydon's, in which are particular certificates as to the truth of the facts; and as the admiral was never proſecuted, though his conduct was afterwards enquired into by the houſe of lords, it is to be preſumed it was found ſatisfactory.

but the ſcheme was ſo ill laid, that nothing could be expected from it. The fleet was not ready to ſail till the beginning of July, and the admiral had orders to leave the Streights by the end of September; a ſtrange inconſiſtency! Sir Cloudeſley repreſented the impoſſibility of performing any eſſential ſervice in ſo ſhort a time; but the admiralty-board enforcing their orders, he had nothing left but to comply.

He waited till the middle of June for the Dutch, and then was joined only by twelve ſhips of the line, under Allemonde, and two other flags. On the firſt day of July he ſailed from St. Helen's with the combined ſquadrons, amounting to fifty-ſeven ſhips, having alſo a fleet of upwards of two hundred and thirty merchantmen under his convoy. On the twenty-fourth he arrived off the Rock of Liſbon, where he held a council of war, in which the rendezvous was appointed to be held in Altea-bay, on the coaſt of Valencia. There the whole fleet arrived on the thirty-firſt of Auguſt; and having made a deſcent with two thouſand five hundred marines, they ſent a meſſage to the governor, that they did not come as enemies, but friends. The general anſwered, he had a great eſteem for the Engliſh, but he was ſorry he was not in a condition to oppoſe their landing. Sir Cloudeſley and the Dutch admiral then publiſhed a ſhort manifeſto, importing, that, purſuant to the orders of her majeſty the queen of Great Britain, and the States-general, they were come to protect ſuch of the good ſubjects of Spain as were willing to return to the obedience of their lawful ſovereign the archduke Charles, and endeavour to ſhake off the yoke of France. This manifeſto ſeemed to have no other effect but that the Spaniards, ſeeing no injury was offered them, brought in plenty of all refreſhments and proviſions, for which they were paid in ready money. The fleet having taken in water and freſh proviſions, the marines were reimbarked, and the admiral ſailed again the third of September for Leghorn, where count Lamberg, the imperial ambaſſador at Rome, came on board ſir Cloudeſley's ſhip, and acquainted him that the archduke was proclaimed king of Spain at Vienna the twelfth of September, by the name of Charles III. † Hereupon fifteen guns were fired by every ſhip in the fleet, and his Catholic majeſty's health drank.

The admiral, on his leaving England, had received orders to ſend ſome aſſiſtance to the Cevennois, or inhabitants of the Cevennes, a mountainous country in the ſouth part of Languedoc in France; and who having, in the courſe of the preceding year, been perſecuted into a revolt on account of religion, had implored the protection of England and the States-general. Agreeable to his inſtructions, therefore, ſir Cloudeſley, before he left Altea-bay, had ſent the Pembroke and Tartar into the Gulph of Narbonne, with arms and ammunition for thoſe malecontents; but the court of Verſailles had been ſo fully apprized of the expedition, that they had taken effectual methods to render it abortive: whereupon the two ſhips left the French coaſt, and ſailed for Leghorn, where they arrived the twenty-third of September, and joined the grand fleet that had put in there three or four days before. Such of our readers who are deſirous of ſeeing a more particular account of the inſurrections of the Cevennois, and our attempt in their favour, may conſult M. de Voltaire's Eſſay on General Hiſtory, and his Age of Lewis XIV. as alſo Mr. Oldmixon's Hiſtory of England, it being foreign to our purpoſe: I ſhall therefore only obſerve, that the time being now expired to which the admiral was limited, he ſailed from Leghorn on the twenty-ſecond of October; and having ordered a ſquadron of ſhips to Tunis, Tripoli, and Algiers, to renew the peace with thoſe piratical ſtates, he came again into Altea-bay, where ſeveral of the natives declared for king Charles, and entered as volunteers to ſerve on board our fleet; after which the admiral, having victualled and watered, ſet ſail for England, and arrived in the Downs on the ſeventeenth of November following, not having had an opportunity of engaging the French fleet, which kept cloſe in Toulon while the confederates were in the Mediterranean. This expedition did not reflect much honour upon the nation, and therefore created ſome murmurs; but theſe fell, very undeſervedly, upon the admiral, who certainly did all that was in his power, and not on thoſe who gave him his orders, and were thought to have rather more power than parts ‡.

But while the grand fleet was at ſea, Thomas Dilkes, eſq. rear-admiral of the white, did the nation a very acceptable ſervice in diſtreſſing the French trade. Intelligence was brought to the lord high-admiral's council, that a conſiderable fleet of French merchant ſhips, with their convoy, were in Cancalle bay, on the coaſt of Normandy; upon which the rear-admiral, who was then at Spithead with a ſmall ſquadron, had orders to ſail immediately in purſuit of them, which he did on the twenty-ſecond of July, and executed his commiſſion with ſuch ſucceſs, that he took, burnt, and ſunk, upwards of forty ſail, three of which were equipped as men of war. This ſervice was thought of ſuch importance, that the queen ordered a gold medal to be ſtruck on the occaſion, and delivered to the rear-admiral and all his officers, who certainly diſ-

† The ceremony of proclaiming the archduke was performed in the following manner: the privy-council, to the number of thirty-five, and all the foreign miniſters, having met in the council chamber, by an invitation from the emperor, his imperial majeſty made a long ſpeech to the aſſembly, in which he declared, that, after the example of his predeceſſor, the emperor Charles V. he made a formal reſignation of all his claims and pretenſions to the crown of Spain, in favour of his eldeſt ſon, Joſeph, king of the Romans. And at the ſame inſtant the king of the Romans, on his part, made the like reſignation in favour of his brother the archduke, who thereupon made his acknowlegements to the emperor and the king of the Romans for the ſame. The uſual oaths were then adminiſtered to him on the Goſpel, by cardinal Collonitſch, before a crucifix placed on a large table, in the midſt of four wax tapers; and the new king received the compliments of the whole court. After this he entertained the emperor his father and all the imperial family at dinner; and in the evening he himſelf was entertained at ſupper by his brother the king of the Romans. Never had there been a more magnificent feſtival ſeen at Vienna. All the Neapolitan nobility, who were in the Auſtrian intereſt, kept open houſe; at night there were public balls, fireworks, and illuminations. The new king made an offering at the ſhrine of the Holy Virgin, in the church of Marienzel, of a large croſs richly adorned with jewels. tinguiſhed themſelves greatly by their courage and conduct in this expedition §.

In the midſt of theſe battles, and the ſieges of ſo many towns and cities, and whilſt the confederate fleets lorded it on the Ocean, Lewis XIV. ſtraining every nerve of government, ſtill appeared in a capacity to make head againſt the united efforts of the grand alliance: it was therefore reſolved to weaken him, by detaching from his intereſt two of his principal allies, the duke of Savoy and the king of Portugal, in hopes, by means of the latter, to cut out ſufficient work for him and his grandſon in Italy, and by the aſſiſtance of the other to open an eaſy entry into Spain, whither the archduke Charles had now in view to tranſport himſelf in perſon. The project ſucceeded to admiration; and in the ſummer of this year Lewis, to his infinite ſurprize, learnt for certain that the duke of Savoy was on the point of quitting the Bourbon intereſt, and was actually in treaty with the emperor. The duke had been treated with great inſolence by the generals of France: this, joined to the advantageous offer made him by the emperor, and that verſatility which was ſo truly the characteriſtic of his family, determined him to abandon the intereſt of his ſon-in-law Philip V. and to eſpouſe the cauſe of the allies. The event proved that he was not at all wanting to the rules of policy in the treaty he made, but he was wanting in another very eſſential point of politics; I mean the leaving his troops at the mercy of the French while he was treating with the emperor; for though he uſed the utmoſt circumſpection to conceal his intentions till the end of the campaign; yet the court of Verſailles having, as obſerved, got intelligence of the duke's proceedings, immediately ſent orders to the duke of Vendoſme to ſeize and diſarm the troops of Savoy that were in his ſervice, to the number of twenty-two thouſand men. The duke, by way of reprisal, commanded ſeveral French officers that were in Turin, and the French ambaſſador himſelf, to be put under arreſt. This proceeding produced another order from the French king to the duke of Vendoſme, to invade Savoy immediately, and to tranſmit the following letter, in his Moſt Chriſtian majeſty's name, to his royal highneſs:

"SIR,

"Since neither religion, honour, intereſt, alliance, or even your own hand-writing, are of any force between us, I ſend my couſin the duke of Vendoſme at the head of my armies, to make known to you my intentions. He will allow you but twenty-four hours to reſolve what you have to do.

LEWIS."

The duke in return publiſhed a manifeſto, ſetting forth the neceſſity and juſtice of his proceeding, and ſent expreſſes to the confederated powers to ſollicit their aſſiſtance againſt the impending ſtorm. Queen Anne, knowing his importance, as well as his ſelfiſh diſpoſition, aſſured him of her protection; and both ſhe and the States ſent ambaſſadors to the court of Turin. In the mean time, the duke concluded a treaty with the court of Vienna, who promiſed him all that France and Spain had refuſed him, viz. Montferrat, Mantua, Alexandria, Valencia, and the countries between the Po* and the Tanaro†, with more money than he received from France in ſubſidies. The money was to be furniſhed by England, for the emperor had hardly ſufficient to pay his troops. England, the richeſt of all the allies, contributed more than any of them towards the common cauſe: ſhe ever has done ſo. The duke of Savoy in return acknowleged the archduke Charles as king of Spain, and prepared for the worſt. Leopold, however, ſenſible in what a delicate ſituation this new ally was placed, ordered count Staremberg to march from the Secchia‡ with a body of fifteen thouſand men to join the duke. This march is ſaid to have been the beſt concerted and the beſt executed of any that was performed during the whole war. He advanced from the Modeneſe in the worſt ſeaſon of the year, through an enemy's country, and ways that were deemed impaſſable, having the French both in front and rear. He ſurmounted, however, all theſe difficulties, and at length joined the duke at Canelli, ſo as to ſuccour the country of Piedmont ¶.

No ſooner had the houſe of Bourbon loſt this ally than ſhe heard that Portugal had likewiſe declared againſt her. Mr. Methuen, our ambaſſador at that court, had ſpared no pains to detach his Moſt Faithful majeſty from his unnatural connections with the Grand Monarch. He repreſented to him, with no leſs ſpirit than truth, that ſhould the crowns of France and Spain ever devolve upon the ſame perſon, he muſt not expect to remain long a king. He alarmed his apprehenſions for his preſent ſafety, by painting to him in the moſt ſtriking colours, the acknowleged ſuperiority of the confederates by ſea, the weight of whoſe power he muſt expect certainly to feel, ſhould he at any time, in conſequence of an alliance with France, refuſe them the free uſe of his ports; and that his compliance with ſuch a demand would, on the other hand, render his friendſhip to France of little account. Theſe arguments had their due weight with his Portugueſe majeſty, who was moreover allured by the proſpect of a match between the Infanta his daughter and the archduke Charles, to whom the emperor and the king of the Romans ſhould transfer all their pretenſions to the crown of Spain: in fine, a treaty was ſet on foot and ſoon concluded at Liſbon, between the emperor, the queen of Great Britain, the king of Portugal, and the States-general. In this treaty it was ſtipulated, that king Charles (for ſo I ſhall henceforward ſtile the archduke) ſhould be conveyed to Portugal by a powerful fleet, having on board twelve thouſand ſoldiers, with a great ſupply of arms and ammunition, and that twenty-eight thouſand Portugueſe ſhould be ready to join him immediately at Liſbon §.

In conſequence of theſe arrangements, the archduke Charles having been proclaimed king of Spain at Vienna, the emperor his father made preparations for ſending him to Portugal by way of Holland and England, and at the ſame time diſpatched letters to his Portugueſe majeſty and the queen of Great Britain, recommending him to their protection. About the middle of September king Charles ſet out from Vienna for Holland; and paſſing through the territories of the elector of Hanover, was met by that prince, and complimented on his acceſſion. At Duſſeldop * he was viſited by the elector-palatine and the duke of Marlborough, the latter of whom made him compliments of congratulation in the name of our queen. Charles received the duke with the moſt obliging courteſy. In the courſe of their converſation, taking off his ſword from his ſide (which was very rich, and provided for that purpoſe) he preſented it to the duke, telling him, in French, he was but a poor prince; adding, "Je n'ai que le cape et l' epée; I have nothing but my cloak and my ſword: the latter may be of uſe to your grace, and I hope you will not think it the worſe for my having wore it one day." "On the contrary, replied the duke, it will always put me in mind of your majeſty's juſt right and title, and of the obligations I lie under to hazard my life in making you the greateſt prince in Chriſtendom." His majeſty arrived at the Hague the ſecond of November, where he repreſented to the States, that the province of Lemburgh appertained to him as king of Spain, and deſired he might have the civil government thereof; which the States complying with, his majeſty appointed count Zinzendorf to take poſſeſſion of the town and province of Lemburgh in his name †.

To return to England.

The duke of Marlborough, at the end of the campaign in Flanders, returned to England the thirtieth of October: the queen and prince George of Denmark having been at the Bath ſeven weeks, came back to Windſor the ſame month, and on the ninth of November the parliament met: but before we enter upon a detail of its proceedings, I muſt take notice of the moſt violent ſtorm, both by ſea and land, that had ever been known in the memory of man; I mean the dreadful tempeſt which aroſe on the twenty-ſixth of November, 1703, about eleven o'clock at night, attended with ſuch flaſhes of lightning and peals of thunder as filled every mind with the utmoſt terror and conſternation throughout the kingdom. The houſes in London ſhook from their foundations, and ſeveral of them falling, overwhelmed the inhabitants in their ruins. The Thames overflowed ſeveral ſtreets, and roſe to a conſiderable height in Weſtminſter-Hall. London-bridge was almoſt choaked up by the wreck of veſſels that were beat in pieces in the river. The loſs ſuſtained by the capital alone was computed at near two millions, and the city of Briſtol ſuffered to the amount of two hundred thouſand pounds: but the greateſt loſs fell upon our navy, of which there periſhed no leſs than thirteen ſhips: upwards of fifteen hundred ſeamen were drowned, among whom was Beaumont, rear-admiral of the blue, who had been employed all this year in obſerving the Dunkirk ſquadron. Theſe loſſes, however, greatly as they might affect us at home, ſerved in ſome meaſure to raiſe our reputation abroad; for orders were immediately iſſued for building a greater number of ſhips than were deſtroyed; and the queen, by ſeveral gracious bounties, gave ſuch ſpeedy relief to thoſe ſeamen who eſcaped with their lives, and to the diſtreſſed widows of ſuch as were drowned, as gained her full poſſeſſion of the hearts and affections of her ſubjects. The reader will ſee in the notes the particulars of this great loſs, as taken from the beſt accounts ‡.

§ Beſides this treaty, which was ratified on the fourteenth of July, O. S. 1703, Mr. Methuen concluded, on the part of our court, a treaty of commerce with his Portugueſe majeſty, much to the benefit of both nations, viz.

"Article I. The king of Portugal, on his part, ſtipulates, both in his own name and that of his ſucceſſors, to admit for ever hereafter into Portugal the woollen cloths, and the reſt of the woollen manufactures of the Britons [theſe are the very words of the treaty, as found in the fourth volume of Treaties of Peace and Commerce, printed in the year 1732] as they were accuſtomed, till they were prohibited by the laws. Nevertheleſs, upon this condition,

"That her royal majeſty of Great Britain, in her own name and that of her ſucceſſors, be obliged, for ever hereafter, to admit the wines of the growth of Portugal into Britain and France; ſo that at no time, whether there ſhall be peace or war between the kingdoms of France and Britain, any thing more ſhall be demanded for thoſe wines, by the name of cuſtoms or duty, or by whatſoever other title, directly or indirectly, whether they ſhall be imported into Great Britain in pipes or hogſheads, or other caſks, than what ſhall be demanded for the like quantity or meaſure of French wines, deducting or abating one third part of the cuſtoms or duty. But if at any time this deduction or abatement of cuſtoms, which is to be made as aforeſaid, ſhall in any manner be attempted and prejudiced, it ſhall be juſt and lawful for his ſacred majeſty of Portugal, again to prohibit the woollen cloths, and the reſt of the Britiſh manufactures." Dated at Liſbon, December 27, 1703.

This moſt juſt and beneficial convention has remained inviolable to this day, which has preſerved an uninterrupted friendſhip and alliance between the two nations. After England had declared war againſt France and Spain, it was by no means her intereſt to uſe the wines of thoſe two countries, which doubtleſs could have been imported by neutral ſhips; and as the red wines of Portugal were therefore in ſome ſort the only kind we could then conveniently and reaſonably come at, this treaty was and is ſtill beneficial to both countries, eſpecially as Portugal has, in return for our taking ſuch vaſt quantities of their wine, conſtantly taken off a greater quantity of our manufactures, ſo as to occaſion a conſiderable yearly balance in our favour; and our palates being long ſo well reconciled to Portugal wines, the Portugueſe for our ſupply have turned great quantities of their lands into vineyards.

And now for parliamentary affairs. The ſeſſion, as I ſaid before, beginning the ninth of November, the queen opened it with a ſpeech, in which ſhe took notice of the declaration by the duke of Savoy, and the treaty with Portugal, as circumſtances very advantageous to the allies: ſhe told them, that though no proviſion was made for the expedition to Liſbon, and the augmentation of the land-forces, the funds had anſwered ſo well, and the prizes had turned out ſo valuable, that the public had not incurred any debt by thoſe additional ſervices. She obſerved, that ſhe had contributed out of her own revenue to ſupport the circle of Suabia, whoſe firm adherence to the allies deſerved her ſeaſonable aſſiſtance. She aſſured them that ſhe would not engage in any unneceſſary expence of her own, that ſhe might have the more to ſpare towards the eaſe of her ſubjects. She recommended union amongſt themſelves, and diſpatch in the buſineſs before them; and above all preſſed them to avoid all heats or bickerings that might give encouragement to the common enemies of the church and ſtate.

It was thought by many that the admonition with which her majeſty cloſed her ſpeech, was intended to prevent the reſuming the occaſional conformity bill. It appears, however, by a letter of her's to the ducheſs of Marlborough, that ſhe was no enemy to that bill *. However this might be, the commons would not loſe ſight of their favourite ſcheme, and the bill was revived early in the ſeſſion, though the penalties indeed were ſomewhat lowered. In the mean time, however, the commons attended her majeſty with an addreſs of thanks for her ſpeech, and for engaging the king of Portugal and the duke of Savoy in the alliance; for contributing part of her own revenue to the public ſervice; and for her aſſiſtance to the circle of Suabia; and they aſſured her that they would ſupport her majeſty in her alliances, and enable her to carry on the war with vigour †. The lords alſo preſented an addreſs on their parts, much to the ſame effect.

About a fortnight after the meeting of the parliament, a new draught of an occaſional conformity-bill was offered to the lower houſe. In this the preamble againſt "perſecution for conſcience only" was now left out; and in the enacting part, whereas the former bill allowed but four, beſides the family, where a conventicle was held, this allowed nine, and inflicted no puniſhment, unleſs there were ten or more beſides the family. It was hoped by theſe ſoftenings to make the bill more readily go down. It occaſioned, however, very warm debates; but after a violent oppoſition from the few Whig members that were in the houſe, it was put to the vote, and was carried by a great majority. The bill being finiſhed on the ſeventh of December, it was the ſame day ordered up to the lords for their concurrence, who on the eighth expected it in a full houſe; but the ſame not having been ſent up, neither on that day nor on the ninth in the morning, lord Hartington, eldeſt ſon to the duke of Devonſhire, who ſat in the houſe of commons, moved to know the reaſon why the bill was not carried up according to order, which occaſioned a very hot debate in the houſe about the matter. At length the queſtion being put, whether the houſe ſhould adjourn till Tueſday the fourteenth, and it being carried in the affirmative, the bill was then ſent to the houſe of lords, who read it the firſt time; and great debates ariſing thereupon, there were many learned ſpeeches made for and againſt the bill; but at laſt the houſe divided, whether it ſhould be read a ſecond time, and carried it in the negative, ſeventy-one to fifty-nine. It is not eaſy to account for ſo great a majority this year againſt the bill, in compariſon of laſt year, when there was not above one or two odds: one would have ſuppoſed that the new-made Tory lords might have added ſuch a weight to the balance on the other ſide as to have carried the point; but the event proved the contrary, and ſo there we will leave it.

This diſappointment, however, did not prevent the commons from making proviſion for the proſecution of the war. The treaty with Portugal having been laid before them, and being duly conſidered, they voted forty thouſand men, including five thouſand marines, for the ſea-ſervice of the en-loſt on the Goodwin Sands. All her company was loſt, being two hundred and twenty men, including twenty-four marines.

IV. The Stirling-Caſtle, a third-rate, captain Johnſon, on the Goodwin Sands, ſeventy men of which, and four marine officers, were ſaved; the reſt were drowned, being two hundred and ſix.

V. The Mary, a fourth-rate, rear-admiral Beaumont, captain Edward Hopſon, on the Goodwin Sands; the captain and purſer aſhore. One man, whoſe name was Thomas Atkinſon, was ſaved, though the reſt, to the number of two hundred and ſixty-nine, were drowned. The eſcape of this Atkins is very remarkable: he ſaw the rear-admiral, when the ſhip was breaking, get upon a piece of her quarter-deck, from which he was ſoon waſhed off; and about the ſame time Atkins was toſſed by a wave into the Stirling-Caſtle, which ſinking ſoon after, he was thrown the third time into her boat by a wave that waſhed him from the wreck.

VI. The York, a fourth-rate, captain Smith, loſt at Harwich; all her men ſaved except four.

VII. The Mortar Bomb, a fifth-rate, captain Raymond, on the Goodwin Sands. All her crew loſt, being ſixty-five.

VIII. The Eagle advice-boat, a ſixth-rate, captain Boſtock, loſt on the coaſt of Suſſex. All her crew, being forty-five, ſaved.

IX. The Reſolution, a third-rate, captain Liſle, on the coaſt of Suſſex. All her company, being two hundred and twenty-one, ſaved.

X. The Litchfield Prize, a fifth-rate, captain Chamberlain, on the coaſt of Suſſex. All her company, being one hundred and eight, ſaved.

XI. The Newcaſtle, a fourth-rate, captain Carter, loſt at Spithead. The carpenter and thirty-nine men were ſaved. The reſt, being one hundred and ninety-three, drowned.

XII. The Veſuvius fire-ſhip, a fifth-rate, captain Paddon, at Spithead. All her company, being forty-eight, ſaved.

XIII. The Reſtoration, a third-rate, captain Emms, three hundred and eighty-ſeven men, on the Goodwin Sands. Not one ſaved.

Sir Cloudeſley Shovel, who was juſt returned from the Mediterranean, was then at anchor in the Gunfleet with ſeveral great ſhips, which were all in the utmoſt danger. He cut his main-maſt by the board, which ſaved the ſhip from running on the Galloper, of the beach of which ſhe was then in view. Sir Stafford Fairborne had his flag, as vice-admiral of the red, flying in the Aſſociation, in which he was driven to Gottenburgh, and then to Copenhagen, from whence he did not get home till next year. The Revenge was forced from her anchors, and with much ado, after driving ſome time on the coaſt of Holland, got into the river Medway. The Ruſſel, captain Townſhend, was forced over to Holland; and the Dorſet, captain Edward Whitaker, after ſtriking thrice on the Galloper, drove a fortnight at ſea, and then got ſafe to the Nore. † Proceedings of the Houſe of Commons, iii. 278.

ſuing year; the like number of land-forces to act in conjunction with the allies, beſides the additional ten thouſand; and they reſolved that the proportion to be employed in Portugal ſhould amount to eight thouſand. For the maintenance of theſe armaments, as well as for the diſcharge of the ſubſidies payable to her majeſty's allies, they granted the ſum of three millions eight hundred eighty-one thouſand ſix pounds fifteen ſhillings. They likewiſe preſented an addreſs to the queen, in which they aſſured her that they would provide for the ſupport of ſuch alliances as ſhe had made or ſhould make with the duke of Savoy.

At this period the nation was alarmed by the detection of a conſpiracy, ſaid to be ſet on foot in Scotland. It appears that both the French and the pretender entertained great hopes of his reſtoration to the crown of that kingdom at leaſt, when they ſaw the Scots would neither ſettle the ſucceſſion in the Hanover line, nor grant the neceſſary ſupplies for the ſupport of the war; and thereupon Simon Frazer, lord Lovat, with two other perſons, were ſent over from St. Germain's to Scotland, with inſtructions to learn the ſtrength and ſentiments of the clans, and endeavour to perſuade ſome of the nobility and leading men to engage in the deſign. Frazer had on his part undertaken to raiſe a body of twelve thouſand Highlanders to act in favour of the pretender, if the court of France would aſſiſt them with a body of troops: this Lewis had promiſed to do. As ſoon as Frazer landed in Scotland, he waited privately upon the duke of Queenſberry, and acquainted him with the whole tranſaction, at the ſame time putting into his hands a letter from the late king James's queen, directed to the marquis of Athol. This letter was couched in general terms that might have been addreſſed to any of the nobility, and the direction was written in a different hand; ſo that it was generally believed Frazer, who was a man of a moſt infamous character, had forged it, in order to wreak his vengeance upon the marquis, who had proſecuted him for having violated the chaſtity of his ſiſter. Queenſberry, in conſequence of this ſervice, and of the informer's promiſing to make him acquainted with the whole correſpondence between the pretender and his friends in Scotland, provided him with a paſs, under favour of which he made a progreſs through the Highlands, to ſound the inclinations of the chieftains. He afterwards propoſed a ſecond journey to France, pretending that he ſhould then be able to make more material diſcoveries; and the duke procured a paſs for him to go to Holland from the earl of Nottingham, ſecretary of ſtate, though under a borrowed name. The duke had already imparted the diſcovery to the queen, but had concealed the name of the informer, at his own earneſt requeſt. Her majeſty was the more readily induced to credit the particulars, on account of the evidence given by ſir John Maclean, who had lately come over from France to England, and had been apprehended at Folkſtone in Kent, and afterwards brought up in cuſtody of the queen's meſſengers to London. One Keith, whoſe uncle had accompanied Frazer over to England, was alſo taken up at the ſame time; as was Mr. Lindſey, who had been under-ſecretary to king James and the pretender. One James Boucher alſo, who had been aid-de-camp to the duke of Berwick, was taken on the coaſt of Suſſex coming over from France. The flocking over of ſuch a number o rebels and out-laws tended ſtill farther to confirm the truth of a conſpiracy being in agitation, though they all aſſerted that their only deſign was to live peaceably at home under her majeſty's government for the future. Sir John Maclean being examined at the earl of Nottingham's office, who was then ſecretary of ſtate, ſaid, that he was going to Scotland to take the benefit of the queen's pardon; but afterwards both he and Keith, being more cloſely interrogated, did acknowlege that they had heard of ſome conſultations at St. Germain's, concerning the ſending a body of troops to join the malcontents in Scotland, but declared there was no other deſign on foot at this time, but to pave the way for the pretender's aſcending the throne after the queen's deceaſe. On the other hand, one Ferguſon, who had been much famed for having a hand in every Jacobite plot, came in voluntarily, and declared that Frazer had been employed by the duke of Queenſberry, her majeſty's high-commiſſioner in Scotland, to draw ſome perſons whom he hated into a plot, but that there was in reality no ſuch thing in agitation.

Little credit however was given to theſe aſſurances; and the houſe of lords taking theſe matters into conſideration, reſolved, that a committee ſhould be appointed to examine into the particulars; and ordered that ſir John Maclean, and the other emiſſaries, ſhould be taken into the cuſtody of the black-rod, and no perſon admitted to ſpeak to them. The queen being diſpleaſed with this ſtep, as thinking it too officious an interpoſition to take them out of the hands of her meſſengers, gave the lords to underſtand by meſſage, that ſhe thought it would be inconvenient to change the method of examination already begun, and that ſhe would in a ſhort time inform the houſe of the whole affair. On the ſeventeenth day of December the queen went to the houſe to paſs the bill for the land-tax, when ſhe made a ſpeech to both houſes, in which ſhe declared that ſhe had unqueſtionable information of the practices and deſigns carried on by the emiſſaries of France in Scotland, "which might have proved extremely dangerous to the peace of theſe kingdoms, as they would ſee by the particulars, which would be laid before them as ſoon as the examinations could be fully perfected and made public without prejudice; and that in the mean time, ſhe doubted not but by this ſeaſonable diſcovery ſhe ſhould be able to give ſuch directions for their ſecurity as would effectually prevent any ill conſequences from theſe pernicious deſigns."

The lords, however, perſiſting in their reſolution to bring the enquiry into their own houſe, proceeded to name their committee by ballot, and the choice fell upon the dukes of Somerſet and Devon, the earls of Sunderland and Scarborough, and the lords Somers, Townſhend, and Wharton; and on the twentieth of December they preſented the following addreſs to her majeſty:

"We your majeſty's moſt dutiful and loyal ſubjects, the lords ſpiritual and temporal in parliament aſſembled, return our moſt humble acknowlegements to your majeſty for your gracious condeſcenſion in promiſing to communicate to us thoſe informations you have received of the ill practices of your majeſty's and our enemies in Scotland.

"And we doubt not but the zeal this houſe hath ſhewed for having the perſons ſecured, and their deſigns brought to light, has been very acceptable to your majeſty.

"We rely upon your majeſty that you will give ſuch directions as may effectually prevent all pernicious deſigns; and we truſt in God Almighty's goodneſs, that that watchful providence which has diſcovered the wicked plot ſo ſeaſonably, will likewiſe proſper all your majeſty's councils and good intentions.

"We reckon all our concerns, but chiefly the greateſt of all, the proteſtant religion, to be very ſafe under your majeſty's tender care and wiſe adminiſtration; and we will, by our utmoſt zeal, maintain the rights of the crown and the church of England, all ſuch ways as may beſt anſwer your majeſty's pious deſigns, and may moſt promote the good and happineſs of all your ſubjects. We deſire not to let our thoughts go beyond your majeſty's perſon to a future ſecurity, but as it is neceſſary for your majeſty's preſervation, as well as for ſettling the minds of all your good ſubjects, who look on the proteſtant ſucceſſion as your majeſty's beſt ſecurity, as well as their own."

The commons alſo addreſſed the queen, and thanked her for her ſpeech and communicating the plot to them, whereby they had an opportunity to repeat their unanimous reſolution to ſtand by and ſupport her majeſty and the proteſtant ſucceſſion againſt all pretenders, and all her majeſty's enemies whatſoever. They ſaid, they could never have the leaſt diſtruſt of her majeſty's vigilance and care for the preſervation of the proteſtant intereſt in general, and of the monarchy and church of England, as by law eſtabliſhed; and they aſſured her majeſty that they would never be diſcouraged, but would continue inceſſant in their endeavours by all proper methods to tranſmit them ſecurely to poſterity. In anſwer to which the queen aſſured them they might depend upon her willingneſs to join her endeavours with them in ſecuring the proteſtant ſucceſſion and the church of England.

Things had begun now to veer about at court: the earl of Nottingham found himſelf tottering, the lord-treaſurer and the Marlborough family having obtained the aſcendency. Thoſe things, together with the rejection of the occaſional conformity bill by the lords, created a miſunderſtanding between them and the commons, and the latter were glad to find an opportunity to vent their diſguſt: they took it for granted that the queen was diſpleaſed with the proceedings of the upper houſe, in taking the ſuſpected perſons out of the hands of her meſſengers (though upon the queen's meſſage to them, already related, they had returned them back to their former cuſtody) they therefore preſented another addreſs on the twenty-third of December, in which they expreſſed the juſt concern they were under to ſee her royal prerogative violated. They ſaid, they were ſurprized to find, that when ſeveral perſons, ſuſpected of treaſonable practices, were taken into cuſtody by her majeſty's meſſengers in order to be examined, the lords, in violation of the known laws of the land, had wreſted them out of her majeſty's hands, and without her leave or knowlege, in a moſt extraordinary manner, taken the examination of them ſolely to themſelves, whereby a due enquiry into the evil practices and deſigns againſt her majeſty's perſon and government might in great meaſure be obſtructed. They deſire her majeſty that ſhe will ſuffer no diminution of her prerogative, in the exerciſe whereof they were reſolved to ſupport her, as well as in the carrying on the war. The queen thanked them for their concern and aſſurances, and did not ſeem ill pleaſed at the nature of the addreſs; though the charge againſt the peers of violating the known laws of the realm was certainly over-ſtretched, ſince there did not want precedents of their houſe having aſſumed ſuch a right of enquiry: and the attack of the commons ſeems to have been rather unparliamentary: for the uſual method eſtabliſhed was, that when the one houſe was affected with any thing done in the other, conferences were demanded, in which the objected matters were freely debated: but indeed this behaviour in the commons was the pure reſult of party-pique and artifice. The Tories, or High-Church men, as they were called, who carried all before them in that houſe, thought no conjuncture ſo favourable as the preſent for ingratiating themſelves with the queen, by appearing zealous aſſertors of the royal prerogative.

The lords, however, burning with indignation at the charge brought againſt them, which they thought moſt cruel and malicious, reſolved to vindicate their honour, and aſſert their privileges. Accordingly, they came to the following reſolution, That by the known laws and cuſtoms of parliament they had an undoubted right, whenever they conceive it to be for the ſafety of the crown and the kingdom, to take examination of perſons charged with criminal matters, whether they be in cuſtody or not; and to order that perſons to be examined be taken into cuſtody by the ſworn officers of the crown attending that houſe; and that the ſaid addreſs of the commons was unparliamentary, groundleſs, without precedent, &c. This reſolve they backed by a remonſtrance to her majeſty, which for beauty, decency, and energy of ſtile, was eſteemed one of the moſt capital pieces of the kind that were in all the records of parliament; for which reaſon, as well as for its containing a preciſe account of the nature of the diſpute between the two houſes, we ſhall give it to our readers verbatim, together with the reply of the commons thereto, though ſomewhat long *.

"May it pleaſe your moſt excellent majeſty,

"We your majeſty's moſt dutiful and loyal ſubjects, the lords ſpiritual and temporal, in parliament aſſembled, find ourſelves under an unhappy neceſſity of making this our humble application to the throne, upon occaſion of an addreſs preſented to your majeſty by the houſe of commons the twenty-third day of December laſt, and ſince that time publiſhed to the whole nation in print; by which the houſe of lords is charged with the violation of your royal prerogative, and of the known laws of the land; with wreſting perſons ſuſpected of treaſonable practices, and taken into cuſtody by meſſengers, out of your majeſty's hands, without your leave or knowlege, in a moſt extraordinary manner; taking the examination of them ſolely to themſelves, whereby a due enquiry into the real practices and deſigns againſt your majeſty's perſon and government might in great meaſure be obſtructed; and they conclude their addreſs by moſt earneſtly deſiring your majeſty to ſuffer no diminution of your prerogative, and promiſe to ſupport you in the aſſerting it againſt all invaſions whatſoever. It is not poſſible for us to remain ſilent under this heavy charge, ſo unjuſtly, and without the leaſt ground or colour, endeavoured to be fixed upon the whole body of peers, which, tending directly to create an ill opinion of us to your majeſty, puts us under an inevitable neceſſity of vindicating both the legality and dutiful manner of our proceeding.

"The expreſſions in the addreſs of the houſe of commons are ſo very harſh and indecent, that we may truly affirm the like were never uſed of the houſe of peers, in any age, not even by that aſſembly which, under the name of the houſe of commons, took upon them not only to aboliſh the houſe of lords, but to deſtroy the monarchy. We ſhall carefully avoid making returns of that kind: we conſider too much what we owe to ourſelves, and we know too well the profound reſpect due to your royal perſon, to let any provocation tranſport us ſo as to uſe words unfit to be offered by us to our ſovereign.

"The matter of this addreſs is no leſs injurious to us, than the terms. There was not the leaſt occaſion for a juſt objection to any part of our conduct in the buſineſs to which the addreſs relates. The proceeding was ſtrictly juſtifiable by the known laws and cuſtoms of parliament: it was carried on with the utmoſt reſpect to your majeſty, and with true zeal for the ſafety of your perſon and government. All that was done, was agreed to by the concurrent opinion of the houſe, without the leaſt objection from any of our members, who have the honour of ſerving your majeſty in your great offices and employments.

"We humbly repreſent to your majeſty, that by the known laws and cuſtoms of parliament, the houſe of peers has an undoubted right, in caſes where they conceive it to be for the good and ſafety of your majeſty and the kingdom, to take examinations of perſons charged with criminal matters, whether ſuch perſons be then in cuſtody or not: and alſo to order the perſons ſo to be examined to be taken into cuſtody of your majeſty's ſworn officers, attending the houſe, during ſuch examinations; or to commit them to any other ſafe cuſtody, that they ſhall think proper; and to reſtrain others, if they ſee cauſe, from having acceſs to, or communication with them. The houſe of lords have exerciſed this right from time to time, as occaſions have required, without objection: our records are filled with precedents which warrant our claim, in every part of it; and we preſume to affirm to your majeſty, that the drawing this right into queſtion, at any time, cannot but be of dangerous conſequence to the liberties and ſafety of the people, and to the conſtitution of the government, as tending to avoid or render in a great meaſure ineffectual, the enquiries of parliaments; which are ſo abſolutely neceſſary, eſpecially where many and great perſons are engaged in dangerous deſigns againſt the government, or where ill miniſters abuſe their favour, towards the oppreſſing and enſlaving of the people. Your majeſty's wiſdom and goodneſs makes us ſecure at preſent againſt all influences of that kind; and we unanimouſly and heartily pray we may long enjoy the bleſſing of your reign; but if it happens in future times, that ill men ſhould gain too great a degree of favour with our princes, how eaſily will it be for them to ſtifle or defeat all parliamentary enquiries into their crimes: for if being in priſon, or in the hands of a meſſenger, will protect men from being examined in the houſe of lords, or from being put into the cuſtody of proper officers of the houſe, during the examination, and debarred from converſing with others, it will certainly be always in the power of favourites, to cauſe thoſe who can be witneſſes againſt them, as well as accomplices of their deſigns, to be taken into cuſtody; and if perſons in cuſtody are out of the reach of the houſe of lords, who are the hereditary counſellors of the crown, and in whom a judicial power is lodged by the conſtitution, it is not to be imagined that the commons can pretend to a greater power of examining, committing, or reſtraining them.

"No houſe of commons, till now, has given countenance to this dangerous opinion, which does ſo directly tend to the rendering ill miniſters ſafe from the examination of parliament; and we are perſuaded no houſe of commons hereafter will aſſert ſuch a notion; becauſe they are not wont eaſily to part with a power they have aſſumed; and it is certain that they have ſeveral times taken upon them to exerciſe an authority like that which they have ſo ſeverely reflected on in their addreſs. This conſideration gave us the greater aſtoniſhment, to find our proceeding repreſented in the ſtrange terms of wreſting priſoners out of your majeſty's hands, and taking the examination of them ſolely to ourſelves. We believe the ordering perſons to be examined in that high court, where your majeſty is always preſent in conſideration of law, and in the great council where you may be preſent in your royal perſon as often as you pleaſe, will never be thought an excluſion of your majeſty from the examinations, if that was intended to be inſinuated, by ſaying we had taken the examinations ſolely to ourſelves. Having thus laid before your majeſty what it is we claim, and muſt inſiſt on as the indiſputable right of the houſe of peers, which was never thought, in the time of your royal anceſtors, to be prejudicial to the juſt prerogative of the crown, and which is manifeſtly neceſſary for the ſecuring the liberties of the people, whereof we are aſſured your majeſty will have an equal care; we humbly beg leave to lay before you a ſhort ſtate of the particular matter of fact relating to theſe priſoners, not doubting but when the whole proceeding is known to your majeſty, it will be approved, not only as lawful, but every way reſpectful to your majeſty.

"On Tueſday the fourteenth of December, the houſe of lords was informed, that ſeveral perſons had been ſeized by the cuſtom-houſe officers on the coaſt of Suſſex, as they came from France; and that among them there was one Boucher, who was capable of making conſiderable diſcoveries, having been in arms in the French ſervice for many years, and gentleman of the houſe and aid du camp to the late duke of Berwick, who ſtands attainted of high-treaſon, and who had been ſecretly in England ſeveral times before. That it was probable, if he was ſtrictly examined, he might be brought to confeſs, ſince he ſaw his life was in apparent danger; but that he was a bold man, and likely to attempt an eſcape, on that very account, if he was not carefully looked after. And the houſe was alſo told, that there was a general remiſſneſs, both in the taking, ſearching, and looking to ſuch priſoners; which did afterwards appear very evidently in the examinations that were taken. Upon this information, the earl of Nottingham, your majeſty's principal ſecretary of ſtate, acquainted the houſe, that he had not heard of Boucher's name particularly; but had ſent meſſengers to bring one Ogilby, and the other priſoners, who had been apprehended by the cuſtom-houſe officers, to town; and that he believed that the meſſengers would do their duty; but he would not be anſwerable for them.

"After this account of the priſoners, and what had been done in order to ſecure them, the houſe thought themſelves obliged, in duty to your majeſty and the public ſafety, at a time when the kingdom is engaged in a war with France, and that there are too juſt grounds to apprehend the dangerous practices of French emiſſaries, to make a humble addreſs to your majeſty, that particular care might be taken for ſecuring the perſons of Boucher, and of thoſe who were taken with him; and that none might be ſuffered to ſpeak with them till they were examined.

"The next day your majeſty's gracious anſwer to this addreſs was repreſented to the houſe, that care had been taken to ſecure the priſoners, and that your majeſty would give orders, that nobody ſhould ſpeak with them till they were examined. Thereupon the lords entered into a farther conſideration of the importance of this matter; and conceiving nothing to be more likely to bring priſoners, who had forfeited their lives, to a full diſcovery of the truth, than to find themſelves under the enquiry of a parliament, they thought it would be a public ſervice for them to make examinations of theſe perſons; and accordingly an order was made, that no perſons ſhould ſpeak with the priſoners till they had appeared at the bar of the houſe.

"On the ſixteenth day, the earl of Nottingham informing the houſe of lords, that the priſoners were brought to town, the uſher of the black-rod was ordered to take them into cuſtody, in order to their examination, and to keep them ſeparate and in cloſe cuſtody (as your majeſty had before directed); and it being thought moſt proper, for the nature of the thing, that the examination ſhould be by a committee of lords rather than by the whole houſe, it was reſolved accordingly.

"We beg leave to mention to your majeſty a matter of fact, which ſatisfied the lords that their reſolution to examine Boucher and the perſons apprehended with him, was neither unknown nor diſagreeable to your majeſty. On the ſame day when that was ordered, being the fifteenth of December, the lords reſolved to examine ſir John Maclean, a very dangerous perſon, as was repreſented to the houſe, who then ſtood committed in the hands of a meſſenger; and for that purpoſe ordered him to be brought to the houſe the next day, having, as they then thought, very good grounds to believe it might prove of great ſervice to your majeſty. Sir John Maclean was brought to the houſe, according to the order; but your majeſty being pleaſed ſo far to take notice of this order, as to ſignify to the houſe, by the lord-ſteward, that ſir John Maclean had been in part examined already, and that your majeſty thought it not proper to have that buſineſs taken out of the way of examination it was then in, but that your majeſty would, in a ſhort time, communicate it to the houſe; the lords immediately acquieſced in your majeſty's opinion, and ſent back ſir John Maclean to the place from whence he was brought. It was with this diſpoſition of mind the lords acted in this whole matter; and if your majeſty, who no doubt had the ſame notice of both orders, had thought any other method of examination of Boucher, and the perſons taken with him, more proper than that of the lords, they had reaſon to conclude your majeſty would have intimated it at the ſame time; and moſt certainly the houſe would have paid a like deference for your royal judgment in that inſtance alſo.

"The lords committees appointed to examine the priſoners, proceeded with all poſſible diſpatch, and made their report to the houſe on the twenty-firſt of December. Upon conſideration of the report, the houſe found it requiſite to commit Boucher to the priſon of Newgate, for high-treaſon; and the lords committees having ſubmitted to the judgment of the houſe, whether ſeveral parts of the examinations referred to in their report, ſhould be laid open to the houſe, or put into any other way of being farther enquired into, or proſecuted; the houſe, out of a full aſſurance they had, that when the matter of fact ſhould be laid before your majeſty, you would certainly give ſuch orders thereupon as were every way ſuitable to your royal prudence and tender care of the public ſafety; did unanimouſly reſolve, without ſo much as ſuffering thoſe parts of the report to be laid open to the houſe, that an humble addreſs ſhould be made from the houſe to your majeſty, by the lord-ſteward and the duke of Somerſet (two of the lords committees to whom the examination had been referred), laying before your majeſty the whole report, with all the matters relating thereto; and humbly deſiring your majeſty to give orders, that Boucher ſhould be proſecuted by Mr. Attorney-general for high-treaſon: and that as for the commitment, proſecution, or diſcharge of the other priſoners, mentioned in the report, you would be pleaſed to give ſuch directions as ſhould ſeem moſt proper to your royal wiſdom. Thus, as the whole affair was entered upon out of zeal for your majeſty's preſervation, and the ſafety of the kingdom, and was carried on and concluded with all poſſible reſpect to you, ſo we had the comfort to reſt aſſured, that our behaviour was no leſs graciouſly accepted by your majeſty, from the anſwer you were pleaſed to make, the ſame day, to our laſt addreſs on that ſubject, and which was reported to us, on the twenty-ſecond of December, by the duke of Somerſet, whereby your majeſty was pleaſed to ſignify to the houſe, with your accuſtomed goodneſs, that you would give order for every thing as the lords had deſired it.

"Madam,

"This is a true and juſt account of our proceedings, which have been ſo ſtrangely miſrepreſented, and to which no exception can poſſibly be taken by any perſons, rightfully informed: for as we had your royal approbation of all that was done, ſo the houſe of commons would have had no pretence of objection, if they had taken the uſual parliamentary methods of deſiring to be informed of what we had done, and of the grounds of our proceedings, before they had approached your majeſty with ſuch a repreſentation of them.

"Their carrying this unprecedented addreſs to your majeſty in ſo haſty a manner, gives us almoſt as great trouble as the hard uſage we find in it. The ancient known, and only effectual method of preſerving a good correſpondence between the two houſes of parliament, has been by conferences: if, at any time, either houſe conceived they had a reaſonable ground to object againſt the proceedings of the other, conferences have been deſired, and the matter in debate with them fairly diſcuſſed; and thereby miſtakes have been cleared, for the moſt part, a good underſtanding cultivated, and a mutual reſpect preſerved, which is always highly requiſite in the nature of our conſtitution, but more eſpecially neceſſary in the time of war and danger.

"Had the houſe of commons thought fit to have purſued this method, upon this occaſion, we ſhould have been able to have given them entire ſatisfaction, not only of the lawfulneſs of all we have done, but of the juſt and weighty grounds upon which we took the examination of theſe perſons into our hands; or, at leaſt, if they could have convinced us of any miſtake, we ſhould have given them any reaſonable ſatisfaction.

"But without taking any ſuch previous ſtep, the houſe of commons have made an appeal directly to the throne againſt the houſe of lords, and charged them moſt unjuſtly with attempts of the higheſt nature. Nothing like this was ever done before; and, out of hearty concern for the preſervation of our happy conſtitution, we hope the ſame will never be done again. We know your royal heart is unmoveably fixed for the preſervation of the liberties of your people, and tranſmitting them entire to poſterity; but if in after-time the houſe of parliament ſhould be appealing againſt one another to the crown (for if ſuch a courſe be juſtifiable in the houſe of commons, the ſame methods may be taken by the lords), as your majeſty is now ſenſible how great difficulties it neceſſarily brings upon a good prince, ſo it is eaſy to foreſee (and we cannot think upon it without terror) how fatal the conſequences may be in the reign of an ill-deſigning prince, and what advantages may be taken from it, for utterly ſubverting the beſt ordered form of government in the world. There are examples abroad, where proceedings of this kind have ended in the overthrow of the liberties of the people, which makes us the more apprehend the beginning of them among ourſelves. Your majeſty's great judgment cannot but readily diſcern, whether it does naturally tend for one houſe of parliament to be exciting and earneſtly deſiring the ſovereign to exert a real, or ſuppoſed, prerogative againſt the other houſe. It is not eaſy to imagine what the commons could expect from your majeſty, from ſuch an application. The lords have never entertained a thought of uſing this dangerous method, whatever occaſions may have been given within the compaſs of late years; and we promiſe your majeſty, we will alway endeavour to preſerve a good underſtanding with the houſe of commons; and ſhall never think it too dear to procure that union at any rate, unleſs that of delivering up thoſe rights and powers which are lodged in us by law, and without which the conſtitution cannot ſubſiſt.

"We ſhall never be guilty of the preſumption of preſcribing to your majeſty when, and againſt whom, you ſhould exert your prerogative; but we will be always ready to aſſiſt you in the ſupport of all the juſt rights of the crown, as well as in the maintaining the liberties of the ſubjects, which we know are no leſs dear to your majeſty.

"It may, with modeſty and truth, be affirmed, that the lords have, in all times, been the ſureſt and moſt natural bulwark of the prerogatives of the crown; they being (as your grand-father, of ever bleſſed memory, was pleaſed to expreſs it) an excellent ſkreen and bank between the princes and people, to aſſiſt each other againſt any encroachment of the other.

"We will never contribute, by any act of ours, to the diminution of the rights of the crown; nor, as far as we are able, will ſuffer it in others: we cannot act otherwiſe, without hurting ourſelves in the higheſt degree, being thoroughly convinced, that the preſervation of the legal prerogative is not only the ſureſt way to ſecure our own privileges, but of abſolute neceſſity for the happy and rightful adminiſtration of the government; and we hope the houſe of commons will, in all times to come, ſpeak and act with that regard to the prerogative which they ſeem to have taken up lately.

"There remains one particular more, which we only name to your majeſty, becauſe we reſt ſatisfied it cannot have weight any where; that is, the inſinuation in the addreſs, as if the examination of theſe priſoners by the lords, was in order to obſtruct the enquiry into the deſigns againſt your majeſty's perſon and government; or, at leaſt, that it was likely to produce ſuch an effect. Our dutiful zeal for your majeſty's government, and our warm concern to diſcover all deſigns, and oppoſe all practices, againſt it, are too well known to the world, that any ſuggeſtions of that ſort ſhould make the leaſt impreſſion to our diſadvantage; and we are very ſure it was no ſuſpicion of that nature, which gave the true riſe to this very ſharp addreſs. It is eaſy to determine, whether a hearty and forward undertaking to ſearch into the deſigns of your enemies, or the ſeeking occaſions to object to, and to interrupt, ſuch endeavours, be moſt likely to obſtruct the diſcovery of the pernicious practices of traitors.

"Moſt gracious ſovereign,

"We moſt humbly aſk pardon for preſuming to give your majeſty the trouble of this long repreſentation, which has proceeded from the paſſionate concern we have to ſtand, not only acquitted, but entirely approved, in the judgment of ſo excellent a queen, and ſo juſtly beloved of all her ſubjects.

"We depend upon your juſtice, as well as your goodneſs, that nothing can do us prejudice (from whatſoever hands it comes) in your royal opinion, while we continue to act, in that ſtation where we are placed by the form of the Engliſh government, according to the laws and cuſtoms of parliament, with all imaginable reſpect and duty to yourſelf, and all poſſible zeal for the ſafety and happineſs of your kingdom

"Give us leave to conclude this our humble addreſs with this firm promiſe, that no dangers, no reproaches, nor any artifices whatever, ſhall deter or divert us from uſing our utmoſt endeavours, from time to time, in diſcovering and oppoſing all contrivances and attempts againſt your royal perſon and government, and the proteſtant religion as by law eſtabliſhed."

To this remonſtrance her majeſty was pleaſed to return for anſwer, "that ſhe was ſorry for any miſunderſtandings that happen between the two houſes of parliament, which was ſo inconvenient for the public ſervice, and ſo uneaſy to her, that ſhe could not but take notice, with ſatisfaction, of the aſſurances their lordſhips gave her, that they would carefully avoid all occaſions of them. She thanked them for the concern they expreſſed for the rights of the crown and her prerogative, which ſhe ſhould never exert ſo willingly as for the good of her ſubjects and the protection of their liberties."

The remonſtrance of the lords occaſioned another from the commons in anſwer thereto, and in vindication of their own conduct: but this was the language of irritated faction, by which, indeed, both ſides were too much actuated. The commons therein ſaid, "their lordſhips had thought fit to take offence at the manner and words of their addreſs; but that they had made uſe of no terms but what were ſuitable to the occaſion, and ſuch as had been frequently and reciprocally uſed by both houſes to each other; and whatever expreſſions their zeal for her majeſty and the public might have inſpired, they could never have offered their ſovereign ſo ungrateful a remembrance as the deſtruction of the monarchy, by a deteſtable aſſembly compoſed of members of both houſes, who, being alike partakers of the guilt, ought equally to ſhare the reproach.

"That they might, with more reaſon, obſerve that their lordſhips, not contented with preferring their own examinations to her majeſty's, and not content with excluding her and the commons (to whom parliamentary enquiries properly belong) had appropriated to their houſe only the name of a Parliament; an inſtance, they obſerved, not to be paralleled, unleſs by that very aſſembly that ſubverted the monarchy.

"The queſtion, they ſaid, was not, Whether their lordſhips had a right to take into cuſtody perſons under examination for matters cognizable in parliament? but, Whether the peers had a right to take the priſoners of the crown, and the examination of them ſolely into their hands, without her majeſty's conſent, and in ſuch a manner as muſt neceſſarily prove an excluſion of her majeſty and the commons? This is a propoſition which the commons deny, and for which their lordſhips have produced no precedent.

"They obſerved, that when her majeſty communicated to the lords the Scottiſh conſpiracy, with an exception only of ſome matters not yet proper to be made public, and with which her majeſty aſſured them they ſhould be acquainted, as ſoon as it could be done without prejudice, their lordſhips immediately addreſſed her majeſty to lay before them the whole matter. This could not but ſenſibly affect her faithful commons, who earneſtly deſired that both houſes of parliament, and the nation in general, would agree to pay the juſt deference due to her majeſty's wiſdom, to confide in her care, and maintain her honour and dignity.

"That the lords, not ſatisfied with aſſuming this unprecedented power, had endeavoured to perſuade her majeſty of the neceſſity of it, to prevent the ill deſigns of bad princes and their favourites. But the commons thought it unreaſonable to begin to practiſe upon a good prince thoſe methods which were calculated only to guard againſt a bad one; and it was their opinion, that the danger might be much greater by admitting this precedent, ſhould the lords at any time combine to defend one another from enquiries or proſecutions.

"Had the lords, ſay they, conſulted their own Journals, they would not have affirmed, that a direct application to the throne, without any previous conference, was an unprecedented practice; nor could they ſoon forget their addreſs preſented to her majeſty laſt ſeſſion, on behalf of the biſhop of Worceſter, and their addreſs to the late king, on behalf of the four lords impeached by the commons of high crimes and miſdemeanors.

"The commons declared for themſelves, that they ſhould be careful, as far as was conſiſtent with their own neceſſary juſtification, of reviving animoſities; and how great ſoever the provocation had been, her majeſty having declared her uneaſineſs at theſe miſunderſtandings, they ſhould make no difficulty of laying aſide their reſentment; but hoped they ſhould ſtand acquitted to the world, and her majeſty, ſince the zeal they had ſhewn, and the reproaches they had borne, had been owing to no other cauſe but the defence of our excellent queen, in whoſe hands God had placed the executive authority over theſe nations *."

The queen returned an anſwer to this, much in the ſame terms as ſhe had done to the lords remonſtrance.

The commons alſo addreſſed her majeſty again, that ſhe would reaſſume the juſt exerciſe of her prerogative, and take to herſelf the examination of the ſaid conſpiracy, declaring, that the eſtabliſhing a committee of ſeven lords, for the ſole examination of the conſpiracy, was of dangerous conſequence, and might tend to the ſubverſion of the government.

The lords, however, proceeded with their examinations of the Scottiſh plot, and on the twenty-ninth of January, 1704, the earl of Nottingham acquainted the lords, that the queen had commanded him to lay before them the papers, containing all the particulars hitherto diſcovered, in relation to that affair; but that there was one circumſtance which could not be properly communicated, without running the riſque of preventing a diſcovery of greater importance. It ſeems that Keith had tampered with his uncle to diſcloſe the whole ſecret of the correſpondence between the court of St. Germain's and the Scottiſh Jacobites; and this was the circumſtance the queen declined imparting to the lords, until ſhe ſhould know the ſucceſs of her endeavours, which happened at laſt to prove ineffectual. The lords, however, not ſatisfied with this reſerve, or perhaps ſuſpecting Nottingham's integrity, preſented an addreſs, deſiring that all the papers, without diſtinction, might be ſubmitted to their inſpection, that they might be better enabled to go to the bottom of this conſpiracy before the end of the ſeſſion. This application the queen took as an affront, indeed not without reaſon; and returned for anſwer, that ſhe did not expect to be preſſed in this manner immediately after the declaration ſhe had made; but ſhe hoped, that before the end of the ſeſſion ſhe ſhould be able to inform them of thoſe particulars, which could not at preſent be publiſhed without manifeſt inconvenience. Nevertheleſs, Nottingham in a few days delivered the papers, ſealed, to the houſe, and all the lords were ſummoned to attend on the eighth of February, that they might be opened and peruſed.

Accordingly, on the day appointed the lords began with the moſt material of them, which was drawn up by the earl of Nottingham, entitled, An Account of the Conſpiracy in Scotland. It was an abſtract of all the examinations the council had taken. Some of the Whigs took great exception at it, as drawn with a deſign to make the affair appear more inconſiderable than they believed it to be. They then proceeded to examine ſir John Maclean, who mentioned ſeveral circumſtances that were not to be found in Nottingham's paper. He named the perſons who ſat in council at St. Germain's: he ſaid the command of the troops to be ſent over to Scotland from France was offered to the duke of Berwick, who thought proper to refuſe it till trial ſhould be made whether the duke of Hamilton, whom he judged the more proper perſon, would accept it. He likewiſe explained the particular directions which had been ſent to Scotland, in order to prevent the eſtabliſhing the ſucceſſion in that kingdom. Theſe, with ſome other very intereſting facts, which were entirely omitted in Nottingham's papers, together with his having diſcharged an officer belonging to the late king James, who had been ſeized by the governor of Berwick, and who, had he been detained, might have been of great uſe in detecting the conſpiracy, brought ſeveral ſevere reflections from the houſe of lords upon that nobleman. It was even moved to paſs a cenſure on the account he had given; but the queſtion being put, it was carried in the negative by eleven voices. The lords were highly offended with Ferguſon's report already mentioned, and paſſed a ſevere vote againſt thoſe who had received ſuch ſcandalous papers, and had not ordered him to be proſecuted, which they now directed the attorney-general to do: but Ferguſon never received the leaſt puniſhment. During the debates one thing very extraordinary happened: the earl of Nottingham affirmed, that upon three or four occaſions ſome things had been ordered in the cabinet-council which the dukes of Somerſet and Devonſhire, who were likewiſe of that council, did not agree with him in.

The lords having finiſhed the examinations, and glowing with all the flame of faction, voted, That there had been dangerous plots between ſome perſons in Scotland and the courts of France and St. Germains; and that the encouragement for this plotting aroſe from the not ſettling the ſucceſſion to the crown of Scotland in the houſe of Hanover. Theſe votes were ſignified to the queen in an addreſs; and they promiſed that when the ſucceſſion ſhould be thus ſettled, they would endeavour to promote the union of the two kingdoms upon juſt and honourable terms. Then they compoſed another repreſentation in anſwer to the ſecond addreſs of the commons, which was filled with reflections and inſinuations againſt the commons, and contained ſome farther juſtifications of their own conduct. Among other things, they take notice that the commons ſtopped the iſſuing of writs for filling up the vacancies in their houſe, whereby, they ſaid, they made themſelves an imperfect repreſentation, which was a wound to the conſtitution; that there were very few things leſs excuſable in that unhappy houſe of commons who began the rebellion, than their refuſing to fill up their body, and compleat the repreſentation; and that an ill prince might take advantage of theſe precedents, and think himſelf juſtified in withholding his writs from ſome places, by as good law as the commons could ſhew for pretending to ſtop them from iſſuing to others; and concluded with expreſſing a juſt ſenſe of her majeſty's moderation in not ſuffering herſelf to be prevailed upon to do any thing to the prejudice of the conſtitution, from whatever hands the invitation came.

The queen anſwered, ſhe hoped none of her ſubjects deſired to leſſen her prerogative, ſince ſhe ſhould uſe it only for their protection and advantage: that any miſunderſtanding between the two houſes muſt be to the prejudice of the public; therefore ſhe ſhould not omit any thing in her power to prevent the occaſions of them.

In the mean while a complaint having been made in the houſe of commons againſt the earl of Nottingham, as having endeavoured to ſtifle the conſpiracy, a warm debate enſued, which at length, through the prevailing intereſt of the Tory party, ended in a reſolve, "That the ſaid earl, one of her majeſty's principal ſecretaries of ſtate, for his great ability and diligence in the execution of his office, for his unqueſtionable fidelity to the queen and her government, and for his ſteady adhering to the church of England, as by law eſtabliſhed, highly merited the truſt her majeſty repoſed in him." They ordered the ſpeaker to preſent this reſolution to the queen, who ſaid in reply, that ſhe was pleaſed to find the commons ſo well ſatisfied with the earl of Nottingham, who was truſted by her in ſo conſiderable an office. They then peruſed the examination of the witneſſes which was laid before them, but through the whole of their proceedings gave plain teſtimony of their diſbelief of the reality of a plot: however, they thanked her majeſty for having communicated thoſe particulars, as well as for her wiſdom and care of the nation *.

The lords and commons, actuated by ſuch different principles, eagerly ſought every occaſion of arraigning each other's conduct. Unhappily they found but too many: I ſhall inſtance one in particular, as being of the moſt importance to the conſtitution. The caſe was as follows †:

An action was brought by one Matthew Aſhby againſt William White, and three other conſtables of the borough of Ayleſbury in Buckinghamſhire ‡, for refuſing his vote at the laſt election of burgeſſes to ſerve in parliament for that borough. The cauſe was tried at the aſſizes, and the conſtables were caſt, with damages; but the defendants moved the court of Queen's-Bench in arreſt of judgment. Three of the judges, Powel, Gould, and Powis, were of opinion the action could not lie, for that the judging of elections belonged ſolely to the houſe of commons; adding, that this was the firſt action of the kind that had been brought, and if theſe ſuits were encouraged, it would make the returning officers liable to an infinite number of vexatious proſecutions. Lord chief-juſtice Holt, however, was of a very different opinion: he ſaid, this was a matter of the utmoſt importance, as well to the whole nation in general, as to every individual in particular: that there was a great difference between an election for a member and a right to vote in that election: that the houſe of commons were undoubtedly the only judges of the former; but that the right of voting at an election was an original right, founded on certain ſpecified legal titles, and as ſuch were cognizable only in a court of law. His opinion, however, could not prevail againſt that of the three other judges, and an order of the court was accordingly iſſued to quaſh all the proceedings in conſequence of the decree at the aſſizes. Aſhby, diſappointed in this quarter, moved the cauſe by writ of error into the houſe of lords, where the matter was argued with great warmth, and all the judges were ordered to deliver their opinions: whereupon ſir Thomas Trevor, lord chief-juſtice of the Common-pleas, and ſeveral others of his brethren, declared it was their opinion, That the houſe of commons only had a right to judge of elections, and conſequently of the qualifications of the electors; and obſerved, that petitions to that houſe were frequently founded on allegations: that ſome of the voters had no right, and that others were refuſed that had a right; nor had it ever been diſputed that the commons were the only proper judges of this matter, alleging, that if two independent juriſdictions ſhould be allowed in the ſame caſe, this might frequently occaſion contrary judgments, and create great confuſion in the execution of ſuch judgments. To this it was anſwered, that a voter had no other remedy but in a court of law; for ſuppoſing the perſon was returned he would have voted for, he had no pretence to complain to the houſe of commons; and if they could admit of ſuch a complaint, they could give him no damages to make him ſatisfaction for the officers denying his vote; and ſince this was a right inherent in every voter, it was reaſonable an action ſhould be brought for it in the courts of law where all other rights were tried. It was farther urged, that if this determination of the court of Queen's-Bench was confirmed, it would amount to an indemnity for the returning officers, how partial or unjuſt ſoever they ſhould prove, and exceedingly multiply thoſe diſorders. Many other arguments were employed on both ſides the queſtion; but their lordſhips adhering to the latter opinion, confirmed the verdict given for Aſhby the plaintiff at the aſſizes, and ordered the determination of the court of Queen's Bench to be ſet aſide.

The commons were grievouſly offended at this deciſion of the lords, which they looked upon as an encroachment on their privileges, and in the firſt tranſports of their reſentment paſſed the following five reſolutions, 1. That according to the known laws and uſage of parliament, it was the ſole right of the commons (except in caſes otherwiſe provided for by act of parliament) to examine and determine all matters relating to the right of election of their own members. 2. That neither the qualification of any elector, or the right of any perſon, is cognizable or determinable elſewhere than before the commons, except as aforeſaid. 3. That the examining and determining the right of qualification, or right of any elector, or any perſon elected in any court of law, or elſewhere than before the commons, except as aforeſaid, will expoſe all mayors and other returning officers to multiplicity of actions and vexatious ſuits, and ſubject them to different and independant juriſdictions, and inconſiſtent determinations. 4. That Matthew Aſhby having brought his action againſt White, &c. for not receiving his vote, was guilty of a breach of privilege. 5. That whoever ſhall commence or proſecute any action, indictment, or information, which ſhall bring the right of electors or elected to the determination of any other juriſdiction than the houſe of commons, except as aforeſaid, ſuch perſons, and all attornies, ſollicitors, counſellors, and ſerjeants at law, ſolliciting, pleading, or proſecuting in any ſuch caſe, are guilty of a high breach of the privilege of this houſe. Theſe reſolutions, ſigned by the clerk, were ordered to be fixed upon Weſtminſter-hall gate.

The lords were not a little alarmed at theſe vigorous proceedings of the lower houſe, and thought it behoved them to ſupport their decrees with the utmoſt firmneſs. To this end they appointed a committee to draw up the ſtate of the caſe; and the committee having made their report, their lordſhips came to the following reſolutions; 1. That by the known laws of this kingdom, every freeholder, or other perſon having a right to vote at the election of members to ſerve in parliament, and being wilfully denied or hindered ſo to do by the officers who ought to receive the ſame, may maintain his action againſt ſuch officer, and recover damages for the injury. 2. That the aſſerting that a perſon having a right to give his vote at an election, and being hindered ſo to do by the officer who ought to take the ſame, is without remedy for ſuch wrong by the ordinary courſe of law, is deſtructive of the property of the ſubject, againſt the freedom of elections, and manifeſtly tends to encourage corruption and partiality in officers who are to make returns to parliament, and to ſubject freeholders and other electors to their arbitrary will and pleaſure. 3. That the declaring Matthew Aſhby guilty of a breach of privilege of the houſe of commons for proſecuting his action againſt the conſtables of Ayleſbury, &c. after he had obtained a judgment in parliament for recovery of his damages, is an unprecedented attempt upon the judicature in parliament, and is in effect to ſubject the law of England to the votes of the houſe of commons. 4. That the deterring electors from proſecuting actions in the ordinary courſe of law, where they are deprived of their right of voting; and the terrifying attornies, ſollicitors, counſellors, and ſerjeants at law, from ſolliciting, proſecuting, and pleading in ſuch caſes, by voting their ſo doing to be a breach of privilege of the houſe of commons, is a manifeſt aſſuming a power to controul the law, to hinder the courſe of juſtice, and ſubject the property of Engliſhmen to the arbitrary votes of the houſe of commons.

Printed copies of the caſe and of theſe reſolutions were ſent by the lord-keeper (by the command of the houſe) to the ſheriffs of all the counties of England, to be circulated by them through the different boroughs of their reſpective counties; and this being the firſt queſtion of the kind that had ever been agitated, the nation was divided in its ſentiments between the two parties.

During theſe differences between the two houſes, her majeſty performed an act of generoſity which greatly endeared her to her ſubjects, and was a ſtrong proof of the regard ſhe had to God and religion, by conferring on the poor clergy a more extenſive and magnificent bounty than any of her predeceſſors had done, and which at this day amounts to upwards of twenty thouſand pounds per annum, and is ſtill increaſing. On the ſeventh day of February, 1704, her majeſty ſent a meſſage to the commons, importing, that having taken into her ſerious conſideration the mean and inſufficient maintenance belonging to the clergy in divers parts of this kingdom, ſhe had remitted the arrears of the tenths to the ſaid poor clergy; that ſhe would grant her whole revenue ariſing out of the firſt-fruits and tenths, as far as it ſhould become free from incumbrances, towards an augmentation of their maintenance; and that if the houſe of commons could find any methods by which her good intentions to the poor clergy could be rendered more effectual, it would be a great advantage to the public, and very acceptable to her majeſty.

The commons, upon receiving this meſſage, addreſſed her majeſty, expreſſing their thanks for her gracious meſſage, and her pious concern for increaſing the maintenance of the poor clergy out of her own revenue; and aſſured her majeſty they would do their utmoſt to make her majeſty's charitable intentions more effectual; and accordingly a bill was brought in "for the making more effectual her majeſty's gracious intentions for the augmentation of the maintenance of the poor clergy, by enabling her majeſty to grant in perpetuity the revenue of the firſt-fruits and tenths *." To this they added a repeal of the ſtatute of mortmain, ſo far as that it might be free to all men, either by deed or by their laſt wills, to give what they thought fit towards the augmentation of benefices. This addition was oppoſed with great warmth by ſome of the lords, who alleged it would be opening a door for the clergy to practiſe on the weakneſs of dying men: but after ſome debate the bill was carried by a great majority, and was paſſed into a law.

The lords have always been conſidered as the chief ſupport of the rights of the crown; and the commons, as the principal bulwark of the people. At this juncture, however, they appear to have ſhifted ſides; at leaſt the commons had been very remiſs in their ſtation. Prince George of Denmark, the lord high-admiral of England, knew nothing of ſea affairs, and was moreover ſo afflicted with an aſthma, that he was incapacitated from attending to public buſineſs of almoſt any kind. The management of the navy was therefore committed to a council, who acted under the authority of his name. They had been guilty of ſhameful neglects and miſmanagements, which however had been paſſed over unnoticed by the commons; but the lords, who now ſeemed reſolved to drag every abuſe forth to public view, on the ſecond of March entered upon an enquiry into the condition of the navy †; in which, as I obſerved before, they found things very indifferently managed: for inſtance, complaints had been made to the lord high-admiral of bad proviſions, by which the ſeamen were poiſoned, as well as the nation cheated; yet a ſurvey of the proviſions complained of was delayed for three months, which gave a great opportunity for making ſuch removes and changes, as rendered the proof of this charge altogether impracticable. The merchants complained that they were ill ſerved with convoys, and that ſo little care was taken of the Newcaſtle trade, as occaſioned an exceſſive riſe of coals. The neglect of providing for ſuch ſeamen as were priſoners in France was likewiſe rendered very evident, as was the danger of Jamaica, and the betraying our naval councils to the enemy. Theſe were all digeſted into an addreſs, which was preſented by the houſe of lords to the queen, who endeavoured to pacify the houſe by a ſoft anſwer, though perhaps the righteſt ſtep ſhe could have taken would have been to have diſmiſſed his royal highneſs's council as lord high-admiral, and either reſtored the earl of Pembroke, or appointed other commiſſioners. The lords ſtill continuing their enquiries, ſoon after reſolved, That admiral Graydon, with a ſquadron of men of war, meeting four French ſhips and not attacking them, on pretence of his inſtructions to make the beſt of his way to the Weſt Indies, was a prejudice to the queen's ſervice, and a diſhonour to the nation; and alſo that his diſorderly preſſing men at Jamaica, and his ſevere uſage of the maſters of merchantmen and tranſports under his convoy, was a diſcouragement to the inhabitants

* The firſt-fruits and tenths was an impoſition begun by the popes in the time of the holy wars, and it was raiſed as a fund to ſupport thoſe expeditions; but when taxes are once raiſed by ſuch an arbitrary power as the popes then aſſumed, and after there has been a ſubmiſſion, and the payments have been ſettled into a cuſtom, they are always continued, even after the pretence upon which they were firſt raiſed, ſubſiſts no more. Thus this became a ſtanding branch of the papal revenue, till Henry VIII. ſeemed reſolved to take it away. It was firſt aboliſhed for a year, probably to draw in the clergy to conſent the more willingly to a change that delivered them from ſuch heavy impoſitions: but in the ſucceeding ſeſſion of parliament this revenue was again ſettled as part of the revenue of the crown for ever. It is true, it was the more eaſily borne, becauſe the rates were ſtill at the old value, which in ſome places was not the tenth, and in moſt not above the fifth part of the true value; and the clergy had been often threatened with a new valuation, in which the rates ſhould be rigorouſly ſet to their full extent. The tenths amounted to about eleven thouſand pounds a year, and the firſt-fruits, which were more caſual, roſe one year with another to five thouſand pounds; ſo that the whole amounted to between ſixteen and ſeventeen thouſand pounds a-year. This was not brought into the Treaſury as the other branches of the revenue were; but the biſhops, who had been the pope's collectors, were now the king's, and perſons in favour obtained aſſignations on them for life, or for a term of years. of that iſland, and prejudicial to the queen's ſervice, and thereupon addreſſed her majeſty that the ſaid admiral might be no more employed. Graydon was accordingly laid aſide.

The lords at the ſame time reſumed the examination of the earl of Orford's accounts, in relation to his victualling the fleet while it wintered at Cadiz. This matter had been much canvaſſed in king William's time; their lordſhips now were of opinion, that the remarks which had been made on them by the commiſſioners for auditing the public accounts, were frivolous and trifling; and they confirmed an order the lords of the Treaſury had made to paſs the ſaid accounts. The commons propoſed, and ſent up a bill for continuing the commiſſion; the lords made ſome alterations, eſpecially in the nomination of the commiſſioners; but theſe were rejected by the commons. The peers adhered to their amendments; the commons refuſed to admit them: the bill was dropped, and the commiſſion of conſequence expired. No other bill of importance paſſed in this ſeſſion, except that for raiſing recruits, which empowered juſtices of the peace to impreſs idle perſons for ſoldiers and mariners. On this occaſion the lords addreſſed againſt any perſons being put in the commiſſion of the peace who had refuſed the oaths to king William.

The parliament having finiſhed the buſineſs before them, her majeſty came to the houſe of peers on the third of April; and the commons being ſent for up, ſhe made a ſpeech to both houſes, on the uſual topics of acknowlegement, unity, and moderation, and prorogued the parliament to the fourth day of July. The acts paſſed this ſeſſion, beſides the land-tax already mentioned, were, the malt-tax; an act for granting an aid to her majeſty by the ſale of annuities; an act for regiſtering deeds in the Weſt Riding of the county of York *; an act for the increaſe of ſeamen and encouraging navigation, and for the ſecurity of the coal-trade; an act for granting to her majeſty an additional ſubſidy of tonnage and poundage for three years; and the act for the augmentation of poor livings, by granting the revenues of the firſt-fruits and tenths, &c. Thus ended this ſeſſion of parliament, in which all the rancour of party had been diſplayed on both ſides; and the merit of the cauſe was leſs conſidered than the ends which a particular faction had to anſwer by it.

I ſhall juſt obſerve, that the two houſes of convocation ſat at the ſame time with the parliament; and the diviſion ſtill continuing between the upper and lower houſe, nothing of any moment was tranſacted in that aſſembly, except their addreſs to the queen, upon her granting the firſt-fruits and tenths for the poor clergy †.

Soon after the breaking up of the parliament, the earl of Nottingham, after having ineffectually preſſed the queen to diſcard the dukes of Somerſet and Devonſhire, who thwarted him in all his meaſures, waited on her majeſty, and told her that he could no longer ſerve in councils to which thoſe lords were admitted, and thereupon reſigned the ſeals as ſecretary of ſtate. The earl of Jerſey and ſir Edward Seymour, the former lord-chamberlain, and the other comptroller of the houſhold, reſigned their ſtaves of office; upon which the earl of Kent was made chamberlain; Mr. Manſel, a gentleman of a very conſiderable family in Wales, comptroller; Mr. Harley, ſecretary of ſtate; and Mr. Henry St. John was appointed ſecretary at war, in the room of Mr. Blathwayte.

Upon theſe removes, which ſeemed to throw the weight once more into the ſcale of the Whigs, that party became ſo elated, that they quickly after publiſhed a paper, entitled, Legion's humble Addreſs to the Lords; in which they reflected with more acrimony than decency on the houſe of commons, whom they charged with having betrayed their truſt, and giving up the rights of the people. They had even the boldneſs to aſſert, that the commons were become an unlawful aſſembly, and ought to be depoſed, by the ſame rule that oppreſſed ſubjects may, and in all ages have, depoſed bloody and tyrannical princes: that the tyranny of five hundred uſurpers was no more to be endured than that of one, ſince no number or quality of perſons could make that lawful, which in its own nature was not ſo.

They complained that the town of Maidſtone had not been permitted to chuſe repreſentatives the laſt ſeſſion: they inveighed againſt the notorious partiality ſhewn by the committees of the commons appointed to examine into and decide concerning controverted elections: they exclaimed againſt that houſe for its proceedings in the Aylesbury affair, and having deprived the electors of the right of election; of their complimenting the queen with an hereditary right, when her title was purely parliamentary; and of their addreſſing her majeſty to exert her prerogative againſt the peers.

They highly commended the lords for having

* By this law, a memorial of all the deeds and conveyances, and of all wills and deviſes in writing, whereby any honours, manors, and the like, in the ſaid Weſt Riding, may be any way effected in law or equity, may at the election of the party or parties concerned, be regiſtered in the manner as after directed.—And that after ſuch regiſter, every ſubſequent deed or conveyance of the ſaid honours, manors, and the like, ſo regiſtered, or any part thereof, ſhall be adjudged fraudulent and void, unleſs a memorial thereof ſhall alſo be regiſtered; and the like of wills and ſuch matters—The Regiſter-office to be kept at Wakefield—This act not to extend to copyhold eſtates, nor to leaſes at rack-rent, nor to any leaſe not exceeding twenty-one years.

The preamble to this law aſſigns the following very good grounds and reaſons for enacting it, viz. "That this Weſt Riding is the principal place in the North for the cloth manufacture, and that moſt of the traders therein are freeholders, and have frequent occaſions to borrow money upon their eſtates for managing their ſaid trade; but for want of a regiſter find it difficult to give ſecurity to the ſatisfaction of the money-lenders (although the ſecurity they offer be really good) by means whereof the ſaid trade is very much obſtructed, and many families ruined." See ſtat. 2 & 3 Annæ reginæ.

It is certainly much to be wiſhed that ſuch a regiſter could be rendered practicable all over England, ſince many frauds would undoubtedly be prevented thereby, and this too without expoſing the circumſtances of perſons families (the great objection to ſuch an eſtabliſhment) farther than the nature of ſuch regiſters abſolutely require.

† By this act the queen was empowered to incorporate ſuch perſons as ſhe ſhould think fit, and to ſettle upon ſuch corporation the firſt-fruits of all benefices for the maintenance of the miniſters of the church of England, not ſufficiently provided for; and it was farther enacted, That any perſon by deed or will might grant to the ſaid corporation their eſtate or intereſt in any lands, tenements, or hereditaments; and their property in any goods or chattels, for the augmentation of the maintenance of ſuch miniſters, having no ſettled competent penſion, to be applied according to the appointment of the benefactor; and in default of ſuch appointment, then in ſuch manner as by her majeſty's letters-patent ſhall be appointed: and the ſaid corporation are enabled to purchaſe, take, and hold, for the purpoſes aforeſaid, any lands, tenements, goods or chattels, as ſhall be given or granted to them. An act alſo paſſed this ſeſſion for diſcharging out of priſon ſuch inſolvent debtors as ſhould ſerve, or procure a perſon to ſerve, in her majeſty's fleets or armies: and another act for the further explanation and regulation of privilege of parliament, in relation to perſons in public offices. See ſtat. 2 & 3 Annæ reginæ.

ſo nobly vindicated their undoubted rights againſt the encroachments and invaſions of the commons, and aſſerting the rights and liberties of the people of England: they acknowleged their lordſhips to be the ſanctuary and ſafeguard of the nation, and the glorious inſtruments of preſerving her majeſty and their undoubted rights, and aſſure them that they will adhere to and faithfullly defend their lordſhips, both in their perſons and authority, in vindicating their juſt rights, defending her majeſty's perſon and their own liberties, and that they would live and die with them. This very extraordinary addreſs was ſubſcribed, "Our Name is MILLION, and we are more."

It can hardly be ſuppoſed that ſo flagrant an outrage upon ſo illuſtrious an aſſembly as that of the houſe of commons, would paſs uncenſured by any government that had the leaſt regard to its own dignity and authority, or indeed ſafety. Accordingly, the queen iſſued a proclamation, offering a reward of one hundred pounds for the diſcovery of the authors, and fifty pounds for the printer of this libel. However, I cannot find that any one was puniſhed for it.

As ſoon as it was known in France that the Scottiſh conſpiracy was diſcovered, Frazer was, by Lewis's order, confined in the Baſtile, where he remained ſeveral years. In England, Lindſay being ſentenced to die for having correſponded with the French court, was told that no hopes of mercy remained for him, unleſs he would reveal the whole myſtery of the conſpiracy. Nevertheleſs, he perſiſted in denying all knowlege of any ſuch conſpiracy, even at the gallows, whither he was carried with all the dreadful parade of death, the near proſpect of which, it was imagined, would have extorted a confeſſion from him; but this not having the deſired effect, he was carried back to Newgate, where he remained ſome years. He was afterwards baniſhed the kingdom, and at length died of hunger in Holland. As to ſir John Maclean, the lords, after examining him, had come to a reſolution to addreſs the queen in his favour, on account, they ſaid, of his ingenuous confeſſion. He was then diſcharged from priſon, and even received a conſiderable penſion from the crown, though in the queen's time he ſecretly, and after her death openly, continued in the intereſt of the pretender, and died in the rebellion againſt king George I. in 1715.

The miniſtry had been ſo very remiſs in their enquiries into this plot, that it afforded a very plauſible handle to their adverſaries the Whigs, to load them with the popular odium of Jacobitiſm; nor did they ſcruple to inſinuate that the queen herſelf was influenced by a ſiſterly affection for the court of St. Germain's. What ſeemed to confirm this allegation was, the diſgrace of the duke of Queenſberry, who had been particularly active in inveſtigating the ſecret machinations of the French court with the pretender's friends in Scotland, though his being laid aſide at this time appears to have been really occaſioned by the manifeſt decline of his intereſt in Scotland, which incapacitated him to do the government any eſſential ſervice in that kingdom.

The Scots had given repeated proofs of being greatly diſſatisfied with their neighbours of England, who, they thought, had too much exerted their influence in their affairs; and they ſeemed only to wait for an opportunity of ſhewing their reſentment. Their refuſal to come into the Hanover ſucceſſion, or to give ſupplies for the war in the laſt parliament, had given occaſion to many to conclude that they aimed at a change of government, and to put themſelves under the protection of France again, and bring in the pretender. Our court therefore was very deſirous to obtain a majority in the Scottiſh parliament, in order to ſecure to itſelf the nomination of a ſucceſſor to the crown, and obtain thoſe ſupplies which had been refuſed laſt ſeſſion. Mr. James Johnſton, who had been ſecretary of ſtate for Scotland under king William, had, in concert with the marquis of Tweddale, engaged to carry thoſe points, on condition that the ſucceſſor to be nominated ſhould be ſubjected to certain limitations and reſtrictions; to which the queen agreed. Hereupon Johnſton was taken into the adminiſtration, and made lord-regiſter, in the room of ſir James Murray of Philiphaugh; the duke of Queenſberry was diſplaced, and his poſt of high-commiſſioner given to the marquis of Tweddale, and the earl of Cromarty remained ſole ſecretary of ſtate; the earl of Leven was inſtalled governor of Edinburgh caſtle, in the room of the earl of March; the earl of Glaſgow was removed from being lord-treaſurer depute, and his place remained vacant.

Theſe alterations being made in the Scottiſh miniſtry, the parliament was convened on the ſixth day of July this year, when the new lord-commiſſioner preſented them a letter from her majeſty, wherein ſhe obſerved, that their unhappy diviſions had proceeded to ſuch an height, as had not only given her the greateſt concern, but had alſo encouraged her enemies abroad to employ their emiſſaries to debauch them from their allegiance, and render that kingdom a ſcene of war; but ſhe was willing to hope that none but men who were obnoxious to the laws, or of mean and deſperate fortunes, had given ear to them. She ſaid, ſhe was always inclined to believe that the late miſtakes did not proceed from any want of duty or reſpect to her, but only from difference of opinions as to meaſures of government: that ſhe was reſolved to give every ſatisfaction to her people that they could deſire, in regard to the rectifying abuſes, and for that end had named the marquis of Tweddale her high-commiſſioner, of whoſe capacity and diſpoſition to ſerve his country there could be no doubt; that ſhe had given him authority to conſent to ſuch laws as they ſhould think yet wanting to ſecure their government in church and ſtate; and having done her part, ſhe hoped they would lay hold of this opportunity of ſhewing the world the ſincerity of the profeſſions they had made her. The remaining part of the letter turned upon the neceſſity of their granting a ſupply, the diſcouragement of vice, the encouragement of commerce, and the uſual recommendation of moderation and unanimity *.

This letter was backed by a ſpeech from the lord-commiſſioner and the lord-chancellor, who each of them aſſured the parliament, that the whole affair of the Scottiſh plot ſhould be laid before them, and that her majeſty truſted in their prudence and loyalty to take ſuch meaſures as would effectually prevent the like machinations on the part of her enemies for the future. It would be equally unintereſting and unentertaining to the reader, was I to detain him here with relating the various modes of oppoſition ſet up againſt the miniſtry on this occaſion by the ſeveral parties in Scotland, who were at this time adverſe to the Engliſh government. Suffice it then to obſerve, that the court, with all the intereſt it could make, was not able to carry any one of its points. The Scottiſh parliament reſolved not to name a ſucceſſor to that crown until they had concluded a previous treaty with England, in relation to commerce and other concerns. The populace without doors ſeconded, in tumultuous aſſemblies, the reſolutions of their advocates within: and the commiſſioner and his friends finding it impoſſible to oppoſe the torrent, and under ſome apprehenſion for their own ſafety, the marquis, with the concurrence of the other miniſters, wrote a letter to the queen, repreſenting the diſagreeable ſituation of affairs, and adviſing her majeſty to paſs the bill of ſecurity, as it was called, without which ſhe muſt not expect that the parliament would grant any ſupplies. The lord-treaſurer Godolphin, on whoſe counſel the queen chiefly relied, conſidering that the army, which was already greatly creditor for arrears, muſt of neceſſity be diſbanded, and that this would expoſe the kingdom to imminent danger of an invaſion, ſeconded the advice of the Scottiſh miniſters; upon which the queen authorized the commiſſioner to paſs the bill which was then depending, under the title of a bill "for ſecuring the religion, liberty, and independency of the Scottiſh nation."

This act provided, that in caſe of the death of the queen, her heirs and ſucceſſors, the parliament then in being ſhould immediately meet, and nominate the ſucceſſor to the crown, different from the perſon poſſeſſing the throne of England, unleſs during her majeſty's reign, there be ſuch conditions of government enacted as may ſecure the honour and ſovereignty of the crown and kingdom, the freedom of the parliament, the religion, liberty, and trade of the nation, from Engliſh or any foreign influence: and until the meeting of the eſtates on ſuch death as aforeſaid, the adminiſtration of the government ſhall be by ſuch of the members of the ſaid eſtates, and ſuch of the privy-council as are then at Edinburgh. And all civil commiſſions granted during pleaſure ſhall be void, except ſheriffs, ſtewards, and juſtices of the peace. And for a farther ſecurity to the kingdom, it was enacted, that the whole proteſtant heritors, and all the burghs, ſhall provide themſelves with arms for all the fencible men who are proteſtants; and the ſaid heritors and burghs ſhall diſcipline their ſaid fencible men once a month at leaſt.

The Scottiſh parliament having obtained this act of ſecurity, on which the minds of the nation had been ſo ſtrongly bent, granted the ſupply without farther heſitation: but not yet ſatisfied with this conceſſion on the part of the Engliſh court, they began to canvaſs the affair of the conſpiracy, and the proceedings of the houſe of lords in England, which they termed an officious intermeddling in their concerns, and an encroachment upon the ſovereignty and independency of the nation: but while they were proceeding in their debates upon this matter, the high-commiſſioner, who, from the ſpecimen he had already received of their ungovernable ferocity, dreaded the effects of this enquiry, came to the houſe on the twenty-ſeventh of Auguſt, and, after a ſoothing ſpeech, prorogued the parliament to the ſeventh day of October following. However, before they ſeparated, they drew up an addreſs to the queen, deſiring that the witneſſes, and all the papers relating to the plot, might be ſent down, in order to be ſubjected to their examination in the next ſeſſion. Immediately after the adjournment of the parliament, an entire change was made in the Scottiſh miniſtry. Tweddale was made chancellor of Scotland, in the room of the earl of Seafield, who, with the earl of Roxburgh, was appointed joint ſecretaries of ſtate; the privy-ſeal was given to the earl of Rothes; the poſt of juſtice-general, to the earl of Cromarty; the management of the Treaſury was veſted in the hands of the earl of Selkirk, lord Belhaven, and ſir John Hume; Baillie of Jerviſwood was made treaſurer-depute; and at the ſame time a commiſſion was ſent down to Edinburgh, by which moſt of the cavaliers or Jacobite party, and all the duke of Queenſberry's faction, were outed, and their places ſupplied by ſuch as it was known would concur with the meaſures purſued at that time by the court of England, where the Whig intereſt ſeemed now to become every day more prevalent *.

From the cabinet and civil affairs of theſe kingdoms, I ſhall now proceed to take a view of the operations of the war abroad. The emperor's affairs were at this time in a moſt deplorable ſituation, and the houſe of Auſtria beheld itſelf on the verge of ruin, without a timely and powerful aſſiſtance. The elector of Bavaria was maſter of Paſſau †: thirty thouſand French, under the command of marſhal Marſin, who had ſucceeded Villars, overſpread the country on the other ſide the Danube. There were ſeveral flying parties in Auſtria. Vienna itſelf was threatened on one ſide by the French and Bavarians, and on the other ſide by prince Ragotſki, at the head of the mutinous Hungarians, fighting for their liberty, and ſupplied with money by the French and Turks. In this forlorn condition, Leopold had no reſource left but to implore the aſſiſtance of her Britannic majeſty; accordingly, in the beginning of April this year, count Wratiſlaw, the imperial envoy here, preſented a memorial to the queen, ſetting forth the imminent danger which threatened Germany, and earneſtly requeſting her relief. This memorial was ſtrongly enforced by the duke of Marlborough, who repreſented the abſolute neceſſity of ſpeedily ſuccouring the emperor. The queen, entirely guided by that general, returned a favourable anſwer to the memorial; and the duke embarking for Holland, arrived at the Hague about the beginning of May, where he had a conference with the States-general; and having repreſented in the ſtrongeſt terms the danger that the empire and all Europe were threatened with, if an immediate check was not given to the French and Bavarians in Germany; and having ſhewn that the allies, being now maſters of the Maeſe and all Spaniſh Guelderland, their frontiers were ſufficiently ſecured, the Dutch at length came into the project for ſending a body of troops immediately for the relief of the empire. The forces for the expedition being ordered to rendezvous, and all proper meaſures being concerted, the duke ſet forward for Maeſtricht, and on the ſixteenth of May joined the detachment commanded by brigadier Ferguſon; and on the eighteenth the Engliſh forces commanded by his own brother, general Churchill, aſſiſted by lieutenant-general Lumley, the earl of Orkney, and other officers of diſtinction. In the mean time, the States regulated the poſts of their general officers: Mynheer Auverquerque, their veldt (or field) marſhal, was appointed to command their forces on the Maeſe, having under him the counts de Tilly and Noyelles; Slangenberg, thoſe on the Moſelle; Saliſch, in Brabant; and Spaar and Fagel in Flanders. As the duke now ſeemed to bend his march towards Coblentz, the French in Flanders imagined he deſigned to open the campaign with the ſiege of Traerbach, and penetrate into France along the Moſelle; whereupon they laid ſiege to Huy, in order to divert him from that enterprize: but this conſummate general had a much more important ſcheme in view; no leſs than that of marching into the heart of the empire, and delivering the houſe of Auſtria from impending ruin. This deſign he had imparted to a few only, in whoſe diſcretion he could ſafely confide. It was approved by the penſionary and deputy Gueldermallen, who procured the approbation of the States-general thereto. The duke, paying little regard to the motions of the French againſt Huy, proceeded in his march by Bedburgh, Kerpenord, Kalſecken, and viſited the frontiers of Bonne, where he received advice that the recruits and reinforcements for the French army in Bavaria had joined that elector at Villingen. The duke now redoubled his diligence, and on the ninth of June got to Mildenheim, where he was viſited by prince Eugene, and next day prince Lewis of Baden arrived at the camp. Theſe three celebrated generals held a long conſultation; the reſult of which was, that the duke and prince Lewis ſhould command alternately from day to day, and that prince Eugene ſhould head a ſeparate army on the Rhine. Accordingly, prince Eugene ſet out for Philipſburgh, and on the ſixteenth the duke marched with the horſe from Eberſpach to Groſſen-Seinſen; his other troops proceeding in two columns under the command of the prince of Heſſe and general Bulow, but encamped in ſuch a manner that the whole might join prince Lewis in a day's march. On the twenty-ſecond the army made a motion, and joined that prince at Waſtertel. In the mean while, the duke had notified to the States-general her Britannic majeſty's orders to march to the relief of the empire, expreſſing his hope that they would approve of the deſign, and allow their troops to ſhare the honour of the enterprize. By the return of the courier he received their High Mightineſſes approbation of the project, and full power to command their forces *.

The Engliſh general having his hands now at full liberty, and being left to act as he pleaſed by his queen and her allies the Dutch, proſecuted his march into the heart of the empire, and by forced ſtages arrived on the banks of the Danube near Donawert †, oppoſite to the Bavarian lines, where about eight thouſand French, and as many Bavarians, lay entrenched, to guard the country they had conquered. On the firſt of July Marlborough encamped with his right at Amerdghem, and his left at Onderingen. The elector of Bavaria hereupon ſent a detachment of his beſt troops to reinforce count d'Arco, who was poſted at Schellenberg, a riſing ground on the Danube, near Donawert, where for ſeveral days he had been raiſing entrenchments, as being a poſt of vaſt importance. The duke, however, knowing that the works were not compleated, reſolved to attempt driving the enemy from their poſt; and, willing to have the ſole glory of this important piece of ſervice, he choſe the day on which he had the command, which, as I have already mentioned, he was to ſhare alternately with the prince of Baden, and gave orders for attacking the enemy without the aſſiſtance of his colleague. Accordingly, on the ſecond of July his grace advanced at three o'clock in the morning, with a detachment of ſix hundred foot, thirty ſquadrons of Engliſh and Dutch, and three battalions of imperial grenadiers, the reſt of the army following him with all poſſible diligence: but the way being bad and long, and other unavoidable accidents intervening, it was near three o'clock in the afternoon before he could get over the river Wermitz, which runs by Donawert, with our artillery. The attack was at length begun with an unparalleled intrepidity by the Engliſh and Dutch, before the Imperialiſts could come up. The enemy on their ſide made a moſt vigorous defence; but after an engagement of about an hour and an half, in which time the Imperialiſts came up, the entrenchments were forced, and the allies made a terrible ſlaughter of the enemy, who, as ſoon as they ſaw us in poſſeſſion of their works, ran away in great confuſion towards Donawert and the Danube; but being cloſely purſued by our horſe and dragoons, the greateſt part followed the example of count d'Arco and the reſt of their generals, who flung themſelves into that river and ſwam over it. Few actions were more bloody than this for the time it laſted. As the attack was begun by a battalion of the Engliſh foot-guards, and the regiments of Orkney and Ingoldſby, they ſuffered more than any others. Upon the whole, we loſt about ſix thouſand men, including many gallant officers. The loſs of the enemy was computed at about eight thouſand. We took ſixteen pieces of cannon, and thirteen colours and ſtandards. The duke gained great honour by the action; but he was once in imminent danger of being routed, had not prince Lewis of Baden arrived with his Imperialiſts in the critical moment to his aſſiſtance, in which piece of ſervice he was wounded. The day after this action, the army marched towards Donawert, of which the duke took poſſeſſion, the Bavarian garriſon quitting it upon his approach, after breaking down all the bridges; but they had not time to deſtroy the ammunition and proviſions, as they were ordered to do. The elector of Bavaria hearing of the defeat of his troops, repaſſed the Danube with the utmoſt precipitation, in order to march to the river Leche, leſt the victors ſhould cut off his retreat to his own country. On the fifth of July the confederate army paſſed the Danube over ſeveral bridges of pontoons near Donawert, and encamped at Mertingen, in the elector of Bavaria's country, and the ſixth was obſerved as a thankſgiving in the army for their ſucceſs. Marlborough, not to give the enemy time to recover from their conſternation, immediately ordered his troops to paſs the Leche; whereupon the garriſon of Neuburg abandoned that place, and retired to Ingoldſtadt. Neuburg was immediately ſecured by the confederates; and the enemy having left a ſmall party in Rain *, the ſiege of that town was immediately formed. The elector of Bavaria encamped under the cannon of Augſburg †.

On the thirteenth of July the count de Vehlen, general of the Palatine horſe, arrived in the confederate army from prince Eugene, with advice that the marſhals Villeroi and Tallard, with forty-five thouſand men, had paſſed the Rhine above fort Kehl, in order to join the elector of Bavaria; and therefore his highneſs deſired a reinforcement of horſe to obſerve the enemy's motions. Thereupon prince Maximilian of Hanover was detached with 30 ſquadrons of Imperialiſts as a reinforcement for Eugene. On the 16th the garriſon of Rain capitulated, and were conducted by a party of horſe to the elector of Bavaria's camp; and orders were given for providing magazines at Neuburg and Rain for the ſubſiſtence of the confederate forces. The army then reſumed its march, and on the twenty-third encamped with the right at Wolfurtzhauſen, and the left at Ooſtmaring (the town of Friedberg being in the center of the line) within a league of Augſburg, whereby the elector of Bavaria ſaw all communication with his own country entirely cut off.

The duke of Marlborough having now reduced the elector to the laſt extremity, propoſed very advantageous terms of peace, provided he would abandon the French intereſt and join the Imperialiſts in Italy. The elector ſeemed at firſt inclinable to accept the propoſals, and even agreed to a negotiation, which was in a manner brought to a concluſion; but upon advice that marſhal Tallard had paſſed the Black Foreſt, and was in full march to join him, he ſuddenly receded from the treaty, and declared, that ſince the French king made ſuch powerful efforts to ſupport him, he thought himſelf obliged in honour to remain firm to his alliance. His wretched ſubjects, however, paid dear for this temporizing conduct of their prince. The confederate generals ſo reſented his procedure, that they detached thirty ſquadrons of horſe and dragoons to plunder and burn the country of Bavaria, to the very walls of Munich, its capital.

In the mean time marſhal Tallard, notwithſtanding all the vigilance and precaution of prince Eugene, joined the elector of Bavaria at Biberach, near Ulm, with an army of twenty-two thouſand men, about the end of July; of which the duke of Marlborough having received intelligence, decamped on the fourth of Auguſt from Friedberg, and marched that night to Kippach. The next morning the army continued its route, and went to Hokenwert, where it continued two days; during which time the duke of Marlborough, prince Lewis of Baden, and prince Eugene, held a council of war, in which it was agreed that prince Lewis ſhould beſiege Ingoldſtadt, while the other two were to obſerve the elector of Bavaria. On the eighth the army decamped from Hokenwert, and marched to St. Sanditzell, and on the ninth to Axheim. The ſame day the duke of Marlborough received intelligence that the enemy had paſſed part of their army over the Danube at Dillingen, or Lavingen; upon which the duke gave orders to general Churchill to march with a ſtrong detachment over the Danube at Sconevelt, to reinforce prince Eugene, who lay near Donawert. The whole army followed the next day, and joined the forces of prince Eugene at the camp of Munſter; prince Lewis having by this time marched off towards Ingoldſtadt, which he was to inveſt. On the twelfth of Auguſt the duke and the prince took a view of the enemy, whom they found advantageouſly poſted on a hill near Hochſtet ‡, their right being covered by the Danube and the village of Blenheim §, their left by the village of Lutzingen, and their front by a rivulet, the banks of which were ſteep, and the bottom very marſhy. Notwithſtanding this advantageous poſition of the enemy, it was determined in a council of war to attack them before they could fortify themſelves in this poſt, as advices had been received that Villeroy was to march into Wirtemberg to deſtroy that country, and to cut off the communication of the allies with the Rhine, which muſt have been attended with very fatal conſequences to the latter. The ſame night therefore (the twelfth of Auguſt) the duke ordered all the baggage to be ſent towards Donawert, and the army to be ready to march by break of day, which accordingly it did, in nine columns, the Imperialiſts being to the right, and the Engliſh and Dutch on the left. By ſix or ſeven o'clock in the morning of the ever-memorable thirteenth of Auguſt, the allies appeared in ſight of the enemy's camp, where every thing was in profound ſilence, neither Tallard nor Marſin having once imagined that the confederates would have dared to attack them in ſuch a poſition. The appearance of our troops threw them into great confuſion: they fired two pieces of cannon to recal their foraging parties, and alſo ſet fire to ſeveral ſmall villages that lay between the confederate army and theirs. The cannonading began about nine in the morning, and was maintained on both ſides till one in the afternoon.

The French army, including the Bavarians, conſiſted of eighty-two battalions, and one hundred and ſixty ſquadrons; in all, near ſixty thouſand men. Marſhal Tallard commanded the right wing, and the elector, with Marſin, the left. The number of the confederates did not exceed fifty thouſand: their right was led by prince Eugene; their left by the lord Cutts and Orkney, the generals Churchill, Lumley, and Ingoldſby; and the duke of Marlborough took his ſtation in the center, as commander of the whole. Tallard, according to M. de Voltaire, had all the impetuous and ſprightly courage of a Frenchman, with an active and penetrating underſtanding, and a genius fruitful in expedients and reſources; but he laboured under a malady of very dangerous conſequence to a general: his ſight was ſo weak, that he could not diſtinguiſh objects at the diſtance of twenty paces from him; and it has been aſſerted by thoſe who knew him well, that his fiery courage, quite the reverſe of the duke of Marlborough's, growing ſtill warmer in the heat of action, deprived him ſometimes of the neceſſary preſence of mind. This was the firſt time that marſhal Marſin had commanded in chief: with a great deal of wit, and a good underſtanding, he was thought to have had rather the experience of a good officer than that of a general. As to the elector of Bavaria, he was looked upon not only as a great general, but as a valiant and amiable prince; but then he had a greater ſhare of magnanimity than application.

This battle, which proved ſo bloody, and decided the fate of the elector of Bavaria, by the loſs of all his country, began between twelve and one in the afternoon. The allies had a rivulet to croſs before they could attack the enemy, who had guarded it only by three ſquadrons of horſe, under M de Zurlauben, a Bavarian general, who attacked our troops with great vigour and reſolution, and obliged them to give back three times; but this handful of French not being properly ſupported, they were ſoon overpowered by numbers, and obliged to retreat in their turn. The French generals were accuſed of a number of errors in this day's action; one in particular was, their not having taken care to ſend a ſufficient force to diſpute the paſſage of this rivulet againſt the confederates; a miſtake they could never after retrieve. Their artillery, indeed, played very hotly upon our troops, but with very little execution; ſo that, by the help of pontoons and faſcines, they effected their paſſage in the face of the enemy. General Wilkes, at the head of nine battalions of Engliſh and Dutch, attacked the village of Blenheim, to the left of the enemy, and was repulſed, after three ſucceſſive attempts. Mean while the troops in the center, and part of our right wing, having croſſed the rivulet in ſeveral places, formed on the other ſide, without any interruption from the enemy, who remained quiet on the hills of which they were poſſeſſed. Marlborough then attacked Tallard's cavalry: that general, a little before, had rode towards the left wing, to obſerve its diſpoſition. It was no ſmall diſadvantage to Tallard's corps, from the beginning, to be obliged to fight without its general at its head. The corps commanded by the elector and Marſin, had not yet been attacked by prince Eugene: Marlborough began upon the enemy's right wing near an hour before Eugene could come up to the left. As ſoon as marſhal Tallard heard that Marlborough had attacked the wing which he commanded, he immediately poſted thither, where he found a furious action begun. The French cavalry, however, had behaved with ſuch reſolution, that they had put our troops in diſorder, and even obliged part of them to repaſs the rivulet; but a reinforcement of dragoons coming up, the French were broke in their turn, and forced to recoil. The marſhal then went to the village of Blenheim, where he had poſted twenty-ſeven battalions and twelve ſquadrons; and this formed a little detached army, which kept a continual fire on Marlborough's corps, during the whole time he was engaged with Tallard's wing, who, after he had given his orders in this village, haſtened back to the place of action, where the duke, with a body of horſe, and ſome battalions of foot between the ſquadrons, was driving the French cavalry before him.

The cavalry of the left wing of the confederates being now completely formed, aſcended the hill of Lutzingen with amazing intrepidity, charging the enemy's horſe ſo hotly, that, though they rallied ſeveral times, they were at length put to flight. The victorious Marlborough now forced his way between the two bodies of the French army, on one ſide, while on the other his general officers got between the village of Blenheim and Tallard's diviſion, which was alſo ſeparated from the little army in that village. In this deſperate ſituation, marſhal Tallard flew to rally ſome of his broken ſquadrons; but the badneſs of his ſight made him miſtake a ſquadron of the enemy for one of his own, and he was taken priſoner by the Heſſian troops in Engliſh pay, together with the marquis de Montperoux, general of horſe, the majors general de Sepperville, de Silly, de la Valiere, meſſieurs de la Meliſſiere, St. Pouange, de Legendais, and many other officers of diſtinction.

While theſe things were tranſacting in one part of the field, Marſin's quarters, at the village of Oberklau, in the centre, were attacked by ten battalions, under the prince of Holſtein Beck; but before he could form his men on the other ſide, he was overpowered by numbers, deſperately wounded, and taken priſoner. His battalions, however, being ſupported by ſome Daniſh and Hanoverian cavalry, returned to the charge, and were again repulſed. At length the duke of Marlborough in perſon advanced to their relief with ſome freſh ſquadrons from the corps de reſerve, and obliged the enemy to retire.

Prince Eugene had attempted the paſſage of the rivulet at a place where the banks of the ſtream were very ſteep, and the bottom very rough and uneven: the leaſt oppoſition on the part of the enemy muſt have rendered his efforts fruitleſs, and have obliged him to go back; but they made none;

ſo that, being got on the other ſide, he attacked the left wing, commanded by the elector and Marſin, with great vigour. But the imperial horſe behaved on this occaſion in a very bad manner; they were ſo intimidated by the furious fire the French made upon them, that they could not be brought to advance within muſket-ſhot: the Daniſh and Pruſſian troops alſo gave back in the ſame manner; however, at length, being animated by the example of their officers, they took heart, returned to the charge, and exerted themſelves with ſuch vigour, that they at length put the enemy to the rout; and the elector and Marſin, finding it in vain to make farther reſiſtance, abandoned Oberklau and Lutzingen, and were purſued as far as the villages of Morſelingen and Teiſſenhoven, from whence they retired to Dillingen and Lavingen. The rout now became general throughout the French army; every one fled with the greateſt precipitation; and ſo extreme was the terror and confuſion, that officers and ſoldiers ran headlong into the Danube, without knowing whither they were going.

The count du Bourg (afterwards marſhal of France), ſaved a ſmall part of the infantry, by retreating over the marſhes of Hochſtet; but neither he, Marſin, nor any one elſe thought of the little army which ſtill remained in Blenheim, waiting for orders. It conſiſted of twenty-ſeven battalions and twelve ſquadrons, making about eleven thouſand effective men, all the beſt troops of France; and the confederates, being now maſters of the field of battle, ſurrounded Blenheim. It was impoſſible for the French to get out of the narrow ſtreets of a village, and range themſelves in order of battle, in the face of a victorious army, that would have overwhelmed them at once with a ſuperior front, and blown them to atoms with their own artillery, which was all fallen into the hands of the victors. The general officer who commanded theſe troops was the marquis de Clerambault, ſon to the marſhal of that name. On the firſt news of the defeat of the cavalry, and that Tallard was taken priſoner, he abandoned his men, and endeavoured to ſave himſelf by ſwimming acroſs the Danube, but periſhed in the attempt. Marſhal Blanſac then took the command; but, upon the approach of our victorious troops, his courage failed him: he found it was impoſſible to maintain his troops, and thought proper to capitulate; and, about eight o'clock in the evening, ſigned the articles, in conſequence of which the French troops in the village laid down their arms, delivered their colours and ſtandards, and ſurrendered themſelves priſoners of war, on condition that the officers ſhould not be rifled.

Thus ended this famous action, which in France is known by the name of the Battle of Hochſtet, and by the Engliſh and Germans called the Battle of Blenheim, and was one of the moſt glorious and complete victories that ever was gained in any war, or by any general. The French army was almoſt entirely cut to pieces; of ſixty thouſand men, who had been ſo long accuſtomed to victory, not above twenty thouſand could be gathered together after the battle. Ten thouſand French and Bavarians were killed upon the ſpot; the greater part of thirty ſquadrons of horſe and dragoons were drowned in the Danube; thirteen thouſand were made priſoners, including twelve hundred officers; one hundred pieces of cannon were taken, with twenty-four mortars, one hundred and twenty-nine colours, one hundred and ſeventy-one ſtandards, ſeventeen pair of kettle-drums, three thouſand ſix hundred tents, thirty-four coaches, three hundred laden mules, two bridges of boats, fifteen pontoons, twenty-four barrels and eight caſks of ſilver. The loſs of the allies amounted to about five thouſand killed, and eight thouſand wounded and taken priſoners *.

The emperor was no ſooner informed of this ſignal victory, which had ſaved his family from impending ruin, than he wrote a letter to the duke of Marlborough, expreſſing his obligations to him, and offering to create him a prince of the empire. The duke declined the honour till he had obtained the conſent of the queen; and this being procured, he was immediately advanced to that high dignity, and Mindelheim was beſtowed on him as his principality; but he was never known by that title, the name of Marlborough being now the moſt noble he could bear.

By the diſperſion of the French army, an open paſſage was left to the allies from the Danube to the Rhine: it was therefore thought moſt adviſeable by the confederate generals, to join all their forces, and drive the enemy entirely out of Germany. Accordingly, prince Lewis of Baden abandoned the ſiege of Ingoldſtadt, and on the 26th day of Auguſt all the forces of the allies began their march under the conduct of the duke of Marlborough, with the princes Eugene and Lewis, by different routes, to the general rendezvous at Bruſchal, near Philipſburg, having firſt left twenty-three battalions and ſome ſquadrons to carry on the ſiege of Ulm † under general Thungen. The duke alſo took care to ſend marſhal Tallard under a guard of dragoons to Franckfort, and diſpoſed of all the other priſoners of diſtinction in the adjacent places. He alſo ordered a detachment to take poſſeſſion of Augſburg, which the French garriſon had evacuated. After a few days ſpent at Bruſchal in order to refreſh the troops, it was determined in a council of war, that prince Lewis of Baden ſhould undertake the ſiege of Landau, in order to ſecure the circle of Suabia from the incurſions of that garriſon. This is ſaid to have been a meaſure propoſed and warmly inſiſted on by the prince of Baden, who was jealous of the glory Marlborough might acquire ſhould he, purſuing the advantage he had already gained, drive the enemy again before him. † Ulm is an imperial city and ſovereign ſtate of Suabia in Germany, ſituated on the weſt ſide of the Danube, which here begins to be navigable, after receiving the Lauter and Beaw, oppoſite to the mouth of the Iller. It is governed by its own magiſtrates, who are all Lutherans, as are moſt of the inhabitants. It is a large populous city, with regular fortifications and deep ditches, but not able to ſuſtain a long ſiege; is a place of good trade, and its artiſts excel in clock-work and hard-ware. It lies thirty-ſix miles weſt of Augſburg.

though ſenſible that nothing could be more impolitic than this meaſure, which gave the foe time for recollection and recruiting their forces, conſented to the propoſal, and even ſubmitted to cover the ſiege while prince Lewis carried it on; for which purpoſe he and prince Eugene encamped at Croon Weiſſenburg, in the neighbourhood of Landau, which was inveſted about the middle of September; by which time news arrived in the camp that Ulm had ſurrendered to Thungen, on the firſt appearance of that general before its walls. In the place were found two hundred and twenty-two pieces of braſs cannon, twenty-two braſs mortars, one thouſand two hundred barrels of powder, with a conſiderable quantity of proviſions; all of which were extremely ſerviceable to thoſe employed in the ſiege of Landau. While the duke of Marlborough lay covering the operations of prince Lewis with his army, marechal Villeroy approached with his army as if he intended to attack the confederates in their entrenchments; but this proved to be a mere bravado; for after having lain a few days in ſight, he thought proper to retire without making the leaſt attempt to relieve the place, which continued to make a moſt obſtinate reſiſtance, till the twenty-third day of November, when the beſiegers, having made ſome advantageous lodgments, and the breaches being rendered practicable, the garriſon capitulated, in order to prevent the fatal conſequences of a general aſſault, and were indulged with honourable terms. Joſeph, king of the Romans, the emperor's eldeſt ſon, had arrived ſome time before in the camp of the confederates, that he might have the credit of taking the place; but his behaviour was not ſuch as to give any favourable impreſſion either of his courage or underſtanding. He was ſeldom ſeen in any poſt of danger, and was continually ſurrounded by his prieſts and confeſſors, who ſeemed to have engroſſed his whole confidence and affection. He was, however, commendable in beſtowing the government of the place on the count de Frize, who had before defended it with great courage and ability *.

After the precipitate retreat of Villeroy, the duke of Marlborough having nothing to apprehend from that quarter, and the ſiege of Landau being drawn out to a great length, his grace, without waiting for the end of it, advanced with a part of the army to the Saar, ſurprized Treves, poſſeſſed himſelf of other proper poſts for erecting magazines, and opening the next campaign with the ſiege of Saar-Louis; after which he cauſed Traerbach to be inveſted by the prince of Heſſe-Caſſel; and though the place was ſtrongly fortified and well defended; the attacks were carried on with ſuch vigour and reſolution, that in about ſix weeks the garriſon ſurrendered on honourable terms. On the tenth of November the king of the Romans concluded a treaty with the electreſs of Bavaria, whereby ſhe was to ſurrender all the towns in Bavaria to his imperial majeſty, her electoral highneſs being permitted to remain in Munich with a guard of four hundred men, and to be allowed a yearly penſion out of the revenue of the electorate, for the ſupport of her court and family. The operations of this year's campaign in Germany being concluded by the ſurrender of Landau, the duke of Marlborough repaired to Berlin, where he contracted for a reinforcement of eight thouſand Pruſſians, to ſerve under prince Eugene in Italy during the enſuing campaign. Thence he proceeded to the court of Hanover, and ſo on to the Hague, where he was congratulated by the States-general on his victories at Schellenberg and Blenheim, and treated with as much conſideration and reſpect as if he had been actually the ſtadtholder. In December he embarked for England, where he was received by all ranks of people with thoſe demonſtrations of joy and gratitude which his important ſervices ſo well deſerved †.

In Flanders very little paſſed worthy notice this campaign, except the bombardment of Bruges and Namur by baron Spaar with nine thouſand Dutch troops, and two attacks upon the French lines by M. d'Auverquerque, who actually forced them, though he was not able to maintain the footing he had gained. The elector of Bavaria, who after his defeat had retired to Bruſſels, aſſembled all his forces, with a view to ſurprize the Dutch general; but he was diſſuaded from this hazardous enterprize by marechal Villeroy, who repreſented in the ſtrongeſt terms the fatal conſequences that would inevitably enſue in caſe of a repulſe.

In Italy the French were greatly ſuperior to the duke of Savoy, who was obliged to be inactive, and ſee Vendoſme reduce Vercelli and Ivrea. The French afterwards made themſelves maſters of the valley of Aoſta, whereby his royal highneſs's communication with Germany by the way of Switzerland was entirely cut off; and on the fourteenth of October the duke of Vendoſme laid ſiege to Verrua, a ſtrong fortreſs, ſituated on the other ſide of the Po, between Caſal and Turin. It held out five months againſt all the efforts of the French general, the duke of Savoy having poſted his little army on the other ſide of the Po at Creſcentino, where he had a bridge of communication, by which he ſupplied the place occaſionally with freſh proviſions; but at length the communication being cut off, the duke of Savoy retired to Chivas, and Verrua ſurrendered to the enemy. The duke of Savoy complained greatly of having been abandoned by his allies on this occaſion; and indeed the emperor had greatly neglected Italy, that he might act with more vigour againſt Ragotſki and the Hungarian malcontents, over whom he had gained ſeveral advantages; notwithſtanding which, they continued very formidable. In the ſummer of this year a treaty had been ſet on foot between Leopold and them, under the mediation of the Engliſh and Dutch, who ſent their miniſters into Hungary for that purpoſe; but after much time had been ſpent in treaties, the war was renewed on that ſide; and the troops which had been promiſed to the duke of Savoy, to aſſiſt him againſt the French, were ordered into Hungary, and the burthen of the war in Italy thrown upon the Engliſh and Dutch ‡.

I ſhall now proceed to take a view of the meaſures proſecuted by our court in ſupport of the intereſts of the archduke of Auſtria, whom the allies had determined to ſet upon the throne of Spain, in oppoſition to the French king, who had already placed his grandſon the duke of Anjou in that ſo-vereignty,

vereignty, by the name of Philip V. The reader may remember that I left the archduke, whom we muſt now call Charles III. (for by that title he was recognized by the confederates) at the Hague, concerting with the Dutch and the duke of Marlborough the moſt ſuitable ſteps to be taken for aſſerting his claim. On the twenty-third of December of the preceding year, his catholic majeſty arrived at Spithead, and the next day the duke of Somerſet, maſter of the horſe to the queen, waited on him on ſhip-board with a letter of compliment from her majeſty, and acquainted him that ſhe expected to ſee him at Windſor. The next day Charles landed and went to Petworth, a ſeat of the duke of Somerſet in Suſſex, where the prince of Denmark was come to receive him, and they were both ſplendidly entertained there by the duke that evening. On December 29, his Catholic majeſty and the prince ſet out for Windſor, where they arrived about ſeven at night. His majeſty was received by the queen at the head of the grand ſtair-caſe. Having made his compliments, he thanked the queen for her generous aſſiſtance; and having led her majeſty into her chamber, ſhe preſented ſeveral ladies of the firſt quality to him, who had each of them the honour of a kiſs from his royal lips; then the prince waited on his majeſty to the apartment prepared for him. His majeſty ſupped that night with the queen and prince, the queen giving him the right hand at table, and the prince ſitting at the end. While the king was at Windſor, the Spaniſh merchants attended him to wiſh him ſucceſs, deſired his protection, and were graciouſly received by him.

His Catholic majeſty being very deſirous of proſecuting his voyage to Liſbon, ſet out on the thirty-firſt of December for Portſmouth, and the next day went on board admiral Rooke in the Royal Catherine at Spithead. The Dutch ſquadron arriving in that road on the fifth of January, 1704, the combined fleet ſet ſail for Portugal, having on board a body of land forces under the duke of Schomberg. When admiral Rooke had almoſt reached Cape Finiſterre, he was driven back by a ſtorm to Spithead, where he was obliged to remain till the middle of February; then being favoured with a fair wind, he happily performed the voyage to Liſbon, arriving there on the twenty-fifth of February; and after ten days had been ſpent in adjuſting the ceremonial, the king of Portugal came on board the Engliſh admiral in perſon, with moſt of the royal family, to conduct his Catholic majeſty to ſhore, where he was received with great ſplendor, though the court of Portugal was then overſpread with ſorrow for the death of the Infanta, whom the king of Spain intended to eſpouſe. Among other debates in relation to the ceremony of receiving the king of Spain, there was one which deſerves particular notice, and that was in relation to our flag, which I ſhall tranſcribe from the account publiſhed by authority. The king of Portugal deſired, that upon his coming on board the admiral's ſhip in his veſſel of ſtate, and ſtriking his ſtandard, the Engliſh flag might be ſtruck at the ſame time; and that when his Catholic majeſty, with himſelf, ſhould go off from the ſhip, his ſtandard ſhould be hoiſted, and the admiral's flag continue ſtruck till they were on ſhore. This propoſition was made from the king of Portugal by the king of Spain. To which the admiral replied, that his majeſty, ſo long as he ſhould be on board, might command the flag to be ſtruck when he pleaſed; but that whenever he left the ſhip, he himſelf was admiral, and obliged to execute his commiſſion, by immediately hoiſting his flag. This, and ſome other reaſons, ſatisfied the king of Spain, as well as his Portugueze majeſty, ſo that the flag of England was no longer ſtruck than the ſtandard of Portugal.

Notwithſtanding the exterior civility and friendſhip which the court of Portugal affected to diſplay towards king Charles, that prince ſoon found little or no preparations to ſupport his intereſt, or to open the campaign with vigour. The Portugueze miniſtry were ſecretly friends to the French; the people being led entirely by their prieſts, had an invincible averſion to thoſe they called heretics. Another misfortune was, that the duke of Schomberg was on ill terms with Fagel, the Dutch general, and both of them were envied by the Portugueze officers, who had prevailed on their king not to ſuffer the Engliſh and Dutch to command their own forces, or act in a body, but to diſtribute them into his little paltry towns that were not tenable. The king of Portugal had promiſed to enter Spain with Charles by the middle of May, but he was not ready till the middle of June, when they reached Santareno. Here they publiſhed their reſpective manifeſto's, Charles diſplaying his title to the crown of Spain, and offering his pardon to all his ſubjects who ſhould in three months join his army and the king of Portugal, declaring that his ſole intention in taking up arms was to reſtore the liberty of the Spaniſh nation, oppreſſed by the power of France, and to aſſert the right of his Catholic majeſty Charles III. to that monarchy, unjuſtly uſurped from him by the duke of Anjou. The duke of Anjou, however, the preſent poſſeſſor, took care in the mean time to anticipate the deſigns of his competitor, and the powers who ſupported him.

The duke of Berwick, who had engaged in the ſervice of Philip, and ſoon diſtinguiſhed himſelf as an able general (tho' he had paſſed elſewhere for a man of a very middling military genius) entered Portugal in the beginning of May, and took the town of Segura by ſurprize, and ſo intimidated the governor of Salvaterra, that he delivered up that place without making any defence. Cebreros was next reduced, with very little oppoſition. Zebredo was quitted by its inhabitants, and the town of Ihana la Viella was taken by ſtorm. At the ſame time the marquis de Jeoffreville, prince Tſerclaes de Tilly, and the marquis de Villadarias, were ſent with three ſeparate bodies of troops, to invade Portugal in as many different quarters, while the duke of Berwick laid ſiege to Sovreira Formoſa, defended by two battalions of Dutch, who were compelled to ſurrender themſelves priſoners of war. The duke then paſſed the Tagus *, and joined prince Tſerclaes. King Philip arriving ſoon after in in the army, laid ſiege to Portalegre, and the garriſon, including an Engliſh regiment of foot, commanded by colonel Stanhope, were taken in the place. Philip next proceeded to inveſt Caſtel-Davide, which gave him very little trouble in the reduction. On the other hand, the marquis das Minas, the Portugueze general, penetrated into Spain with fifteen thouſand men, and took Fuente Grimaldo in Caſtile by ſtorm, routed a body of French and Spaniards commanded by Don Ronquillo, and made himſelf maſter of Manſeinto. It being now the latter end of June, and the weather growing exceeding ſultry, Philip ſent his troops into quarters of refreſhment; and not thinking it poſſible to preſerve all his conqueſts, ordered his troops to abandon them, except Marvan and Salvaterra, and to raze the walls of Portalegre, Caſtel Davide, and ſome other towns. The allies followed the example of Philip, by putting their troops under covert from the prevailing heats.

The ſucceſs of the enemy gave no ſmall uneaſineſs to the Engliſh court; and duke Schomberg finding his advice diſregarded by the Portugueze, and foreſeeing very little honour or ſucceſs from the ſervice in which he was engaged, deſired leave to reſign his commiſſion, which was granted, and the earl of Galway was ſent over to ſucceed him, with a reinforcement of eight thouſand Dutch, who arrived at Liſbon in the beginning of Auguſt. About a month after, the earl having reviewed the Portugueſe and auxiliary forces, marched them over the river Coa, and encamped near Almeyda. Thither king Charles and his Portugueze majeſty repaired on the twentieth of September, with a deſign to penetrate into Caſtile; but they found the river Agueda ſo ſtrongly defended by the enemy, that the paſſage was not to be effected: they therefore returned back into Portugal, and in the beginning of October ſent the army into winter-quarters. The Spaniards on their ſide were now ſo weakened by ſending off detachments to the ſuccour of Gibraltar, inveſted by the allies this ſummer, that they were not in a capacity to undertake any thing of importance during the remaining part of the campaign *.

In Poland the war was ſtill carried on between young Charles of Sweden and Auguſtus, with unremitting fury and animoſity. Charles, whoſe army lay encamped in the neighbourhood of Dantzick, had found means to engage cardinal Radjouſki, archbiſhop of Gneſna, and primate of Poland, in his intereſt. By the intrigues of this prelate a diet was aſſembled at Warſaw, which ſolemnly depoſed Auguſtus, and declared the throne vacant. The intention of Charles and the primate was to have ſet the crown on the head of young Sobieſki, ſon of their late monarch. This prince was then at Breſlau in Sileſia, waiting with impatience for this event. While he was one day hunting, a few leagues from the place of his reſidence, in company with prince Conſtantine, one of his brothers, thirty Saxon horſemen, ſent privately by king Auguſtus, iſſued ſuddenly from a neighbouring wood, ſurrounded the two princes, and carried them off without reſiſtance to Dreſden, where they were committed to cloſe cuſtody. By this ſtroke Auguſtus diſconcerted the meaſures of Charles, the cardinal, and the aſſembly of Warſaw. Fortune, who delights alike to ſport with crowned heads as with the humbleſt of her ſubjects, expoſed Auguſtus almoſt at the ſame time to the danger of being taken himſelf. He was at table three leagues from Cracow (the capital of Poland) relying upon an advanced guard which was poſted at ſome diſtance, when all on a ſudden Renſchild, one of Charles's generals, appeared with a ſtrong party, after having ſurprized the guard. The king of Poland had but juſt time to get on horſeback, with eight or ten of his officers. General Renſchild, who purſued him for four days, was upon the point of ſeizing him every moment; and it was only by good fortune that he eſcaped †.

Our operations at ſea during the courſe of this year next demand our attention; and we ſhall ſee, that the Engliſh arms in that element fell very little ſhort of the ſucceſs with which they had been crowned by land. Sir George Rooke, after having landed king Charles at Liſbon, cruized for ſome time with the confederate fleet on the coaſt of Portugal, and then returned into the Tagus, where he was preſſed by king Charles to execute a deſign upon Barcelona, projected by the prince of Heſſe d'Armſtadt, who declared his opinion that the Catalonians would declare for the houſe of Auſtria, as ſoon as they ſhould be aſſured of proper protection and ſupport. The admiral accordingly took the prince on board, with whom he ſailed on the twentieth of Auguſt to Barcelona. In the mean time, the Engliſh miniſtry received advice that the French were very buſy in fitting out a great ſquadron at Breſt, which alarmed us much; and it was reſolved to equip, with the utmoſt expedition, a good fleet, which was put under the command of ſir Cloudeſley Shovel, admiral of the white, who had under him ſir Stafford Fairborne, vice-admiral of the red, and George Byng, eſq. then rear-admiral of the ſame ſquadron Sir Cloudeſley was directed, if he found the Breſt ſquadron already ſailed, to call a council of war, in order to judge what ſtrength might be neceſſary to ſend to ſir George Rooke; and if it amounted to twenty-two ſhips, then he was to ſail with them himſelf, that our fleet might at all events be ſuperior to that of the enemy. Sir Cloudeſley executed his inſtructions punctually; and finding that a great ſtrength was neceſſary in the Mediterranean to oppoſe the French, he ſailed thither about the latter end of May ‡.

On the eighteenth of that month ſir George Rooke appeared before the city of Barcelona, when a prieſt, and ſome others of the inhabitants, came on board, and informed the prince of Heſſe and the admiral, that if ſome few forces were landed, and a few bombs thrown into the town, the Catalonians would declare for Charles III. and open their gates to him. Upon this ſome Dutch ketches were ordered cloſe in ſhore, who during the whole night threw ſhells into the place, and the next morning early the prince of Heſſe landed his troops, to the number of about two thouſand men, who remained aſhore all that day and the enſuing night; but the prince finding no diſpoſition in the inhabitants to ſtir in his favour, notwithſtanding the bombs had done conſiderable execution on the town, his highneſs thought proper to reimbark the men, from an apprehenſion of their being attacked by a ſuperior force. On the twenty-firſt of May the fleet left Barcelona, and ſteered for the iſles of Hieres. In their paſſage they deſcried a large French ſquadron, which was ſailing towards Toulon, and was no other than that which had been diſpatched from Breſt. Sir George Rooke immediately gave chace; but their ſhips being cleaner than ours, outſailed us, and got ſafe into Toulon; upon which the admiral proceeded for Liſbon, in order to wait for a reinforcement. On the fourteenth of June our fleet ſailed through the Streights mouth, and two days after was joined by ſir Cloudeſley Shovel with his ſquadron off Lagos. A council of war was then called, in order to conſider what ſervice ſhould be proceeded on, when it was reſolved to ſteer up the Mediterranean in queſt of the French fleet. After cruizing for near a month, without ſeeing any thing of them, on the ſeventeenth of July the admiral called a council of war in the road of Tetuan *, wherein it was reſolved to make a ſudden attempt upon Gibraltar †, which was known to be but ſlenderly provided with a garriſon.

Thither the fleet accordingly bent its courſe, and on the twenty-firſt got into that bay. At three o'clock in the afternoon the mariners, Engliſh and Dutch, to the number of one thouſand eight hundred, with the prince of Heſſe at the head of them, were put on ſhore on the neck of land to the northward of the town, to cut off all communication with the country. Having taken poſt there, his highneſs ſent a ſummons to the governor to ſurrender the place; who anſwered, that he would defend it to the laſt extremity. Next day the admiral gave the ſignal for cannonading the town, which was performed with ſuch vigour, that fifteen thouſand ſhot were expended in five hours. In the mean time, to amuſe the enemy, captain Whitaker was ſent in with ſome boats, who burnt a French privateer of twelve guns in the old mole-head. By this time the admiral perceiving that the enemy were driven from their fortifications at the ſouth mole-head by the fire from our ſhips; and conſidering that if we could poſſeſs ourſelves of theſe works, the town muſt be taken of courſe; he ordered all the boats of the fleet to be manned and armed, and gave the command of them to captain Whitaker, with orders to attempt to make himſelf maſter of theſe works: but while Whitaker was preparing to execute theſe orders, captain Hicks of the Yarmouth, and captain Jumper, who lay next the mole, puſhed on ſhore in their pinnaces, and ſome other boats; whereupon the Spaniards immediately ſprung a mine, which blew up all the fortifications upon the mole, killed two lieutenants, with about forty men, and wounded about ſixty. Nevertheleſs the ſeamen kept poſſeſſion of the great platform till captain Whitaker landed with the reſt of the boats, who, with the ſeamen under his command, quickly made himſelf maſter of a redoubt between the mole and the town, and turned the cannon he found therein againſt the enemy. The admiral then ſent a letter to the governor, and at the ſame time a meſſenger to the prince of Heſſe, deſiring that general to ſend a peremptory ſummons, which his highneſs accordingly did; in conſequence of which, on the twenty-fourth in the morning, the governor capitulated, and the prince of Heſſe took poſſeſſion of the place. Upon this occaſion it is but doing juſtice to our brave ſeamen to obſerve, that as this deſign was entirely contrived by the admiral, ſo it was executed entirely by the ſailors, and therefore the whole honour is due to them. After having left as many men with the prince of Heſſe as could be ſpared for the defence of this conqueſt, the fleet ſailed to Tetuan, in order to take in wood and water.

This account of the taking of Gibraltar is inſerted from that publiſhed by the government. Biſhop Burnet in his Hiſtory has indeed given a different turn to the affair, in which, with a partiality inexcuſable in any writer, and ſtill more in a divine, and that divine giving in his hiſtory upon oath, he has endeavoured to make our enterprize, undertaken on the moſt mature advice, and conducted with the greateſt ſkill and bravery, together with the ſucceſs that attended it, to be the effect of pure chance. Rooke, ſays he, fell in upon Gibraltar; from which no one would imagine that a counicil of war had actually been called on board the admiral's own ſhip at Tetuan harbour, and a reſolution taken there by the general officers of both nations to attack the place, as the fact really was. In ſhort, according to this right reverend hiſtorian, every thing ſucceeded by accident. The reader however is to be informed, that Rooke was a Tory, and the biſhop had taken an utter averſion to all of that party ‡. But to return:

* Tetuan is a walled town of Habat, in the empire of Morocco in Africa, ſituated on the Cus, juſt within the Streights of Gibraltar, and about three miles from the ſea.

† Gibraltar is a celebrated town and fortreſs of Andaluſia in Spain, by the Moors called Gebel Tarif, i. e. Mount Tarif, a Mooriſh general who, in the eighth century, landed here with three African princes, whence its preſent name ſeems to be compounded. It lies on the ſtreight between the Atlantic Ocean and the Mediterranean, to which it gives its name. The town, which is neither large nor beautiful, ſtands at the foot of Mount Calpe, one of Hercules's pillars, and about ſixteen miles north of Ceuta, the other, in Africa. On account of its fortifications, it is looked upon as the key of Spain, and is furniſhed with all the neceſſary artillery for its defence. It is built on a rock in a peninſula, and acceſſible only on the land ſide, by a narrow paſſage between the rock and the ſea, acroſs which the Spaniards have drawn a fortified line, in order to prevent the garriſon of Gibraltar from having any intercourſe with the country; yet they carry on a clandeſtine trade. The harbour is formed by a bulwark properly fortified: The ſtreight of Gibraltar is twenty-four miles in length, and fifteen in breadth, and through it ſets a ſtrong current from the Atlantic and the Mediterranean; for ſtemming of which a briſk gale is required. The garriſon is confined within very narrow limits, the ground of which hardly produces any thing; ſo that they have all their proviſions from England and Ceuta, on the Barbary coaſt. The road is not ſafe either againſt enemies or ſtorms. Since ſeveral notorious oppreſſions have been committed by the governors of Gibraltar, this town has been erected into a body corporate, and the civil power lodged in its magiſtrates. It lies forty miles ſouth-weſt of Cadiz, and eighty ſouth of Seville. Buſching.

‡ His lordſhip in his account is pleaſed to introduce the following circumſtance; That after the admiral had bombarded the town to very little purpoſe, and with little hopes of ſucceſs, ſome bold men ventured to go aſhore in a place where it was not thought poſſible to climb up the rocks; and yet they ſucceeded in it; and when they had got up, they ſaw that all the women of the town were come out according to their ſuperſtition, to a chapel, there to implore the Virgin's protection. They ſeized on them, and that contributed not a little to diſpoſe thoſe in the town to ſurrender.

The

The fleet being ſupplied with proviſions, ſailed again into the Mediterranean, and on the eleventh of Auguſt got ſight of the French fleet, which ſir George purſued with all the ſail he could make. On the thirteenth, which was Sunday, he came within three leagues of them, to the weſtward of Cape Malaga, where they brought to, formed their line, and lay ready to receive him. Their line conſiſted of fifty-two ſhips, and twenty-four gallies: they were very ſtrong in the center, and weaker in the van and rear: to ſupply which, moſt of the gallies were divided into thoſe quarters. In the center was the count de Thouloufe, with the white ſquadron; in the van, the white and blue; and in the rear, the blue: each admiral had his vice and rear-admiral. Our line conſiſted of fifty-three ſhips, the admiral ſir George Rooke, with the rear-admirals Byng and Dilkes, being in the centre. Sir Cloudeſley Shovel and ſir John Leake led the van, and the Dutch formed the rear.

The action began about ten in the morning, when the van and rear, commanded by Shovel and the Dutch admiral Callembergh, immediately preſſed forward to a cloſe engagement, and ſoon compelled that part of the French line with which they were engaged to give way; but the center of the French bore extremely hard upon Rooke's diviſion: the fight however was maintained with great obſtinacy till night, when the French bore away to leeward, their diſabled ſhips being taken in tow by the gallies. The wind ſhifting in the night, the enemy got the weather-gage; but their fleet and ours lay by all day within three leagues of each other, repairing their defects, and at night they again made ſail to the northward. Sir George Rooke endeavoured the two next days to renew the fight, but the French as earneſtly evaded it, and at laſt made all the ſail they could, and fairly ran for it. This plainly ſhews that the victory was ours, notwithſtanding that the French, according to their old cuſtom, claimed the honour of the day; and Lewis XIV. wrote a letter to the archbiſhop of Paris affirming this, and directing Te Deum to be ſung on the occaſion: and however Burnet and other writers, to anſwer purpoſes, have affected to treat this action as of very little conſequence, and not to be mentioned with the other ſucceſſes gained by the duke of Marlborough; yet if we conſider the great diſadvantages under which the admiral engaged the French fleet, and that they were ſo beaten, that their grand fleet durſt not venture a battle in that element during the remainder of the war, it certainly may be ſaid, without exaggeration, that the battle of Malaga decided the empire of the ſea, and left to us and the Dutch the indiſputable claim to the title of MARITIME POWERS *. The loſs ſuſtained by each ſide in this action may be found at the bottom of the page †.

After the battle ſir George Rooke ſailed to Gibraltar to refit; and leaving a ſquadron of eighteen ſhips under ſir John Leake, ſet ſail for England, where he arrived in the month of September, when her majeſty, to ſhew the true ſenſe ſhe had of the ſervice performed by the fleet under his command this ſummer, thought proper that his royal highneſs prince George, lord high-admiral, ſhould introduce to her majeſty ſuch of the officers who had moſt diſtinguiſhed themſelves, when ſhe was pleaſed to confer the honour of knighthood on George Byng and Thomas Dilkes, eſqrs. rear-admirals, and captain John Jennings, commander of the St. George, a ſecond-rate.

As ſoon as the news of the loſs of Gibraltar reached the court of Spain, Philip, the reigning king, ſent the marquis of Villadarias with an army to releaſe it. He inveſted the place on the twenty-fourth of October. The ſiege laſted four months; during which the prince of Heſſe diſplayed many ſhining proofs of courage, conduct, and capacity, in its defence. The garriſon was ſupplied with men and proviſions from the ſquadron under ſir John Leake; but that admiral being obliged to ſail to Liſbon for freſh ſuccours, monſieur de Pointis, the French admiral, came out of Cadiz with thirteen men of war, and blocked up Gibraltar on the ſide next the ſea, whereby the town was reduced to the laſt extremity until ſir John, returning thither again, ſurpriſed de Pointis with his ſquadron in the bay, of whom he took three, and ran two of the largeſt ſhips on ſhore, which the enemy quitted after having ſet fire to them; and the beſiegers, after having loſt the beſt part of their army by ſickneſs and the ſword, thought fit to raiſe the ſiege on the tenth of March, leaving only a detachment of their forces at ſome diſtance to block up the place ‡.

* Campbell's Lives of Admirals, who thus enumerates the advantages the French fleet had over ours: firſt, Their ſhips were bigger; they had ſeventeen three-deck ſhips, and we had but ſeven. Secondly, they had a great advantage in their weight of metal, for they had ſix hundred guns more than we. Thirdly, they were clean ſhips, juſt come out of port, whereas ours had been long at ſea, and had done hard ſervice. Fourthly, they had the aſſiſtance of their gallies; and how great an advantage this was will appear from hence, that about the middle of the fight the French admiral ordered a ſeventy gun ſhip to board the Monk, a ſixty gun ſhip of ours, commanded by captain Mighells, which ſhe did, and was beat off three times; and after every repulſe, ſhe had her wounded men taken off, and her complement reſtored by the gallies. Fifthly, the French fleet was thoroughly provided with ammunition, which was ſo much wanted in ours, that ſeveral ſhips were towed out of the line, becauſe they had not powder nor ball ſufficient for a ſingle broad-ſide. Campbell. Burchet.

† Of the Engliſh were killed and wounded two thouſand three hundred and fifty-eight, and of the Dutch four hundred. Sir Andrew Leake, captain of the Grafton; captain Coe of the Ranelagh; lieutenant Jennings of the St. George; the third lieutenant of the Shrewſbury, and the firſt lieutenant of the Lenox, were all the officers of their rank that were killed. Captain Myngs, captain Baker, captain Kirton, captain Jumper, captain Myghels, lieutenant Ediſburg, and lieutenant Leſtock, were wounded; as were two lieutenants of the Barfleur, and the chaplain; ſeven or eight lieutenants more, three maſters, and about as many boatſwains and carpenters.

On the French ſide were killed the Bailey of Lorraine, commodore of a ſquadron, and the count de Thouloufe's ſecond; five captains, of which three were knights; a commiſſary of marines, ſix lieutenants, and five ſea-enſigns. Among the latter, the marſhal de Chateaurenault's ſon, and the ſieur de Bollem Villers, the count de Thouloufe's gentleman: the count himſelf was wounded in the forehead, ſhoulder, and thigh: the count de Relingues had his leg ſhot off: the marquis de Herhault, intendant of the fleet; monſieur du Caſſe, commodore of a ſquadron; monſieur de Chateaurenault, the count de Phelipaux, the count de Cominges, monſieur de Valincourt, the count de Thouloufe's ſecretary, ſeven captains, eight lieutenants, and about one hundred and fifty other officers, were wounded.

After this view of foreign tranſactions, it is time to return to domeſtic occurrences.

On the twenty-fourth of October the parliament met, and the ſeſſion was opened with a ſpeech from the throne, in which her majeſty obſerved, that the great and remarkable ſucceſs with which God had bleſſed her arms, produced unanimous joy and ſatisfaction through all parts of the kingdom; and that a timely improvement of the preſent advantages would enable her to procure a laſting foundation of ſecurity for England, as well as a firm ſupport for the liberty of Europe: ſhe declared, that her intention was to be kind and indulgent to all her ſubjects; ſhe expreſſed her hope that they would do nothing to endanger the loſs of this opportunity, and that there would be no contention among them, but who ſhould do moſt for the public welfare: "Such a temper as this (added ſhe) in all your proceedings, cannot fail of ſecuring your reputation both at home and abroad: this would make me an happy queen, whoſe endeavours ſhall never be wanting to make you a happy and flouriſhing people."

The next day the lords attended her majeſty with an addreſs of thanks for her ſpeech, in which they congratulated her on the great and glorious ſucceſs of her arms, under the command of the duke of Marlborough, without taking any notice of ſir George Rooke.

The commons, in their addreſs preſented the ſame day, congratulated her majeſty "as well upon the victory obtained by ſir George Rooke, as upon that obtained by the duke of Marlborough." The different ſpirit of the two houſes may be gathered from the different wording of their addreſſes. They alſo aſſured her, they came diſpoſed to do every thing that was neceſſary for the effectual proſecution of the war, and that they would give ſuch a ſpeedy diſpatch to the public buſineſs as might enable her majeſty to purſue the advantages ſhe had obtained over the common enemy; that they would uſe their utmoſt endeavours, by all proper meaſures, to prevent all diviſions among themſelves, and diſpute only who ſhould moſt contribute to the welfare of the nation, both in church and ſtate †.

The commons taking into conſideration the ſervices of the army and navy, by an unanimous vote, on the ſecond of November, deſired the queen, in an addreſs, "to beſtow her bounty upon the ſeamen and land-forces who had behaved themſelves ſo gallantly:" upon which her majeſty gave directions accordingly, for diſtributing a bounty amongſt them. After this they deliberated upon the different articles of national expence, and ſhewed ſuch zeal and application in ſupporting the war by neceſſary ſupplies, that before the end of November the ſupplies requiſite for maintaining both the army and navy were voted; and on the ninth of December the bill for the ſame received the royal aſſent, when the queen, in a ſhort ſpeech, thanked the commons for their diſpatch, which, ſhe ſaid, ſhe conſidered as a ſure pledge of their affection ‡.

The high-church party, who had ſtill the paſſing the occaſional-conformity bill greatly at heart, now cauſed it to be revived and brought into the houſe of commons, on a new model, by Mr. William Bromley, who made a long ſpeech in ſupport of it, wherein he urged, that the practice of occaſional conformity was ſuch a ſcandalous hypocriſy, as was not to be excuſed by any pretence; that the employing perſons of a different religion from that eſtabliſhed by law, had never been practiſed by any wiſe government, and was not allowed even in Holland, the country of univerſal toleration; and obſerved, that this law, ſo neceſſary, having been twice refuſed in the houſe of lords, the only way to have it paſs, was to tack it to the money-bill, and therefore he made a motion in form for ſo doing, which occaſioned a warm debate; however, upon better conſideration, the commons ſent it up ſingly, on the fourteenth of November, when it would hardly have excited a debate, had not the queen been preſent, and deſirous of hearing what could be ſaid on both ſides of the queſtion. For the information and ſatisfaction of her majeſty, the ſubject was again diſcuſſed, and all the arguments for and againſt being repeated, the bill was rejected by a majority of 21 voices, the majority increaſing nine this year beyond the laſt: this was thought to have been owing to the too indiſcreet behaviour and ſpeeches of the nonjurors and Roman catholics while the bill was depending in the lower houſe.

By this time the lords were engaged in an affair which made no leſs noiſe than the conformity bill, I mean the debates on the late conduct in the Scot-

‡ The ſums granted for the above purpoſes were as follow: For maintaining forty thouſand ſeamen, including eight thouſand marines, four pounds per man a month, for thirteen months, amounting to two hundred and eighty thouſand pounds. For the ordinary of the navy one hundred thouſand pounds, and forty thouſand pounds for ordnance ſtores for the ſea-ſervice, over and above the proportion of four pounds a man. For making a wharf and ſtore-houſe at Portſmouth, ten thouſand pounds. For forty thouſand landmen to act in conjunction with the allies, eight hundred eighty-five thouſand one hundred and ninety-three pounds. For ten thouſand additional forces for the ſame ſervice, one hundred ſeventy-ſeven thouſand five hundred and eleven pounds. For maintaining ten thouſand men to act in conjunction with the Portugueze, two hundred twenty-two thouſand three hundred and ſeventy-nine pounds. For her majeſty's proportion of ſubſidies to her allies, three hundred and ſeventy thouſand one hundred and nineteen pounds. For her majeſty's ſubſidy to the duke of Savoy, from October 3, to December 25, 1703, forty thouſand pounds. For levy-money for recruiting the horſes of the Engliſh horſe and dragoons loſt at Schellenberg and Blenheim, ſix thouſand ſeven hundred and twenty-five pounds. For recruiting the men and horſes of the foreigners in her majeſty's pay in the ſame battles, twenty-four thouſand ſix hundred ſixty-five pounds. For an additional regiment on the Portugueze eſtabliſhment, five thouſand one hundred and thirty-ſix pounds. For ſurgeons in the hoſpital in Portugal for the year 1704, two hundred and forty-four pounds. For expences in the Portugal war laſt year not provided for by parliament, ſixty-eight thouſand five hundred and forty-ſix pounds. For guards and garriſons in England, three hundred and fifty-ſeven thouſand pounds. For the ordnance of the land-ſervice, one hundred and twenty-thouſand pounds. For tranſports, ſixty thouſand pounds. For circulating Exchequer-bills, four thouſand pounds. And for five thouſand additional forces to be raiſed in conjunction with our allies to ſerve with the fleet, for their levy-money, eleven thouſand two hundred and forty-four pounds: for their pay for one year, eighty-ſeven thouſand one hundred and twenty-five pounds. In all, four millions ſix hundred and ſeventy thouſand four hundred and eighty-ſix pounds. Towards the raiſing whereof was granted a land-tax of four ſhillings in the pound, which produced about two millions; the duty upon malt, which might raiſe about eight hundred thouſand pounds, and three thouſand ſeven hundred pounds a week out of the Exciſe; eight hundred ſeventy-ſeven thouſand nine hundred and thirty pounds by ſale of annuities for ninety-nine years, at fifteen years purchaſe; a ſubſidy on wines and merchandizes for four years, as a fund for raiſing ſix hundred forty-ſix thouſand nine hundred and fifty-ſeven pounds for the uſe of the navy; and the duty on low wines continued.

tiſh parliament. The lord Haverſham having acquainted the peers, that he had matters of great importance to lay before them, but that he deſired it ſhould be in a full houſe; all the lords in town and in the neighbourhood thereof, were ſummoned to attend three days after, when his lordſhip made a ſet ſpeech, wherein having congratulated the lords on the duke of Marlborough's victories, and upon ſir George Rooke's deliverance as he called it, he took notice of a ſquadron of Dutch ſhips being called away, juſt before the battle of Malaga ‖, to be a convoy to their merchants, while neither the Engliſh trade or coaſt were protected, but the enemy inſulted us even in the Channel, while we vainly boaſted of being miſtreſs of the ſeas. He alſo mentioned as a grievance, the exportation of our corn; but the chief purport of his ſpeech was to fix an odium upon the miniſtry for ſuffering the act of ſecurity to paſs in Scotland.

He obſerved on this ſubject, "that the ſettlement of the ſucceſſion of Scotland had been poſtponed, partly becauſe the miniſtry for that kingdom were weak and divided, partly from a received opinion, that the ſucceſſion was never ſeriouſly and cordially intended by thoſe who managed the affairs of Scotland in the cabinet-council: he expatiated on the bad conſequences that might attend the act of ſecurity, which he ſtyled a Bill of Excluſion; for, ſaid he, can any reaſonable man believe, that thoſe who promoted that bill, could ever be really friends to the ſucceſſion as ſettled by the Engliſh parliament? He particularly mentioned that clauſe by which the heritors and burghs were ordered to exerciſe their fencible men every month: he ſaid, the nobility and gentry of Scotland were as learned and brave as any nation in Europe, and that theſe were generally diſcontented; the common people, he ſaid, were very numerous, very ſtout, and very poor; and aſked, who was the man that could tell what ſuch a multitude, ſo armed and ſo diſciplined, might do under ſuch leaders, ſhould they find opportunities ſuitable to their intention? Beſides, added this noble peer, I look upon it as of the laſt conſequence to England, that there ſhould not be the leaſt ſhadow or pretence of a neceſſity to keep up a regular ſtanding army in this kingdom, in time of peace. He then recommended theſe circumſtances to the conſideration of the houſe, and concluded with theſe words of lord Bacon, "Let men beware how they neglect or ſuffer matter of trouble to be prepared, for no man can forbid the ſparks that may ſet all on fire §."

Theſe matters were afterwards debated with ſome warmth in both houſes, and a majority in each ſeemed to fall in with lord Haverſham's ſentiments. The queen began this winter to come to the houſe of peers upon any important debates, as well for the ſake of her own inſtruction as to reſtrain the too great heat of the different parties by her preſence. The earl of Nottingham, in a ſpeech he made upon this ſubject, caſt ſuch ſevere reflections on the memory of king William, that he would have been ſent to the Tower, had not the lords declined ſuch a ſtep out of reſpect to her majeſty. After much declamation, in which the miniſtry were very ſeverely handled, and as warmly defended, the lords came to the following reſolutions: "That, to prevent the inconveniences that might happen by the late act paſſed in Scotland, the queen might be enabled, on the part of England, to name commiſſioners to treat about an entire union with Scotland, provided that thoſe powers be not put in execution till commiſſioners ſhould be firſt named on the part of Scotland, by the parliament there*: that no Scotſman ſhould enjoy the privileges of an Engliſhman, except ſuch as were ſettled in England, Ireland, and the Plantations, and ſuch as were or might be in the ſea or land ſervice, until an union could be effected, or the ſucceſſion ſettled as in England †: that the traffic of cattle from Scotland to England ſhould be ſtopped ‡: that orders ſhould be iſſued for ſeizing ſuch veſſels as ſhould be found trading from Scotland to France, or to the ports of any of her majeſty's enemies; and that cruiſers be appointed for that end ‖; and that the exportation of Engliſh wool into Scotland be prohibited §." On theſe reſolutions a bill was formed for an entire union, and paſſed the upper houſe on the twentieth of December. In the mean time the lords preſented an addreſs to the queen, requeſting that her majeſty would be pleaſed to give orders for the fortifying Newcaſtle, Tinmouth, Berwick, Carliſle, and Hull; that the militia of the four northern counties might be diſciplined and provided with arms; that a competent number of regular troops might be kept in the northern borders of England, and in the north of Ireland; and that the laws for diſarming the papiſts might be put in execution. The queen, in her anſwer, promiſed that a ſurvey ſhould be made of the places mentioned, and laid before the parliament, and that ſhe would give the neceſſary directions upon other articles of the addreſs ¶.

Complaints being daily made of the miſmanagement both at the board of the prince of Denmark's council, as lord high-admiral, and at ſea, their lordſhips proceeded to take the ſame under their conſideration; and, having made the proper enquiries, preſented an addreſs to her majeſty, ſetting forth, that leſs money had been paid to the ſervice of the navy than had been provided for that purpoſe, whereby the navy-debt was increaſed a million of money and upwards, ſince the year 1702; that more than fifteen hundred men were wanting of the laſt year's complement of ſeamen provided for by parliament; that too large ſalaries were given to the prince's council and other officers. Hereupon his highneſs's council laid before her majeſty an anſwer to all theſe objections, ſhewing particularly that the funds given for the navy had fallen ſhort near one million two hundred thouſand pounds, which was the cauſe of the increaſe of that debt. Here I cannot forbear making an obſervation on the public ſpirit of parliaments in this queen's reign: if they gave in one ſeſſion, they enquired in the next; and it is impoſſible to mention any remarkable expedition within the firſt ſix years, which was not examined and cleared up by ſuch enquiries; by this means the people ſaw and knew what they were doing, which encouraged them to pay chearfully, at the ſame time that it put them upon endeavouring to acquire by induſtry, what might maintain them happily, notwithſtanding theſe large but neceſſary expences. To proceed.

The commons having, in a grand committee, conſidered the ſtate of the nation with regard to Scotland, reſolved, on the eleventh of January, "that a bill be brought in, to enable her majeſty to appoint commiſſioners to treat of an union with Scotland; that the natives of Scotland, not already ſettled, and continually reſiding in the dominions of England, ſhall be reputed aliens, unleſs Scotland ſhall come into the proteſtant ſucceſſion in the houſe of Hanover; that more effectual proviſion be made for preventing the exportation of wool into Scotland †; that a ſtop be put to the importation of Scotch linen; that immediate proviſion be made to prevent the conveying horſes, arms, and ammunition, from England and Ireland into Scotland:" purſuant to which reſolutions a bill was brought in, and paſſed both houſes in a few days.

The duke of Marlborough being now returned home, he had the thanks both of the lords and commons for his great ſervices; and the lower houſe preſented an addreſs to the queen, intreating her to conſider of ſome proper means to perpetuate the memory of ſuch noble actions. In a few days, viz. on the ſeventeenth of January, 1705, the queen returned an anſwer by the chancellor of the Exchequer, in which ſhe acquainted the houſe, that ſhe was inclined to grant the intereſt of the crown in the honour and manor of Woodſtock and hundred of Wooton, to the duke of Marlborough and his heirs; and that as the lieutenancy and rangerſhip of the parks, with the rents and profits of the manors and hundreds, were already granted for two lives, ſhe judged it proper to remove that incumbrance, and deſired the aſſiſtance of the houſe therein. In conſequence of this intimation a bill was prepared, enabling her majeſty to beſtow theſe honours and manors on the duke and his heirs, and deſiring her to advance the money to clear the incumbrances. The queen not only complied with this addreſs, but alſo ordered the comptroller of the board of works to build, in Woodſtock park, a magnificent palace for the duke, to be diſtinguiſhed by the name of Blenheim Houſe, where the famous battle, from whence it takes its name, is repreſented in moſt curious paintings and tapeſtry: the ſtructure, which was the deſign of ſir John Vanbrugh, is thought, by moſt judges of architecture, to have more of grandeur and ſolidity, than of propriety and elegance.

Such were the honours and rewards heaped upon the duke of Marlborough, all which the world were ſatisfied he had juſtly merited; but his grace's glory and influence were now arrived to ſuch a pitch, that the bare mentioning the merit of another was held a ſufficient reaſon to lay that man aſide. The univerſity of Oxford had ſent an addreſs to her majeſty, congratulating the ſucceſs of her arms in Germany, under the admirable conduct and invincible courage of the duke of Marlborough; and at ſea under the moſt brave and faithful admiral ſir George Rooke. The latter part of this addreſs gave umbrage to the queen, as it ſeemed to raiſe the admiral upon a level with the general, whoſe great victories had captivated her admiration, and whoſe wife had alienated her affection from the Tories; her majeſty therefore returned a cool anſwer to the addreſs, and ſoon after ſir George Rooke, without the leaſt demerit on his ſide, was diſmiſſed from his command, and permitted to retire to his ſeat in Kent, without any reward for a long ſeries of eminent ſervices. The command of the fleet was beſtowed on ſir Cloudeſley Shovel, declared rear-admiral of England; ſir John Leake was appointed vice-admiral of the white; ſir George Byng, vice-admiral of the blue; ſir Thomas Dilkes, rear-admiral of the red; William Whetſtone, eſq. rear-admiral of the white; and ſir John Jennings was made an admiral in the room of ſir James Wiſhart, rear-admiral of the blue, who laid down his commiſſion at that time.

The duke of Marlborough having brought over with him marſhal Tallard, with the other French generals and officers taken at Hochſtet ‡, they were immediately conveyed to Nottingham and Litchfield, where they were attended by a detachment of the royal regiment of horſe-guards, were treated with great reſpect, and allowed the privilege of riding ten miles round the places of their confinement.

On the eighth of February the houſe of commons took into conſideration the treaty which the duke of Marlborough had concluded with the king of Pruſſia, for taking eight thouſand of his troops into Engliſh pay to ſerve in Savoy; and unanimouſly reſolved, that an humble addreſs be preſented to her majeſty, returning the thanks of the houſe to her majeſty for concluding the ſaid treaty, which was ſo ſeaſonable a ſupport to the duke of Savoy, and ſo great an advantage to the common cauſe; and alſo to aſſure her majeſty, that they would effectually enable her to make good the ſaid treaty. They alſo farther addreſſed her to continue her endeavours for an accommodation between the emperor and his ſubjects, now in arms in Hungary, in order for the better and more effectual carrying on the preſent and moſt neceſſary war: they likewiſe took notice, how very deficient the allies were in furniſhing their reſpective quotas towards the war, as well by ſea as land; and beſought her majeſty to uſe her intereſt with them, that they might next year furniſh their complete proportion, according to their reſpective treaties: to all which the queen returned complying anſwers.

† The Scottiſh parliament had paſſed an act for exporting their wool the laſt ſeſſion, only to ſpoil the woollen manufacture, which our miniſtry had weakly or treacherouſly ſuffered to receive the royal aſſent, as well as the act of ſecurity.

‡ There were, beſides the marſhal, the marquis de Montperoux, general of the horſe; the count de Blanzac, lieutenant-general; the marquis de Hautefeuville, general of dragoons; the marquis de Valleſame, the marquis de Sapperville, the marquis de Silly, the chevalier de Croiſſy, the marquis de la Valiere, major generals; monſieur de St. Second, brigadier; the marquis de Vaſſe, colonel of dragoons; the marquis de Marivaux, lieutenant-general; monſieur de la Meſſiliere, monſieur Jolly, monſieur d'Amigny, brigadiers; monſieur de St. Maurice, the count de Lionne, the marquis de Laſſey, the baron d'Elſt, monſieur de Balincourt, monſieur de Saalveboeuf, monſieur de Montenay, monſieur de Gallort, monſieur de Creſſey, colonels of foot; monſieur de Ligondais, the baron de Heyder, colonels of horſe; monſieur de Priſc, and monſieur d'Aurival, colonels of dragoons.

The remaining part of this ſeſſion was conſumed in diſputes and altercations between the two houſes on the Ayleſbury affair, which was now brought on the carpet again. John Petty, John Ovrat, John Paton, Henry Baſs, and Daniel Horn, inhabitants of that borough, encouraged by the countenance the houſe of peers had given Aſhby to ſue White, and the reſt of the conſtables of Ayleſbury, for refuſing his vote, ventured alſo to lay their ſeveral actions againſt the ſaid conſtables on the latter account; whereupon the five complainants were committed to Newgate, by order of the houſe of commons, for proſecuting their action at common law contrary to the declaration of that houſe formerly made. The priſoners moved for an habeas corpus in the court of Queen's-bench, but that court refuſed to take cognizance of the affair. Two of them now endeavoured to bring their writs of error returnable in parliament, which occaſioned great heats between the two houſes, and ſeveral repreſentations to her majeſty; the lords addreſſing that the writs of error in that court might be granted, and the commons inſiſting they might not. The principal matter in diſpute was the ſame as in Aſhby's caſe, viz. Whether an elector's vote being refuſed by the proper officer empowered to take the poll, he might not bring an action at law againſt ſuch offender? or, Whether ſuch elector's right to vote could be determined any where but in the houſe of commons? I ſhall not detain the reader by a repetition of the arguments uſed by each ſide in ſupport of their different opinions, as I have already touched upon this matter in my account of the tranſactions of laſt ſeſſion; but ſhall content myſelf with obſerving, that the lords firſt had a conference, and then a free conference with the commons, about the principal points in this affair; but neither ſide being willing to recede in any part from the principles they had adopted, and the diſputes beginning to threaten ſerious conſequences, the queen thought it moſt adviſeable to put a ſtop to the contention between the two houſes, by immediately cloſing the ſeſſion. Accordingly, repairing to the houſe of peers on the fourteenth of March, the deputy uſher of the black rod was ſent to ſummon the commons to attend her majeſty in the upper houſe, where ſhe paſſed the bills that were ready for the royal aſſent; and then having in a ſhort ſpeech thanked the parliament for the zeal and diſpatch with which they had provided for the exigences of government, and warned them to avoid the fatal effects of animoſity and diſſenſion, ſhe commanded the lord keeper to prorogue the parliament to Thurſday the firſt of May; but on the fifth of April it was diſſolved by proclamation, and another was publiſhed for calling a new parliament, this being upon the point of expiring according to the triennial act.

Beſides the acts already mentioned, the following bills received the royal aſſent this ſeſſion:

I. An act to prevent the exportation of Iriſh linen to the plantations, and to prohibit the importation of Scotch linen into Ireland. By the ſtatute of the fifteenth of Charles II. "For the encouragement of trade, ſtiled by way of eminence, The Act of Navigation, it was enacted, That no merchandize of any part of Europe ſhall be imported into any part of Aſia, Africa, or America belonging to his majeſty but what ſhall be laden from England, except as therein excepted." The act before us ſo far repeals the ſame, as to permit the exportation of Iriſh linen cloth to the Engliſh plantations in Engliſh built ſhipping, navigated according to law; "foraſmuch, ſaith the preamble, as the proteſtant intereſt in Ireland ought to be ſupported by giving the utmoſt encouragement to the linen manufactures of that kingdom." * The linen manufacture of Ireland was then, and in a great meaſure ſince is principally carried on in the province of Ulſter, and parts adjacent, where the Proteſtants are by far the majority of the people; but in moſt other parts of that kingdom it is well known to be otherwiſe.

II. An act for giving remedy on promiſſory notes, making them aſſignable by endorſement, in like ſort as was enacted on inland bills of exchange, Anno 1698, ninth of king William. And whereas in the ſaid act of the ninth of king William there is no proviſion made for proteſting inland bills of exchange, in caſe the party on whom ſuch bill, or bills, ſhall be drawn refuſes to accept the ſame, it was now hereby enacted, "That inland bills of exchange ſhall be underwritten for acceptance, and proteſted for non-acceptance, as well as for non-payment, in like ſort as foreign bills of exchange." ‡ It is ſomewhat ſtrange that two ſuch ſalutary and important regulations as this law hath made in promiſſory notes, and inland bills of exchange, were not ſooner enacted in a country of ſuch conſiderable mercantile tranſactions as England has long been famed for. But to ſay the truth, which many have remarked, our national ſlowneſs in reforming abuſes and defects, ſeems but too well grounded. This law was made perpetual by the ſeventh of queen Anne, cap. xxv.

III. An act "for encouraging the importation of naval ſtores from her majeſty's plantations in America." The neceſſity which all maritime trading nations, and eſpecially England, lie under of being ſupplied with naval ſtores, has often put it in the power of the northern crowns to diſtreſs ſuch nations who had none of their own. This evidently appeared in the year 1703 from the tar company of Sweden, who abſolutely refuſed to let us have any pitch or tar, (although ready money was always paid for it) unleſs we would permit it all to be brought in Swediſh ſhipping, and at their own price, and likewiſe only in ſuch quantities as that company ſhould think proper. This diſappointment put the government and parliament on the method of allowing bounties for raiſing of pitch and tar, hemp and flax, and ſhip-timber in our own North American colonies, particularly in Carolina, and gave riſe to this act, whereby it is enacted, "that whoever ſhall in ſhips, and with ſailors qualified as by the Act of Navigation, import from the Engliſh plantations in America the under-mentioned naval ſtores, ſhall be entitled to the following bounties, viz. for tar and pitch per ton, of eight barrels, four pounds ſterling; for rozin and turpentine per ton three pounds; for hemp per ton, of twenty hundred weight, ſix pounds; for all maſts, yards, and bowſprits, per ton, of forty feet each ton, one pound. This act to be in force for nine years, from the firſt of January 1705, old ſtyle.*" The good conſequence of which ſeaſonable law was ſoon after felt, and ſtill continues to be every day more manifeſt, for the ſaid colonies do at this time import into England great quantities of merchantable pitch and tar fit for moſt uſes in the navy, and which may in time be probably brought to ſerve for all uſes, ſo as to render us abſolutely independent on Sweden for ſuch two moſt neceſſary articles. Of late alſo good hemp and flax are raiſed in theſe colonies, where there are immenſe tracts of proper and excellent lands for raiſing thoſe commodities, of which, according to Mr. Gee (in his ingenious book of the Trade and Navigation of Great Britain conſidered) Ruſſia did, ſo late as the year 1729, export annually to Britain and other nations to the value of one million ſterling.

IV. An act to prohibit all trade and commerce with France. It is ſomewhat remarkable that, notwithſtanding the ſeveral addreſſes and repreſentations of the lords and commons to the throne againſt the Dutch for trading with France during the war, that people had ſuch intereſt with our miniſtry at this time (probably through the friendly offices of the duke of Marlborough), that they obtained an order of council, by which the ſhips of the States, that had proper paſſes, ſhould not be moleſted by the commanders of her majeſty's ſhips in their trade with France, and this at the very time that all trade and commerce with that country was ſtrictly forbidden to our own ſubjects! It was indeed alleged in defence of this meaſure, that as we were then about to open a free trade with Spain, this would be an equivalent in our favour; but it will clearly appear that this was no more than a ſpecious pretence for conniving at the Dutch, for we never propoſed to trade to any place that was not under the dominion of king Charles, and he was not then poſſeſſed of a foot of land in Spain, except Gibraltar. Beſides, when we had a trade in thoſe ports that were afterwards in king Charles's poſſeſſion, the Dutch had the ſame privilege of trading thither as ourſelves; nor does there appear any reaſon why they ſhould have been indulged in the French trade on account of our trading with Spain.

V. An act to prevent all correſpondence with her majeſty's enemies. By this act "whoever had paſſed into France after the fourth of May, in the firſt year of the queen, or had borne arms in the French ſervice, and ſhould return into the queen's dominions after the twenty-fifth of March 1705, without licence, was declared guilty of high-treaſon †."

I need not, I believe, apologize to my readers for the particular notice I have taken of the above acts, which, on account of their importance to the commercial intereſts of this kingdom, deſerve ſome degree of attention. I ſhall now proceed in the track of my hiſtory.

The queen, upon the diſſolution of the late parliament, wherein Toryiſm prevailed in the houſe of commons, made ſeveral promotions and changes in favour of the Whigs; this was brought about chiefly by the influence of the ducheſs of Marlborough and of the duke her huſband, who had now mutually abandoned the Tory intereſt. The duke of Newcaſtle was made lord privy-ſeal, in the room of the duke of Buckingham; and Charles earl of Peterborough, and Hugh lord Cholmondeley, were ſworn of the privy-council; the earl of Montague was made duke of that name; lord Cutts was appointed commander of her majeſty's forces in Ireland, under the duke of Ormond; and the following promotion of general officers took place, viz. brigadier Frederick Hamilton, the lord Windſor, the lord Raby, and brigadier Ravenſworth, were made major-generals; and the honourable colonel Mordaunt, colonel Brood, and colonel Stanhope, were made brigadier-generals.

The queen about this time went to Newmarket, where ſhe was attended by the vice-chancellor of Cambridge, Dr. Ellis, and the heads of that univerſity, who gave her majeſty an invitation to Cambridge, which ſhe was graciouſly pleaſed to accept, and was magnificently entertained on the ſixteenth of June, at the charge of the univerſity, in Trinity-college. On this occaſion her majeſty beſtowed the honour of knighthood on Mr James Montagu, council for the univerſity, and the famous Mr. Iſaac Newton, mathematical profeſſor. In the mean time, the whole nation was in a ferment, on account of the elections for the new parliament, both parties exerting their utmoſt efforts to diſpoſe the minds of the people in their favour. On the other hand, ſeveral counties and corporations thought fit to give inſtructions to their new repreſentatives as to their behaviour in the enſuing parliament, which generally ran in the Whig ſtrain, and were thought to have been procured by the miniſtry.

In the beginning of May this year count Gallas, envoy-extraordinary from the imperial court, received advice of the death of his maſter the emperor Leopold V. who died on the fifth of May, and was ſucceeded by Joſeph, king of the Romans, his eldeſt ſon. The envoy had orders to aſſure her majeſty, that the new emperor would not only obſerve all the treaties concluded with his predeceſſor, but would omit nothing that might render thoſe alliances more firm. Some time after the earl of Sunderland was ſent envoy-extraordinary from her majeſty to the emperor Joſeph, with compliments of condolance on the death of his father, and of congratulation on his imperial majeſty's acceſſion to the throne, with orders to ſignify at the ſame time her majeſty's reſolution to abide invariably by the league ſubſiſting between the Imperial and Britiſh courts.

Before I proceed to relate the progreſs of the war in the year 1705, I ſhall take a ſhort ſurvey of the proceedings of the parliaments in Ireland and Scotland, beginning in order of time.

The Iriſh parliament met at Dublin on the fifth day of March, 1704 5, according to the ridiculous ſtyle then in uſe, when the heats which had for ſome time ſubſiſted among the proteſtants there, and had been connived at by the miniſtry, were revived; and ſome of the high-church clergy, who had been preferred to benefices in that kingdom from England, were very buſy in raiſing the ſame fury againſt the diſſenters that had prevailed on this ſide the water. Soon after the opening of the ſeſſion, a diſpute aroſe between the commons and the lower houſe of convocation, occaſioned by the latter offering a memorial againſt the paſſing a bill for the improvement of the hempen and flaxen manufactures of the kingdom, wherein was a clauſe to aſcertain the tythes of hemp and flax. After ſome altercation, in which the convocation juſtified their memorial, the commons came to the following warm reſolutions: That the convocation were guilty of a contempt and breach of privilege of the houſe; that all matters relating to the memorial ſhould be razed out of the Journals and books of convocation; and that the perſon who preſented the ſaid memorial was guilty of a breach of privilege, and ſhould be taken into cuſtody. The commons proceeding ſtill farther, came to ſome reſolutions that reflected obliquely on the convocation, as enemies to her majeſty's government and the proteſtant ſucceſſion: whereupon the clergy in convocation paſſed ſome reſolves, which contain a ſhort, but ſtrong, apology for their body againſt the inſinuations of their adverſaries. The ſubſtance of theſe reſolutions was as follows, viz.

"That the church and nation had been happily delivered from popery and tyranny by his late majeſty king William III. of bleſſed memory, by means of the Revolution.

"That the continuance of theſe bleſſings were due, under God, to the auſpicious reign and happy government of her majeſty queen Anne.

"That if any clergyman ſhould, by word or writing, declare any thing in oppoſition to theſe reſolutions, they ſhould look upon him as a ſower of diviſions among the proteſtants, and an enemy to the conſtitution.

"That to teach or preach againſt the doctrine, government, rites, or ceremonies of the church; or to maintain ſchools or ſeminaries for the education of youth in principles contrary to thoſe of the eſtabliſhed church, was a contempt of the eccleſiaſtical laws of the kingdom, of pernicious conſequence, and ſerved only to continue and widen the unhappy ſchiſms and diviſions in the nation." This reſolve was plainly levelled againſt the preſbyterians.

Theſe feuds, however, did not prevent the due diſpatch of the public ſupplies: one hundred and fifty thouſand pounds were voted for the ſupport of the neceſſary branches of the eſtabliſhment; and ſeveral bills being ready for the royal aſſent, the duke of Ormond went to the houſe of lords with the uſual ſolemnity, on the ſixteenth of June, and paſſed them, after which the parliament was prorogued for one year; and his grace having viſited ſeveral of the fortified towns with able engineers, and given orders for ſuch repairs and additional works as were wanted, embarked for England, leaving the adminiſtration of the government of Ireland in the hands of ſir Richard Cox, lord-chancellor, and of the lord Cutts, commander in chief of her majeſty's forces in that kingdom, who were appointed lords-juſtices during his grace's abſence *.

The Iriſh ſeſſion being thus finiſhed, the Scottiſh parliament met a few days after, viz. on the twenty-eighth of June. The miniſtry of that kingdom had by this time undergone a great change: the Engliſh miniſtry finding how much they had been cenſured upon account of the act of ſecurity which they had connived at, reſolved to purſue ſuch meaſures as might reinſtate them in the favour of the public, and with that view ſet all their powers to work to get the proteſtant ſucceſſion ſettled in Scotland, or to procure an union of the two kingdoms. The marquis of Tweddale and ſecretary Johnſon were now laid aſide, and the management of affairs again intruſted to the duke of Queenſberry, under the title of lord privy-ſeal; and the office of high-commiſſioner was conferred upon the young duke of Argyll, who ſucceeded to his father's influence among the preſbyterians, with inſtructions to bring about the points propoſed by the Engliſh miniſtry.

At the opening of the ſeſſion the members were divided into three parties, namely, the Cavaliers or Jacobites, the Revolutioniſts, and the Squadrone Volante, or Flying Squadron: this latter conſiſted of diſcarded courtiers, who diſclaimed all connection with the other two parties, and pretended to hold the balance between them. The marquis of Tweddale was at the ead of this faction, and had with him the earls of Rothes, Roxburgh, Haddington, and Marchmont. Biſhop Burnet tells us, that they were in great credit with the people of Scotland, on account of their pretending to act from dictates of conſcience only. Their number, he ſays, was between twenty and thirty †. The Cavaliers, or Antirevolutioniſts, were headed by duke Hamilton; Queenſberry, Argyll, Annandale, and their friends, headed the Revolutioniſts, or zealous preſbyterians.

Many members being abſent at the opening of the ſeſſion, the lord-commiſſioner adjourned the parliament to the third of July, when being met again, the queen's letter was read to the aſſembly, wherein her majeſty expreſſed herſelf to the following purport: That at their laſt meeting ſhe recommended to them, with the greateſt earneſtneſs, the ſettling of the ſucceſſion of that her ancient kingdom in the proteſtant line; and ſeveral things having ſince happened which ſhewed the great inconveniency of that matter continuing in ſuſpence, ſhe could not but at preſent moſt ſeriouſly renew the recommendation of that ſettlement, as being convinced of the growing neceſſity thereof, both for the preſervation of the proteſtant religion, and the peace and ſafety of all her dominions, and for defeating the deſigns and attempts of all her enemies; and to prevent any objections to the ſaid ſettlement, that could be ſuggeſted from the views or fears of future inconveniencies that might happen to that her kingdom from thence, ſhe ſhould be ready to give the royal aſſent to ſuch proviſions and reſtrictions as ſhould be found neceſſary and reaſonable in ſuch a caſe; and therefore ſhe muſt ſtill leave it upon them, as moſt neceſſary for all the ends already mentioned, that they go to the ſettlement of the ſucceſſion before all other buſineſs.

"She was fully ſatisfied, ſhe ſaid, and doubted not but they were, that great benefits would ariſe to all her ſubjects, by an union of Scotland and England, and that nothing would contribute more to the compoſing of differences, and extinguiſhing the heats that were unhappily raiſed and fomented by the enemies of both nations, than the promoting of every thing that tended to the procuring of the ſame; therefore ſhe heartily recommended them to paſs an act for a commiſſion to ſet a treaty on foot between the kingdoms, as the parliament of England had done, for effectuating what was ſo deſirable, and for ſuch other matters and things as might be judged proper for her honour, and the good and advantage of both kingdoms for ever, in which ſhe ſhould moſt heartily give her beſt aſſiſtance." The reſt being matter of form, I ſhall paſs it over. This letter was backed by a ſpeech of the duke of Argyll, the high-commiſſioner, and by another from the lord-chancellor.

Many matters of conſiderable moment were taken into conſideration by this parliament, ſuch as the ſtate of the commerce and coin of the kingdom, the eſtabliſhing a paper-credit, by circulating of bills, &c. but they all came to nothing. The affair of nominating a ſucceſſor being taken into deliberation, duke Hamilton propoſed, that the parliament ſhould not proceed upon that matter until the treaty with England ſhould be diſcuſſed, and the limitations be ſettled: upon which it was put to the vote, Whether to go firſt upon the conſiderations of a treaty of union with England, or upon limitations? but it was carried for limitations. At length, however, the draught of an addreſs to her majeſty, ſetting forth the reaſons why the parliament could not proceed to an act for a treaty with England, was offered by Mr. Fletcher of Saltoun, and was to this effect: "That the act lately paſſed in the parliament of England containing a propoſal for a treaty of union of the two kingdoms, is made in ſuch injurious terms to the honour and intereſt of the Scottiſh nation, that the parliament could by no means comply with it: but that out of the great ſenſe they had of the duty they owed to her majeſty, they declared that they ſhould always be ready to comply with any ſuch propoſal from the parliament of England, whenever it ſhall be made in terms as are no ways diſhonourable or diſadvantageous to the nation or people of Scotland."

A very hot debate enſued hereupon; but at length the parliament proceeded to the act for a treaty with England, when the duke of Hamilton, to the ſurprize of his whole party, moved that the nomination of the commiſſioners ſhould be left to the queen. This gave riſe to a ſtill more vehement altercation; but at length the queſtion being put, Whether the nomination ſhould be left to the queen, or the parliament? the duke's motion was approved by a ſmall majority, and an act for treating about the union was paſſed; but it was provided, that they ſhould not commence ſuch treaty until the clauſe in the Engliſh act, declaring the ſubjects of Scotland aliens, ſhould be reſcinded; ſo that nothing was effectually to be done for uniting the two kingdoms till the Engliſh parliament ſat and made the repeal abovementioned. On this occaſion the duke of Athol entered a rigorous proteſt, to which the greater part of the cavaliers, and all the ſquadron, adhered, comprehending twenty-four peers, thirty-ſeven barons, and eighteen boroughs. On the twentieth of December the houſe was adjourned, after having granted a ſupply of fifty thouſand pounds. Not long after the adjournment, the earl of Marr, who during the whole ſeſſion had ſtuck faſt by the court, was declared ſecretary of ſtate, in the room of the marquis of Annandale, who was appointed preſident of the council *.

It is now time to turn from the conſideration of civil affairs to the progreſs of the war in 1705. The duke of Marlborough had long been revolving a ſcheme for improving the victory he had gained at Blenheim; and, after the moſt mature deliberation, no one appeared ſo rational as that of making an impreſſion on the frontiers of France. The Moſelle † was therefore pitched upon as the ſcene of action, and large magazines of all ſorts were formed at Triers. On the thirtieth of March the duke left England, and repaired to the Hague, where he ſoon perſuaded their High Mightineſſes to approve of his project, and even to contribute their troops towards its execution. This point ſettled, he departed for Maeſtricht in order to aſſemble his army; in which he uſed ſuch diligence, that by the latter end of May the troops paſſed the Maeſe, and bent their march towards the Moſelle, under the command of the duke's brother, general Churchill; while his grace ſet out for Raſtadt, to viſit prince Lewis of Baden, where, after a long conſultation, they reſolved that a ſufficient number of German troops ſhould be left for ſecuring the limits of Lauterburg and Stolhoffen, under the command of general Thungen; and that prince Lewis ſhould advance with a large detachment towards the Saar, to act in concert with the duke of Marlborough in forming the ſiege of Saar-Louis (a fortreſs of Lorraine, ſituate on the Saar) the taking of which would have opened a gap into the very bowels of France.

The duke with his troops paſſed the Saar in the beginning of June, and encamped at Elft, in ſight of marſhal Villars, who was encamped in that neighbourhood with a numerous army; but upon the approach of the allies, retreated to Coningſmacheren. As the time was very precious, on account of the great ſcarcity of forage, for want of which the Engliſh and Dutch army could not long ſubſiſt between the Moſelle and the Saar, he ſent frequent expreſſes to quicken the march of the Imperialiſts; but neither his remonſtrances, nor thoſe of the deputies of the States, had any effect. It is true, ſome few imperial troops were detached from Lauterburg for the Moſelle; but they would march their own way, that is, ſo ſlowly, that inſtead of being on the banks of the Saar on the ninth or tenth of June at the fartheſt, they did not arrive till the twentieth, and there were neither horſes nor artillery provided. Prince Lewis of Baden, who had promiſed to join the duke in perſon, came indeed as far as Creutznach; but then, under a pretence of being taken ill, he went to the baths at Swalbach, leaving the command of the imperial troops to the count de Frize. The prince was ſtrongly ſuſpected of treachery; but it is more probable that the motives of his conduct proceeded from envy of the duke, whoſe military reputation had now eclipſed that of all the other commanders.

While our general met with ſuch a mortifying diſappointment on the Moſelle, the French did not fail to avail themſelves of their ſuperiority in the Netherlands, where monſieur d' Auverquerque was in no condition to oppoſe their progreſs; they inveſted Huy, and carried on their attacks with ſuch vigour, that in leſs than fourteen days the garriſon was obliged to ſurrender themſelves priſoners of war. Fluſhed with ſucceſs, and encouraged by the abſence of the duke of Marlborough, the elector of Bavaria and marſhal Villeroy undertook the reduction of Liege, and actually began to raiſe batteries before the citadel. When this diſagreeable news reached the allied army, the deputies of the States repreſented to the duke of Marlborough, "that it was impoſſible to ſubſiſt them any longer where they then were; that the Germans having, by their delays, rendered the beſieging of Saar Louis impracticable, and defeated all the projects for a campaign on the Moſelle, it was to no purpoſe to continue any longer in thoſe parts, when their forces might be better employed in the Netherlands for ſtopping the progreſs of the enemy." The duke was but too ſenſible of the truth of this repreſentation, but being willing to remain till the laſt extremity, he did not decamp till the ſeventeenth of June, by which time he found all his hopes vaniſhed; he then marched for the Netherlands by the ſhorteſt way, and the imperial troops, the Pruſſians, and the Wirtembergers, moved towards the Upper Rhine. Marſhal Villars having now no enemy to dread, ſent a detachment to reinforce the elector of Bavaria, and another for the army of marſhal Marſin in Alſace, and advanced with the reſt towards Triers, which the Palatine general abandoned in a moſt diſhonourable manner to the enemy. After which, Villars marched to join monſieur Marſin, and both together drove the Imperialiſts from the lines of Croon Weiſſenburg; and general Thungen could with difficulty maintain himſelf in the lines of Lauterburg.

In the mean while, the duke of Marlborough proſecuted his march with ſo much expedition, that he ſaved Liege; for the enemy, upon the advice of his approach, ſent back their artillery to Namur, and retired in great precipitation to Tongeren. On the other hand, the duke puſhing his ſucceſs, retook Huy, and ſoon made the enemy retire behind their lines, which the duke reſolved to force. The French were poſted along their lines, with near one hundred battalions, and one hundred and forty-ſix ſquadrons. The force of the allies was nearly equal, they having ninety-five battalions, and one hundred and fifty-nine ſquadrons. In order to divide the enemy, it was reſolved to make a falſe motion; and accordingly the army under monſieur d'Auverquerque decamped from Vignamont on the ſeventeenth of July, in the morning, and marched towards Burdine on the other ſide the Mehaigne. Marlborough at the ſame time made a motion as if he intended to ſupport Auverquerque in the attack of the lines about Meſſelin, which was the weakeſt part of them. This feint had the deſired ſucceſs; for the French ſent off large detachments to thoſe parts where they apprehended the greateſt danger; by which they left thoſe on which the duke had a real deſign in a very weak condition. The duke ſaw with pleaſure the enemy give ſo readily into the ſnare he had prepared for them, and the ſame night put his army in march, which was joined by that of M. d'Auverquerque, his army having repaſſed the Mehaigne; and both proceeded with all poſſible expedition to ſupport a detachment which was ordered to attack the enemy's lines about Heyliſhem. The deſign was ſo ſecret, and ſo ſudden in the execution, that the enemy knew nothing of it; and this being the ſtrongeſt part of their lines, was leſs ſuſpected than any other.

The confederate troops paſſed the lines with very little oppoſition, but were afterwards attacked by twenty four ſquadrons of Bavarian horſe, and twenty battalions. This occaſioned a ſharp diſpute; but the horſe and dragoons of the right wing defeated them, and the enemy at length fairly betook themſelves to flight, leaving their ſtandards, colours, and cannon, behind them. All the troops behaved to admiration; and amongſt the horſe the regiment of brigadier Cadogan diſtinguiſhed themſelves, having had the honour to charge firſt: they defeated four ſquadrons of Bavarian guards, drove them through two battalions of their own foot, and took four ſtandards. In this action the confederates took the marquis d'Alegre, and the count de Horne, lieutenant-generals, priſoners; with one major-general, two brigadier-generals, and ſeventy-four other officers. The army marched the ſame day before noon to Tirlemont, the French decamping in our ſight, and paſſed the Geete, breaking down their bridges with ſuch precipitation, that they left fourteen or fifteen hundred men on this ſide, who were taken priſoners, with the battalion of Montluc in Tirlemont. There was little of moment performed the reſt of the campaign in the Netherlands, the Dutch deputies refuſing to concur with a propoſal made by the duke of Marlborough and monſieur Auverquerque, to paſs the river Yſch and attack the French, who had poſſeſſed themſelves of the ſtrong camp of Parck, extending their army in ſuch manner as to cover Bruſſels and Louvain. The duke was not a little chagrined at this timid conduct in the deputies, and wrote an expoſtulatory letter to the States-general on the ſubject, which being made public, occaſioned great uneaſineſs among our own people at home, who foreſaw that ſuch dilatory proceedings would infallibly ſpin out the war to a great length.

About the latter end of October the duke of Marlborough, in conſequence of an invitation from the new emperor Joſeph, ſet out for Vienna, where he was treated with great reſpect, and concerted with his imperial majeſty the operations of the enſuing campaign. After viſiting the courts of Berlin and Hanover he repaired to the Hague, where the States-general, in order to compenſate for the diſguſt their deputies had given him by their over-caution, agreed to furniſh an additional number of ten thouſand men, as a reinforcement to the army of prince Eugene in Italy. After this his grace took his leave of their High Mightineſſes, and embarking for England, arrived at St. James's on the thirtieth of December *.

With regard to the proceedings of the army on the Upper Rhine, the Imperialiſts did not take the field till Auguſt, when prince Lewis of Baden, now recovered from his indiſpoſition, arrived in the camp at Stolhoffen. Marſhal Villars had a little before paſſed the Rhine at Straſburg, which obliged general Thungen to do the like with the Imperialiſts. Prince Lewis having taken a review of the army, reſolved to advance and attack Villars, but the latter thought proper to retreat; and the French abandoned Haguenau, and ſome other places of no great importance. After which the Germans formed the blockade of Fort Lewis, and thus the campaign ended on that ſide, without any conſiderable action.

In Italy prince Eugene made ſeveral attempts to join the duke of Savoy this campaign, but was not able to effect it, through the vigilance and attention of the duke of Vendoſme. At length his royal highneſs, underſtanding that the duke of Savoy was reduced to the greateſt diſtreſs, having now but a ſmall army of twelve thouſand men, and no conſiderable territories left, and that even Turin, his capital city, was threatened with a ſiege, reſolved to make a bold puſh to get to his aſſiſtance. Accordingly, he tried to divide the French army, by ſending a ſtrong detachment towards the Adda: the ſcheme took. The duke of Vendoſme immediately marched with good part of his troops to watch the motions of this detachment, while prince Eugene in the mean time advanced to attack the body commanded by the grand prior; but Vendoſme having notice of his deſign before he had marched to too great a diſtance, returned and joined his brother; whereupon there happened a ſharp engagement near Caſſano, on the ſixteenth of Auguſt, in which great numbers were killed and wounded on both ſides, and both ſides ſung Te Deum for the victory. The French boaſted they had gained their point in hindering the conjunction of prince Eugene with the duke of Savoy; and prince Eugene thought he had great reaſon to be ſatisfied for having prevented the ſiege of Turin this campaign; and having left the command of the army to count Raventlau, he returned to Vienna to ſollicit further reinforcements †.

Things in Portugal were but badly managed laſt year. This year the confederates under the earl of Galway had ſome ſucceſs, but not equal to what was expected. The Portugueze, with their allies the Engliſh and Dutch, marched to the frontiers of Spain; and meeting with no enemy in the field on that ſide (the vigorous defence of Gibraltar by the prince of Heſſe, of which I have already taken notice, having obliged the French and Spaniards to draw moſt of their forces that way) they laid ſiege in the beginning of May to the town of Valencia d'Alcantara, in the province of Alentejo, which in a ſhort time they carried by ſtorm. The garriſon of Albuquerque, another town of no great ſtrength, fearing the ſame fate, ſurrendered on the twenty-ſecond of the ſame month, on articles. Several councils were afterwards held to ſettle the operations for the reſt of the campaign, when the earl of Galway and general Fagel propoſed laying ſiege to Bajadox; but that being a town better fortified than either of the former, and having a garriſon of nine or ten battalions to defend it, and the Portugueze moreover declaring they wanted the neceſſary requiſites for forming the ſiege, that deſign was laid aſide for the preſent, and about the latter end of June the army was ſent into quarters of refreſhment.

In the mean time, however, the marquis das Minas, who commanded a ſeparate army of Portugueze in the province of Beyra, attacked the town of Salvaterra, in which was a garriſon of three hundred and ſixty men, who ſurrendered priſoners at diſcretion. The marquis afterwards plundered and burnt Sarca; but receiving intelligence that a ſtrong body of French and Spaniards were in full march towards him, he thought proper to retire to Penamacos. As ſoon as the ſummer heats were pretty well abated, the earl of Galway again renewed his inſtances to form the ſiege of Bajadox, which after much delay, and many frivolous excuſes, on the part of the Portugueze (who from the beginning never appeared to act heartily in the cauſe of the allies) was agreed to, and about the latter end of September the army marched towards that place, and opened the trenches on the fourth of October; and the ſiege was carried on with ſuch vigour, that the reduction of the town was looked upon as certain: but the enterprize miſcarried by an unforeſeen accident. The earl of Galway being one day in the trenches, buſied in giving the neceſſary orders, a cannon-ball carried away his right arm, and he was obliged to be moved off the field; ſo that the conduct of the ſiege was left to general Fagel, who is ſaid not to have carried it on with that vigour which the Engliſh general had done, and by that means gave time to the marquis de Theſſe to throw a relief of one thouſand men into Bajadox; and then the confederates abandoned the enterprize, and marched their troops into winter-quarters. The earl of Galway had the conſolation to receive letters from the queen his miſtreſs, and from the king of Portugal, condoling with him on his misfortune, and expreſſing their entire ſatisfaction in his conduct previous to that unhappy accident ‡.

The diſappointment the arms of the allies ſuſtained in Portugal was, however, in ſome meaſure, made up by king Charles's ſucceſs in Catalonia, and the reduction of Barcelona by the celebrated earl of Peterborough and ſir Cloudeſley Shovel, who in the latter end of May ſailed for St. Helen's with the Engliſh fleet, having on board a body of five thouſand land-forces; and on the twentieth day of June arrived in Liſbon harbour, where they were reinforced by ſir John Leake from the Mediterranean, and the Dutch admirals Allemonde and Vanderduſſen. King Charles having received aſſurances that the inhabitants of Catalonia and Valencia were well affected to his intereſt, reſolved to repair into thoſe quarters, and undertake ſome actions of importance. Accordingly, having ſent to the prince of Heſſe d'Armſtadt to get the garriſon of Gibraltar in readineſs to embark, he went on board the Engliſh admiral's ſhip, with the earl of Peterborough and other officers of diſtinction; and the fleet ſailed on the twenty-eighth day of July, the earl of Galway having ſupplied them with two regiments of Engliſh dragoons, and in a few days arrived in the bay of Gibraltar, the ruins of which place preſented a melancholy, but uncontrovertible proof of the great courage, induſtry, and indefatigable care, wherewith the gallant prince of d'Armſtadt, and the brave officers and ſoldiers under him, had defended it againſt the united forces of France and Caſtile; a defence ſo glorious and honourable, as hardly to be paralleled either in antient or modern hiſtory! Here the prince of Heſſe came on board, and with him the Engliſh guards and three old regiments; in lieu of which two new-raiſed battalions were left in the garriſon.

On the eleventh of Auguſt the fleet put into the bay of Altea * to water, when the earl of Peterborough publiſhed a manifeſto, importing, "That he was not come to take poſſeſſion of any place in the name of her Britannic majeſty or of the States-general, but to maintain the juſt right of the houſe of Auſtria to the Spaniſh crown; to defend the good and loyal ſubjects of that monarchy; and to free them from the inſupportable yoke of foreign maſters †." Encouraged by this declaration, the inhabitants flocked from all quarters, acknowleging Charles III. as their lawful ſovereign, and ſeized the town of Denia, not far from Altea, for his ſervice, whither his Catholic majeſty immediately ſent a garriſon of four hundred Portugueze, under the command of general Ramos. The fleet then ſailed from Altea bay about the middle of Auguſt, and arrived in the bay of Barcelona on the twenty-ſecond of the ſame month, about nine o'clock in the morning.

This city, the capital of Catalonia, is one of the moſt antient in Spain, having been a colony of the Carthaginians, built by them to ſtop the impetuous torrent of the Romans who came from Italy, and after they had ſubjected Gallia Narbonenſis, were endeavouring to make themſelves maſters of Spain. It is ſituated in a plain near the ſea, having a mole within, which only gallies and ſmall ſhips can enter. The entrance into it has a platform with ſome guns mounted for its defence, and a light-houſe, being a tower built in the form of a pyramid, with a lanthorn at the top. It is fortified round with ten bulwarks and ſome old towers. Its ditch in ſome parts is not very deep, and the covered way is not quite finiſhed. The caſtle and citadel, which is called Montjuic, is built upon a hill on the weſt ſide. It commands the city, without being commanded itſelf by any ground thereabouts. The country along that coaſt is level, very fruitful, and well cultivated, being watered by many rivers and rills, which run down from the neighbouring mountains; for at about a league's diſtance from the ſea the land begins to riſe, and ſhapes itſelf into ſeveral hills and mountains, one above another, in the form of a theatre, all full of villages and towns, vineyards and country ſeats, which make a very agreeable proſpect all along the ſea-coaſt for a great way together.

As ſoon as the fleet had anchored, the enemy began to fire from the mole and a battery near the ſea, upon ſome of the tranſport ſhips which ſtood in for the ſhore; but this firing had but very little effect, and the tranſports all anchored in ſuch a manner as they found moſt commodious for the landing of the forces aboard them. The wind however blew ſo hard, and made ſo great a ſea, that notwithſtanding all the diligence that could be uſed, it was impoſſible for them to get on ſhore that day. The day following, however, the wind and ſea being down, the debarkation of the troops began, about three quarters of a league from the city, near a river called Baſſoz, which lies on the eaſt ſide, between the town and a place called Badalona. By the twenty-eighth the landing was completed, and the troops poſſeſſed of a ſtrong camp, being extremely well received by the inhabitants of the neighbouring villages, who were ſtrongly attached to the houſe of Auſtria.

Upon the arrival of the fleet, Don Franciſco de Velaſco, viceroy of Catalonia, gave orders for burning all the ſtraw and forage in the country and villages for a league round Barcelona: but notwithſtanding all his precaution, there remained enough for all the horſe the fleet had brought. The prince of Heſſe having been diſpatched with two frigates to enquire into the poſture of affairs on the coaſt, and of the ſtrength of the city, his highneſs put into Mataro, four leagues diſtant from Barcelona, where having informed himſelf of what he judged neceſſary, and adviſed the people thereabouts, who had declared for king Charles, to come down, he returned to the fleet, with information that the inhabitants of Barcelona were warmly in the intereſt of his Catholic majeſty; but that they were overawed by a garriſon of five thouſand men, commanded by Velaſco, the duke of Popoli, and other officers who had eſpouſed the cauſe of Philip.

On the twenty-ſeventh a council of war was held on board the admiral, and his Catholic majeſty reſolved to go on ſhore the day following, to encourage the expedition by his preſence. Accordingly his majeſty landed on the twenty-eighth, amidſt the acclamations of an infinite multitude from Vich, and other parts of the adjacent country, who, with repeated cries of "Long live the King!" came to the water-ſide, threw themſelves at his majeſty's feet, and kiſſed his hand, with a thouſand demonſtrations of joy; inſomuch that Charles found it a difficult matter to diſengage himſelf from their boiſterous loyalty; but having at length mounted on horſeback, he rode to the camp, where the forces were all drawn up in a line to receive him; and when his majeſty arrived at his quarters, he was ſaluted with a treble diſcharge of cannon and ſmall arms.

Here the confederate fleet, during the firſt part of the war with Spain, in the reign of queen Anne, had frequent ſupplies of freſh water and proviſions till the fatal battle of Almanza in 1707. It is ſituated forty-five miles ſouth of the city of Valencia.

Some days after his Catholic majeſty had landed, an expreſs arrived from England, directing the earl of Peterborough, the general, to proceed to Italy, and endeavour to join the duke of Savoy with his troops, or to make an attempt upon Naples and Sicily, as ſhould be found moſt adviſeable, in order to drive the French out of Italy, and ſet his royal highneſs at liberty to employ his forces another way. Theſe orders gave inexpreſſible uneaſineſs to king Charles: he preſſed lord Peterborough in the moſt earneſt manner not to abandon him, when there appeared ſuch a proſpect of ſucceſs in carrying on the war in Spain; adding at the ſame time with great warmth, that if his lordſhip (who ſeemed diſpoſed to comply with the orders he had received) ſhould perſiſt in his reſolution to go away, his majeſty, finding that his crown and good ſubjects were to be thus ſacrificed, was reſolved to ſtay with them, and ſhare the event of his good or evil fortune. Upon this ſeveral councils of war were called, wherein it was deliberated, whether or not to proceed to the ſiege of Barcelona. The opinions of the members were various: lord Peterborough did indeed twice give his vote for the undertaking; but from the minutes of thoſe councils it appeared to be only out of the extreme inclination he had to comply with the king of Spain's deſires, and not out of any confidence he had of ſucceeding. At length the prince of Heſſe propoſed to the earl the ſcheme of ſurpriſing the fort of Montjuic, and deſired that his lordſhip would give him only one thouſand men for that purpoſe, offering himſelf to conduct and command them. The earl having taken a view of that fort, and of the town on that ſide; and having maturely weighed his highneſs's reaſons, and conſidered the manner in which he intended to proceed in the attack; not only concurred with the prince and readily granted him the one thouſand men he deſired, but likewiſe reſolved to ſupport his highneſs with one thouſand more, and ſome dragoons *.

Accordingly a detachment of two thouſand men, ſupported by the dragoons, and furniſhed with ſcaling-ladders, and all other materials for a ſudden aſſault, began their march the fourteenth of September, at ſix in the evening, led by the brave prince of Heſſe; but being obliged to go a conſiderable way about, and the roads they had to paſs through being very bad, they did not arrive at the foot of the hill on which fort Montjuic is ſituated, till day had began to break; whereupon the alarm was given to thoſe in the caſtle and town, who received our troops with a general diſcharge of their artillery and ſmall arms: notwithſtanding which the prince preſſed forward, and the troops entered the covered way and ditch ſword in hand, ſome of them getting upon the out-works that were unfiniſhed, and, maugre the continual fire of the enemy, poſſeſſed themſelves of the baſtion of a new fortification, beat the Spaniards out of it, and obliged them to retire into the caſtle: but the prince of Heſſe expoſing his perſon too much, in order to make himſelf maſter of a poſt that would cut off the communication between the town and the fort, was unfortunately ſhot through the thigh with a muſket-ball that tore an artery, by which he loſt a great quantity of blood; and after marching about fifty paces, animating the men, as if he had known nothing of his being wounded, he fell down through weakneſs, and was carried to a little houſe that ſtood near the place; but before the ſurgeons, who were immediately called, could come to look at his wound, he expired, to the inexpreſſible grief of every one who had a true ſenſe of his great military abilities. The ſoldiers, who had a kind of enthuſiaſtical confidence in the prince, were ſtruck with an inſurmountable damp upon the news of his untimely fall. Their deſpondency was ſtill farther encreaſed upon ſeeing the marquis of Riſburg march out of Barcelona, at the head of a large body of troops, to ſuccour the line of communication, and reinforce the citadel. All was now upon the point of falling into confuſion on our ſide, when lord Peterborough, hearing of the prince's death, advanced, and took upon him the command (for hitherto he had only ſerved as a volunteer in this enterprize) and by his preſence re-animated the drooping ſpirits of the ſoldiers, and perſuaded them to maintain their ground; and being reinforced with freſh bodies of troops, the earl attacked the fort, tho' with no great proſpect of ſucceſs; the governor, a Neapolitan gentleman, named Don Carlos Caracholi, continuing to defend it very reſolutely, till the ſeventeenth of September, when a bomb from one of our batteries falling into the magazine of powder, blew it up, by which the governor and ſome of the beſt officers, and a number of men, were killed. This ſtruck the reſt with ſuch conſternation, that they were unable to make any farther reſiſtance. The earl of Peterborough advancing to ſtorm the place, through a breach made in part of the wall and gate by the exploſion, they ſurrendered at diſcretion.

This poſt of Montjuic was of the utmoſt importance, for it commanded the city, being upon an eminence; and beſides, the fortifications of the town on that ſide were weakeſt. This induced the earl to make immediate diſpoſitions for bombarding Barcelona; the trenches were accordingly opened before it on the 19th of September, and the batteries erected, with the help of the Miquelets or militia of Catalonia and our own ſeamen; and the fleet from the road thundered with ſuch fury upon the town, and did ſuch terrible execution, that in a few days the governor, deſpairing of relief, thought fit to capitulate, and ſurrendered on the fourth of October. The next day the earl of Peterborough ordered a detachment of the army to take poſſeſſion of one of the gates. The ſame day Gironne declared for king Charles, as did all the reſt of Catalonia, except Roſes *.

The king of Spain having made his entry into Barcelona, and received the oath of fidelity from his ſubjects, a council of war was aſſembled a few days afterwards, wherein it was reſolved that ſir Cloudeſley Shovel ſhould proceed for England with the beſt part of the fleet: that ſir John Leake, with a ſtrong ſquadron, ſhould be left in the Mediterranean: that ſix ſhips ſhould remain with the earl of Peterborough; two more be ſtationed at Gibraltar; and a third and fourth-rate be employed, at the requeſt of his Portugueze majeſty, in cruizing for the homeward-bound Brazil fleet. In purſuance of thoſe reſolutions, ſir Cloudeſley Shovel, with 19 ſhips of the line, and part of the Dutch fleet, ſailed through the Streights, and arrived at Spithead on the ſixteenth of November *.

The garriſon of Barcelona, all but one thouſand men, who, with Velaſco the late governor, were conveyed to Malaga, inliſted in the ſervice of Charles, who formed from among them a body of guards, and ſix other regiments were raiſed by the ſtates of Catalonia. The Condé di Cifuentes, at the head of the Miquelets and Catalonians who were in the intereſt of the houſe of Auſtria, ſecured Tarragona, Tortoſa, Lerida, San Mattheo, and other places. At the ſame time Don Raphael Nebat, a Catalonian general, who had already three brothers in the ſervice of Charles, deſerted Philip, with his whole regiment of five hundred horſe; and joining general Ramos at Denia, they made themſelves maſters of Xabia, Oliva, Gandia, and Alſira, in Valencia. Encouraged by ſuch great ſucceſſes, they advanced to the capital of that kingdom, which bears the ſame name ‡: this they took by the aſſiſtance of the inhabitants, and in it the marquis de Villa Garcia, the viceroy, and the archbiſhop; and thereupon the whole kingdom of Valencia, except Alicant and Perſinſola, revolted to king Charles, who appointed the conde di Cifuentes his viceroy of that province; and had the Portugueze made any diverſion, as they promiſed, or but permitted their allies, the Engliſh and Dutch, to have advanced to the Spaniſh frontiers at this time, it is not improbable but all Spain had ſubmitted to Charles; but their unaccountable dilatorineſs, not to give it a worſe term, furniſhed the enemy with an opportunity to ſend a body of ſix thouſand men into the kingdom of Valencia, under the command of the conde de las Torres, who forthwith inveſted San Mattheo, guarded by colonel Jones, at the head of five hundred Miquelets only. This being a place of great importance on account of its ſituation, the earl of Peterborough marched thither with one thouſand infantry and two hundred dragoons, and by means of feigned intelligence artfully conveyed to the conde, induced that general to abandon the ſiege with precipitation, in the apprehenſion of being ſuddenly attacked by a conſiderable army. The earl having ſo effectually atchieved this important enterprize, poſſeſſed himſelf of Nules and Molviedro (the ancient Saguntum), and then having nothing to interrupt his progreſs, he marched to Valencia, where he was received by the inhabitants in general as their guardian angel and deliverer. Indeed the generous behaviour of the earl to the natives, his care to protect them, and the ſtrict diſcipline he kept among his troops had ſo conciliated the minds of the Spaniards to the Engliſh, that the diſorders at Port St. Mary's were entirely forgot, and they appeared ready to join the allies, and run all hazards with them, to drive the French and their adherents out of the kingdom.

Our affairs at ſea were more proſperous this year than they had been formerly. Beſides the great things done in the Mediterranean in the beginning of the ſeaſon by admiral Leake, who defeated monſieur de Pointis' ſquadron, and thereby relieved Gibraltar; Sir George Byng, ſent with a ſmall ſquadron into the Soundings, took a French ſhip of forty guns, together with twelve privateers, and ſeven rich Weſt India ſhips. Our other cruizers alſo picked up ſo many of the French privateers, that we had ſome thouſands of their ſeamen in our priſons; and ſuch a good look-out was kept off Breſt, that the French fleet did not think fit to venture forth. By this means our navigation was rendered much more ſafe, and our trade conſequently more proſperous; but as it would be unpardonable in an hiſtorian who makes claim to impartiality not to mention our loſſes as well as our ſucceſſes, I muſt not paſs by unnoticed a misfortune that attended the Engliſh arms by ſea in the courſe of this year, I mean the capture of the Baltic fleet homeward-bound, with their convoy of three ſhips of war, which were taken by the Dunkirk ſquadron, commanded by the count de St. Paul, though he himſelf was killed in the engagement.

The endeavours uſed by the Engliſh and Dutch envoys at the court of Vienna, to accommodate matters between the emperor and his rebellious ſubjects in Hungary, having had no effect, that kingdom continued to be a ſcene of confuſion and plunder.

Poland was in no better condition. Charles XII. of Sweden, who ſtill maintained his army by contributions in that country, had preſented to the diet at Warſaw young Staniſlaus Leczinſki, palatine of Poſnania, as a perſon proper to be their king: the intimation of a conqueror has the force of a law. The diet, unable to reſiſt, acquieſced in his propoſal. Staniſlaus was elected and proclaimed king, and recognized by Charles; while Auguſtus, unable to maintain his footing in Poland, retreated into his Saxon dominions, which he impoveriſhed in order to raiſe a great army to return into Poland. The pope eſpouſed the cauſe of Auguſtus, and cited the cardinal-primate to appear at Rome, to give an account of the ſhare he had in the Poliſh troubles. The old cardinal however refuſed to go to Rome: he owned Staniſlaus, but died before his coronation; and that ceremony was performed by the biſhop of Cujavia, in the preſence of Charles, on the fourth of October, 1705, in the city of Warſaw, notwithſtanding the uſual cuſtom of the Poles crowning their kings at Cracow.

* Burchet. Lives of Admirals. Oldmixon, &c.

‡ Valencia is the capital of the province of the ſame name, on the river Turio. It ſtands in a very fruitful country, abounding with corn, wine, oil, fruits, &c. The inhabitants amount to fifteen thouſand families. It is the ſee of an archbiſhop, and has an univerſity. The city is abundantly ſupplied with water, not only from the river which runs along it, but by an incredible number of deep wells, dug almoſt in every houſe. Trade and manufactures flouriſh here,; the principal of the latter is that of ſilk, which the women and children ſpin before their houſes. They export large quantities of wine, oil, and fruit; and the inhabitants have an eaſy and agreeable converſation, without any of that ſtiffneſs obſervable in the reſt of Spain. It lies one hundred and eighty miles ſouth-eaſt of Madrid.

While Charles was thus intent upon the ruin of Auguſtus, he neglected the preſervation of his own dominions. Peter, czar of Muſcovy, was every day becoming more formidable. Though he had given but little aſſiſtance to Auguſtus in Poland, he had nevertheleſs made powerful diverſions elſewhere. He now began to grow not only a good ſoldier himſelf, but likewiſe inſtructed his ſoldiery in the art of war: diſcipline was eſtabliſhed among his troops, and he underſtood the great ſecret of ſubſiſting his armies. He had beſides formed a reſpectable navy, capable of making head againſt the Swedes in the Baltic. Strengthened by theſe advantages, and by the abſence of the king of Sweden, he took Narva by aſſault, ravaged all Livonia, and made incurſions even into Sweden ‖.

Peter, however, aſpired to a nobler character than that of a deſtroyer of towns: he employed himſelf in laying the foundation of a great city in the midſt of his military toils: this was the city of Peterſburgh, which he afterwards made the place of his reſidence, and the center of his kingdom's trade. It is ſituated between Finland and Ingria, in a marſhy iſland, round which the river Neva throws ſeveral branches before it falls into the Gulph of Finland. He himſelf drew the plan of the city, the fortreſs, and the harbour, with the quays which embelliſh it, and the forts that defend its entrance. This deſert and uncultivated iſland, which, during the ſhort ſummer in theſe climates, was only a heap of mud, and in winter a frozen pool, into which there was no entry by land but through pathleſs foreſts and deep moraſſes, and which had hitherto been the haunt of wolves and bears, was, by an amazing perſeverance, made habitable, amidſt the obſtacles which nature, the genius of the people, and an unſucceſsful war, conſpired to raiſe againſt it. Peterſburgh was become a reputable city in 1705, and its harbour was filled with ſhips. The emperor, by a proper diſtribution of favours, drew many foreigners thither, beſtowing lands upon ſome, houſes upon others, and encouraging all the artiſts that came, to civilize this barbarous climate. Above all, he rendered it proof againſt the utmoſt efforts of his enemies. The Swediſh generals, who frequently beat his troops in every other quarter, were never able to hurt his infant colony. It enjoyed a profound tranquillity in the midſt of the war with which it was ſurrounded §.

I ſhall now return to England, where the Whigs carried all before them, and got poſſeſſion of all places and preferments. On the 13th of October the ſeals were taken from ſir Nathan Wright, and William Cowper, eſq. a great patron of the diſſenters, was made lord keeper in his room, and was ſoon after made lord-chancellor. It muſt be acknowleged, that lord Cowper was ſo eminent for his abilities and integrity, that he brought a new credit to the Whig party in the nation. The earl of Abingdon was about the ſame time removed from his place of conſtable of the Tower and lord-lieutenant of Oxfordſhire. Some other changes of leſs note were alſo made, all of them having the ſame tendency.

On the twenty-fifth of October the new parliament met, when a violent conteſt aroſe about the choice of another ſpeaker. The candidates were Mr. Bromley and Mr. Smith; the former ſupported by the Tories, the latter by the Whigs, who carried their point by a majority of forty voices; upon which Mr. Smith was preſented to, and approved by her majeſty on the twenty-ſeventh, when ſhe made a ſpeech to both houſes, in which ſhe repreſented the neceſſity of acting vigorouſly againſt France, as the common enemy to the liberties of Europe. She recommended the fortitude of the duke of Savoy, which, ſhe ſaid, was without example, and merited all their endeavours to encourage him to perſevere in the ſame conduct. She acquainted them, that ſhe had an intention to expedite commiſſions for treating of an union with Scotland: ſhe earneſtly recommended unanimity and brotherly affection among her people: ſhe obſerved, that ſome perſons had endeavoured to foment animoſities, and even ſuggeſted in print that the eſtabliſhed church was in danger. Such people, ſhe ſaid, were enemies to her and to the kingdom, and meant only to cover deſigns which they durſt not publicly avow, by endeavouring to diſtract the nation with unmeaſurable and groundleſs diſtruſts and jealouſies. She declared, ſhe would always affectionately ſupport and countenance the church of England, as by law eſtabliſhed; that ſhe would inviolably maintain the toleration; that ſhe would promote religion and virtue, encourage trade, and every thing elſe that might make them a happy and a flouriſhing people; "And they who ſhall concur zealouſly with me (concluded ſhe) in carrying on theſe good deſigns, ſhall be ſure of my kindneſs and favour."

This ſpeech, which was a very long one, and ſuppoſed to be drawn up by the new lord-keeper, was extremely pleaſing to the majority of the parliament, and both houſes preſented addreſſes fraught with the warmeſt expreſſions of duty and affection; and the commons in particular preſented a ſecond on the thirteenth of November, in which they return her thanks for her great care and endeavours to ſettle the ſucceſſion to the Scottiſh crown in the houſe of Hanover, and promoting the union of the two kingdoms, aſſuring her no endeavours ſhould be wanting on their part to aſſiſt her in perfecting ſo ſalutary a work. They at the ſame time requeſt that her majeſty will be pleaſed to direct that the whole of the proceedings of the late ſeſſion of parliament in Scotland, relating to the union and the ſucceſſion, might be laid before the houſe. The lords had made the like requeſt the day before: the queen anſwered both houſes, that ſhe would comply with what they deſired ¶.

The lower houſe having diſcuſſed and decided ſome controverted elections (which is the firſt buſineſs the commons generally enter upon) proceeded to examine the eſtimate for the ſervice of the enſuing year, and readily voted the neceſſary ſupplies.

The moſt important debates in this ſeſſion began in the houſe of lords, her majeſty being preſent at all of them. On the fifteenth of November, while that houſe was upon the ſtate of the nation, the lord Haverſham, an active man among the Tories, made a long ſpeech, in which he reflected with great freedom on the conduct of the duke of Marlborough, both on the Moſelle and in Brabant; as alſo on the behaviour of the Dutch, who prevented the duke's engaging the French after he had forced their lines. Having occaſion to ſpeak of the decay of our trade, he ſaid, "There was a word we were very fond of, which we called the Balance of Power: but the Dutch, who were a very wiſe people, had a double view, and took as much care of the balance of trade as they did of the balance of power, and were as much afraid of our power by ſea as the power of France by land." Trade, he obſerved, begets wealth, and wealth begets power; and he thought it was very hard for England, that while the Dutch lived at peace under the protection of our arms, we, if we would have any part of trade with them, muſt have it under the protection of French paſſes: that the Dutch indeed complained they were very poor, but he did not ſee how they had been any thing out of pocket ſince the war; for they had more by remittances from England than all the money that went out of their country to Portugal, Savoy, and the German princes †."

But the principal deſign of this ſpeech appears to be the inviting over the princeſs Sophia; and therefore he concluded with a motion, That an addreſs might be preſented to her majeſty, to invite over the preſumptive heir of the crown to reſide here. This motion was ſtrongly ſupported by the duke of Buckingham, the earls of Rocheſter, Nottingham, and Ayleſbury, who urged, that there was no method could be more effectual for ſecuring the ſucceſſion than that of the ſucceſſor being upon the ſpot, ready to aſſume and maintain his right againſt any pretender whatſoever, as it appeared, from the whole courſe of the Engliſh hiſtory, that when the throne became vacant, the firſt comer had always ſucceeded in his pretenſions. This propoſal, however, was warmly oppoſed by the Whigs, who knew it was ſo diſagreeable to the queen, that ſhe would never give her conſent. In fine, the queſtion being put, Whether to approve of the motion? it was carried in the negative by a great majority: however, the lords thought fit, on the motion of lord Wharton, to bring in a bill for the further ſecurity of the Hanover ſucceſſion, and the peace of the kingdom, in caſe of her majeſty's deceaſe. This bill provided that a regency ſhould be appointed, to be compoſed of the ſeven perſons who ſhould poſſeſs for the time being the offices of archbiſhop of Canterbury, lord-chancellor or lord-keeper, lord-treaſurer, lord-preſident, lord privy-ſeal, lord high-admiral, and lord chief-juſtice of the Queen's-Bench: that their buſineſs ſhould be to proclaim the next ſucceſſor through the kingdoms of England and Ireland, and join with a certain number of perſons named as regents by the ſucceſſor, in three liſts to be ſealed up and depoſited with the archbiſhop of Canterbury, the lord-keeper, and miniſter reſidentiary of Hanover: that theſe joint regents ſhould conduct the adminiſtration, till the ſucceſſor ſhould arrive or ſend further orders: and that the laſt parliament, even though diſſolved, ſhould re-aſſemble, and continue ſitting for ſix months after the death of her majeſty.

The bill met with a warm oppoſition from the Tories in the lower houſe, and ſeveral of the upper houſe entered their proteſts againſt it: nor were there wanting ſome of the Whig party in the houſe of commons who endeavoured to obſtruct it, from a perſuaſion that the princeſs Sophia was really deſirous to reſide in England. Great exceptions were taken to that clauſe in the bill, enacting that the laſt parliament ſhould be reaſſembled. The Tories obſerved hereupon that this was a plain contradiction to part of the act by which the ſucceſſion was originally ſettled; for, among other limitations, the parliament had provided, that when the crown ſhould devolve to the houſe of Hanover, no one who had either place or penſion ſhould be capable of ſitting in the houſe of commons. After long and puzzling debates, it was at laſt agreed that a certain number of offices ſhould be particularly ſpecified as non-admiſſible into the houſe of commons on any condition. This ſelf-denying clauſe, and ſome other amendments, produced conferences between the two houſes, and at length the bill paſſed by their mutual aſſent, under the title of an Act of Regency; but it was not till the 19th of February; ſo induſtrious had the Tory party been in throwing obſtructions in the way, in order, if poſſible, to carry their point of bringing over the next ſucceſſor. The principal managers for the Tories on this occaſion were Mr. Bromley and ſir Thomas Hanmer. While this matter was in debate, the queen gave the royal aſſent to an act for exhibiting a bill to naturalize the princeſs Sophia and the iſſue of her body ‡.

The Tories tried their ſtrength in another point, in which however they found themſelves equally diſappointed. The duke of Marlborough had incurred the hatred of that party by deſerting them (who had certainly been the inſtruments of his firſt promotion) and joining with the Whigs: they reſolved therefore to ſet on foot a ſtrict enquiry into his conduct, in hopes of diſcovering ſome particulars that would be ſufficient to fix a ſtain upon his character, and effect his ruin. With this view a motion was made in the upper houſe ‖ by the lord Haverſham, That the miſcarriages of the laſt campaign ſhould be enquired into, and that an addreſs ſhould immediately be preſented to her majeſty, requeſting her to acquaint the houſe with whatever ſhe knew concerning thoſe tranſactions §. Fired with indignation at this concealed attack upon their darling general, the Whigs muſtered all their force, and the motion was rejected by a great majority. And now more effectually to triumph over their adverſaries, the two houſes preſented an addreſs to her majeſty, importing, that being juſtly alarmed by the many artifices lately employed by the emiſſaries of France, in order to raiſe jealouſies and miſunderſtandings between the allies, they moſt earneſtly beſought her majeſty to uſe all poſſible endeavours to preſerve a good correſpondence among the confederates, and in a particular manner to maintain and cultivate a ſtrict friendſhip with the States-general. However, as if conſcious of the great deficiencies of the allies in furniſhing their reſpective quotas, and properly concurring with us in the operations of the war; they at the ſame time deſired, that as her majeſty had ſet them a noble example, ſhe would uſe all proper means to excite the whole confederacy to make early and effectual preparations, and to exert their utmoſt efforts in the proſecution of the war. The commons in the mean while proceeded with great unanimity in providing proper funds for the ſupplies; and the queſtion being propoſed, Whether it ſhould be referred to the committee of ways and means to conſider, that in the clauſe for adding ten thouſand men to act in conjunction with the troops of the States-general, it ſhould be provided, That the Dutch be obliged to leave off trading with France? it was carried in the negative by a majority of one hundred and eighty-four againſt one hundred and ſeventeen. I have already animadverted upon the ſtrange partiality ſhewn in favour of the Dutch by the Whig party.

The Scottiſh parliament having declared that they would enter into no treaty of union with England, till the act by which they were declared aliens ſhould be finally reſcinded; in order to remove this obſtruction, the two houſes now concurred in repealing that act, as well as the taking off the ſeveral prohibitions and reſtrictions which had been laid upon the trade between the two nations.

On the twenty-fifth of November captain Norris, in the Britannia, with the lord Shannon and brigadier Stanhope, arrived at St. James's, with news of the ſucceſs of the allies in Catalonia. The queen hereupon went to the houſe of peers on the twenty-ſeventh, and in a ſpeech communicated to the lords and commons theſe good tidings; with which the commons were ſo pleaſed, that they forthwith granted two hundred and fifty thouſand pounds "for her majeſty's proportion in the expence of proſecuting the advantages already gained by king Charles III. for the recovery of the monarchy of Spain to the houſe of Auſtria *".

On the firſt of September this year a pamphlet called, The Memorial of the Church of England, had been preſented at the Old Bailey, and ordered to be burnt by the common hangman. It was a Tory production, and the deſign of it was to ſhew that the Whig miniſtry were contriving the deſtruction of the church of England, and countenanced its greateſt enemies. This pamphlet had been much read; and being wrote in a ſtyle well adapted to captivate the minds of the people, it had raiſed a great clamour that the church was expoſed to the moſt imminent danger: it was therefore reſolved by the miniſtry that an enquiry ſhould be made into the real foundation of this uneaſineſs; and accordingly the lord Halifax moved that a day might be appointed to enquire into "the danger of the church." Upon this the ſixth of December was appointed for that purpoſe: and on that day the queen repaired to the houſe of peers, in order to hear the reaſonings on this important ſubject.

The debate was opened by the earl of Rocheſter †, who, among other things, urged, That there was danger to be apprehended to the eſtabliſhed church, from theſe three cauſes: Firſt, the act of ſecurity in Scotland: Secondly, the heir of the houſe of Hanover not being ſent for over: Thirdly, the not paſſing the bill to prevent occaſional conformity. Upon the firſt, he ſaid, the preſbyterian church in Scotland was fully eſtabliſhed, without a toleration: that to arm that people was to give them a power to invade England, where they had a powerful party, who never wanted the will to deſtroy the church: that he thought the heir to the crown ought to be preſent amongſt us, in order to be fully acquainted with us and our conſtitution, and thereby enabled to prevent any evil deſigns upon the church and ſtate: with reſpect to the occaſional conformity-bill, he obſerved, that by rejecting that bill, which was in itſelf ſo reaſonable, and the church's requeſt in it ſo ſmall, the greateſt enemies to the church might qualify themſelves to hold offices of truſt and authority in church and ſtate, to the ruin of both.

The ſubſtance of this ſpeech was repeated and enlarged upon by ſeveral other peers of the ſame party, particularly the duke of Buckingham, the earl of Nottingham, the duke of Leeds, Compton biſhop of London, the archbiſhop of York, and the biſhop of St. Aſaph. Theſe were anſwered by lord Halifax, lord Wharton, Burnet biſhop of Saliſbury, the biſhop of Norwich, and others. The ſubſtance of their argument was, that the church was ſafer now than it ever had been. At the Revolution proviſion was made, that our king muſt be of the Reformed Religion: nor was this all; by the late act of ſucceſſion he was reſtricted to be of the communion of the church of England. In regard to the occaſional conformity-bill, it was anſwered, that the rejecting that bill could not with any propriety be brought as a matter of objection and blame, inaſmuch as it was done by a majority of the houſe, to whoſe deciſion the leſſer number were bound to ſubmit. It was aſked, If we had not all our laws left to us not only entire, but ſtrengthened by late additions and explanations; ſo that we were ſafer in theſe than we had been at any time formerly? As to the diſſenters, it was ſaid, they gained no new ſtrength: on the contrary, they were viſibly decreaſing; the toleration had conciliated their minds towards us, and they had given many recent inſtances of their care and zeal to preſerve the government. In reſpect to our clergy, the queen was taking all poſſible care to relieve them from the depreſſions of poverty, and a ſpirit of zeal and piety appeared in our churches, and at ſacrament, beyond the example of former times. In one reſpect, it was acknowleged that the church was in danger, and that was from an evil ſpirit and a virulent temper ſpread among the clergy, many of whom had raiſed factions in dioceſes againſt their biſhops: theſe, it was ſaid, were dangers created by the very men who now filled the nation with imaginary perils, while their own conduct produced real and threatening ones ‡.

Lord Somers recapitulated all the arguments which had been advanced on both ſides of the queſtion, and declared his own opinion to be, that the nation was happy under a wiſe and juſt adminiſtration; and that for men to raiſe groundleſs jealouſies at that juncture, could mean no leſs than an intention to embroil the people at home, and defeat the glorious deſigns of the allies to humble the arrogance of that reſtleſs enemy of this nation, Lewis of France.

In fine, the queſtion being put, Whether the church of England was in danger? it was carried in the negative by ſixty-one againſt thirty. Then the houſe reſolved, "That the church of England, as by law eſtabliſhed, which was reſcued from the extremeſt danger by king William III. of glorious memory, is now, by God's bleſſing, under the happy reign of her majeſty, in a moſt ſafe and flouriſhing condition; and whoever goes about to ſuggeſt and inſinuate that the church is in danger under her majeſty's adminiſtration, is an enemy to the queen, the church, and the kingdom *."

This reſolution was oppoſed by many lords, who entered their reaſons for diſſenting from it; but being communicated to the commons, that houſe, after ſome ſhort debates, concurred with the determination of the peers, and alſo joined with them in an addreſs to her majeſty to take effectual meaſures for making the joint reſolution of the two houſes public; as alſo for bringing to condign puniſhment the authors and ſpreaders of the ſeditious and ſcandalous report of the church being in danger. Her majeſty returned for anſwer, that ſhe would readily comply with their requeſt, and was very well pleaſed to find them ſo forward in aſſiſting her to put a ſtop to thoſe groundleſs and malicious reports. Accordingly, on the twentieth of December ſhe iſſued a proclamation, notifying the reſolution of the two houſes, and offering a reward for diſcovering the author of the Memorial of the Church of England, and for apprehending David Edwards, charged upon oath as the printer and publiſher of that libel. The next day, December 21, her majeſty came to the houſe of peers, and, among other bills, gave the royal aſſent to one for naturalizing the princeſs Sophia, electreſs and ducheſs-dowager of Hanover, and the iſſue of her body. She then made a ſpeech to both houſes, applauding the unanimity of their proceedings, and the good diſpoſition they had ſhewn towards an union with Scotland. After this the commons adjourned themſelves to the ſeventh day of January.

In the mean time Edwards, the printer of the Memorial, finding himſelf abandoned by the party who had employed him, ſurrendered himſelf, on a promiſe of his pardon if he would diſcover the author. He named three gentlemen of the houſe of commons; ſir Humphry Mackworth, Mr. Pooley, and Mr. Ward; but as he was not able to make out the charge, the copy having been brought him by a third hand, the matter ſlipt. Edwards was continued in cuſtody a long time, in expectation perhaps that he would make a fuller diſcovery; but he was at length diſcharged, and the real authors of the Memorial are to this day unknown.

The firſt thing the commons did after their next meeting (January 1706) was to preſent the thanks of the houſe to the duke of Marlborough (lately returned from abroad) for his great ſervices to the queen and the nation in the laſt campaign, and for his prudent negotiations with her allies: to which his grace returned a reſpectful and grateful anſwer. The credit of this nobleman was extremely high with the nation at this juncture, inſomuch that having propoſed a loan of five hundred thouſand pounds to the emperor on a branch of his revenue in Sileſia, the whole ſum was ſuddenly ſubſcribed by the merchants of London, and other monied perſons ‡. Indeed public credit at this time was very high; the kingdom was bleſſed with plenty; the forces were well paid, notwithſtanding the great quantities of coin exported for the maintenance of the war; the paper-currency ſupplied the deficiency ſo well, that there were very few murmurs heard.

All the funds being now eſtabliſhed, one in particular, for two millions and a half, by way of annuities for ninety-nine years, at ſix and an half per cent. her majeſty came to the houſe of peers on the nineteenth of March; and having given the royal aſſent to ſuch bills as were ready, ſhe made a ſpeech to b th houſes, in which ſhe expreſſed her acknowlegements for the unanimity and diſpatch with which they had conducted the public buſineſs, and the zeal and affection they had ſhewn for her ſervice: after which, by her majeſty's order, the parliament was prorogued to the firſt of May following §. For the ſeveral public bills that received the royal aſſent this ſeſſion, I refer the reader to the notes ¶; but cannot cloſe this account of parliamentary affairs without taking particular no-

An act for 4 s. in the pound upon land. An act for repealing ſeveral clauſes in the act made for the ſecurity of the kingdom of England, againſt ſeveral acts paſſed in Scotland, particularly that part of it which made the Scots aliens. An act for continuing the duties on malt, &c. An act to prevent frauds committed by bankrupts: by this act it was enacted, That ſuch bankrupts who ſhall remove, carry away, or embezzle, any part of their effects, ſhall ſuffer as felons; a bankrupt ſhall not be diſcharged, unleſs his certificate be firſt ſigned by four fifths in number and value of his creditors; commiſſioners of bankrupts may appoint aſſignees, who may by the majority of the creditors be afterwards removed—No commiſſion of bankruptcy ſhall be iſſued by the application of any creditor, unleſs his ſingle debt ſhall amount to one hundred pounds; or of two of the creditors ſo petitioning, to one hundred and fifty pounds; or of three or more creditors, to two hundred pounds. An act alſo paſſed during this ſeſſion, by the procurement of the lord Somers, for abridging and reforming ſome proceedings in the common law and in chancery, which were both dilatory and very chargeable: beſides theſe, and ſome other acts, to the number of ſeventeen, the royal aſſent was given to fifty-three private ones.

And here I cannot paſs over unnoticed a very extraordinary example of public ſpirit and integrity in the lord-keeper Cowper. On the firſt day of the year it was a cuſtom for all thoſe who practiſed in chancery, to offer a new year's gift to the lord-chancellor or keeper of the great-ſeal. Theſe grew to be ſo conſiderable, that they amounted to fifteen hundred pounds a year. On the new year's-day of this year, which was his firſt, he ſignified to all thoſe who, according to cuſtom, were to come with their preſents, that he would receive none. He thought it looked like beſpeaking the favour of the court; and that if it was not bribery, yet it came too near it, and looked too like it. Tindal's Continuation of Rapin, vol. iv. p. 220.

tice of two acts, viz. "An act for the better ſecurity of her majeſty's perſon and government, and of the crown of England in the proteſtant line;" and "An act for the encouragement and increaſe of ſeamen, and the ſpeedier manning of the fleet."

By the firſt of theſe, commonly called the Act of Regency, the act of ſucceſſion received very material alterations, particularly in the appointing a regency after the demiſe of her majeſty. And whereas it was provided by the former act of ſettlement, that all matters relating to the government ſhould be tranſacted in the privy-council, and ſigned by the members of that board, this clauſe was repealed by the preſent act, as well as that other important clauſe, that no perſon in office ſhould be a member of parliament. I have already taken notice that this laſt alteration met with great oppoſition in the houſe of commons, and at length the matter was compromiſed in the following manner, viz. That after the diſſolution of the then parliament, no perſon in any new office to be created by the crown, or any commiſſioner, ſecretary, or receiver of prizes, comptroller of accounts of the army, commiſſioner of tranſports for ſick or wounded, agents of regiments, governors of plantations, commiſſioners of the navy, of the out-ports, or any having penſions from the crown during pleaſure, ſhould be capable of being choſen members of the commons: and that if any perſon choſen a member ſhould afterwards accept any place of profit from the crown, his election ſhould be void; but that the ſame perſon might be re-choſen for that or any other county or borough. And it was further provided, that there ſhould be no more commiſſioners appointed for the execution of any office than there had been before that ſeſſion: and, laſtly, it was enacted, That if any perſon declared incapable of being elected by this act ſhould preſume to ſit or vote in the houſe, he ſhould forfeit five hundred pounds to him that ſhould ſue for the ſame.

By the bill for the encouragement and increaſe of ſeamen, a reward was offered for every perſon who ſhould diſcover and take up ſuch ſeamen as ſhould not be already in her majeſty's ſervice, and a penalty denounced againſt every one who ſhould harbour or conceal ſuch ſeamen. Conduct-money was to be allowed for conveying and ſubſiſting ſuch ſeamen, according to the uſage of the navy: and as an encouragement to ſeamen and ſea-faring perſons, every ſeaman who ſhall be turned over from one ſhip to another ſhall be paid the wages due to him from the ſhip in which he is turned over, before that ſhip to which he ſhall be turned over go to ſea, either in money, or by a ticket, which ſhall entitle him to an immediate payment. A clauſe was alſo inſerted for diſcharging of ſuch ſeamen, and other inſolvent perſons, as are in priſon for debt, and delivering them into her majeſty's ſervice on board the fleet *.

The new convocation met at the ſame time with the new parliament; but inſtead of imitating the union and harmony of the parliament, they revived the diviſions by which the former had been diſtracted, and the two houſes ſeemed to act with more determined rancour againſt each other. The lower houſe being determined to make choice of a prolocutor, choſe Dr. Binks, dean of Litchfield: then the upper houſe proceeded to draw up an addreſs to the queen, wherein they expreſs much reſentment againſt thoſe who ſuggeſted the church to be in danger, and ſent it to the lower houſe for their concurrence, which was refuſed, without any reaſon being aſſigned for ſuch diſſent. They prepared another in a different ſtrain, which was rejected by the archbiſhop. Then the lower houſe came to ſeveral reſolutions, aſſerting their right of having what they offered to the upper houſe received by his grace and their lordſhips. This paper being preſented to their lordſhips, and read, they ſtill refuſed to receive the addreſs of the lower houſe, by which a ſtop was put to all addreſſing, and to all farther communication between the two houſes, and the convocation was prorogued in the beginning of March. The queen, apprehending theſe diſputes would riſe to a greater height if the two houſes were ſuffered to meet ſuddenly, ſent a letter to the archbiſhop, wherein ſhe ſignified her reſolution to maintain her ſupremacy, and the due ſubordination of preſbyters to biſhops: ſhe expreſſed her hope that he and his ſuffragans would act conformably to her reſolution, in which caſe ſhe aſſured them of her favour and protection; and concluded with directing them to adjourn the convocation to ſuch farther time as ſhould appear convenient †.

Her majeſty, after having done every thing in her power to preſerve peace and unity at home, was no leſs attentive to do the ſame among her neighbours and allies abroad. The biſhopric of Lubeck in Germany becoming vacant the preceding year, the duke adminiſtrator of Holſtein, brother to the late duke of that name, and nephew of the late biſhop, and prince Charles brother to the king of Denmark, who were both choſen coadjutors to that prelate by different parties, now laid claim to the vacant ſee. The duke of Holſtein firſt took poſſeſſion of it, but was ſoon after ejected by ſome Daniſh troops. The king of Sweden ſeemed reſolute to maintain the right of the duke of Holſtein; the king of Denmark, that of his brother; and the emperor, whoſe prerogative it is to confirm the election of all proteſtant biſhoprics, being fearful of diſobliging either party in this critical juncture of affairs, choſe rather to leave the controverſy to the arbitration of the queen of England and the States-general. Their High Mightineſſes referring the ſame to her Britannic majeſty, the queen decreed, That the adminiſtrator of Holſtein ſhould be reſtored to the civil poſſeſſion of the biſhopric, until the diſpute was finally determined either by the aulic chamber or a friendly accommodation, which ſhould be left to the king of Denmark's choice. The parties concerned acquieſced with this proviſional deciſion; and about the middle of April this year (1706) the king of Denmark ordered his troops to evacuate the biſhopric of Lubeck, and to deliver up the town and caſtle of Eutin to Mr. Wick, the Engliſh reſident at Hamburgh ‡.

The attention of the public was now engroſſed by the moſt important tranſaction that ever happened in this iſland, which was finally and legally concluded at the cloſe of the year 1706: I mean, a conſolidating union of the two Britannic kingdoms of England and Scotland, after their crowns had been united one hundred and four years before in the perſon of king James I. This great and happy union had been ſeveral times before attempted in different reigns, but had been as often obſtructed by the ſtarting of various objections; to remove which, no ſerious or ſteady endeavours had ever been purſued. Nothing certainly could be more obvious than that it was the intereſt of two nations, inhabiting and poſſeſſing the ſame iſland, perfectly to unite for their common defence againſt all attacks from the continent. While they remained disjointed, they had their different, and conſequently their contrary intereſts to purſue, not only in matters of trade and commerce, product, and manufactures, but even in friendſhip and affection with regard to different nations on the continent. Religion too (or rather indeed the mere external mode of it) contributed its ſhare in keeping up the difference; and what had perhaps the greateſt influence of all, ancient ill-judged national prejudices on both ſides, ſtill remained too ſtrong eaſily to be conquered. Finally, the great hereditary officers of Scotland, and the poſſeſſors of many other lucrative poſts in that ſtate, which muſt be neceſſarily ſunk upon ſuch an incorporating union with England, had hitherto no ſmall influence in obſtructing it; but happily a more moderate way of thinking than formerly, in the miniſtry of both kingdoms, at length got the better of all obſtructions; and the parliament of each kingdom having paſſed an act, empowering the queen to appoint commiſſioners to treat upon this ſubject, her majeſty was pleaſed, on the part of England, to nominate the following noblemen and gentlemen:

The Engliſh commiſſioners named Mr. George Doddington, and the Scots, ſir David Nairn, to be their ſecretaries.

The commiſſioners of both kingdoms met, for the firſt time, on Tueſday the ſixteenth of April, 1706, at the council-chamber of the Cockpit, near Whitehall, the place appointed for their conferences; and their commiſſions being opened and read by the reſpective ſecretaries, and introductory ſpeeches delivered by the lord-keeper of England and the lord-chancellor of Scotland, it was agreed that copies of the ſeveral commiſſions ſhould be prepared and ſigned by the ſecretaries, and interchanged; and then the commiſſioners adjourned to the Monday following (April 22) when, being again aſſembled, the lord-keeper Cowper, in the name of the lords-commiſſioners for England, delivered to the board four preliminary articles, which were read, and were in ſubſtance as follows: That all propoſals made by either ſide ſhould be in writing; and every point, when agreed, reduced into writing: That no point, though agreed upon, ſhould be obligatory, till all matters ſhould be adjuſted in ſuch a manner as would be proper to be laid before the queen and the parliament of each nation, for their approbation: That a committee ſhould be appointed from each commiſſion, to reviſe the minutes which might paſs, before they ſhould be inſerted in the books by the reſpective ſecretaries: and, laſtly, That all the proceedings during the treaty ſhould be kept ſecret.

The Scots propoſed a fœderal union, in the nature of that ſubſiſting between the Dutch United Provinces, or the cantons of Switzerland; but the Engliſh would hear of nothing leſs than an incorporating union, ſo as effectually to take from any future Scottiſh parliament, the power of repealing the articles of this treaty. Accordingly, on the twenty-fourth of April, the lord-keeper of England propoſed that the two kingdoms of England and Scotland ſhould be for ever united into one nation, by the name of GREAT-BRITAIN; that it ſhould be repreſented by one and the ſame parliament; and that the ſucceſſion to this monarchy, in failure of heirs of her majeſty's body, ſhould be ſubject to the limitations mentioned in an act of parliament made in England, in the twelfth and thirteenth year of the reign of the late king William III. entitled, "An act for the farther limitation of the crown, &c."

To theſe preliminaries the commiſſioners for Scotland agreed, with this proviſo only, "That all the ſubjects of the united kingdom of Great Britain ſhould have full freedom and intercourſe of trade and navigation, to or from any part or place within the ſaid united kingdoms, and plantations thereunto belonging, and that there may be a communication of all other privileges and advantages which do or may belong to the ſubjects of either kingdom." This the commiſſioners of England acquieſced in, under ſuch terms as, in the further progreſs of this treaty, ſhould be found for the common advantage of both kingdoms. Theſe general preliminaries being agreed upon, the commiſſioners proceeded to particulars; and during their conferences the queen made them ſeveral viſits to quicken their progreſs. I ſhall not trouble the reader with the ſeveral propoſals and anſwers on every head, which may be found at large in the Proceedings of the Lords-Commiſſioners for the Union, publiſhed by authority; but give him the ſubſtance of the articles as they were agreed to and ratified by both parliaments, though not without great oppoſition on the part of that of Scotland, as will hereafter appear.

ARTICLES of UNION between ENGLAND and SCOTLAND. *

I. That the two kingdoms of England and Scotland ſhall, from the firſt of May, 1707, be united into one kingdom, by the name of GREAT BRITAIN; and that the enſigns-armorial of the ſaid united kingdoms be ſuch as her majeſty ſhall appoint; and the croſſes of St. Andrew and St. George be conjoined in ſuch manner as her majeſty ſhall think fit, and uſed in all flags, banners, ſtandards, and enſigns, both by ſea and land.

II. That the ſucceſſion to the united monarchy of Great Britain ſhall be to the princeſs Sophia and her heirs; and that all papiſts, or perſons that marry papiſts, ſhall be for ever excluded from inheriting the imperial crown of Great Britain, agreeable to the proviſion for the deſcent of the crown of England, made in the firſt year of the reign of their late majeſties king William and queen Mary, entitled, "An act declaring the rights and liberties of the ſubject, &c."

III. That the united kingdoms of Great Britain ſhall be repreſented by one and the ſame parliament, to be ſtiled the parliament of GREAT BRITAIN.

IV. That the ſubjects of the united kingdoms ſhall have freedom of trade and navigation to all places within the ſame, and plantations belonging to it; and that there be a communication of all other rights, privileges, and advantages, except where it is otherwiſe expreſsly agreed in theſe articles.

V. That all ſhips or veſſels belonging to the Scots [at the time of ratifying the treaty of union of the two kingdoms in the parliament of Scotland] ſhall be deemed Britiſh built, the owners making oath that [at the time of ratifying the treaty of union in the parliament of Scotland] the ſame did [in the whole or in part] belong to them.

VI. All parts of the united kingdom to be under the ſame regulations of trade, and liable to the ſame cuſtoms and duties [excepting and reſerving the duties upon export and import of ſuch particular commodities, from which any perſons, the ſubjects of either kingdom, are eſpecially liberated and exempted by their private rights, which after the union are to remain ſafe and entire to them in all reſpects as before the ſame; and that from and after the union, no Scots cattle carried into England ſhall be liable to any other duties, either on the public or private accounts, than thoſe duties to which the cattle of England are or ſhall be liable within the ſaid kingdom: and ſeeing by the laws of England there are rewards granted upon the exportation of certain kinds of grain, wherein oats grinded or ungrinded are not expreſſed, that from and after the union, when oats ſhall be ſold for fifteen ſhillings ſterling per quarter, or under, there ſhall be paid two ſhillings and ſix-pence ſterling for every quarter of the oatmeal exported, in the terms of the law, whereby, and ſo long as rewards are granted for the exportation of other grains; and that the beer of Scotland have the ſame rewards as barley: and in reſpect the importation of victual into Scotland would prove a diſcouragement to tillage; therefore, that the prohibition, as now in force by the law of Scotland, againſt importation of victual from Ireland, or any other place beyond ſea, into Scotland, do after the union remain in the ſame force as now it is, until more proper and effectual ways be provided by the parliament of Great Britain for the diſcouraging the importation of the ſaid victual from beyond ſea.]

VII. That all parts of the united kingdom be liable to the ſame exciſes upon all exciſable liquors [excepting only that the thirty-four gallons Engliſh barrel of beer or ale, amounting to twelve gallons Scots preſent meaſure, ſold in Scotland by the brewer at nine ſhillings and ſixpence ſterling, excluding all duties, and retailed, including duties and the retailer's profit, at two-pence the Scots pint, or eighth part of the Scots gallon, be not after the union liable, on account of the preſent exciſe upon exciſeable liquors in England, to any higher impoſition than two ſhillings ſterling upon the aforeſaid thirty-four gallons Engliſh barrel, being twelve gallons the preſent Scots meaſure.]

VIII. Foreign ſalt in England ſhall pay the ſame duty as in Scotland: [but in regard the duties of great quantities of foreign ſalt imported may be very heavy upon the merchants importers; that therefore all foreign ſalt imported into Scotland ſhall be cellared and locked up under the care of the merchant importer, and the officers employed for levying the duties upon ſalt: and that the merchant may have what quantities thereof his occaſions may require, not under a weight of forty buſhels at a time, upon his giving ſecurity for the duty of what quantities he receives payable in ſix months.] By this article it was alſo provided, that ſalt made in Scotland ſhould be exempted for ſeven years from the Engliſh duty; but from the expiration of the ſaid ſeven years, ſhall be ſubject to the ſame duties as ſalt made in England: [but Scotland ſhall, after the ſaid ſeven years, remain exempted from the duty of two ſhillings and four-pence per buſhel on home ſalt, impoſed by an act made in England in the ninth and tenth of king William III. of England: and if the parliament of Great Britain ſhall, at or before the expiring of the ſaid ſeven years, ſubſtitute any other fund in the place of the ſaid two ſhillings and four-pence of exciſe upon the buſhel of home ſalt, Scotland ſhall, after the ſaid ſeven years, bear a proportion of the ſaid fund, and have an equivalent in the terms of this treaty.] No ſalt whatſoever ſhall be brought from Scotland to England by land in any manner, under certain penalties denounced: and for eſtabliſhing an equality in trade it was provided [that all fleſh exported from Scotland to England, and ſhipped in Scotland to be exported beyond ſea; and proviſions for ſhips in Scotland, and foreign voyages, may be ſalted with Scots ſalt, paying the ſame duty for what ſalt is ſo employed, as the like quantity of ſuch ſalt pays in England, and under the ſame penalties, forfeitures, and proviſions, for preventing of frauds, as are mentioned in the laws of England.] And that for the encouragement of the herring fiſhery [there ſhall be allowed and paid to the ſubjects inhabitants of Great Britain, during the preſent allowances for other fiſhes, ten ſhillings and five-pence ſterling for every barrel of white herring that ſhall be exported from Scotland; and that they ſhall be allowed five ſhillings ſterling for every barrel of beef or pork ſalted with foreign ſalt, without mixture of Britiſh or Iriſh ſalts, and exported to ſale from Scotland to parts beyond ſea, alterable by the parliament of Great Britain.]

IX. That whenever the ſum of one million nine hundred and ninety-ſeven thouſand ſeven hundred and ſixty-three pounds eight ſhillings and four-pence halfpenny ſhall be enacted by the parliament of Great Britain on land, that part of the united kingdom now called Scotland ſhall be charged with the additional ſum of forty-eight thouſand pounds, as the quota of Scotland for ſuch tax, and ſo proportionably for any greater or leſſer ſum raiſed in England on land; the ſaid quota to be aſſeſſed in the ſame manner as the ceſs now is in Scotland, but ſubject to ſuch regulations as ſhall be made in the parliament of Great Britain.

X. That Scotland ſhall not be charged with the ſtamp-duties now in force in England.

XI. Nor with the duties payable in England on windows.

XII. Nor thoſe on coals and culm.

XIII. Scotland ſhall not pay the malt-duty during its continuance in England (which was to expire the twenty-fourth of June 1707.)

XIV. Scotland ſhall not be charged with any other duties impoſed by the parliament of England before the union, except thoſe conſented to in this treaty; and if the parliament of England, in their proviſion for the ſervice of the year 1707, ſhall impoſe any farther cuſtoms, Scotland ſhall have an equivalent for the ſhare thereof they may be liable to; [and Scotland ſhall not be charged with any impoſition on malt made or conſumed in that kingdom during this war.]

XV. Stipulates, That whereas, by the terms of this treaty, the ſubjects of Scotland, for preſerving an equality of trade throughout the united kingdom, will be liable to ſeveral cuſtoms and exciſes now payable in England, which will be applicable towards payment of the debts of England contracted before the union, it is agreed [That an equivalent ſhall be anſwered to Scotland for ſuch part of the Engliſh debts as Scotland may hereafter become liable to pay by reaſon of the union, other than ſuch for which appropriations have been made by parliament in England, of the cuſtoms and other duties on exports and imports, exciſes on all exciſable liquors, in reſpect of which debts equivalent are herein before provided]; which equivalent is herein ſtipulated to be three hundred ninety-eight thouſand eighty-five pounds ten ſhillings ſterling, to be granted by the parliament of England in the manner as in this article is particularly and at large explained. The diſtinction of this equivalent is in the ſame article applied, [1ſt, For indemnifying of private perſons for any loſſes they may ſuſtain by reducing the coin of Scotland to the ſtandard and value of England. 2dly, For indemnifying the ſufferers in the late African and Indian company of Scotland. 3dly, For diſcharging the public debts of Scotland. 4thly, For improving the manufacture of the coarſe wool of Scotland: and, 5thly, For encouraging and promoting the fiſheries, and ſuch other manufactures and improvements in Scotland as may moſt conduce to the general good of the united kingdom: for which end commiſſioners were to be appointed, &c.] It ſeems the Scots in general were ſo inflamed, by the deſtruction of their Darien or African company by the government of England, that nothing but the abſolute aſſurance of an equivalent for reimburſing of their whole capital employed on that affair, with intereſt, being two hundred and thirty-two thouſand one hundred and ſixty-two pounds ſixteen ſhillings and eleven-pence halfpenny, could have prepared their minds for this union; and they even inſiſted on the inſertion of this clauſe, [That if the ſaid ſtock capital and intereſt ſhall not be paid in twelve months after the commencement of the union, that then the ſaid company may from thenceforward trade, or give licence to trade, until the ſaid whole capital ſtock and intereſt ſhall be paid.]

XVI. That

XVI. That the coin be of the ſame ſtandard throughout the united kingdom as now in England, and a mint to be continued in Scotland, under the ſame rule as the mint in England, [and the preſent officers of that mint be continued.]

XVII. That the ſame weights and meaſures be uſed throughout the united kingdom as are now uſed in England; and ſtandards ſhall be kept in the burghs, agreeable to the ſtandard of the Engliſh Exchequer.

XVIII. That the laws for the regulation of trade, cuſtom, and ſuch exciſes which Scotland is to be liable to, ſhall be the ſame as thoſe in England. Other laws in Scotland to remain as before the union, but alterable by the parliament of Great Britain. Laws which concern public right, policy, and civil government, may be the ſame throughout the united kingdom, [but no alteration ſhall be made in the laws which concern private right, except for evident utility of the ſubjects of Scotland.]

XIX. The court of ſeſſion and other courts ſhall remain in Scotland the ſame as before the union, ſubject nevertheleſs to ſuch regulations, for the better adminiſtration of public juſtice, as ſhall be made by the parliament of Great Britain; [and that hereafter none ſhall be named by her majeſty and her royal ſucceſſors to be ordinary lords of ſeſſion, but ſuch who have ſerved in the college of juſtice as advocates or principal clerks of ſeſſion for the ſpace of five years, or as writers to the ſignet for the ſpace of ten years, with this proviſion, that no writer to the ſignet be capable to be admitted a lord of the ſeſſion, unleſs he undergo a private and public trial on the civil law, before the faculty of advocates, and be found by them qualified for the ſaid office two years before he be named to be a lord of the ſeſſion, yet ſo as the qualification made or to be made, for capacitating perſons to be named ordinary lords of the ſeſſion, may be altered by the parliament of Great Britain.] This is a very long article, and ſpecifies the ſeveral regulations to which theſe courts may be ſubjected, which are not ſufficiently intereſting to claim a place here.

XX. That all heritable offices, ſuperiorities, heritable juriſdictions, offices for life, and juriſdictions for life, be reſerved for the owners thereof as rights of property, in the ſame manner as they are now enjoyed by the laws of Scotland, this treaty in any wiſe notwithſtanding.

XXI. The rights and privileges of the royal boroughs in Scotland, as they now are, ſhall remain entire after the union, and notwithſtanding thereof.

XXII. That by virtue of this treaty, ſixteen of the peers of Scotland, at the time of the union, ſhall ſit and vote in the houſe of lords, and forty-five of the members of the repreſentatives of Scotland in the houſe of commons of the parliament of Great Britain, the choice whereof to be according to the act paſſed in Scotland for that purpoſe; [which act is hereby declared to be as valid as if it were a part of, and engroſſed in this treaty:] and in caſe her majeſty ſhall, on the firſt of May 1707, declare this preſent parliament to be the firſt parliament of Great Britain, the preſent parliament of England may be ſo on the part of England, and the ſixteen peers and the forty-five commoners for Scotland to ſit with them; ſuch parliament to continue no longer than the Engliſh parliament is by law allowed to continue.

XXIII. That the aforeſaid ſixteen peers of Scotland, mentioned in the laſt preceding article, to ſit in the houſe of lords of the parliament of Great Britain, ſhall have all the privileges of parliament which the peers of England now have, and which they or any peers of Great Britain ſhall have after the union, and particularly the right of ſitting upon the trials of peers; and that all peers of Scotland, and their ſucceſſors to their honours and dignities, ſhall, from and after the union, be peers of Great Britain, and have rank and precedency next and immediately after the peers of the orders and degrees in England at the time of the union, and before all peers of Great Britain of the like orders and degrees who may be created after the union.

XXIV. That from and after the union there ſhall be one great-ſeal for the united kingdom of Great Britain, which ſhall be different from the great-ſeal now uſed in either kingdom; and that the quarter of the arms [and the rank of the precedency of Lyon king at arms of the kingdom of Scotland] as may beſt ſuit the union, be left to her majeſty; and that in the privy-ſeal, ſigner, caſſet, &c. now uſed in Scotland, be continued; but that the ſaid ſeals be altered and adapted to the union, as her majeſty ſhall think fit: [that the crown, ſceptre, and ſword of ſtate, the records of parliament, and all other records, rolls, and registers whatſoever, both public and private, general and particular, and warrants thereof, continue to be kept as they are, within that part of the united kingdom called Scotland; and that they ſhall ſo remain in all time coming, notwithſtanding of the union.]

XXV. That all laws and ſtatutes in either kingdom, ſo far as they are contrary to, or inconſiſtent with the terms of theſe articles, or any of them, ſhall, from and after the union, cloſe and become void, and ſhall be ſo declared to be by the reſpective parliaments of the ſaid kingdoms.

There was no proviſion made in this treaty with reſpect to religion; for in the acts of parliament of both kingdoms, which empowered the queen to name commiſſioners for treating of an union, there was an expreſs reſtriction that they ſhould not treat of thoſe matters.

The above articles being agreed to, they were ſigned by the reſpective commiſſioners on the twenty-ſecond day of July 1706; and the next day the lords commiſſioners waited on the queen at St. James's with them, when the lord-keeper Cowper, in the name of the Engliſh commiſſioners, made a ſpeech, congratulating her majeſty on the concluſion of a treaty which ſo happily united the different parts of this iſland under the ſame monarchy. The earl of Seafield, lord-chancellor of Scotland, did the ſame on the part of the commiſſioners for that kingdom: to which her majeſty was pleaſed to return the following gracious anſwer:

" My lords,

" I give you many thanks for the great pains you have taken in this treaty, and am very well pleaſed to find your endeavours and applications have brought it to ſo good a concluſion: the particulars of it ſeem ſo reaſonable, that I hope they will meet with approbation in the parliaments of both kingdoms. I wiſh therefore my ſervants of Scotland may loſe no time in going down to propoſe it to my ſubjects of that kingdom; and I ſhall always look upon it as a particular happineſs if this union (which will be ſo great a ſecurity and advantage to both kingdoms) can be accompliſhed in my reign."

From domeſtic affairs let us now direct our attention towards the field, in which reſpect this year may be juſtly ſtiled the year of wonders!

Lewis XIV. had determined to exert his utmoſt efforts in the courſe of this campaign; and indeed at the beginning of it his armies were very formidable: he hoped, that by the reduction of Turin and Barcelona, he ſhould put an end to the war in Italy and Catalonia: he knew that his forces on the Rhine were ſuperior to any body of troops the prince of Baden could aſſemble; and he reſolved to reinforce his army in Flanders, ſo as to be in a condition to act offenſively againſt the duke of Marlborough.

That general left England in the beginning of April, and repaired to the Hague, where, having concerted the operations of the campaign with the States, he took the field about a fortnight afterwards. The French, who made great advantages laſt war by early campaigns, had this ſpring formed a deſign to ſurprize the duke of Marlborough before the Danes and Pruſſians (whom he had engaged as auxiliaries laſt year) ſhould join him; and thereupon the elector of Bavaria and marſhal Villeroy paſſed the Dyle * in the beginning of May, and advanced directly towards the confederate army. The duke, who was ſeldom ſurprized for want of intelligence of the enemy's motions, being appriſed of their deſign, diſpatched an expreſs to the Daniſh troops to join him, and they arrived, under the duke of Wirtemberg their commander, within a league of the confederates camp (which was between Borchloen and Groes Waren) on the twenty-ſecond of May, when the duke, on reviewing his army, found it amounted to ſeventy-four battalions of foot, and one hundred and twenty-three ſquadrons of horſe and dragoons, provided with an hundred pieces of cannon, twenty hawbitzers, and forty-two pontoons. About the ſame time that the Danes arrived in the confederate army, that of the French was joined by marſhal Marſin's horſe; ſo that their number amounted to ſeventy-ſix battalions, and one hundred and thirty two ſquadrons: confiding therefore in their ſuperiority, they came out of their lines, and encamped between Tirlemont and Judoigne.

Marlborough on his part was no leſs eager for a battle, relying on the goodneſs and known bravery of his troops. Accordingly, having conſulted with monſieur d'Auverquerque the Dutch general, it was reſolved to advance towards the enemy; and on Sunday the twelfth of May, (being Whitſunday) about three in the morning, the confederate army marched in eight columns towards Ramillies, a village where the Gheete takes its ſource, in order to avoid the inconvenience of paſſing that river. Being advanced near the ſaid village, the enemy were perceived getting into the ſtrong camp of Mont St. André, and placing their right towards the Mehaigne. This river flows about half a league from Ramillies †, the ground between them being upon a level. The Gheete runs from Ramillies to Anderkirk, through a marſhy ground; and beyond Anderkirk the river grows wide, and the ground is impaſſable. Their left extended to Anderkirk, while a good number of battalions were poſted in Offuz and Ramillies near their center. This precaution, though it might be prudent in the enemy, was a ſtrong indication that their courage was rather cooled. His grace judging, by the ſituation of the ground, that the ſtreſs of the action would be on our left, ordered that, beſides the number of horſe belonging to that wing, the Daniſh ſquadrons, being twenty in number, ſhould alſo be poſted there.

About two in the afternoon the allied army was drawn up in order of battle, with the right wing near Foltz, on the brook of Yauſe, and the left by the village of Franquennes, which the enemy had occupied. The action was begun on the left of our army by four battalions, which puſhed a brigade of foot from their poſt on the Mehaigne. Monſieur Auverquerque about the ſame time charged the troops of the French houſhold with the horſe of that wing. The ſucceſs was doubtful for about half an hour, which the duke of Marlborough perceiving, ordered the reſt of the horſe of the right wing, except the Engliſh, who were ſeventeen ſquadrons, to ſupport thoſe on the left. While the duke was in perſon rallying ſome of the broken ſquadrons, in order to renew the charge, he was in very great danger of being either killed or taken priſoner, by falling from his horſe; but was ſuccoured in time by a party of our horſe that came to his aſſiſtance. Colonel Bringfield, in re-mounting him, had his head ſtruck off by a cannon-ball. The duke then ordered lieutenant-general Schultz, with twelve battalions, twenty pieces of cannon, and ſome hawbitzers, to attack the village of Ramillies, which was ſtrongly fortified with artillery. The attack was made with great vigour and reſolution: the enemy was beat quite out of the village, and in endeavouring to make good their retreat, were moſt of them either killed or taken priſoners.

By this time the enemy's right wing of horſe being entirely defeated, the Dutch and Daniſh horſe of the left wing of the allied army fell upon the foot on their right, cut in pieces no leſs than twenty battalions, and made themſelves maſters of their colours and cannon. The reſt of the enemy's infantry began to retreat in tolerable order, under cover of the cavalry of their left wing, which formed themſelves in three lines, between Oſſuz and Anderkirk; but the Engliſh horſe having found means to croſs a rivulet which divided them from the enemy, attacked them ſo quick, and with ſo much bravery, that they entirely abandoned their foot; and our dragoons puſhing into the village of Anderkirk, made a terrible ſlaughter of them. The enemy now gave way on all ſides: the elector of Bavaria and marſhal Villeroy ſaved themſelves with the utmoſt difficulty. Several waggons of the enemy's vanguard breaking down in a narrow paſs, ſo obſtructed the way, that the baggage and artillery could not proceed, nor could their troops defile in order. The victorious horſe hearing of this accident, preſſed on them ſo vigorouſly, that the French king's own regiment of foot called for quarter, and delivered up their arms and colours. The allies continued the purſuit till two o'clock the next morning, by the way of Judoigne, as far as Melden, five leagues from the place of battle, and two leagues diſtant from Louvain.

In fine, never was victory more complete: all the enemy's cannon, a very few pieces excepted, fell into the hands of the confederates, with moſt of their baggage, about one hundred and twenty colours, and ſeveral pairs of kettle-drums. The French in this action, if we reckon the ſlain, wounded, and deſerters, whoſe numbers were very great, loſt forty thouſand men; near half their army. The perſons of note among the priſoners were, meſſieurs Palavicini and Mezieres, major-generals; the marquis de Bar, brigadier-general of horſe; the marquis de Nonant, brigadier-general of foot; the marquis de la Baume, ſon of the marſhal de Tallard; monſieur de Montmorency, nephew to the late duke of Luxemburgh; and ſeveral others. Thus did the army of the confederates, in the ſpace of little more than an hour, defeat an army of eighty thouſand men, while their own loſs did not amount to much more than two thouſand: of perſons of note, prince Lewis of Heſſe and M. Bentinck were the only ſlain, and none taken priſoners.

After this ſignal diſcomfiture of the French army, which is by all military writers agreed to have been owing to the injudicious manner in which marſhal Villeroy drew up his army, the allies met with no further interruption in their conqueſts. Louvain *, Mechlin †, Bruſſels ‡, Antwerp ‖, Ghent §, and Bruges ¶, all ſurrendered to the victors within a fortnight, without waiting for a ſiege. Oſtend  indeed made ſome ſhew of a defence, but capitulated, after having been inveſted ten days only. Menin ††, reckoned the moſt finiſhed fortification in Europe, and ſupplied with a garriſon of ſix thouſand men, received the conquerors within their gates in eighteen days after opening the trenches. Dendermonde ‡‡ ſuſtained a blockade of ſome weeks, which the duke of Marlborough afterwards ordered to be turned into a regular ſiege, which terminated in the garriſon's ſurrendering themſelves priſoners of war. Aeth ‖‖ was next inveſted, and ſubmitted on the ſame terms, after twenty days reſiſtance.

The conqueſt of all thoſe places was compleated by the middle of September. Marſhal Villeroy, in deſpair, did not dare to acquaint the king with the defeat he had ſuſtained at Ramillies: he continued five days without diſpatching a courier. At length he wrote a confirmation of this news, which had already filled the court of France with conſternation. Lewis, however, affected to bear his misfortunes with calmneſs and compoſure; but the effect they had on his mind ſenſibly diſplayed itſelf in the altered ſtate of his health. He immediately ſent for the duke of Vendoſme out of Italy, where he thought his preſence not ſo neceſſary, to replace Villeroy, and repair, if poſſible, the diſgrace that had befallen the arms of France; but that general having fixed himſelf in a ſtrong camp that could not be forced, did not think fit to give the duke of Marlborough any diſturbance while he lay with the confederate army covering the ſieges. With that of Aeth the allies finiſhed their glorious campaign in Flanders, and ſoon after the army broke up and went into winter-quarters. The duke of Marlborough returned to the Hague, and M. Auverquerque being appointed to command in chief in the Netherlands, took up his reſidence at Bruſſels, while the ſtates of Flanders, having aſſembled at Ghent, formally recognized for their ſovereign Charles II. *.

I have already obſerved, that Lewis XIV. had entertained ſtrong hopes of making himſelf maſter of Turin, the capital of the duke of Savoy's dominions, and almoſt the only town that prince had left. The French indeed had met with ſome ſucceſs in the beginning of this year's campaign in Italy; having attacked the Imperialiſts at Calcinato, in the abſence of prince Eugene, drove them from their poſts, and obliged them to quit the territories of Breſciano, with the loſs of three thouſand men killed or taken priſoners, beſides their cannon and baggage. Upon this ſucceſs the French king ordered the duke de la Feuillade to inveſt Turin †. Prince Eugene was at too great a diſtance to come to its relief: he was on the other ſide of the Adigi ‡; and a long chain of entrenchments that lined the river on this ſide, ſeemed to make a paſſage impracticable. Fifty-ſix ſquadrons and one hundred battalions formed the ſiege of this great city, who began to batter the town and citadel on the eighth day of June, and on the fifteenth the beſiegers fired red-hot bullets, many of which fell near the duke's palace; whereupon his royal highneſs ſent the two ducheſſes (his wife and mother) with the young prince and princeſſes, to ſome diſtance from the town, and marched out himſelf on the ſeventeenth, leaving a numerous garriſon, under the command of count Thaun, general of the emperor's forces. His royal highneſs took this ſtep in order to amuſe the duke de la Feuillade. The latter immediately quitted the direction of the ſiege to purſue the prince, who being better acquainted with the ground, baffled his purſuit. Thus la Feuillade miſſed the duke, and the buſineſs of the ſiege ſuffered by it. At length, finding the duke of Savoy was not to be ſurprized, the French general returned to the camp before Turin, leaving the duke of Aubeterre with forty ſquadrons and five battalions to attend the duke of Savoy's motions.

The duke of Vendoſme had been poſted on the banks of the Adigi, from the thirteenth of May to the twentieth of June, to cover this ſiege, and thought himſelf certain, with ſeventy battalions and ſixty ſquadrons, to ſtop all the paſſages againſt prince Eugene; but that prince ſhewed himſelf a greater general than his adverſary: he croſſed the Adigi, and even the Po, a river larger, and in ſome places more difficult of paſſage than the Rhine; and before Vendoſme left Italy to take upon him the command of marſhal Villeroy's ſcattered forces in Flanders, he ſaw prince Eugene in a condition to advance to the relief of Turin.

Upon the recalling of Vendoſme, Lewis XIV. ſent his nephew the duke of Orleans to command his army in Italy, who found the troops in as much diſorder as if they had ſuffered a defeat. Eugene had paſſed the Po in ſight of Vendoſme; he now croſſed the Tanaro in view of the duke of Orleans, took Carpi, Corregio, and Reggio; ſtole a march upon the French, and joined the duke of Savoy with his whole army, near Aſti §, on Sept. 1.

The city of Turin was at this time reduced to great diſtreſs, moſt of the powder being ſpent, and the enemy having made a lodgment on the counterſcarpe, and carried ſeveral other parts of the works: they were indeed beaten out again by the garriſon; but it was thought impoſſible that the beſieged could reſiſt many more attacks. His royal highneſs and prince Eugene therefore found themſelves under a neceſſity of marching immediately to the relief of the place. Accordingly, they paſſed the Doria on September 6, and encamped with their right on the banks of that river before Pioneſſa, and with the left on the banks of the Stura. The next day the army moved by break of day towards the enemy, who were intrenched very deep, having the Stura on their right, the Doria on their left, and the convent of Capuchines of our Lady de la Campagna in their center, beſides Luſingua, and ſeveral other fortified caſſines which flanked their intrenchments. Never was a march more bold than that which the allied army made on this occaſion, having a continual fire to ſuſtain from forty pieces of cannon which the enemy had pointed to gall them. The duke of Orleans perceiving the intrepidity with which the duke and the prince advanced towards him, propoſed to quit the intrenchments, and march directly to the enemy. In this advice he was joined by almoſt all the general officers in the army; but marſhal Marſin producing an order from the French † Turin is a ſtrong and ſplendid city of Italy, with a fine caſtle, the marquiſate of the principality of Piedmont, in the territory of Turin, an archbiſhopric and univerſity, is ſubject to the duke of Savoy, and his ſeat. It ſtands in a very fruitful and pleaſant vale on the river Po, twenty miles nigh eaſt of Pignerol, ſeventy-eight miles weſt of Genoa and Milan, two hundred and fifty weſt of Venice, three hundred and ſixty north-eaſt of Paris, thirty-four north-weſt of Rome, and four hundred and ſixty ſouth-weſt of Vienna.

‡ The Adigi, or Etſch, is a large river in Italy, riſes in the Rhœtian Alps, runs near the cities of Trent and Verona, ſouth of the former, and eaſt of the latter. It is the only conſiderable ſtream in Lombardy which does not fall into the Po, and at laſt empties itſelf into the Adriatic.

king, king, which left every thing to his deciſion in caſe of an action; and giving it as his opinion to remain in the lines, the duke was forced to acquieſce.

When the army of the confederates came within half cannon-ſhot of the French lines, it drew up in order of battle, and began to fire the great guns: the whole army then moved in a moment; the infantry marched up with their muſkets to the foot of the intrenchments, and prince Eugene putting himſelf at the head of the left wing, began the attack, which was directed with ſuch amazing vigour and intrepidity, that in leſs than two hours he forced the enemy's entrenchments. The duke of Savoy did the like in the center and the right near Luſingua. By noon the allies were maſters of the French camp, and the defeat of the enemy was become general. The duke of Orleans behaved with great gallantry and courage, and received ſeveral wounds in the action. Marſhal de Marſin was taken priſoner, after having his thigh ſhattered by a cannon-ball, and died in a few hours after under the amputation. The French loſt in the action, near ſeven thouſand men killed, with three hundred officers and about eight thouſand private men taken priſoners; two hundred and fifty pieces of cannon, one hundred and eight mortars, ſeven thouſand eight hundred bombs, thirty-two thouſand hand-granades, forty-eight thouſand cannon-balls, four thouſand cheſts of muſket-balls, eighty-ſix thouſand barrels of gun-powder, all their tents and baggage, five thouſand beaſts of burden, ten thouſand horſes belonging to thirteen regiments of dragoons, and the mules of the commiſſary-general, all fell into the hands of the victors: the latter of theſe were ſo richly laden, that this part of the booty alone was valued at three millions of livres, near one hundred and thirty thouſand pounds of our money. The loſs of the confederates did not amount to three thouſand men, killed, wounded, or diſabled, in the attack, beſides about two thouſand of the garriſon of Turin, who had fallen during the courſe of the ſiege.

The duke of Savoy now entered his capital in triumph, while the duke of Orleans, finding it impoſſible to procure ſubſiſtence for the troops he had with him, retired into Dauphiny with the ſhattered remains of his army.

While theſe great things were tranſacting at Turin, the count of Medavi-Grancei, who was at that time in the Mantuan with a body of troops, defeated the Imperialiſts at Caſtiglione, under the command of the prince of Heſſe-Caſſel, and obliged him to retreat to Adigi, with the loſs of two thouſand men: but this, though a complete, proved a fruitleſs victory; for the duchy of Milan, Mantua, Piedmont, and laſtly, the kingdom of Naples, were recovered from the French within a very ſhort time of one another *.

The affairs of France were as unſucceſsful in Spain as in Germany, Flanders, and Italy. In the beginning of April this year king Philip and the marſhal de Teſſe, the French general, at the head of a numerous army, undertook the ſiege of Barcelona, which was defended by his rival Charles in perſon: it was at the ſame time blocked up by ſea by the count de Thouloufe with a powerful ſquadron. The inhabitants, encouraged by the preſence of king Charles, defended the town with great bravery; nevertheleſs, the enemy's army being compoſed of veteran troops, carried on the ſiege very vigorouſly, and on the twenty-fourth made themſelves maſters of Montjuic, taking above four hundred of the garriſon, and moſt of the officers, priſoners. Lord Donnegal was ſlain in the attack, after having cut down ſeveral of the enemy's grenadiers with his own hand. About the ſame time the earl of Peterborough arrived in the neighbourhood of the place from Valencia with two thouſand men; and though he found it impoſſible to enter the city, yet he kept his poſt upon the hills with admirable courage and activity, and alarmed the beſiegers with frequent ſkirmiſhes. Barcelona, however, was at length ſo hard preſſed, that it was thought impoſſible to hold out many days longer, when, on the eighth of May, the drooping ſpirits of the garriſon were revived by obſerving the enemy's fleet getting under ſail in a great hurry, and ſeveral of their ſhips ſtanding out to ſea, which gave the beſieged aſſurance that an Engliſh fleet was coming to their relief.

This was really the fact: the confederate fleet, commanded by ſir George Byng, arrived from England, and joined the ſquadron under ſir John Leake on the firſt of May, in the bay of Altea, and were ſoon after farther reinforced by commodore Walker with ſeveral men of war; ſo that the fleet conſiſted of thirty-ſeven Engliſh, and thirteen Dutch ſhips; in all, fifty of the line of battle, beſides eight frigates, fire-ſhips, &c. The ſeventh the fleet came off Tarragona, when the earl of Peterborough joined them with ſeveral barks, on board of which were fourteen hundred land forces. His excellency went on board the prince George, and hoiſted the union flag at the main-top-maſt head †. The eighth, in the morning, they came off Cape Montjoy. The French admiral, upon news of the approach of the confederate fleet, had retired the night before; and taking advantage of a fair wind, made the beſt of his way to Toulon. In the afternoon the confederate fleet anchored in the bay of Barcelona, to the inexpreſſible joy of the inhabitants of that place. The enemy however ſtill made a ſhew of keeping up the ſiege; but on the twelfth of May, in the morning, king Philip marched off in a manner little expected, and in ſo great diſorder, that he left all his tents behind him, together with his ſick and wounded, whom the marſhal de Teſſe, by a letter, recommended to the earl of Peterborough's clemency, who behaved with the utmoſt tenderneſs and indulgence towards them. King Philip made all the haſte he could to Perpignan, but his army was almoſt entirely ruined before he got thither ‡.

† The earl of Peterborough was admiral of the fleet, as well as general of the land forces.

‡ There happened a total eclipſe of the ſun in thoſe parts that morning the French raiſed the ſiege: this was looked upon as very ominous by the lower kind of people; and marſhal Teſſe was much blamed even by his ſuperiors, for not having raiſed the ſiege a day ſooner, and the rather as the French king had made the ſun, with this motto, Nec pluribus impar, his device. Hiſtory of Europe. Burnet. Naval Hiſt. &c.

To theſe diſaſters was added yet another, which ſeemed to give the finiſhing ſtroke to the hopes of the Bourbon family. The earl of Galway, who commanded the forces in Portugal, took almoſt every place he preſented himſelf before, and had advanced even into the provice of Eſtremadura; while the duke of Berwick, who headed the troops of France and Spain, in vain attempted to ſtop his progreſs: he now penetrated as far as the bridge of Almaras. Philip V. uncertain of his fate, was in Perpignan: the court of Spain was filled with conſternation, not in the leaſt doubting but the victorious allies would immediately march to Madrid; but the overſight of the latter preſerved the crown on Philip's head: the Portugueze, conſidering only their own ſafety, refuſed to proceed any farther till they ſhould hear of the fate of Barcelona. In the interim, Philip's queen (a daughter of the duke of Savoy) who had gained the affections of the Spaniards by the pains ſhe took to pleaſe them, and by an intrepidity and fortitude above her ſex, ſummoned the grandees and magiſtrates of Madrid to attend her, when ſhe made the following ſpeech:

"I have ſent for you, to acquaint you what diſtreſs the ſtate is in; I cannot conceal it from you: while the king is expoſing his life in your defence, heaven bleſſes his arms in Catalonia, and we hope that rebellious province will ſhortly be reduced; but affairs do not go ſo well in Eſtremadura: the Portugueze advance. Will you tamely ſee ſuch enemies approach you? do you not think of exerting your utmoſt efforts to make them repent their audaciouſneſs? The preſervation of the monarchy is now the point in queſtion. You ought, in this preſſing neceſſity, to ſhew your loyalty and zeal, by ſacrificing your all for the king, for me, and for yourſelves. Powerful and ſpeedy ſuccours are neceſſary. I am the firſt queen who has appeared in this place on ſuch an occaſion. When I give you ſuch extraordinary marks of my affection, I well deſerve you ſhould do ſomething for me, and appear in my defence."

This pathetic diſcourſe, however, produced very little effect: the Spaniards appeared ſtruck with a panic that took from them all power of deliberating on the moſt proper means for oppoſing the victors, who proceeded in their march to Madrid. Philip hereupon poſted through France, and arrived in that city on the ſixth of June; but finding that moſt of the grandees were fled, and having no army he could truſt to; and ſeeing moreover that the Portugueze and Engliſh were almoſt at the gates, he ſent his queen to Burgos *, whither he followed her in a few days, having withdrawn the court and all the tribunals before the earl of Galway could reach the place; ſo that upon his arrival, about the latter end of June, he found Madrid an open village. But the troops having been extremely weakened by ſo long a march, and not being above four thouſand horſe, and eight or ten thouſand foot, the Portugueze generals and thoſe of the allies thought it highly neceſſary that Charles ſhould come to Madrid as ſoon as poſſible: for beſides the advantage his preſence might have been to his own affairs among the Spaniards, who retained all the pride, though they wanted the courage, of their anceſtors, and thought it beneath them to make their ſubmiſſion to any but king Charles himſelf; it was of the laſt importance to the allies to be immediately joined by the forces under the king and the earl of Peterborough's command, not being ſtrong enough without them to attack Philip, who had already received ſome ſuccours from France, beſides five thouſand four hundred horſe, and eight thouſand foot, under the duke of Berwick and the Conde de las Torres. Expreſs after expreſs was ſent to king Charles to haſten his march to his capital city, where the earl of Galway had cauſed him to be proclaimed on the twenty-eighth of June; but the province of Arragon declaring for Charles at the ſame time, he marched into Saragoſſa, where he unhappily ſpent ſo much time, that his rival Philip aſſembled an army ſuperior to that of the allies, and marched to give the earl of Galway battle, who, conſcious of his own inferiority, choſe to quit Madrid and retire; ſo that Philip V. in leſs than ſix weeks after leaving Madrid like a fugitive, entered it again in triumph. The conſequence of this turn of affairs was, that Toledo, Salamanca, and the reſt of the towns in Caſtile which had declared for the houſe of Auſtria, ſubmitted again to the yoke of the French.

At length, when it was too late, Charles joined the earl of Galway and the marquis das Minas, at Guadalaxara, in the beginning of Auguſt, with a ſmall body of troops, and was followed by the earl of Peterborough at the head of five hundred dragoons. By this junction the army of the allies became nearly equal in number to that of the enemy, and the event of a battle might have been finally deciſive; but as both ſides expected to be reinforced, neither ſide would put any thing to the hazard. So ſoon as the armies were joined, the earl of Galway waited upon lord Peterborough, offering him the command of the Engliſh, and to ſerve under him till he could have the queen's leave to return home (for which he had applied); but the marquis das Minas refuſing to do the like, the earl of Peterborough, who aſpired to the chief command, choſe not to ſtay with the army; and embarking in diſguſt on board an Engliſh ſhip, ſet ſail for Genoa †.

The confederates had formed a deſign this year of making a deſcent upon the coaſt of France by way of diverſion; and accordingly about eleven thouſand men were embarked, under the command of the earl of Rivers, with a large train of artillery; and the combined fleet, conſiſting of one hundred and fifty ſail, commanded by ſir Cloudeſley Shovel, ſet ſail from Plymouth on the 30th of Auguſt. The ſcheme for invading France had been propoſed by the marquis de Guiſcard, who from a motive of diſguſt had abandoned his country, and engaged in the ſervice of the allies. He obtained the rank of a lieutenant-general in the emperor's army, and afterwards coming over to London, inſinuated himſelf into the good graces of Mr. Henry St. John, and other perſons of diſtinction. His ſcheme of invading France was approved of by the miniſtry, and he was, by way of reward, promoted to the command of a regiment of dragoons, with which he embarked in the expedition. However, the fleet being driven into Torbay by contrary winds, where it was detained for a conſiderable time; in the interim a diſcovery was made that Guiſcard's plan was altogether romantic, or at leaſt built upon ſuch a precarious baſis as could not juſtify the attempting its execution; and letters having arrived from the earl of Galway, ſoliciting ſuccours with the moſt earneſt importunity, the expedition to France was poſtponed; and ſir Cloudeſley Shovel and the earl of Rivers, with the land forces on board, were ordered to make the beſt of their way to Liſbon, there to take ſuch meaſures as the ſituation of affairs ſhould indicate to be moſt expedient.

They arrived ſafe in the Tagus on the 18th of October, when lord Rivers, finding the communication between Portugal and the allies was cut off, ſailed round to Alicant in order to join the earl of Galway on that ſide; and having landed his troops, who were in a miſerable condition by being kept ſo long on board, he returned to England, together with the earl of Eſſex and brigadier Gorges, who embarked with thoſe troops in the firſt deſign, and ſir Cloudeſley ſailed back with the fleet to Liſbon *.

As to that part of the Engliſh fleet which had relieved Barcelona, under the command of ſir John Leake and ſir George Byng, it continued all the ſummer in the Mediterranean, and cooped up the French navy in the harbour of Toulon. They ſecured Carthagena, which had declared for king Charles, and took Alicant by aſſault. Sir John Leake next made the neceſſary diſpoſition for a winter ſquadron, to be commanded by ſir George Byng, and then proceeded to put in execution his laſt orders, which were to reduce the iſlands of Majorca † and Ivica ‡; both which ſurrendered, after little or no reſiſtance; and the admiral having cauſed king Charles III. to be proclaimed in each, and left garriſons to ſecure his conqueſts, he ſailed out of the Streights in the beginning of October, when he diſpatched a ſquadron under ſir John Jennings to the Weſt Indies, and another under ſir George Byng to lie at Liſbon: then proſecuting his voyage for England, he arrived ſafe at Spithead about the middle of the ſame month, with the reſt of the fleet, which was ſoon after laid up for the winter ſeaſon §.

Poland was this year delivered from the preſence of that hot-headed conqueror the king of Sweden, who, obſerving that he ſhould never be able effectually to dethrone king Auguſtus, unleſs he cut off the ſupplies which that monarch conſtantly received from Saxony, he marched through Sileſia and Luſatia into Saxony, plundered the open country through its whole extent, and obliged the rich city of Leipſick, and other towns, to pay him contributions. King Auguſtus ſeeing his hereditary dominions in the hands of his enemy, ſoon found he could no longer maintain the war in Poland, and therefore agreed to a treaty in the month of September, by which he reſigned the kingdom of Poland and the grand duchy of Lithuania, and acknowleged Staniſlaus Leczinſki as the true and rightful king of Poland, reſerving to himſelf only the empty title of ſovereign.

Charles of Sweden in the heart of Germany, was, however, an object of great diſcontent to the members of the grand alliance. Lewis XIV. who was redoubling all his efforts to retrieve his ſhattered affairs, ſpared no pains to ſollicit the young victor's alliance. Charles however rejected all offers of that nature. Lewis then implored his mediation for a peace: he replied, That he was very ready to interpoſe his good offices, whenever he ſhould find the allies willing to accept the ſame. Baffled in this application, the French king had recourſe to a method for bringing about a treaty, which could not but be very mortifying to one who aimed at univerſal monarchy. He employed the elector of Bavaria to write letters in his name to the duke of Marlborough and the deputies of the States-general (dated the twenty-firſt of October, ſoon after the battle of Ramillies) containing propoſals for opening a congreſs. He likewiſe ſollicited the pope to interpoſe in his favour: he offered to cede to king Charles the greater part of the eſtates that compoſe the Spaniſh monarchy, or elſe the Weſt Indies, or Milan, Naples, and Sicily, with a barrier for the Dutch, and a compenſation to the duke of Savoy for the devaſtation committed in his territories. But theſe offers were rejected, and the allies reſolved to proſecute the war with redoubled vigour.

It is not eaſy to aſſign a reaſon why the confederates would not liſten at this time to the propoſals of peace, ſince there is great room to believe that Lewis XIV. would have conſented to almoſt any that could have been demanded. Their refuſal was ſaid to be owing to the great influence of the duke of Marlborough, both at home, and with the emperor and the Dutch. The war proved at once too honourable and too lucrative for him to deſire ſo ſpeedy an end to it. Moſt of the leading men here in England were his friends and relations, and had gained titles and eſtates by the war. In Holland the penſionary Heinſius, who did all things there, was entirely under the direction of the duke and prince Eugene. As for the emperor, he had all things to hope from the continuance of the war, and nothing either to fear or pay. Whatever degree of truth might be in thoſe ſuggeſtions, it is certain they gained credit both at home and abroad, and occaſioned ſome diſturbances in Holland, and greater here *.

I ſhall cloſe my account of the military tranſactions of this year with obſerving, that little or nothing was done upon the Rhine, both ſides having drawn what troops they could from that quarter. Moreover, prince Lewis of Baden, from a very bad ſtate of health, was incapable of action: he died on the fourth of January in the following year, with the character of a great general, though his reputation in the latter part of his life was by no means equal to the beginning, at leaſt in ſucceſs.

While almoſt every kingdom in Europe was a ſcene of war, rapine, and bloodſhed, England and Scotland were engaged in treating of a union between the two kingdoms. I have already given the ſubſtance of this treaty as ſettled by the commiſſioners on each ſide in England; let us now ſee how the articles were received by our neighbours in the northern part of the iſland, by whom they were firſt taken into conſideration.

The Scottiſh parliament met on the third of October, when the duke of Queenſberry, as high-commiſſioner, produced the queen's letter, in which ſhe acquainted them of the commiſſioners appointed to treat of an union having brought that buſineſs to a happy concluſion, expreſſing her hopes that the terms would prove acceptable to her ſubjects of Scotland. An entire and perfect union, ſhe ſaid, would be the ſolid foundation of a laſting peace; it would ſecure their religion, liberties, and property; remove the animoſities that prevailed among themſelves, and the jealouſies that ſubſiſted between the two nations: ſhe expatiated on the other manifold advantages that would reſult therefrom: ſhe renewed her aſſurance of maintaining the government of the church, and told them they had an opportunity of taking ſuch ſteps as might be neceſſary for its ſecurity after the union: ſhe deſired the neceſſary ſupplies till the parliament of Great Britain could provide for thoſe matters: ſhe obſerved, that the great ſucceſs with which it had pleaſed Almighty God to bleſs her arms, afforded the nearer proſpect of a happy peace, with which they would enjoy the full advantages of this union: that they had no reaſon to doubt but the parliament of England would do all that ſhould be neceſſary on their part to confirm the union; and ſhe recommended calmneſs and unanimity in deliberating on this great and weighty affair, of ſuch conſequence to the whole iſland of Great Britain †.

The lord-commiſſioner and the lord-chancellor (the earl of Seafield) each of them enforced this letter in a ſeparate ſpeech, wherein they exerted all their talents in diſplaying the great advantages ariſing from the union of the two kingdoms: the treaty itſelf was then read, and ordered to be printed, with the proceedings of the lords commiſſioners of both kingdoms in relation thereto; after which the parliament was adjourned for a week.

No ſooner were the particulars of the intended treaty between the two kingdoms divulged, than the greateſt part of the Scottiſh nation kindled into a flame of reſentment, and gave ſuch intimations of a violent oppoſition, as convinced the queen's miniſters that they would have unſpeakable difficulties to encounter in bringing about an union; againſt which a powerful party was now formed, even in the parliament itſelf, headed by the dukes of Hamilton and Athol, the marquis of Annandale, the earls of Errol, Mareſchal, and Buchan, the lord Belhaven, that ſtaunch republican Mr. Fletcher of Saltoun, and ſome other noblemen and private gentlemen of great rank and influence. The Jacobites to a man declared againſt an union, well knowing that, ſhould it take place, it would for ever extinguiſh all their hopes of reſtoring the abdicated family: even the preſbyterians ſeemed averſe to the meaſure, from an apprehenſion that their mode of worſhip would ſuffer a change, and be ſwallowed up in the church of England. On the other hand, a great part of the gentry of Scotland, who were perſonally acquainted with the conſtitution of the Engliſh government, and ſenſible of the protection every good ſubject there enjoys under an houſe of commons, which ſecures them the uninterrupted enjoyment of all their lawful rights and privileges, heartily concurred in furthering the completion of this work. This party was headed by the dukes of Queenſberry and Argyle, the earl of Montroſe, Seafield, and Stair, and many other perſons of weight and abilities. Beſides theſe two parties, there was a third claſs, which I have already made mention of by the name Squadrone Volante, or Flying Squadron; the chief of which were, the marquis of Tweddale, the earls of Rothes, Roxburgh, Haddington, and Marchmont, who kept aloof, diſclaiming all connection with both parties, and refuſing to diſcover any part of their ſentiments in regard to this important affair; but as it was well known that they had many cauſes to be diſguſted with the court, it was univerſally thought they would oppoſe any ſcheme which proceeded from that quarter.

Such was the diſpoſition of minds and parties in Scotland, when the parliament reſumed its ſeſſion on the fifteenth of October, when the queſtion being put, Whether to proceed immediately to the conſideration of the articles of union, or refer the conſideration thereof till the firſt ſitting of the enſuing week? it was carried to proceed, one hundred and ſixteen voices againſt fifty-two. Here the ſtrength of the court party appeared; and indeed both ſides exerted themſelves with the utmoſt zeal in order to carry their favourite points; and the debates were agitated with all that warmth and eagerneſs which the importance of the ſubject naturally inſpired.

* Burnet. Lamberti. Military Hiſtory of Prince Eugene and the Duke of Marlborough, vol. ii. Hare.

It was aſſerted by the oppoſers of an union, that the devolving the power of the Scottiſh parliament into the hands of a ſmall number of lords, barons, and burgeſſes, allowed to ſit and vote with all the lords and commons of England, in a parliament to be called The Parliament of Great Britain, was diſhonourable and prejudicial to the kingdom of Scotland, tending to the deſtruction of their antient conſtitution, and all their rights and privileges as a free people in general, and to every individual perſon and ſociety within the kingdom: that they ſhould entirely loſe their ſovereignty and independency, and give up the birth-right of their peers, and the privileges of the barons and burghs: that the rights and intereſts reſerved to them by the articles of union were not in any degree ſecured, ſeeing that the plurality of voices in the parliament of Great Britain muſt determine whatever was brought before them; nor could it be expected that the members of Scotland in the Britiſh parliament would ever be able to carry any point that might be for the intereſt of Scotland, againſt ſo great a majority, who, though divided among themſelves about party-diſputes, would yet unite againſt the Scots, to whom they all bore a natural antipathy: that the being let into the trade of England would be of little or no advantage to them, under the reglations and reſtrictions the Engliſh trade was at preſent in the ſeveral companies. The preſbyterian kirk was alſo repreſented to be in great danger, from the twenty-ſix biſhops who were to ſit in the Britiſh parliament, whereas the kirk would have none to repreſent them. Great objections were alſo made to the ſacramental teſt, being the condition of acceſs to all places of profit or truſt. And it was repreſented as a farther grievance, that the ſovereign was obliged to be of the communion of the church of England *.

In anſwer to theſe objections it was urged, that the ſmall proportion which the Scottiſh would bear to the Engliſh members, could never be attended with thoſe dreadful conſequences which had been ſo artfully diſplayed: few points, if any, could occur, in which the intereſts of Scotland would interfere with thoſe of England: their intereſts were already in a great meaſure the ſame; it was a principal intention of the union to render them invariably and for ever ſuch; nor would ever any ſet of men go about to divide them, but thoſe who had ſome ſiniſter ends to anſwer, or who preferred their own private intereſts to thoſe of their country; and if ſuch perſons ſuffered by the deciſions of a Britiſh parliament, they had no reaſon to complain; they would have ſuffered, or at leaſt they ought to have ſuffered, by the deciſions of a Scottiſh parliament, as that kingdom was bound even more than Great Britain to puniſh the perfidy, treachery, or injuſtice of her own ſubjects: that to aſſert the Engliſh had a natural antipathy to the Scots was a cruel and invidious reflection, contrary to truth, refuted by daily experience, and could only be made with a view to excite animoſities between the two nations, in order perhaps to attain ſome end which could not otherwiſe be accompliſhed: that the union, inſtead of aboliſhing the parliament of Scotland, would rather eſtabliſh it upon a more ſolid foundation, by incorporating it with the parliament of England, which could not with any propriety be ſaid to be ſubſtituted in its place, the Britiſh parliament being ſubſtituted in the place of both; and in this ſenſe indeed the parliament of England, as well as that of Scotland, might be ſaid to be aboliſhed; that their fears therefore, with regard to the conduct of the Britiſh parliament, were entirely groundleſs, as it was not likely that aſſembly would ever take any ſtep prejudicial to the rights and privileges of the people, which they had hitherto defended, nor infringe the articles of the union, which they would make it their care regularly to obſerve: that the union beſides would be attended with many poſſible advantages; it would for ever deſtroy all difference of intereſt between the different parts of the iſland, which in the conteſt had always proved fatal to the Scots from the great ſuperiority of the Engliſh, &c. &c. †.

Theſe and many other arguments were uſed by both ſides; but they had no farther effect than to diſplay the learning or ingenuity of the ſpeakers, each party having already formed its reſolution; and as they were in point of ſtrength nearly equal, it was not eaſy to determine for ſome time what would be the iſſue, when the Squadrone Volante, already mentioned, ſuddenly declared themſelves for the union, which immediately turned the balance, and decided the controverſy.

The oppoſers of the union finding themſelves thus overpowered, raiſed a moſt terrible clamour all over the nation; they procured addreſſes from a number of counties, boroughs, and pariſhes, proteſting againſt the union. The aſſembly of the kirk alſo petitioned againſt the making the ſecurity of the church of England a fundamental article of the union; for hereby, they ſaid, they would involve the whole nation in great guilt, by conſenting to the eſtabliſhment of the hierarchy and ceremonies of a church which they held to be ſinful and abominable. The preſbyterian preachers at the ſame time employed all their power and credit in waking the reſentment of their hearers againſt the treaty, in which they laboured with ſuch ſucceſs, that the people were rouſed to tranſports of fury and revenge. At Dumfries the articles of union were publicly burnt; and the people declared that their commiſſioners muſt either be ſimple, ignorant, or treacherous, or all together; and that the ratification of the treaty would bring them and their poſterity to be tributary and bond-ſlaves to their neighbours. Even in Edinburgh the mob grew mutinous, and aſſaulted the houſe of ſir Patrick Johnſton, provoſt of Edinburgh, and one of the commiſſioners of the union: nor did the perſon of the high-commiſſioner eſcape inſult, the rabble throwing ſtones into the coach as he paſſed through the ſtreets, though ſurrounded by his guards; and on the thirtieth of November a great number of the rioters entered the parliament-cloſe, with loud outcries for rejecting the articles of union, which gave the miniſtry ſuch apprehenſion, that it was thought convenient to march ſeveral regiments of horſe and dragoons to the north of England, to be in readineſs if there ſhould be a neceſſity for their acting. The tumults nevertheleſs continuing, the duke of Queenſberry wrote to the lord-treaſurer Godolphin, repreſenting the neceſſity of a ſhort adjournment until he ſhould be able to allay the ferment that prevailed among the people: but the treaſurer, who foreſaw that the meaſure would be entirely loſt by delay, regardleſs of the difficulties the commiſſioner had to encounter, inſiſted upon his proceeding; and beſides the precautions uſed to preſerve the public tranquility, and protect the friends of the court from the inſults of the malecontents, it was thought proper to remit conſiderable ſums of money to the Scots treaſury, to be diſtributed to the beſt advantage. Thoſe meaſures, together with the equal prudence and firmneſs ſhewn by the high-commiſſioner, and the other noblemen attached to the union, at length got the better of this national fury; and notwithſtanding all the clamour and oppoſition within and without doors, an act for the ratification of the union paſſed on the ſixteenth of January, 1707, by a majority of one hundred and ten voices, and was touched with the royal ſceptre. An act paſſed at the ſame time for the ſecurity of the preſbyterian kirk of Scotland, as a fundamental and eſſential condition of the union *.

The moſt conſiderable ſpeakers for the union were the earls of Seafield, Stair †, Roxburgh, and Marchmont; and thoſe againſt it, the dukes of Hamilton and Athol, and the marquis of Annandale.

As ſoon as the act for ratifying the treaty of union was paſſed, the parliament next proceeded to prepare an act for ſettling the manner of electing the ſixteen peers and forty-five commons to repreſent Scotland in the parliament of Great Britain, and the proportion the ſhires and boroughs ſhould have of the forty-five members; and it was agreed that thirty ſhould be the number for the ſhires, and fifteen the number for the boroughs. It was reſolved that the borough of Edinburgh ſhould have one repreſentative by itſelf; and then a ſcheme for dividing the boroughs into fifteen diſtricts, each of which was to have one repreſentative, was read and approved. This act being touched with the ſceptre, the three eſtates proceeded to elect their repreſentatives ‡.

The remaining part of the ſeſſion was employed in making regulations concerning the coin, in examining the accounts of their African company, and providing for the due application of the equivalent. On the twenty-fifth day of March the commiſſioner adjourned the parliament, after having in a ſhort ſpeech taken notice of the honour they had acquired in concluding an affair of ſuch importance to their country. His grace then ſet out for London, where he was received by the queen with great marks of pleaſure and approbation; and indeed hiſtory hardly furniſhes us with another inſtance of a miniſtry's having carried a point of ſuch importance, againſt ſuch a violent oppoſition, and contrary to the general ſenſe and inclination of a whole people, exaſperated to the higheſt degree by the apprehenſion of ſeeing their trade deſtroyed, their nation oppreſſed, and their country ruined by an union with their ſiſter kingdom. The majority of both nations expected no otherwiſe than that the treaty would occaſion the moſt violent convulſions, and at laſt prove ineffectual. The event, however, has happily demonſtrated the fallacy of thoſe apprehenſions and predictions: the union took place quietly, and has fully anſwered the ſalutary purpoſes for which it was intended. After this account of the reception the treaty of union met with in Scotland, it remains to ſee what entertainment it found in the parliament of England.

The parliament of England, which had been ſucceſſively prorogued to the third of December, aſſembled that day; and the queen, in her ſpeech to both houſes, congratulated them on the glorious

ſucceſs of the Britiſh army: ſhe deſired the commons would grant ſuch ſupplies as might enable her to improve thoſe ſucceſſes: ſhe told them that the treaty of union, as concluded by the commiſſioners of both kingdoms, was at that time under the conſideration of the Scottiſh parliament; and ſhe recommended diſpatch in public affairs, as the ſureſt method to convince our friends and enemies of the vigour and firmneſs of our proceedings.

This ſpeech was highly pleaſing to the parliament, and both houſes anſwered it in very affectionate addreſſes: nor did they ſtop there; but as a convincing proof of the ſincerity of their expreſſions, they proceeded to the conſideration of the ſupply; and having examined the eſtimates, in leſs than a week they voted near ſix millions for the ſervice of the enſuing year *; and when the ſpeaker preſented the money-bills to her majeſty, he told her, that as the glorious victory obtained by the duke of Marlborough at Ramillies was fought before it could be ſuppoſed the armies were in the field, ſo the commons had granted ſupplies to her majeſty before the enemy could well know that the parliament was ſitting †.

Both houſes voted the duke of Marlborough their thanks for the eminent ſervices he had done her majeſty and the kingdom the laſt campaign: nor did they content themſelves with paying him this compliment; for the lords addreſſed her majeſty on the ſixteenth of December, that ſhe would permit them to bring in a bill to ſettle the titles and honours of the duke of Marlborough, with his right of precedence, on his poſterity, by act of parliament, in ſuch manner as would be acceptable to her majeſty ‡. This was readily complied with on the part of her majeſty; and an act accordingly paſſed to limit his titles and honours to his eldeſt daughter (married to the lord Godolphin's ſon) and her heirs-male, and then to all his other daughters ſucceſſively, according to their priority of birth; and that the royal honour and manor of Woodſtock, and the houſe of Blenheim, ſhould always go along with the titles. The commons alſo ſoon after, to ſhew their gratitude to the duke for the ſignal ſervices he had done his country, addreſſed her majeſty for leave to bring in a bill for ſettling the five thouſand pounds per annum which ſhe had already granted the duke (during her life) out of the Poſt-office, upon him and his poſterity, in like manner as his titles; and the honour and manor of Woodſtock, and houſe of Blenheim, were already limited and ſettled, and a bill was brought in accordingly, which received the royal aſſent.

The city of London having addreſſed her majeſty, that the colours taken at the battle of Ramillies might be put up at Guildhall, they were carried thither in great pomp, eſcorted by a detachment of the horſe and foot guards, being in all ſixty-three colours and twenty-four ſtandards. The ſame day his grace the duke of Marlborough, with the dukes of Ormond and Somerſet, and other great officers and miniſters of ſtate, went to an entertainment provided for them at Vintner's-Hall in the city, by the lord mayor and aldermen.

The lords and commons having adjourned themſelves to the laſt day of December, the queen cloſed the year 1706 with triumphal proceſſions, going in great ſtate to St. Paul's, attended by the great officers, and both houſes of parliament.

Her majeſty was pleaſed in this month of December to make the following promotions of nobility, viz. Henry de Grey, earl of Kent, created viſcount Gooderich, earl of Harold, and marquis of Kent; Robert Bertie, earl of Lindſey, was created marquis of Lindſey, in the county of Lincoln; Evelin Pierpoint, earl of Kingſton, marquis of Doncaſter, in the county of Dorſet; Thomas Wharton, lord Wharton, viſcount Winchindon, in the county of Bucks, and earl of Wharton in the county of Weſtmoreland; John Poulet, lord Poulet, of Hinton St. George, viſcount Hinton St. George, in the county of Somerſet, and earl of Poulet; Sidney Godolphin, lord Godolphin, viſcount Rialton, and earl of Godolphin, in the county of Cornwall; Hugh Cholmondley, lord Cholmondley, viſcount Malpas, and earl of Cholmondley, in the county of Cheſter; Henry Howard, lord Walden, ſon and heir of the earl of Suffolk, baron of Cheſterford, in the county of Eſſex, and earl of Bindon in the county of Dorſet. The lord-keeper Cowper was created lord Cowper and baron of Wingham, in the county of Kent; and ſir Thomas Pelham was made lord Pelham, and baron of Laughton, in the county of Suſſex. Some time before, her majeſty had been pleaſed to create the electoral prince of Hanover (afterwards king George I.) a peer of this kingdom, by the ſtile and title of baron of Tewkſbury, viſcount Northallerton, earl of Milford-Haven, and marquis and duke of Cambridge.

The parliament being re-aſſembled after their ſhort adjournment, the queen came to the houſe of peers on the twenty-eighth day of January, 1707, when ſhe told the parliament that the treaty of union, with ſome additions and alterations, was ratified by the Scottiſh parliament: that ſhe had ordered it to be laid before them, and hoped it would meet with their approbation and concurrence: ſhe deſired the commons would provide for the payment of the equivalent, in caſe the treaty ſhould take place: then addreſſing herſelf to both houſes, ſhe concluded thus:

"You have now an opportunity before you of putting the laſt hand to a happy union of the two kingdoms, which I hope will be a laſting bleſſing to the whole iſland, a great addition to its wealth and power, and a firm ſecurity to the proteſtant religion.

"The advantages that will accrue to us all from an union are ſo apparent, that I will add no more, but that I ſhall look upon it as a particular happi-neſs if this ſo great work, which has been ſo often attempted without ſucceſs, can be brought to perfection in my reign."

* To raiſe this money the parliament gave a land-tax of four ſhillings in the pound, and the duty upon malt for one year; duties upon low wines, the ſtamp-duty, and that upon hawkers, which had been continued till 1710, were now continued for ninety-ſix years, to be a fund for one million one hundred and fifty-five thouſand pounds, to be taken in for annuities at ſixteen years purchaſe; the duty upon houſes was continued for circulating Exchequer-bills, whereby one million five hundred thouſand pounds were raiſed. The old tonnage and poundage, and ſeveral other duties at the cuſtom-houſe, which were already continued to 1710, for paying off deficiencies, were now continued for two years more, for a loan of eight hundred and twenty-two thouſand three hundred and eighty-one pounds, at ſix per cent. intereſt.

On the third of February the commons formed themſelves into a committee of the whole houſe, to deliberate on the articles of the union, and the Scottiſh act of ratification. The Tory party in general were againſt the union, and therefore began without delay to open their batteries. Amongſt many ſevere things ſaid againſt this treaty and the promoters of it, ſir John Packington obſerved, that this incorporating union was like marrying a woman againſt her conſent: that it was an union carried on by corruption within doors, by force and violence without: that the promoters of it had baſely betrayed their truſt, in giving up the independency of their conſtitution; and he would leave it to the judgment of the houſe to conſider, whether men of ſuch principles were fit to be admitted into their houſe of repreſentatives. Her majeſty, he ſaid, by the coronation-oath, was obliged to maintain the church of England, as by law eſtabliſhed; and likewiſe bound by the ſame oath to defend the preſbyterian kirk of Scotland in one and the ſame kingdom: Now (added he) after the union is in force, who ſhall adminiſter this oath to her majeſty? Not the Scots, certainly; for it is not their buſineſs: and beſides, they are no well-wiſhers to the church of England. It reſts then with the biſhops; and can it be ſuppoſed that thoſe reverend perſons will or can act a thing ſo contrary to their own order and inſtitution, as thus to promote the eſtabliſhment of the preſbyterian church government? He concluded with obſerving, that the church of England being eſtabliſhed jure divino, and the Scots pretending that the kirk was alſo jure divino, he could not conceive how two nations that claſhed in ſo eſſential a point, could unite; and therefore was for conſulting the convocation on this critical matter.

He was anſwered by colonel Henry Mordaunt, (brother to the earl of Peterborough) who ſaid, that for his part, he knew of no other jure divino than God Almighty's permiſſion: that in this ſenſe the church of England and the kirk of Scotland might both be ſaid to be jure divino, becauſe God had permitted that the former ſhould prevail in England, the other in Scotland. The member who ſpoke laſt (ſaid the colonel) may, if he pleaſes, conſult the convocation for his own particular information; but I believe the commons ſtand in need of no ſuch inſtruction: they are ſufficient judges of the propriety of their own meaſures; and in any event it would be derogatory to the rights of the commons of England to aſk on this occaſion the advice of any inferior aſſembly, who had no ſhare in the legiſlature *.

Many other members ſpoke for and againſt the union: at length a motion was made, that the firſt article of the treaty, which implies a peremptory agreement to an incorporating union, ſhould be poſtponed, and that the houſe ſhould proceed to the conſideration of the terms of the intended union contained in the other articles. This propoſal being rejected, ſeveral Tory members quitted the houſe; whereupon the firſt, ſecond, third, and fourth articles of the treaty were read and approved without oppoſition; and on the eighth of February the commons, in a committee of the whole houſe, went through and approved the remaining articles: in ſhort, ſuch was the diſpatch made by the party who favoured the union, and who had the majority in the houſe, that by the eleventh of February, a bare week only from the time this important matter was firſt taken into their conſideration, the commons had gone through and approved the whole treaty. This precipitation gave the enemies of the party in power too plauſible an handle to charge them with want of that coolneſs and deliberation which an affair of this importance required.

Before their lordſhips began to inveſtigate the articles of the union, they, at the inſtance of the archbiſhop of Canterbury, brought in a bill for the ſecurity of the church of England, to be inſerted as a fundamental and eſſential part of that treaty. This paſſed through both houſes without oppoſition, and received the royal aſſent. On the fifteenth of February the debates concerning the union were begun in the houſe of lords. The queen herſelf was preſent, and the debates were longer and more ſolemn than thoſe of the commons had been. The lords reſolved themſelves into a committee of the whole houſe, and made Burnet, biſhop of Saliſbury, their chairman. The earls of Rocheſter, Angleſey, and Nottingham, with the biſhop of Bath and Wells, and the lords North and Grey, Stawel and Haverſham, were the principal ſpeakers againſt the union. The latter of theſe noblemen, who of late years had made himſelf famous by his ſet ſpeeches on ſeveral occaſions, could not be ſilent on this, and therefore ſpoke to the following purport. He obſerved, that the articles came to their lordſhips with the greateſt countenance of authority that it is poſſible any thing could have; but, ſaid he, notwithſtanding authority may be the ſtrongeſt motive to incline the will, it was certainly the weakeſt in the world to convince the underſtanding. He was not, he ſaid, againſt a fœderal union, a union in intereſt and in the ſucceſſion; but this was a matter of a different nature: the queſtion, he ſaid, was, Whether two nations, independent in their ſovereignties, that have their diſtinct laws and intereſts, and, which is not to be forgotten, their different forms of worſhip, church-government, and order, ſhall be united into one kingdom? That in his opinion, this was an union compoſed of ſo many miſmatched pieces, of ſuch jarring, incongruous ingredients, that he feared it would require a ſtanding force to keep us from falling aſunder and breaking to pieces every moment. He farther obſerved, that by this act, an hundred Scots peers, and as many commons, were excluded the Britiſh parliament; gentlemen who as little thought of being excluded a year or two before as any of their lordſhips did then: that their rights were as well and as ſtrongly ſecured to them as their lordſhips were at that time, by the fundamental laws of their kingdom, by the claim of right, and by act of parliament, whereby it was made high-treaſon to make any alteration in the conſtitution of the kingdom. He ſaid, that if the biſhops would weaken their own cauſe, ſo far as to give up the two great points of epiſcopal ordination and confirmation; if they would approve and ratify the act for ſecuring the preſbyterian church-government in Scotland "as the true proteſtant religion and purity of worſhip," (according to the words in the Scottiſh act) they gave up that which had been contended for between them and the preſbyterians many years, and been defended by the greateſt and moſt learned men of the church of England. He diſapproved of exempting articles, reſerving to the preſent poſſeſſors the heritable offices and ſuperiorities; both which, he ſaid, Cromwell had been ſo wiſe as by an act of ſtate to aboliſh. He ſaid that the union was contrary to the general ſenſe of the Scottiſh nation, ſufficiently manifeſted by the murmurs of all ranks of people in that kingdom, while the treaty was under conſideration of the parliament there; adding, That he ſaw no neceſſity for this incorporating union, ſince Scotland had offered to come into the ſucceſſion without it; and he thought it a very dangerous experiment to both nations: but the topic upon which he laid the chief ſtreſs, and which was enforced by the lords Guernſey, Granville, and Abingdon, who alſo ſpoke againſt the union, was, the injury the good old Engliſh conſtitution, juſtly allowed to be the moſt equal and beſt poiſed government in the world, might ſuffer by having the weight of ſixty-one Scottiſh members, and thoſe too returned by a Scottiſh privy-council, thrown into the ſcale.

The lord North and Grey complained of the ſmall and unequal proportion of the land-tax charged upon Scotland. His lordſhip alſo found great fault with the equivalent granted to that kingdom by the fifteenth article of the treaty, in which he was joined by the earl of Rocheſter, and the lords Guildford and Leigh, who ſaid they conceived nothing could have been more equal on this head of the treaty, than that neither of the kingdoms ſhould have been burthened with the debts of the other contracted before the union; but the revenues of Scotland might have been ſtrictly appropriated to diſcharge the debts of that kingdom, or to any other uſes within themſelves as ſhould have been judged requiſite; and there would have been no need of an equivalent of near four hundred thouſand pounds, to be raiſed in England within this year for the purchaſe of thoſe revenues in Scotland, at a time when this kingdom is already burthened with ſuch vaſt ſums for the neceſſary charges of the war. The earl of Nottingham, after having oppoſed every article of the treaty ſeparately, concluded with the following obſervation: "As ſir John Maynard ſaid to king William at the Revolution, that having buried all his cotemporaries in Weſtminſter-hall, he was afraid, if his majeſty had not come in that very juncture of time, he might likewiſe have out-lived the very laws; ſo if this union do paſs, as I have no reaſon to doubt but it will, I may affirm that I have outlived all the laws, and the very conſtitution of England: I therefore pray God to avert the dire effects which may probably enſue from ſuch an incorporating union."

Such were in ſubſtance the arguments made uſe of by thoſe who oppoſed the union. It may be ſufficient to obſerve, that to all the objections that were offered againſt that treaty taking place, this general anſwer was made, That ſo great a thing as the uniting the whole iſland into one government could not be compaſſed but with ſome inconveniencies; but if the advantage of ſafety and union was greater than thoſe inconveniencies, then a leſſer evil muſt be ſubmitted to: that with regard to matters of an eccleſiaſtical nature, all parties had been guilty of many inſtances of violence; but that the heats and animoſities between them might be allayed by ſoft and gentle management. It was obſerved, that the cantons of Switzerland, though they profeſſed different religions, were yet united in one general body, and the diet of Germany was compoſed of princes and ſtates, among whom three different perſuaſions prevailed; ſo that two different ſorts of diſcipline might very well ſubſiſt under one government: that if there was any danger on either ſide, it threatened the Scots much more than the Engliſh, as it was more likely the five hundred and thirteen members ſhould get the better of forty-five, than that forty-five ſhould overcome five hundred and thirteen; and in the houſe of lords twenty-ſix biſhops would always be an over-match for ſixteen Scots peers. The chief ſpeakers for the union were the earls of Godolphin, Sunderland, and Wharton, the lords Townſhend, Halifax, and Somers, the biſhops of Oxford, Norwich, and Sarum *.

Notwithſtanding all the oppoſition made by the lords of the Tory party, every article was approved by a great majority, though not without ſeveral proteſts. Hereupon a bill of ratification was prepared in the lower houſe by ſir Simon Harcourt the ſollicitor-general, in ſuch an artful manner as to prevent all debate; and the Whigs promoted it with ſuch zeal, that it paſſed by a majority of one hundred and fourteen voices. It made its way through the houſe of lords with equal diſpatch, and on the fourth of March received the royal aſſent, when the queen made the following ſpeech upon the occaſion:

"My lords and gentlemen,

"It is with the greateſt ſatisfaction that I have given my aſſent to a bill for uniting England and Scotland into one kingdom.

"I conſider this union as a matter of the greateſt importance to the wealth, ſtrength, and ſafety of the whole iſland; and at the ſame time a work of ſo much difficulty and nicety in its own nature, that till now all attempts which have been made towards it, in the courſe of above one hundred years, have proved ineffectual; and therefore I make no doubt but it will be remembered and ſpoke of hereafter to the honour of thoſe who have been inſtrumental in bringing it to ſuch a happy concluſion. I deſire and expect from all my ſubjects of both nations, that from henceforth they act with all poſſible reſpect and kindneſs one to another, that ſo it may appear to all the world they have hearts diſpoſed to be one people.

"This will be a great pleaſure to me, and will make us all quickly ſenſible of the good effects of this union.

"And I cannot but look upon it as a particular happineſs, that in my reign ſo full a proviſion is made for the peace and quiet of my people, and for the ſecurity of our religion, by ſo firm an eſtabliſhment of the proteſtant ſucceſſion throughout Great Britain."

The reſt of the ſpeech contains only her deſire that the commons would provide for the equivalent for Scotland, and that the two houſes would uſe all poſſible diſpatch in the public buſineſs before them.

On the eleventh of March the two houſes attended her majeſty with addreſſes of congratulation on the union of the two kingdoms, which were moſt graciouſly received, and condeſcendingly anſwered.

I have already given an abſtract of the twenty-five articles of union, and ſhall in this place add an abſtract of the acts for the ſecurity of the reſpective churches of England and Scotland, which were made eſſential conditions of the union.

The tenor of the act for ſecuring the proteſtant religion and preſbyterian church-government in Scotland.

"Her majeſty, with the advice and conſent of the eſtates in parliament, doth hereby eſtabliſh the true proteſtant religion, worſhip, diſcipline, and government of this church, to continue without alteration to the people of this land to all generations; and confirms the fifth act of the firſt parliament of W. & M. entitled, "An act ratifying the confeſſion of faith, and ſettling the preſbyterian church-government, and other acts relating thereto, in proſecution of the declaration of the eſtates, containing the claim of right, dated the eleventh of April 1689:" and her majeſty, with the advice and conſent aforeſaid, declares that the government of the church by kirk-ſeſſions, preſbyteries, provincial ſynods, and general-aſſemblies eſtabliſhed, ſhall continue unalterable; and that the ſaid preſbyterian government ſhall be the only government of the church of Scotland.

"That the univerſities of St. Andrews, Glaſgow, Aberdeen, and Edinburgh, as now eſtabliſhed, ſhall continue for ever: that none bearing any office in any univerſity, college, or ſchool there, ſhall be admitted or continued in their office, but ſuch as ſhall acknowlege the civil government preſcribed, or to be preſcribed by parliament; and alſo at their admiſſions ſubſcribe the ſaid confeſſion of their faith; and that they will practiſe and conform themſelves to the worſhip in uſe in this church, ſubmit to the diſcipline, and never attempt the ſubverſion thereof.

"The ſubjects of this kingdom ſhall be free from any oath, teſt, or ſubſcription, within this kingdom, inconſiſtent with the ſaid true proteſtant religion, church-government, worſhip, and diſcipline.

"The ſovereign ſucceeding her majeſty ſhall, in all times coming, on acceſſion to the crown, ſwear and ſubſcribe that they ſhall preſerve the ſaid ſettlement of religion, government, worſhip, diſcipline, and privileges of this church.

"This act ſhall be held a fundamental and eſſential condition of any union to be concluded between the two kingdoms, without alteration, for ever.

"And her majeſty declares, that all laws and ſtatutes in this kingdom, inconſiſtent with the terms of theſe articles, ſhall after the union ceaſe and be void."

The tenor of an act for ſecuring of the church of England, as by law eſtabliſhed.

"That an act made in the thirteenth of Elizabeth, cap. 12. for the miniſters of the church to be of a ſound religion; and an act made 13 Car. II. cap. 4. for the uniformity of public prayers, &c. (other than ſuch clauſes in the ſaid acts as have been repealed) and all other acts in force for the preſervation of the church of England, doctrine and government thereof, ſhall be in force for ever.

"Every king and queen ſucceeding her majeſty, at their coronation, ſhall, in the preſence of all perſons aſſiſting, or otherwiſe preſent, take and ſubſcribe an oath to preſerve the ſettlement of the church of England, and the doctrine, diſcipline, and government thereof, within the kingdoms of England and Scotland, and the territories thereunto belonging.

"This act ſhall be held a fundamental and eſſential part of any union between the two kingdoms.

"Then enacted, that the ſaid articles of union, and the ſaid act for the eſtabliſhing the proteſtant religion and the preſbyterian church-government in Scotland ſhall be, and are hereby ratified, approved, and confirmed.

"And that the act paſſed this preſent ſeſſion of parliament, cap. 5. for ſecuring the church of England, as by law eſtabliſhed, and the ſaid act for ſecuring the proteſtant religion and the preſbyterian church-government, ſhall for ever be held fundamental and eſſential conditions of the ſaid union *."

Thus, after many vigorous, though ineffectual, attempts for the purpoſe, was at length happily accompliſhed an union between the kingdoms of England and Scotland, which took place on the firſt day of May, 1707. The great benefits accruing to both nations by this union do now daily appear more and more conſpicuous. From that country England has her American plantations very much increaſed in people; and from Scotland likewiſe not only the navy-royal, but our land-armies, have been ſupplied with many thouſands of ſtout and well-affected men, as has very lately and very effectually been experienced: and although the two rebellions ſince the union were both originally propagated from Scotland, through the violence of party-zeal, and of clanſhips and ſuperiorities, ſince wiſely aboliſhed; yet a peaceable, loyal, and induſtrious ſpirit have ſince univerſally prevailed in that country. By an union with Scotland, England has alſo the more abſolute uſe of many good ports, of a more extenſive fiſhery, of a ſupply of very good, though ſmall cattle, and of ſundry other benefits. SCOTLAND, on the other hand, receives ineſtimable advantages by her incorporating union with England; firſt, by gradually and very viſibly enriching herſelf, from a participation of commerce with England's foreign plantations, factories, &c. Secondly, by this connection with England, ſhe has gradually learnt the melioration of her ſoil, which in many parts is now known to be much more capable of improvement than was formerly imagined. Thirdly, by this union Scotland has procured a prodigious vent for coarſe woollen, ſtockings, and ſtuffs, and her more valuable linen manufactures, not only in England, but for the American plantations, as well as the conſumption of ſo many of her black cattle, peltry, &c. It affords equal matter of concern and ſurprize, that two nations, ſprung from the ſame original ſtock, ſpeaking the ſame language eſſentially, profeſſing the ſame religion, and whom nature ſeems to have deſigned for one, being ſeparated by the Great Ocean from the reſt of mankind, ſhould not have ſooner purſued their true and evident mutual intereſts, and thereby have much ſooner increaſed in wealth, ſecurity, and power.

On the twenty-fourth of April the queen prorogued the parliament, after having told them, in a ſhort ſpeech, that ſhe would continue by proclamation the lords and commons already aſſembled, as members in the firſt Britiſh parliament, purſuant to the power veſted in her by the acts of parliament of both kingdoms. The parliament was accordingly revived by a proclamation, and by another the firſt parliament of Great Britain was appointed to meet on the twentieth of October.

Mean while ſeveral of the Scottiſh lords repaired to London, where they were moſt graciouſly received by the queen, who beſtowed the title of duke on the earls of Roxburgh and Montroſe, who, with the earls of Seafield, Mar, and Loudon, were ſworn of the privy-council. The union taking place on the firſt of May, that day was obſerved as a day of public thankſgiving: congratulatory addreſſes were preſented by the different counties and corporations of England; but the univerſity of Oxford and the Scots were wholly ſilent on this occaſion, diſcovering thereby their diſlike of a meaſure which her majeſty had declared to be the greateſt glory of her reign, and of the benefits of which they enjoyed an equal, if not the greateſt ſhare.

In order to preſerve entire the chain of proceedings in the affair of the union, I purpoſely omitted to mention in their places the following particulars which happened during this ſeſſion of parliament.

The French having made great depredations upon the iſlands of Nevis and St. Kit's in the preceding year, 1706, and exerciſed great cruelty upon the inhabitants, the houſe of commons addreſſed her majeſty about reſettling thoſe iſlands: and the marquis of Caermarthen having offered to go with a ſquadron of men of war to Madagaſcar, to ſuppreſs a neſt of pirates who had become very troubleſome in thoſe parts; the houſe appointed a committee to conſider of that matter, and it was reſolved to preſent an addreſs to the queen, to take ſuch meaſures as in her wiſdom ſhould appear meet to ſuppreſs the ſaid pirates; as alſo that her majeſty would be pleaſed to uſe her endeavours to recover and preſerve the antient poſſeſſions, trade, and fiſhery in Newfoundland. The French refugees alſo, by private direction of biſhop Burnet, and ſome other perſons in power, addreſſed the queen in behalf of their proteſtant brethren labouring under perſecution in France. In this addreſs, which was preſented on the ſeventh of April, by ſome of the moſt eminent among the French refugees, they moſt humbly beſeech her majeſty, "That when her thoughts ſhould be employed in ſettling the great concerns of Europe in a treaty of peace, her majeſty would graciouſly vouchſafe to take into her royal care the intereſt of the poor diſtreſſed churches of France, which having been ruined by the ſuperſtitious vanity of the enemy, ſo it would add to the ſolid glory of her majeſty's reign to be inſtrumental in reſtoring the ſame." To which her majeſty was pleaſed to return a moſt gracious anſwer, promiſing to comply with their requeſt. A ſet of inflammatory writers having of late undertaken, at the inſtigation of the enemies of the union, to alarm the nation with apprehenſions of the church's danger, and to revile and traduce the conduct of the miniſters; and having carried their licentiouſneſs to an inſufferable height, the government thought it high time to take cognizance of theſe incendiaries. Proſecutions were commenced againſt Dr. Brown for a copy of verſes, entitled, "The country parſon's advice to the lord-keeper," and a letter which he wrote to Mr. ſecretary Harley. He was found guilty, and ſentenced to be twice pilloried. The ſame puniſhment was decreed againſt William Stephens, rector of Sutton in Surry, as author of a pamphlet called, "A letter to the author of the memorial of the church of England:" but, in conſideration of his being in holy orders, the execution of the ſentence was remitted. Edward Ward and William Pitts were ſet in the pillory for abuſive writings; and George Sawbridge, the publiſher of all of them, was fined ſix hundred pounds, and ordered to appear in the courts of Weſtminſter-Hall, with a paper on his breaſt denoting his offence *.

The convocation was aſſembled, as uſual, during the ſeſſion of the parliament, and both houſes preſented her majeſty with a very affectionate and loyal addreſs, declaring that the church was in no danger from her majeſty. The lower houſe, however, voted as if they imagined the church was in ſome danger from the terms of the union, and were actually employed in drawing up a remonſtrance to the commons againſt that treaty. On this ſuppoſition, which the court was apprized of, the queen ordered the archbiſhop to prorogue the convocation for three weeks, by which time it was preſumed the act for ratifying the union would have paſſed both houſes. The lower houſe complied with this prorogation, but at the ſame time delivered a repreſentation to the biſhops, in which they complained of the prorogation, as a thing that had never been ordered during the ſitting of the parliament ſince the Reformation. The biſhops however having proved to her majeſty, from the public records, that there were no leſs than ſeven or eight precedents of ſuch prorogation during the ſeſſion of parliament; the queen wrote a letter to the archbiſhop, ſeverely reflecting on the conduct of the lower houſe, which ſhe conſidered as an invaſion of her royal ſupremacy; and threatened, if any thing of the like nature was attempted for the future, ſhe would uſe ſuch means as the law warranted for puniſhing offenders.

Soon after the breaking up of the parliament, ſome changes were made in ſeveral of the public offices, all of them in favour of the Whigs, by the intereſt of Mr. ſecretary Harley. Sir Simon Harcourt was conſtituted attorney-general, in the room of ſir Edward Northey; ſir James Montagu ſucceeded ſir Simon in the place of ſollicitor-general. In the beginning of May the queen declared the lord-keeper Cowper lord high-chancellor of Great Britain. Prince George of Denmark took the oaths in the court of Chancery as lord high-admiral of Great Britain; and in like manner the earl of Godolphin was re-appointed lord high-treaſurer of Great Britain: but the moſt conſiderable change had been made in the month of December, by the promotion of the earl of Sunderland to the poſt of ſecretary of ſtate, in the room of ſir Charles Hedges. This was brought about, againſt the queen's inclination, by the preſſing inſtances of the Whigs, who, after the ſervices they had done, thought that one of the ſecretaries at leaſt ſhould be a man in whom they could place confidence. The republic of Venice having at laſt appointed ambaſſadors extraordinary to compliment the queen on her acceſſion to the throne, her majeſty in return nominated the earl of Mancheſter her ambaſſador-extraordinary to that republic, and in his journey thither he was to call at the courts of Vienna and Turin *.

The battle of Hochſtet, or Blenheim, had coſt Lewis XIV. a fine army, and the whole country from the Danube to the Rhine. The confederates had made themſelves maſters of all Flanders, to the very gates of Liſle, in conſequence of the glorious day of Ramillies; and the defeat at Turin, had drove the French out of Italy. They had, however, ſtill ſome troops left in the duchy of Milan, and the little victorious army under the count de Medavy. They were alſo ſtill in poſſeſſion of ſome ſtrong places. Lewis offered to give up all theſe to the emperor, provided he would permit thoſe troops, which amounted to about fifteen thouſand men, to retire unmoleſted. The emperor accepted of the propoſition, and the duke of Savoy gave his aſſent, without the Engliſh or Dutch being once conſulted about the matter. By this treaty, which was ſigned on the twelfth of March, 1707, the emperor Joſeph became peaceable poſſeſſor of Italy; the kingdom of Naples and Sicily was guarantied to him; and every thing which had formerly been feodal, was now treated as ſubject to a ſupreme power. He impoſed a tax of fifteen thouſand piſtoles upon Tuſcany, forty thouſand upon the duchy of Mantua; and Parma, Modena, Lucca, and Genoa, notwithſtanding they were free ſtates, were included in theſe impoſitions.

In the beginning of this campaign all the enemies of France ſeemed to have acquired new ſtrength, and that kingdom to be on the verge of ruin: ſhe was puſhed on all ſides, both by ſea and land. Of the formidable fleets with which Lewis XIV. had, till lately, domineered on the Ocean, ſcarcely thirty ſhips of the line were remaining. Straſburg ſtill continued to be the barrier town towards Germany; but by the loſs of Landau, all Alſace lay expoſed. A deſign had been formed for the following campaign to invade Provence by ſea and land. The duke of Savoy had undertook to march an army into that province, and to act there as ſhould be concerted by the allies. In a word, deſtruction ſeemed now hanging over the head of the Grand Monarch, who had ſo lately been the terror of all Europe, from which nothing could, in all probability, have ſaved him, but the miſconduct of the confederates. Lewis, by virtue of his capitulation with the emperor in Italy, was enabled to ſend ſuch reinforcements into Spain and the Netherlands, as rendered him capable of oppoſing the allies.

Hitherto the arms of the confederates had been attended with amazing ſucceſs in Spain; but this campaign Fortune ſeemed to abandon them all at once. The Spaniards appeared to be thoroughly reconciled to the government of Philip, and Charles was not in a condition to exert ſufficient force to make them acknowlege him as their ſovereign. His army was much inferior to that of the enemy: he had ſuſtained an almoſt irreparable loſs by the death of the brave prince of D'Armſtadt, who, as I have already related, was killed at the attack upon Barcelona; and the earl of Peterborough had retired into Italy. The earl of Galway, and brigadier-general Stanhope, who commanded in his abſence, were brave and gallant officers: they had the cauſe of the prince they were ſent to ſerve at heart; but they did not poſſeſs all thoſe qualifications which the ſituation of Charles's affairs required. The glory acquired by the duke of Marlborough, their friend and patron, had fired them with emulation, without imparting to them that great general's military capacity. They were eager to ſtrike ſome important blow; and they perſuaded Charles to ſecond their views, by penetrating once more to Madrid, and fighting the enemy wherever they ſhould appear, though much againſt his inclination, as he was very much averſe to engage in any hazardous enterprize. Not that this prince wanted courage; on the contrary, he poſſeſſed a great ſhare of it, joined to a clear head, and a ſolidity of judgment above his years. He repoſed a great confidence in the earl of Peterborough, and that nobleman declared againſt an offenſive war, on account of the difficulty of finding ſubſiſtence in Caſtile. He ſent his opinion from Italy, in which he adviſed Charles to avoid a deciſive action: he repreſented the fatal and irreparable conſequences that might enſue from a defeat: he demonſtrated that thoſe might eaſily be avoided, by remaining on the defenſive, and waiting the event of the intended expedition againſt Provence, which could not fail one way or another to oblige the French king to recal his troops out of Spain to protect his own dominions: he obſerved alſo, that as a fleet was daily expected from England with a powerful reinforcement of men and military ſtores, it would be time enough to attack the enemy when they arrived. This advice, however, prudent as it was, had no attention paid to it. The earl of Galway, brigadier Montroſe, and the marquis das Minas, the Portugueze general, were bent upon coming to action; and it was reſolved in a council of war to go in queſt of the enemy, and offer them battle wherever they ſhould appear; and, in order to provoke the Spaniards to the ſame reſolve, the army, to the number of fifteen thouſand men, was aſſembled at Caudela * on the firſt day of April, and on the ſeventh of the ſame month laid ſiege to the caſtle of Valencia, lying in the road between Valencia and Caſtile: but hearing that the duke of Berwick was in the neighbourhood, they advanced on the fourteenth of the ſame month towards the town of Almanza, where the enemy were drawn up in order of battle, their number, as I have before obſerved, being greatly ſuperior to that of the allies. The following is the account of this fatal day, as publiſhed by authority.

Our army entered the plain of Almanza about noon, and formed in the line of battle, and ſo marched till it came within a mile of the enemy. Lord Galway, to ſupply our want of cavalry, had interlined a brigade of foot with each wing of horſe: but the enemy having drawn from the left ſome ſquadrons to reinforce their right wing, lord Tyrawley, who commanded at the left wing, ordered the Portugueze horſe, of the left of the rear line, commanded by the count de Attalaya, to double into our firſt line, in order to make an equal front with the enemy.

About three o'clock in the afternoon the earl of Galway poſted himſelf at the head of the Engliſh dragoons, and marched to begin the battle with the enemy's right wing of horſe; the Portugueze being ordered to take the charge as it ſhould come to them from the left, but not before the Engliſh and Dutch were actually engaged. While we were marching on, the enemy began to play upon us from a battery on a riſing ground, a little in the front of their right: but our troops preſſing on to come to a cloſe engagement, the cannon on either ſide did little execution; and a detachment of dragoons being ſent under colonel Dormer to attack the enemy's battery, they retired with their guns in great precipitation. As ſoon as our left wing was advanced within an hundred paces of the enemy's horſe, they likewiſe advanced out of their line to meet our charge, and the engagement ſoon became very bloody and obſtinate on both ſides. The enemy, by the weight of their ſquadrons, forced ours to retreat ſome paces; but two regiments of foot, on the left of that brigade which was interlined with the horſe of the firſt line, coming up, threw in their fire upon the enemy's flank and rear, and our cavalry at the ſame time renewing their charge in front, drove them in diſorder through their own lines with a very great ſlaughter.

By this time the Engliſh and Dutch foot, who formed the center of our army, under the command of lieutenant-general Erle and baron Freyſheim, were ſharply engaged, and broke through the enemy's firſt and ſecond lines, bearing down all before them as far as the walls of Almanza: but this ſucceſs was not of long duration; for the enemy's ſquadrons of the ſecond line fell in upon their flank, and forced our infantry back with great loſs.

The enemy obſerving that the cavalry of our right did not advance with our left wing, detached ſome ſquadrons to fall upon the Portugueze, who formed the right line, under the command of the marquis das Minas. Theſe troops, in the moſt daſtardly manner, gave way upon the firſt charge, and the whole right wing made off and abandoned their infantry, who were moſt of them either killed or taken priſoners. The battle ſtill continued on our left wing, the enemy ſtill charging us with freſh ſquadrons, but without ſucceſs; which the duke of Berwick perceiving, he ſent nine battalions, moſt of them French, who drew up before the firſt line of the Spaniſh horſe, to oppoſe our brigade of foot, conſiſting of five regiments. At the ſame time they brought up ſeveral freſh ſquadrons, to make another charge upon our left wing of horſe. The count d'Attalaya, who commanded the Portugueze horſe that were mixed with our dragoons, was carried off wounded. Our troops were now attacked on every ſide; and being left naked in the flanks by the cowardly flight of the Portugueze wing, were ſurrounded and hemmed in on all ſides.

In this dreadful ſituation, they formed themſelves into a hollow ſquare, and retired from the field of battle. Had they been able to make their retreat good, the enemy would have had no great cauſe to boaſt of the victory, the loſs on both ſides being nearly equal; but the men, after marching nine hours without any refreſhment, and fighting about ſix, were fainting with fatigue: all their ammunition was gone; they ſaw themſelves abandoned by their own horſe, and in a country to which they were utter ſtrangers; deſtitute of proviſions, and cut off from all hopes of a ſupply. Upon theſe conſiderations, they reſolved to ſurrender themſelves (to the amount of thirteen battalions) as the French infantry had done at Blenheim, and to ſend to the duke of Berwick to deſire honourable terms, which were gladly granted; and the duke, who was at ſome diſtance, and indeed thought this body out of his reach, ſent count d'Aſfeldt to receive their ſurrender, on theſe conditions; That they ſhould be priſoners of war till they ſhould be exchanged; that they ſhould be all diſarmed but the officers, who ſhould keep their ſwords; and that they ſhould have liberty to ſend for their baggage before they marched any farther. The Portugueze, and part of the Engliſh horſe that guarded the baggage, retreated to Alcira.

In this fatal action the confederates loſt above ten thouſand men, two thouſand of whom were left dead on the field of battle, and among thoſe the following officers; brigadier Killegrew, the colonels Roper, Laurence, Dormer, Deloches, Green, Auſtin, MacNeal, Woolet, Withers, Ramſey, and Erſkine. The earl of Galway, who charged in perſon at the head of Guiſcard's dragoons, received a deep cut in his face, having before loſt his right hand, with which he might have parried the blow. The marquis das Minas was run through the arm, and ſaw his miſtreſs, who fought in the habit of an Amazon, killed by his ſide. The lord Mark Ker; Mr. O'Hara, ſon to the lord Tyrawley; and the colonels Clayton and Pierce were wounded. The loſs of the enemy was not much inferior to ours.

After this unfortunate battle lord Galway retired with the remains of the army to the frontiers of Catalonia, in order to join king Charles, who was purpoſing to march to the borders of Rouſſillon †.

Neither Philip nor Charles were preſent at this action. The duke of Orleans, who had been appointed to the command in Spain, did not arrive till the day after the battle: however, he made all the advantage he could of the victory, marching into Valencia, and reducing that whole province, with the capital city, before the middle of May. He afterwards continued his route to Saragoſſa, the capital of Arragon; whereupon that whole kingdom made their ſubmiſſion to king Philip, imploring his clemency. The duke, however, diſarmed them for the preſent, and they were obliged to buy their peace with great ſums of money, beſides ſubſiſting the French army with proviſions. King Philip afterwards thought fit to deprive them of their antient privileges for a time, and took ſuch other meaſures to mortify them as enraged princes generally exerciſe towards rebellious ſubjects. The duke of Orleans afterwards began a private negotiation with the earl of Galway, during which the two armies lay inactive; and he concluded the campaign with the ſiege of Lerida ‡, which was ſurrendered by capitulation on the ſecond day of November; then the troops on both ſides went into winter quarters. The earl of Galway and the marquis das Minas embarked at Barcelona for Liſbon; and general Carpenter remained commander of the Engliſh forces quartered in Catalonia, which was now the only part of Spain that remained to king Charles §.

The allies, glowing with indignation at the check their arms had received at Almanza, reſolved to put in execution, without delay, the ſcheme they had formed for an attack upon Toulon, hoping to make themſelves amends for the loſſes they had ſuffered in Spain, by over-running the fertile provinces of the ſouth of France, to which Toulon is the key, on the ſide of the Mediterranean. With this view, no expence was ſpared to fit out the moſt formidable armament that had been raiſed for ſome years. Queen Anne remitted a large ſum of money to the duke of Savoy, who, with prince Eugene, was to enter France on the ſide of Provence, at the head of thirty thouſand men, while the combined fleets of England and Holland, under the command of ſir Cloudeſley Shovel, were to aſſiſt their operations by ſea. Secrecy, however, the ſoul of every great enterprize, was wanting here; and the duke of Savoy embarraſſed the meaſures (that had been concerted with great ſagacity) by his irreſolution and delay. The Engliſh and Dutch, who looked upon the conqueſt of Toulon as certain, ſent a large body of troops to fill up the vacancies that had been occaſioned by the emperor's having drawn off conſiderable detachments to ſend through the eccleſiaſtical ſtate towards Naples, of which he had made himſelf maſter without any difficulty. The forces of the confederates were formed into three different armies, in order to amuſe the enemy, and more effectually to conceal their real intentions

It was about the month of June when the deſign upon Toulon firſt began to appear; whereupon the mareſchal de Teſſe, who commanded in Provence, made all the diſpoſitions that could be expected from an experienced and prudent general on ſuch an occaſion; notwithſtanding which the duke of Savoy and prince Eugene paſſed the Var on the eleventh day of July, with their whole army, and advanced directly towards Toulon ‖, whither the artillery and ammunition, which were very formidable, were tranſported on board of the combined ſquadrons. The confederate army being arrived before the place, prince Eugene went upon one of the heights in the neighbourhood, to obſerve the diſpoſition of the enemy, when he ſoon perceived the whole difficulty of the enterprize he had undertaken, and found that he muſt fight an army ſtrongly entrenched in the out-works, and on the heights that ſurrounded the place, and which were well furniſhed with a vaſt number of guns: in fine, that the town, ſo far from being unprovided for a ſiege, as the allies had been made to believe, was in a condition to bid defiance to their ſtrongeſt efforts; upon which the prince was for making a timely retreat, but the duke of Savoy was poſitive in his opinion for carrying on the enterprize. Accordingly a council of war being held, it was reſolved to begin their operations with the attack of the hill of St. Catherine, which the enemy had fortified; and in this firſt attempt the allies ſucceeded, though not without loſs. They now began to erect their batteries on this eminence, and to play with red-hot ſhot upon the town, accompanied by an inceſſant ſhower of bombs from the fleet, which did prodigious damage to the buildings and works of the place. They alſo attacked and carried Fort St. Louis, le Grand Tour, and Balaguier, three little forts in the harbour.

While the allies were thus employed, the enemy were not idle: they made ſeveral vigorous ſallies, in which they cut off a good number of our troops, and nailed up ſome cannon. Marſhal de Teſſe gathered in all the troops that were in the country, as well militia as regulars; and by the fifteenth of Auguſt found his numbers ſo increaſed, that he reſolved to attempt diſlodging the allies from the poſt of St. Catherine, coſt what it might; and indeed he took his meaſures with great ſkill and ſagacity: he ordered two attacks to be made; the one feigned, the other true; but both ſo ordered as to co-operate with and mutually aſſiſt each other: that which was deſtined againſt the hill of St. Catherine he commanded in perſon, and the French attacked the confederates with a fury not to be withſtood. The duke and the prince ſent four battalions to their relief, but it was too late; the French had driven our men from the poſt with ſuch ſlaughter, that not above thirty were left out of a body of between eight and nine hundred. In this action the prince of Saxe-Gotha, one of the braveſt of the confederate generals, chuſing rather to die on the ſpot than abandon his poſt, put himſelf at the head of this ſmall remnant, crying out to them, "Courage, my brave friends, let us die like men of honour; it ſhall never be ſaid that a prince of Saxe-Gotha ſuffered himſelf to be driven from his poſt." He fell, however, the victim of his martial ardour: a muſket-ball entered his head under the left eye, and another pierced his left breaſt: he fell dead on the ſpot, infinitely regretted by the emperor and all the allies: he had not attained his thirtieth year. His little band ſeeing him fall, immediately laid down their arms. The four battalions, who were by this time come up, had not a better fate: the victorious enemy fell upon them ſword in hand, killing great numbers, and putting the reſt to flight; and then nailing up all the cannon of the confederates which they found in the place, they returned to their camp with very little loſs.

§ Tindal. Burnet. Hiſtory of Europe.

‖ Thoulon, or Toulon, is a pretty large city of Provence in France, with one of the moſt ſpacious and ſecure ports of Europe, in a bay of the Mediterranean. Here the largeſt ſhips of the French navy are built and ſtationed: here is an arſenal, furniſhed with all ſorts of naval ſtores, alſo yards and docks, and the whole is well fortified. It lies twenty-five miles ſouth-eaſt of Marſeilles, and four hundred and ſixteen in the ſame direction from Paris.

Prince Eugene was now more than ever convinced of the impoſſibility of taking Toulon: he repeated his inſtances to abandon the enterprize, which he ſaid might be done at preſent without hazarding any thing; but that the enemy were daily receiving reinforcements from all parts; that it appeared even now very difficult to be ſupplied from the fleet with proviſions and neceſſaries for the ſiege when the wind was contrary, and that in an advanced ſeaſon of the year it would be ſtill more ſo; and that the deſertion of the ſoldiers for want of proviſion, and the diſtempers among them, would daily thin their numbers, and reduce them to an inferiority with the enemy. The moſt prudent and experienced amongſt the commanders in the confederate army were fully ſenſible of the truth of prince Eugene's arguments. The duke of Savoy himſelf at length began to ſee the matter in its true light; and having received intelligence that the enemy had now ſixty battalions in their intrenchments, beſides a numerous cavalry, he agreed to deſiſt from this enterprize: but that they might not quit the place without leaving behind them evident marks of their viſit, directions were given for bombarding Toulon both by ſea and land with redoubled vigour; and the duke of Savoy, who in this took retaliation for his capital city of Turin, went to an eminence to enjoy the deſtructive blaze. The enemy were greatly diſtreſſed by this dreadful farewel: eight ſhips of the line were burned in the harbour; twenty were ſunk in the entrance to the mole, few of which could ever be recovered; ſeveral magazines, and above one hundred and ſixty horſes, were deſtroyed in the city; and the devaſtations committed in the adjacent country were eſtimated at no leſs than thirty millions of livres, or near five hundred thouſand pounds ſterling.

By this time the confederates received advice that the French king had recalled a good number of battalions from the army on the Rhine; that the duke of Burgundy was alſo at the head of a powerful army, advancing to the relief of Toulon; wherefore, on the twenty-fifth day of Auguſt, having embarked their guns and other implements of war, they decamped in the night, leaving their tents ſtanding to deceive the enemy, and on the thirty-firſt repaſſed the Var, having loſt, as appeared by a muſter of their troops, about ſix thouſand men, by ſickneſs, deſertion, or the ſword. But to cover in ſome meaſure the diſgrace of this diſappointment, and to make ſome amends for the loſſes he had ſuffered, the duke of Savoy ſoon after laid ſiege to Suza (the capital of the marquiſate of the ſame name in Piedmont) the garriſon of which ſubmitted at diſcretion. By this conqueſt he not only ſecured the entry into his own territories, but likewiſe opened to himſelf a free paſſage into Dauphiné*. After this the army went into winter-quarters †.

The Engliſh and Dutch, particularly the former, were grievouſly chagrined at the miſcarriage of this expedition, from which they had formed ſuch flattering proſpects of ſpeedily terminating the war with honour and advantage, and which they now ſaw vaniſh into air, after ſuch a mighty expence to inſure its ſucceſs. They accuſed the duke of Savoy of holding an intelligence with Lewis XIV. but ſtill we were obliged to ſubmit, and pay the greateſt part of the expence. The ill ſucceſs of this expedition was alſo attributed, as I have already obſerved, to the emperor's having weakened the army under the command of prince Eugene in Italy, in order to ſend troops to the conqueſt of Naples. Indeed the houſe of Auſtria ſeemed all along to have very little at heart the projects or intereſts of the reſt of the allies, or to regard the expences they were at, provided ſhe could anſwer her own private views. She had found out the ſecret to engage England and Holland warmly in her cauſe, and to draw immenſe ſums from thoſe two nations, of which ſhe made her own uſe. The kingdom of Naples was a conqueſt of greater importance to her than that of Toulon, which more immediately concerned the maritime powers, who would have reaped infinite advantages from the deſtruction of one of the fineſt ſeaports the enemy poſſeſſed in Europe.

The raiſing the ſiege of Toulon was followed by ſeveral other croſs accidents and loſſes to the allies. The very ſeaſons ſeemed to arm againſt them. Their fleets were greatly ſhattered by bad weather at ſea, by which ſeveral ſhips were loſt, or fell a prey to the enemy's cruizers. Great Britain in particular ſuffered a terrible diſaſter, in the unhappy fate of ſir Cloudeſley Shovel, who, on his return home with fifteen ſail of the line, and five of a leſſer rank, was loſt upon the rocks of Scilly, in his own ſhip the Aſſociation, and periſhed, with every perſon on board. This was likewiſe the fate of the Eagle, Romney, and Firebrand: the reſt of the fleet happily got ſafe into Spithead *. Nor was this the only misfortune that befel us at ſea this year; for though France was not in a condition to ſend out any fleet, yet the Britiſh nation never ſuffered greater loſſes on that element. The prince of Denmark's council was very unhappy in the whole conduct of the cruizers and convoys. The merchants made heavy complaints, and not without reaſon: five men of war (who were convoy to a great fleet of merchant-men and tranſports, laden with ſtores and horſes, bound for Liſbon) fell in with the Breſt and Dunkirk ſquadrons off the Lizard, to the number of fourteen ſail. The Cumberland, Cheſter, and Ruby, being diſabled, were forced to ſubmit; the Devonſhire maintained a running fight till night, when by ſome accident ſhe was blown up, and only two of her men ſaved: the Royal Oak was boarded by the French, but got clear, and with ſome veſſels made the harbour of Kinſale (in Ireland) and ſome others of the merchant-ſhips and tranſports bore away for, and got ſafe into Liſbon. Indeed, about this time the government received advice that captain Underdom, commander of the Falkland, had made a ſucceſsful expedition againſt the French fiſheries in North America, having taken two of their men of war, and burnt ſeveral fiſhing-veſſels and boats, deſtroyed their ſtages, carried off their fiſh, and made their fiſhermen priſoners: but this ſucceſs was too inconſiderable to alleviate the loſs of the men and ſhips that periſhed with ſir Cloudeſley Shovel, or fell a prey to the French cruizers in the Channel.

It is certain indeed that we ſtill continued to have the ſuperiority over the enemy; but commerce, which is the main ſinew of war, was greatly weakened. The party of Charles III. which he ſupported at ſuch an immenſe expence, was viſibly declining: nothing effectual could be done to retrieve it till the next year's campaign. The interval, however, ought to have been improved by every poſſible means; inſtead of which the operations were ſuffered to languiſh, and the enemy to gain a degree of ſtrength that it was not eaſy afterwards to withſtand. Eight or ten ſhips of force more in the Mediterranean would have obviated theſe inconveniencies, and have enabled Charles to keep his adherents together. Nothing could appear more ſimple and natural than ſuch a meaſure; and it is hardly conceivable how our miniſtry, while they were continually buſied in forming the moſt important projects, ſhould overlook the leſſer arrangement, which naturally led to the completion of the main deſign.

Upon the Upper Rhine the Germans ſeemed to be aſleep: they ſuffered marſhal Villars to paſs that river with very little oppoſition, to make himſelf maſter of their lines at Biehl and Stolhoffen, and lay the circles of Suabia and Franconia under contribution: and he had even penetrated into Bavaria, had he not been obliged to weaken his army, and ſend large detachments into Provence for the relief of Toulon. The imperial army was, as uſual, augmented the latter end of the ſummer, and the command of it was, at the preſſing inſtances of the allies, given to the elector of Hanover, who exerted himſelf with uncommon diligence in reſtoring military diſcipline; but the army was too weak, and the ſeaſon too far advanced, to enter on great deſigns. One conſiderable action happened at Offenburgh, which very much raiſed the elector's reputation. He ſurprized ſeven regiments of French horſe and dragoons encamped near that place, whom he attacked on the twenty-fourth of September, and entirely defeated them, killing ſeveral officers, and eight hundred private men. Soon after marſhal Villars repaſſed the Rhine; and the elector of Hanover ſeparated his army, and diſperſed them ſo conveniently in their winter-quarters, that they might be aſſembled upon any emergent occaſion in leſs than forty-eight hours †.

The conduct of Charles XII. of Sweden continued ſtill ſo myſterious, that the confederates were not a little alarmed at his being in the heart of Germany. It was therefore reſolved to ſend ſome perſon of ſagacity to dive into his real intentions, and the duke of Marlborough was accordingly diſpatched in the month of April, with a letter from the queen to that monarch, who then held his reſidence at Leipſick. His grace, who was no leſs able a negotiator than he was a ſucceſsful general, attacked Charles on the ſide of his vanity, the only part by which he was acceſſible. Being admitted to an audience, he is ſaid to have addreſſed him in the following terms:

"SIRE,

"I preſent to your majeſty a letter, not from the chancery, but from the heart of the queen my miſtreſs, and written with her own hand. Had not her ſex prevented her from taking ſo long a journey, ſhe would have croſſed the ſea to ſee a prince admired by the whole univerſe. I eſteem myſelf happy in having the honour of aſſuring your majeſty of my regard; and I ſhould think it a great happineſs if my affairs would allow me to learn, under ſo great a general as your majeſty, what I want to know in the art of war. §"

To this compliment his Swediſh majeſty returned the following anſwer; "That the queen of Great Britain's letter, and the perſon of her ambaſſador, were both very acceptable to him; that he ſhould always have the utmoſt regard for her Britannic majeſty, and the intereſts of the grand alliance; that it was much againſt his will that he had been obliged to give the leaſt umbrage to any of the parties engaged in the confederacy, but that his excellency could not but be convinced that he had juſt cauſe to bring his troops into that country; that nevertheleſs his grace might aſſure the queen his miſtreſs, that he intended to withdraw them as ſoon as he had obtained the ſatisfaction he demanded; and that in the mean time he ſhould carefully abſtain from doing any thing that might tend to the prejudice of the common cauſe in general, or of the proteſtant religion in particular, of which he ſhould always glory to be a zealous protector *."

This however was looked upon as nothing more than repaying words with words. It was well known that the French court had gained over count Piper, the chief miniſter and favourite of Charles, to their intereſt, who put his maſter upon ſeeking occaſion for a quarrel with the emperor, whom the Swediſh conqueror affected to treat with great haughtineſs, and had ſtarted ſome pretenſions which gave the court of Vienna great uneaſineſs.

Count Zobor, ſon-in-law to the prince of Lichtenſtein, and chamberlain to the emperor, had, at a public entertainment, made ſome indecent reflections on the character of Charles XII. in the preſence of baron de Strahlen, the Swediſh envoy, who ſo far reſented it, that he gave the count at once the lye, and a box on the ear; after which he peremptorily demanded reparation from the Imperial court. The emperor, afraid of diſpleaſing the king of Sweden, was obliged to baniſh the count. Charles, not ſatisfied even with this condeſcenſion, inſiſted that count Zobor ſhould be delivered up to him. The pride of the court of Vienna was forced to ſtoop. The count was put into the hands of the king, who ſent him back, after having kept him for ſome time as a priſoner at Stetin.

He further demanded, contrary to all the laws of nations, that the emperor ſhould deliver up to him one thouſand five hundred unhappy Muſcovites who had eſcaped the year before out of Saxony, and had been entertained in the imperial army on the Upper Rhine. The emperor was obliged to yield even to this unreaſonable demand; but the Muſcovites being informed of what was in agitation, diſbanded themſelves, and marched off in parties into Poland.

The third and laſt of his demands was the moſt daring. Having declared himſelf the protector of the emperor's proteſtant ſubjects in Sileſia, a province belonging to the houſe of Auſtria, and not to the empire; he inſiſted that the emperor ſhould grant them the liberties and privileges which had been eſtabliſhed by the treaties of Weſtphalia, but which were extinguiſhed, or at leaſt eluded, by thoſe of Ryſwick. The emperor, who wanted only to get rid of ſuch a dangerous neighbour, yielded once more, and granted all that he deſired. The Lutherans of Sileſia had one hundred churches, which the catholics were obliged to cede to them. All differences being thus compromiſed, a treaty was ſigned between the emperor and the king of Sweden at Leipſic, on the firſt of September, under the guaranty of the queen of Great Britain and the States-general: and now Charles having no pretext to remain in Germany, ſet out at the head of his army for Poland, to ſtop the progreſs of the czar of Muſcovy, who had by this time almoſt overrun that kingdom †.

Whilſt the houſe of Auſtria underwent humiliations on every ſide, two pieces of pomp and magnificence conſumed great part of their treaſure: an embaſſy was ſent from Liſbon to demand the emperor's ſiſter for the king of Portugal, which was effected at a very great expence. A wife alſo was to be ſought for king Charles: he had ſeen the princeſs Caroline of Anſpach, and was much pleaſed with her. Propoſals were made to her in his name, and great endeavours uſed to prevail on her to change her religion; but ſhe preferring the proteſtant faith to the ſplendor of a crown, refuſed to be a queen on thoſe terms. Her firmneſs met with a ſuitable reward; for being ſoon after married to the electoral prince of Brunſwick, ſhe ſhared with him the crown of Great Britain. The princeſs of Wolfenbuttle was not ſo firm: ſhe ſubſcribed to the conditions of the king of Spain, and was in a ſhort time married to him by proxy, and ſent to Barcelona. The queen of Portugal this ſame year came to Holland, to be carried to Liſbon by a ſquadron of the Engliſh fleet ‡.

The duke of Marlborough having finiſhed his negotiations with the king of Sweden by the latter end of April, left Saxony, and repaired to Flanders, where he aſſembled the allied army at Anderlach, near Bruſſels, about the middle of May, and advanced to Soignies, with a deſign to give battle to the elector of Bavaria and the duke of Vendôme, who commanded the French forces, and had encamped on the plain of Flerus. On his way, however, he received intelligence that the enemy's army had been ſtrongly reinforced by draughts from all their garriſons, inſomuch as to be greatly ſuperior to that of the allies. Upon this intelligence the duke, whoſe prudence was always equal to his valour, thought proper to reſume the road to Bruſſels, and encamped his army at Mildert, while the French advanced to Gemblours. The two dukes ſpent the reſt of the campaign in marches and counter-marches, endeavouring to gain ſome advantage of each other; but ſuch was the caution of each general, that no action happened between the two armies, nor was any town beſieged, but both ſides held their own, and about the latter end of October marched into the ſame quarters they had occupied the preceding winter §.

At the cloſe of the campaign the duke of Marlborough repaired to Frankfort, where he had a conference with the electors of Hanover, Mentz, and Palatine, about the operations of the enſuing year: then he returned to the Hague; and having ſettled the neceſſary meaſures with the deputies of the States-general, ſet ſail for England, where he landed on the ſecond day of November. It furniſhed matter of much ſpeculation to the politicians of thoſe days to account for the inactive conduct of his grace during this critical campaign, when he commanded a victorious army of one hundred thouſand veteran troops flushed with victory. His friends accounted for it, by alleging that he waited to ſee the ſucceſs of the grand expedition againſt Toulon.—It might be ſo.

The military tranſactions abroad being now at an end, we will return to thoſe of a domeſtic nature.

Affairs in the Engliſh council and adminiſtration began now to aſſume a new face, and the royal favour now ſeemed directed in a new channel. Mr. Harley, who had for ſome years been ſecretary of ſtate, had ingratiated himſelf greatly with his ſovereign, and in conſequence thereof began to act for himſelf, and in oppoſition to the lord-treaſurer. The ducheſs of Marlborough was alſo ſupplanted by Mrs. Maſham, her own kinſwoman, whom ſhe had formerly relieved from indigence, and placed about the perſon of the queen, in the nature of a bed-chamber woman. This perſon had, by ſtudying the temper of the queen, and meeting all her deſigns and little biaſſes with aſſent and approbation, abſolutely gained her affection. Her majeſty began now to be ſenſible that her old favourite the ducheſs of Marlborough had, during her reign of favour, played the tyrant; and the remonſtrances of that lady, as to ſtate affairs, which had hitherto been placed to the account of an honeſt bluntneſs and undiſguiſed affection, were now cenſured as inſolent attempts to thwart her majeſty in her moſt reſpected maxims, and make her the tool of an ambitious and deſigning family-party. Mrs. Maſham was a relation to Mr. Harley, as well as to the ducheſs, and ſhe acted under his directions in managing ſome of the private ſprings of political intrigues, which he now began to put in play, to form a party in conjunction with the Tories, to ſap the credit of the duke of Marlborough and the earl of Godolphin, and expel the Whigs from the advantages they poſſeſſed under the government. Harley's chief coadjutor in this ſcheme was Mr. Henry St. John (afterwards the famous lord Bolingbroke) who for the preſent was content to act in a ſubordinate capacity; but in a ſhort time, conſcious of his own parts and influence, raiſed himſelf to the character of that miniſter's rival. To theſe politicians ſir Simon Harcourt joined himſelf, a colleague of uncommon ability and credit; and they united their endeavours to rally and incorporate the diſunited Tories. It was ſaid that prince George was brought into the concert, by being made to apprehend that he was in a manner excluded from his due ſhare in the government, by the great power which the duke of Marlborough and the lord-treaſurer had acquired to themſelves and their friends. They aſſerted that the queen herſelf was little better than a cypher in the ſtate, being as much under the controul of the ducheſs of Marlborough as her affairs were by the duke. The queen about this time took ſome ſteps which plainly ſhewed her inclination towards the Tories: among others, ſhe beſtowed the biſhoprics of Chicheſter and Exeter upon ſir William Dawes and Dr. Blackall, who, tho' perſons of unblemiſhed character, were profeſſed anti-revolutioniſts.

The diſpoſition of the Tories ſeemed to concur with the views of the new-formed party: the nation in general expreſſed great diſcontent with the Whig miniſtry, on account of the many loſſes and diſgraces which had befallen our arms both by ſea and land in the courſe of this year. The Tories did not fail to feed their diſguſt, while the miniſtry ſeemed totally inattentive to the ſpreading murmurs which portended a ſtorm ready to fall upon their heads. By a ſtrange inſtance of miſmanagement, they treated their newly incorporated brethren the Scots in ſuch a manner as ſeemed to exaſperate that people more than ever againſt the union. A ſtop was put to their whole commerce for two months, before it was diverted into the new channel. Three months elapſed before the equivalent was remitted to that kingdom, and it was afterwards applied with the moſt ſhameful partiality. The Scottiſh nation now reſounded on all ſides with complaints: the Jacobites hailed the hapy omen, and began to ſtir in favour of their exiled prince. Conferences were held with the court of St. Germain's, and meaſures concerted for bringing about the deſired revolution: nay, ſo openly did they act, and with ſo little regard to decency towards the eſtabliſhed government, that the pretender's birth-day was publicly celebrated in many different parts of the kingdom: in a word, every thing in Scotland ſeemed ripe for a general revolt.

In Ireland, indeed, every thing wore the face of quiet and tranquility, under the adminiſtration of the earl of Pembroke. A parliament having met at Dublin, in the month of July, preſented addreſſes of congratulation to her majeſty on the late union of the two kingdoms: ſeveral laudable reſolutions were paſſed by the commons, in favour of their own manufactures: they granted the neceſſary ſupplies; and, having finiſhed ſeveral bills, were prorogued to the ſixth of May of the enſuing year; and the earl of Pembroke returned to England.

Such was the ſtate of our home affairs, when the time for convening the great aſſembly of the nation approached very near. The parliament had already ſat two years, and of courſe, according to the inſtitution of triennial parliaments, it had only another year to ſit; but as it had been revived on account of its being the firſt parliament of Great Britain, it was commonly ſuppoſed to be a new parliament. Mr. Secretary Harley and his friends, however, maintained, that it could not be a new parliament, ſince it was not ſummoned by a new writ, but only by virtue of a clauſe in an act of parliament. The Whigs, by their ſuperior intereſt, at length carried their point, and it was yielded to be a new parliament.

Accordingly, on the twenty-third of October, the firſt parliament of Great Britain met at Weſtminſter, when all the forms uſual at the beginning of a new parliament were obſerved: the queen came to the houſe of peers, and the commons being ſent for, they were directed by the lord-chancellor to return to their houſe and chuſe a ſpeaker, and preſent him that day ſevennight. They unanimouſly made choice of Mr. Smith, their former ſpeaker, and then adjourned to the thirtieth of the ſame month: the lords adjourned to the ſame day. At this firſt meeting thirteen of the Scottiſh peers returned for that part of Great Britain called Scotland, were admitted to their places in the Britiſh houſe of lords, each of them being introduced by two Engliſh peers of the ſame rank; and the commons of North Britain took their places in the lower houſe. On the thirtieth the queen came again to the houſe of peers, and the commons, being ſent for, preſented their ſpeaker, who was approved by the queen: then the two houſes were again adjourned to the ſixth of November, on which day her majeſty made a ſpeech to the firſt Britiſh parliament, to the following purport.

She began with expreſſing "her humble thankfulneſs to God, and entire ſatisfaction to herſelf, that ſhe met them there in her firſt parliament of Great Britain, not doubting (ſhe ſaid) but they came with hearts prepared, as her's was, to make the union ſo proſperous, as it might anſwer the well-grounded hopes of all her good ſubjects, and the reaſonable apprehenſions of her enemies; and to that end, ſhe obſerved, nothing was ſo material to convince both friends and enemies, that the uniting their intereſts had not only improved their abilities, but alſo their reſolutions, as to proſecute the war till an honourable peace could be obtained."

Then, having ſpoken of the attempt upon Toulon, which, though it had not been attended with the deſired ſucceſs, had not, ſhe ſaid, wholly loſt its intended effect; having taken notice of our diſadvantages in Spain, and the expulſion of the enemy wholly out of Italy, as alſo of the conduct and authority of the elector of Hanover, who commanded as general of the empire that campaign on the Rhine; and after that, of the ſupplies neceſſary for carrying on the war with ſucceſs; ſhe came to the buſineſs of the late union, and ſaid, "it was impoſſible but ſome doubts and difficulties muſt have ariſen on account of that meaſure, which, however, ſhe hoped, were ſo far overcome as to have defeated the deſigns of thoſe, who would have made uſe of that handle to foment diſturbances." Then, having recommended to their conſideration ſeveral things, made liable by the articles of union to the conſideration of the parliament of Great Britain, ſhe concluded with aſſuring them, "that nothing ſhould be wanting on her part to procure her people all the bleſſings that could follow from that happy circumſtance of her reign, and to extinguiſh the leaſt occaſion of jealouſy, that either the civil or religious rights of any part of that her united kingdom could ſuffer by the conſequences of that union; hoping (ſhe ſaid) they would ſuffer nothing to prevail with them to diſunite among themſelves, or abate their zeal in oppoſing the common enemy *."

I ſhall not dwell on the addreſſes preſented to her majeſty on this occaſion, but only obſerve, that both houſes, having made ſome enquiries into the miſcarriages of the navy, and brought in a bill for the better ſecurity of the trade of the kingdom, the commons went roundly to work about the neceſſary ſupplies for the ſervice of the enſuing year, amounting in all to about ſix millions †. They introduced another bill, for repealing the Scottiſh act of ſecurity, and that about peace and war, which had excited ſuch jealouſy in the Engliſh nation: they likewiſe reſolved, that there ſhould be but one privy-council in the kingdom of Great Britain: that the militia of Scotland ſhould be put upon the ſame footing with that of England: that the powers of the juſtices of the peace ſhould be the ſame through the whole united kingdoms: that, for the better adminiſtration of juſtice in Scotland, the lords of juſticiary ſhould go circuits twice in the year: and that the writs for electing Scottiſh members to ſerve in parliament ſhould be directed, and returns made, in the ſame manner as was obſerved in England.

The queen came to the parliament houſe on the eighteenth of December, and gave the royal aſſent to thoſe bills; when, after thanking the commons for their readineſs and affection in providing ſo conſiderable a part of the ſupplies, ſhe hinted at the neceſſity there was of augmenting the forces in Spain, Portugal, and Savoy. This intimation produced a debate in the houſe of lords, on the affairs of Spain, the queen being preſent incognito. It began about returning thanks to the earl of Peterborough for his ſervices in that country, or elſe to call him to an account for his conduct if he had done amiſs. The ſervices of the earl of Peterborough were extolled by the earl of Rocheſter and lord Haverſham, and it was moved, that he might have the thanks of the houſe: this was oppoſed by the Whigs, who imagined it might imply a reflection on the conduct of the earl of Galway. The earl of Rocheſter obſerved on this occaſion, that it was a ſaying of old duke Schomberg's, that the attacking France in the Netherlands was like taking a bull by the horns; and therefore his lordſhip propoſed the ſtanding upon the defenſive in Flanders, and ſending from thence fifteen or twenty thouſand men to Catalonia. In this he was ſeconded by the earl of Nottingham and others, who took notice that Spain was in a manner abandoned to the enemy. This motion was ſtrongly oppoſed by the duke of Marlborough, who urged, that the great towns in Brabant, which he had conquered, could not be preſerved without a conſiderable number of men; and that if the French ſhould gain any advantage in Flanders, from their ſuperiority in point of numbers, the diſcontented party in Holland, which was very ſtrong, and bore with great impatience the burthen of the war, would immediately become clamorous for a peace. His grace on this occaſion diſcovered ſo much warmth, that the whole houſe took notice of it; and lord Rocheſter ſaid, he wondered that nobleman, who had always been ſo conſpicuous for his calmneſs and moderation, ſhould now be out of temper; at the ſame time he challenged his grace to ſhew how troops could be procured for the ſervice of Italy and Spain; to which the duke replied, that the ſubject was of too great concern to be ſpoken of without warmth, and aſſured the houſe, that meaſures had been already concerted for forming an army of forty thouſand men, under the duke of Savoy, after ſending powerful ſuccours to king Charles ‡.

* Proceedings of the Houſe of Commons, iv. 70.

† The ways and means for raiſing thoſe ſums were, the land-tax of four ſhillings in the pound; the malt duty; upon the ſeveral duties granted laſt year for annuities, a farther ſum was now enacted of ſix hundred and forty thouſand pounds for like annuities of forty thouſand pounds per annum, at the ſame price; cuſtoms laid for ninety-five years, on which one million was to be taken in for purchaſing more annuities at ſixteen years purchaſe. The Eaſt India company propoſed to advance one million two hundred thouſand pounds for the ſervice of the war, if they might have their term enlarged to the year 1726, contenting themſelves with the ſame intereſt they already received for the two millions they formerly advanced, which was complied with, and enacted accordingly; and the general mortgage as it was called (that is, divers duties at the cuſtom-houſe) was continued from 1712 to 1714, for a loan of ſeven hundred and twenty-nine thouſand and ſixty-ſeven pounds, which completed the ſums voted.

‡ Proceedings of the Houſe of Lords, ii. 183.

How

How powerful theſe were, the event will ſhew.

This declaration of the duke's, however, put an end to the debates, and on the twenty-third of December the two houſes joined in an addreſs to the queen, againſt making any peace, which could not be ſafe and favourable for her and her allies, if Spain, the Weſt Indies, or any part of the Spaniſh monarchy, ſhould be ſuffered to remain under the power of the houſe of Bourbon. Her majeſty, in her anſwer, fully concurred with them in opinion, adding farther, that ſhe was very well pleaſed to find the meaſures ſhe had concerted for the ſuccour of the king of Spain, were ſo well approved by both houſes: ſhe ſaid, ſhe would continue her moſt preſſing inſtances with the emperor, for haſtening farther ſuccours, and that they might be commanded by prince Eugene, agreeable to the deſire of the two houſes in their addreſs. This requeſt ſhe accordingly made; the court of Vienna, however, did not chuſe to comply with it, but ſent thither the count Staremberg, who, of all the German generals, was next to the prince in military reputation.

The high degree of credit in which Mr. Harley now ſtood with the queen, filled the Whigs with very diſagreeable apprehenſions: they muſtered all their ſtrength, and, headed by the two great ſtateſmen, the duke and the treaſurer, who yet managed every thing, reſolved to be before-hand with the ſecretary, and, if poſſible, drive him from the court; which while they were meditating upon, an accident happened that gave them ſome colour for attacking their rival. One Gregg, an inferior clerk in Mr. Harley's office, was detected in holding a ſecret correſpondence with monſieur Chamillard, the French king's miniſter; whereupon he was apprehended, and brought to his trial, when he pleaded guilty, and was condemned; but he was reprieved from time to time, for ſeveral months, in hopes that he might make ſome diſcoveries of importance: but the fellow took the whole guilt upon himſelf, declaring at his execution, that neither his maſter Mr. Harley, nor any other perſon, had the leaſt knowlege of his treaſonable correſpondence, which, he ſaid, he had entered into merely to ſupply thoſe neceſſities which a life of extravagance and debauchery had run him into. The Whigs were in great hopes that this affair would have fixed an indelible ſtain upon the ſecretary's character; but the moſt that could be made out to the cenſure of Mr. Harley, was, that he ſuffered papers of a ſecret nature to be too much expoſed in his office, whereby Gregg and other clerks had it in their power to give intelligence to the enemy, if they ſhould be ſo diſpoſed. The peers thought proper to offer an addreſs to her majeſty upon this head, reflecting upon Mr. Harley's negligence in the diſcharge of his office (which was certainly reprehenſible.) The duke of Marlborough and the lord treaſurer Godolphin, laying hold of this favourable opportunity to overturn their tottering rival, declared they would lay down their commiſſions if the ſecretary was employed any longer. The queen, who in fact was little better than the tool of every miniſtry that was uppermoſt, was forced to acquieſce, and prevailed on Mr. Harley to make a voluntary reſignation of his poſt, and retire: with him went out ſir Thomas Manſell, comptroller of the houſhold, ſir Simon Harcourt, attorney-general, and Mr. St. John, ſecretary at war; leaving the Whigs to act without controul. Mr. Harley's place was beſtowed on Mr. Henry Boyle, chancellor of the Exchequer. The queen, however, retained ſo deep a reſentment of the behaviour of the duke of Marlborough and lord Godolphin on this occaſion, that ſhe entirely withdrew her confidence from them, though in appearance ſhe carried it towards them as formerly.

A few days after this breach at court, which happened about the latter end of February, 1708, the nation was alarmed with the ſudden news of an invaſion from France. Lewis XIV. after having tried every method to bring the allies to a compliance with his propoſals, reſolved to attempt an invaſion of Great Britain. The undertaking was certainly a very bold one, conſidering the weak ſtate of his maritime forces, and the powerful fleets with which we then covered the ſeas; but though the ſucceſs was doubtful, it was not quite deſtitute of probability: thoſe of the Scots who were averſe to the union, could not without indignation behold themſelves reduced to a ſtate of dependence on the Engliſh; and they thought no means ſo likely to ſhake off the yoke, as by bringing about a revolution in the government. With this view, they had propoſed an expedition in favour of the pretender, whom they ſtyled James III. and promiſed to join him with thirty thouſand men in arms, to fight his cauſe, if he would only land at Edinburgh, with ſome few ſuccours from France.

Lewis readily fell in with the propoſal, hoping, if he could excite a rebellion in England, it would prevent us from contributing our proportion towards the proſecution of the war; though he pretended that his ſole deſign was to make the ſame efforts in behalf of the pretender, who had now aſſumed the title of the Chevalier de St. George, which he had done for the father. Accordingly in the month of March, 1708, eight ſhips of the line and ſeventy tranſports were got ready at Dunkirk, and ſix thouſand men were embarked on board them. The count de Gacé had the command of the troops, and the chevalier de Fourbin Janſon, one of the beſt ſea-officers of his time, that of the fleet. Every thing ſeemed favourable for their deſign; there were not above three thouſand regular troops in Scotland: England was left defenceleſs, its ſoldiers being all engaged on the continent. This expedition was exactly like that in 1744, in favour of the grandſon of James II. It was impeded by ſeveral accidents, and diſcovered by the government; whereupon orders were given for aſſembling a ſtrong ſquadron of men of war, which were ſent under the command of ſir George Byng and the lord Durſley, to lie off Dunkirk, and wait the motions of the French: but the Engliſh admirals being driven off their ſtation by violent gales of wind, were forced to return into the Downs; and the French took the advantage of the very winds which drove them over to the Britiſh ſhore, to ſail out of their harbours, with the pretender and twelve French and Iriſh battalions on board, and proceeded for the coaſt of Scotland.

In the mean time both houſes of parliament (who had been made acquainted, by the queen's order, with what the enemy was meditating againſt her dominions) addreſſed her majeſty, beſeeching her to take care of her royal perſon; promiſing to ſtand by her with their lives and fortunes, in maintenance of her own undoubted right and title, againſt the pretended prince of Wales and all her enemies. A bill was alſo brought in for ſuſpending the Habeas corpus act till October, with relation to perſons taken up by the government on ſuſpicion: a proclamation was iſſued, declaring the pretender, his accomplices and adherents, traitors and rebels, and for apprehending them; with ſuch other neceſſary precautions as the exigence of the circumſtance dictated.

On the other hand the fleet, under the command of ſir George Byng, which had put back to the Downs, being reinforced to forty ſhips of the line, ſet ſail for Dunkirk again; and on his way the admiral received intelligence, by an Oſtend ſhip, diſpatched by major-general Cadogan, who, upon the firſt news of the intended invaſion, had been diſpatched to Bruſſels, in order to ſhip off the Engliſh forces in garriſon in the Netherlands for England, that the Dunkirk ſquadron was ſailed northward. Whereupon a council of war was held, and it was reſolved to purſue the enemy, whoſe deſign they judged to be againſt Edinburgh: accordingly ſir George Byng, after having detached a ſquadron under admiral Baker, to convoy the troops from Oſtend to England, began to give chace to the enemy with the reſt of the fleet.

The queen having acquainted the parliament, in a ſpeech, of the French fleet being ſailed from Dunkirk, and of ſir George Byng's being ſent in purſuit of them; as alſo that ten battalions of her troops were coming over from Oſtend, for the protection of her dominions; both houſes preſented warm addreſſes, importing, that they would ſtand by and aſſiſt her majeſty againſt all her enemies: that the ſmall number of ſhips and troops employed in this projected invaſion, while it raiſed the contempt and indignation of all her majeſty's faithful and loyal ſubjects, ſhewed, at the ſame time, that the chief proſpect of ſucceſs, which the enemy entertained, depended on their hopes of aſſiſtance from ſome of her ſubjects, whoſe reſtleſs paſſions, and arbitrary principles, had for ſeveral years engaged them in laying deſigns to undermine and deſtroy the beſt form of government that ever was eſtabliſhed in this iſland; and that, as the preſent criſis would effectually diſtinguiſh her real from her pretended friends, they hoped ſhe would encourage the one, and diſcountenance the other, and would never liſten to the ſuggeſtions of any, who endeavoured to excite a jealouſy and diſtruſt of thoſe, who, ever ſince the Revolution, had been moſt ſteady and firm to the intereſt of the late king, and to that of her majeſty.

Addreſſes on the ſame occaſion were ſent up from different parts of the kingdom, all which the queen received with tokens of high ſatisfaction. In the mean time ſhe left no endeavours unexerted to defeat the deſigns of her enemies. Several regiments of foot, with ſome ſquadrons of cavalry, ſent from Flanders and other parts, were ſent towards Scotland; while the earl of Leven, commander in chief of the forces in that country, and governor of the caſtle of Edinburgh, put that fortreſs in a poſture of defence, and made the proper diſpoſitions to oppoſe the pretender at his landing.

The French fleet arrived at Edinburgh Frith the twenty-third of March, N. S and late the ſame night ſir George Byng came to the ſame place, ſo great had been his vigilance and diſpatch in purſuit of the enemy; who were ſo confounded at his ſudden appearance, that they immediately crowded all the ſail they could, and favoured by the darkneſs of the night and a land-breeze, ſtood out to ſea: as ſoon as the day broke, the Engliſh admiral deſcried them in the offing, upon which he made a ſignal for all the ſhips under his command to ſlip their cables, and give chaſe; but the enemy having got the ſtart of them by ſome miles, and their ſhips being cleaner than our's, ſir George could come up but with one of them, which was the Saliſbury, a prize the French had taken from us, on board of which were the lord Griffin, the lord Clermont, Mr. Middleton, the marquis de Levi a French lieutenant-general, with ſome other French and Iriſh officers, and five companies of French ſoldiers And ſir George having followed the reſt of the fleet till he loſt ſight of them, returned to Edinburgh Frith with his priſoners, who being afterwards brought to London, the lord Griffin was committed to the Tower, with the reſt of the priſoners of diſtinction; and his lordſhip having been attainted in the laſt reign for high-treaſon, execution was awarded againſt him by the court of Queen's Bench: but her majeſty being pleaſed to reprieve him from time to time, he died at length in the Tower ‖.

All the noblemen and perſons of diſtinction in Scotland, ſuſpected of diſaffection to the government, were apprehended, and either impriſoned in the caſtle of Edinburgh, or brought up to London, to be confined in the Tower or in Newgate. Among theſe was duke Hamilton, who, according to Lockhart, in his Memoirs, had ſolemnly promiſed to join the pretender at the inſtant he ſhould land. On the duke's being brought to London, he found means to make his court to the Whigs ſo effectually, by promiſing to join with them and their friends in Scotland, in the election of peers for the parliament of Great Britain, that he prevailed on them not only to procure his, but all the other priſoners liberty, upon bail, which was likewiſe ſoon remitted. This was a nice ſtep in the duke; and if he had not hit upon this favourable conjuncture, and managed it with great addreſs, fatal conſequences would probably have enſued to him and his friends. It is certain they were Whig lords who bailed the duke himſelf, three of which were the duke of Newcaſtle, the earl of Wharton, and the lord Halifax. Some writers, indeed, have affected to attribute the duke's releaſe to another cauſe, namely, that he was the perſon who firſt revealed the ſecret of the intended invaſion to the Engliſh court: this time alone muſt unriddle.

But of all the idle reports raiſed by the breath of faction to miſlead a weak and captious populace, no notion could certainly be more abſurd than that which ſome hiſtorians have endeavoured to propagate, who pretend that queen Anne herſelf was engaged in a correſpondence with her pretended brother in this affair. It is abſolute folly to ſuppoſe that ſhe ſhould invite her competitor to the crown to come and dethrone her. What might have been the conſequences of this invaſion, had it actually taken effect, it is hard to determine; but as it was happily ſuppreſſed in embryo, the only inconvenience it produced, was, that it occaſioned a conſiderable run upon the Bank of England, which was like to have affected the credit of the nation. In order to prevent this publick calamity, the commons on the twentieth of March paſſed the following uſeful and ſeaſonable vote: "That whoever deſignedly endeavoured to deſtroy or leſſen the public credit, eſpecially at a time when the kingdom was in danger of an invaſion, was guilty of a high crime and miſdemeanor, and an enemy to her majeſty and the kingdom." The lord-treaſurer alſo ſignified to the directors of the Bank, that her majeſty would allow, for ſix months, an intereſt of ſix per cent. upon their bills; which was double the uſual rate; and conſiderable ſums of money were offered them by ſeveral opulent noblemen and gentlemen; and the directors, on their parts, having called in twenty per cent. upon their capital ſtock, they were ſoon in a condition to anſwer all demands made upon them by the timorous, the envious, or the diſaffected.

This ſeſſion of parliament, during its continuance, exerted itſelf in a very laudable manner for the ſervice of the public, by enquiring into every kind of miſmanagement, real or ſuppoſed, that fell within its cognizance. Both houſes took into conſideration the military proceedings and negotiations of the earl of Peterborough, together with his diſpoſal of the remittances during his having the command in Spain; when his lordſhip produced ſuch a number of witneſſes and original papers to juſtify his conduct, that his character triumphed in the enquiry: however, ſeeing that a party-ſpirit had been raiſed up againſt him, his lordſhip choſe to reſign all his employments. The parliament next took cognizance of the affairs of Spain, and found there had been a great deficiency in the Engliſh troops at the battle of Almanza; for out of near thirty thouſand men provided by parliament for the ſervice of Spain and Portugal in the year 1707, there were but eight thouſand ſix hundred and ſixty-nine men, beſides officers and ſervants, at the time of that battle. This was repreſented to the queen in an addreſs, who returned an anſwer thereto ſo much to their ſatisfaction, that they voted another addreſs, in which they thanked her majeſty for the meaſures ſhe had taken to reſtore the affairs of Spain, and provide foreign troops for the ſervice. A bill was alſo brought in and paſſed both houſes for rendering the union of the two kingdoms more entire and compleat; whereby it was enacted, "That after the firſt of May, 1708, there ſhould be but one privy-council in the kingdom of Great Britain: that juſtices of the peace in Scotland ſhould have the ſame authority as thoſe in England: that circuit-courts ſhall be held twice a year in Scotland; and that the forty-five repreſentatives of Scotland in the Britiſh houſe of commons ſhall be choſen by virtue of writs under the great-ſeal of Great Britain, and returned as in England" A court of Exchequer was likewiſe erected in Scotland upon the model of that of England.

The parliament having at length gone through all the buſineſs before them, her majeſty came to the houſe of commons on the firſt of April, and prorogued the parliament to the thirtieth of the ſame month, and it was afterwards diſſolved by proclamation. The moſt material acts paſſed this ſeſſion, beſides thoſe already mentioned, were, "An act for the ſecurity of her majeſty's perſon and government, and of the ſucceſſion of the crown in the proteſtant line," which declares it to be treaſon in any one to impeach the act of ſettlement; enacts, that the parliament ſhall continue to ſit ſix months after the demiſe of the queen or her ſucceſſors; appoints a regency on ſuch demiſe; and empowers all officers and miniſters for the time being to continue to act ſix months after ſuch event, unleſs removed by the ſucceſſor, as in the former act of ſettlement. An act for the encouragement of the trade in America; by which, amongſt other things, it was enacted, That every ſeaman, being a foreigner, who ſhould faithfully ſerve on board any ſhip of war belonging to Great Britain, for two years, ſhould be deemed a natural-born ſubject.

After the diſſolution of the parliament, writs were iſſued out for new elections, together with a proclamation commanding all the peers of North Britain to aſſemble at Holy-rood-houſe in Edinburgh on the ſeventeenth day of June, to elect ſixteen peers to repreſent them in the enſuing Britiſh parliament, purſuant to the twenty-ſecond article of the treaty of union. titles of baron of Rippon, marquis of Beverley, and duke of Dover; and the office of ſecretary of war, vacant by the reſignation of Mr. Henry St. John, was beſtowed upon Mr. Robert Walpole, a gentleman of very quick parts, maſterly elocution, and one who made a conſiderable figure in the two ſucceeding reigns.

About the ſame time a proclamation was iſſued for diſtributing prizes in certain proportions, amongſt the officers and ſeamen of the royal navy, a regulation that ſtill prevails. The capture was divided into eight equal ſhares, of which the captain, if not under the command of an admiral, or other ſuperior officer, was to have three ſhares; but in the latter caſe, the admiral or commodore was to have one of the three. The commiſſion-officers and maſter were to have one eighth divided amongſt them, the warrant-officers one, the petty-officers one, and the ſailors the other two ‡. I proceed now to the military operations of the year 1708.

Lewis XIV. who for ſome time had the mortification to ſee his affairs grow worſe and worſe, thought that by ſending the duke of Burgundy, his grandſon, to head the army in Flanders, the preſence of the heir-preſumptive of the crown would excite the emulation of the troops, which began to droop. Accordingly, a numerous army was aſſembled in the Netherlands, under the command of this prince, and they gave him the duke of Vendoſme as an aſſiſtant. It now happened, ſays M. de Voltaire, as it too frequently does, the experienced officer was not ſufficiently liſtened to, and the prince's council frequently carried it againſt the general's reaſons. The elector of Bavaria was appointed to the command of a ſeparate army on the Rhine, where he was ſeconded by the duke of Berwick; and marſhal Villeroy was ſent to conduct the forces in Dauphiné.

As ſoon as the ſtorm which had threatened Great Britain by the intended invaſion was blown over, the duke of Marlborough went over to the Hague, where he was met by prince Eugene; and thoſe two great generals conferred with the penſionary Heinſius and the deputies of the States-general: after which they repaired to the court of Hanover, where they perſuaded the elector to be ſatisfied with acting upon the defenſive in his command on the Rhine, and to part with ſome of his forces in order to enable the allies to make more vigorous efforts in the Netherlands.

The prince then repaired to the imperial court, and the duke returned to Flanders, where, about the latter end of May, he aſſembled the army, conſiſting of one hundred and fifty ſquadrons of horſe, and one hundred and twelve battalions of infantry. The French army under the duke of Burgundy amounted to one hundred and ninety-ſeven ſquadrons, and one hundred twenty-four battalions. Thus ſuperior to the allies in number, and headed by a prince of the blood, it was thought they would make ſome ſtriking effort: they opened the campaign indeed with a proſpect of great ſucceſs; for the Flemings being generally better affected to the French than to the Dutch, and having a very great reſpect for the elector of Bavaria, their late governor, that prince eaſily perſuaded them to take up arms againſt the confederates. Accordingly, the troops of the latter being marched from Ghent, Bruges, and the neighbouring garriſons, to the general rendezvous, leaving only the country militia, or the burghers, to guard the gates; on the appearance of a detachment of French troops, thoſe places ſurrendered without ſtriking a blow, and the French advanced to Dutch Flanders, and laid that country under contribution.

Upon the news of theſe ſucceſſes, the duke of Marlborough wrote to prince Eugene to haſten to him, determined to oblige the enemy to come to a battle, as the only means, in his opinion, to prevent their farther progreſs, which might end in cutting off the communication of the allies with Brabant. Hereupon prince Eugene began his march, with a conſiderable body of troops, towards the Moſelle; but this was only with a view to amuſe the French who were in thoſe parts, and give time to the elector of Hanover to advance towards the Rhine; after which prince Eugene quitted the banks of the Moſelle, where he had no magazines, and repaired to join the duke of Marlborough in Flanders; when a council of war being held, it was reſolved to paſs the Dender, and offer the enemy battle. In the mean time, the dukes of Burgundy and Berry, and the duke of Vendoſme, thinking themſelves an over-match for the confederates, reſolved upon the ſiege of Oudenarde §; and accordingly they cauſed that place to be inveſted on the ninth of July, hoping to ſubdue it before the allies could be reinforced.

The duke of Marlborough was immediately in motion, and marched with ſurprizing expedition to the relief of the place. On the approach of the allies the French thought fit to raiſe the ſiege, and began to croſs the Scheld at Gavre; which the duke of Marlborough perceiving, and being determined to bring them to a battle, detached general Cadogan with ſixteen battalions and eight ſquadrons over night to take poſt on the other ſide the Scheld, near Oudenarde, and to lay the bridges neceſſary for the paſſage of the reſt of the army, which began to march about eight in the morning, and proceeded with ſuch expedition, that by two in the afternoon the horſe had reached the bridges, and ſoon after the army began to paſs; but by this time the enemy, finding that we had taken poſt beyond the Scheld, reſolved to ſtrike off to the right towards Ghent. The duke of Vendoſme was for the army forming itſelf, but the duke of Burgundy would not hear of it for ſome time. At length he halted upon the Height of Gaveren, and made a ſhew of marching back, in order to diſpute the paſſage of the allies over the Scheld: he firſt ordered twenty ſquadrons of horſe into the plain, but he ſoon after recalled them again, reſolved to continue his march.

In the mean time, general Cadogan, with his detachment, fell upon ſeven battalions of foot, § Oudenard is a rich and very ſtrong town in the Low Countries, in the earldom of Flanders, the marquiſate of the territory of Oudenard. It ſtands on the river Scheld, thirteen miles ſouth of Ghent, thirteen north-weſt of Aeth, thirty ſix weſt of Bruſſels, and thirty-ſeven almoſt north of Mons.

which the enemy had thrown into the hedges and into a village upon the Scheld, below Oudenard, called Heynem; and being afterwards reinforced by the foot, who now began to come up, the attack was made with ſo much vigour and ſucceſs, that the enemy was ſoon driven out of the village; and our troops purſuing them with a cloſe fire, a whole brigade, together with the brigadier, threw down their arms, and ſurrendered priſoners. The event of this ſkirmiſh convinced the duke of Burgundy that it would now be impoſſible to avoid a battle: he therefore endeavoured to diſengage his troops from the hollow ways and defiles through which they were marching, in order to bring them into the plain, where they might be properly formed; but the confederate generals were too experienced to give him leiſure to effect this purpoſe: their army was immediately formed in order of battle, and advanced to the charge. Hereupon the enemy faced about and formed alſo, but with great diſorder, owing to the miſunderſtanding which prevailed between their generals the duke of Burgundy and the duke of Vendoſme, the former continually countermanding what the other ordered.

At length the battle was begun about four o'clock in the afternoon, and laſted with great firmneſs till about ten at night. The fight was properly between the foot; but the confederates got ground, and drove the enemy from one poſt to another, till darkneſs put an end to the combat. The horſe, who by reaſon of the broken ground, could not act, were detached to the right and left wing, and advanced ſo far, that they attacked the enemy in flank and rear; which when they perceived, they fell into the utmoſt confuſion, and part of them retired with the baggage and artillery towards Deynſe and Ghent, and another part by the road to Courtray. The duke of Vendoſme ſeeing the French forces flying with the utmoſt precipitation, formed a rear-guard of about twenty-five ſquadrons and as many battalions, with which he ſecured his retreat. To this precaution was entirely owing the ſafety of their army; for the next morning at day-break the duke of Marlborough detached a large body of horſe and foot under the lieutenant-generals Bulau and Lumley, to purſue the fugitives; but the hedges and ditches which ſkirted the road were lined with the French grenadiers in ſuch a manner, that the cavalry could not form, and they were obliged to deſiſt. The French reached Ghent about nine in the morning, and marching through the city, encamped at Lovendegen on the canal: there they thought proper to caſt up intrenchments for their ſecurity, which they fortified with the artillery they had left at Gavre with their heavy baggage.

In this action, which was called the battle of Oudenarde, from the place near which it was fought, on the twelfth day of July, the electoral prince of Hanover (afterwards king George II.) gave early proofs of his martial diſpoſition. He charged at the head of the Hanoverian dragoons with great intrepidity: his horſe was ſhot under him, and one of his aids-de-camp killed by his ſide. About four thouſand of the enemy were left dead on the field of battle, two thouſand deſerted, and above eight thouſand were taken priſoners, including a great number of officers, together with ten pieces of cannon, above one hundred ſtandards, ſix colours, eight pair of kettle-drums, and four thouſand horſe. The loſs of the allies did not exceed two thouſand men, among whom were one major-general, and a few inferior officers.

The duke of Vendôme having reinforced the garriſons of Ypres, Liſle, and Tournay, remained quiet in his camp, to obſerve what enterprize the allies would next undertake, as he was pretty certain they would form the ſiege of ſome ſtrong place, as Ypres, Liſle, Mons, or Tournay; in which caſe he hoped to be able to return to Oudenarde, and make himſelf maſter of that town and of the Scheld, and ſo embarraſs them in their operations.

The allies remained two days encamped on the field of battle, when the duke of Marlborough ſent count Lottum with a detachment to level the French lines between Ypres and Warneton, and another was ſent to raiſe contributions as far as Arras, while the reſt of the army plundered the provinces of Picardy and Artois. All this was done with a view to draw Vendoſme out of the advantageous poſt he occupied; but that general underſtood the art of war too well to be thus caught; upon which the allies determined to lay ſiege to Liſle *.

To ſit down before ſo large and well fortified a town as Liſle without being maſter of Ghent, obliged to ſend for proviſions and ammunition as far as Oſtend, at the hazard of being every moment ſurpriſed, was what the French repreſented as an inſtance of the higheſt raſhneſs and preſumption, without reflecting that the miſunderſtanding and irreſolution that prevailed in their own army rendered this enterprize very excuſeable; and it was juſtified in the end by the ſucceſs. On the 13th of Auguſt the place was inveſted on one ſide by prince Eugene, and on the other by the prince of Orange Naſſau, ſtadtholder of Friſeland, while the duke of Marlborough encamped at Helchin to cover the ſiege. The town, the ſtrongeſt in all Flanders, was furniſhed with every kind of neceſſary, ſtore of ammunition, and the garriſon was reinforced by twenty-one battalions of the beſt troops in France, commanded by marechal Boufflers in perſon. The trenches were opened on the 22d day of Auguſt, and the attacks carried on with amazing vigour.

By this time the dukes of Burgundy and Berry being joined by the duke of Berwick with a powerful reinforcement, which augmented their army to twelve thouſand men, it was reſolved to try every effort to oblige the confederates to raiſe the ſiege. The duke of Vendoſme was of opinion to march without loſs of time and give battle to the allies. Indeed every one thought the duke of

* Liſle is a large, rich, and ſtrong city, the capital of French Flanders, and next to Paris, reckoned the chief place of the king of France's dominions. It ſtands among the pools and marſhes, fifteen miles weſt of Tournay, twenty-eight north of Doway, thirty-ſix ſouth-weſt of Ghent, thirty-ſeven ſouth-eaſt of Dunkirk, and thirty-eight almoſt weſt of Mons.

Burgundy rather in a condition to beſiege Marlborough and Eugene, than that general to beſiege Liſle. Vendoſme's advice, however, was not hearkened to, and ſuch were the altercations between the two generals, that the French king thought it neceſſary to diſpatch Mr. Chamillard, ſecretary of war, to examine whether it was proper to give the allies battle or not; the latter, it is certain, reſolved not to fight if they could poſſibly avoid it. The duke of Burgundy and Vendoſme marched towards the duke of Marlborough, and for ſeveral days cannonaded his camp; whereupon prince Eugene joined him with a conſiderable body of horſe and foot from the ſiege; but the allies finding the deſign of the enemy was only to retard the ſiege, the duke of Marlborough intrenched himſelf, and prince Eugene returned to Liſle, where the ſiege went on but ſlowly, the French diſputing every inch of ground with the moſt obſtinate bravery. The French generals finding all their endeavours to bring the confederates to an engagement prove fruitleſs, and not daring to attack the duke in his ſtrong camp, contented themſelves with diſpoſing of their troops in ſuch a manner as to cut off the convoys that might be coming with proviſions and ammunition to the beſiegers, as well as to cover thoſe provinces that lay expoſed to the incurſions of our army.

Accordingly, having received advice that the duke of Marlborough had ſent a detachment to cover the march of ſeven hundred waggons with ſupplies from Oſtend to prince Eugene's camp, the duke of Burgundy ſent an army of twenty-two thouſand men to make themſelves maſters of it; when, incredible to relate, the party which guarded it, tho' not exceeding ſix thouſand, made ſo gallant a defence under major-general Webb, that they compelled the enemy to retire with the loſs of upwards of ſeven thouſand men killed on the ſpot. This action, generally called the battle of Wynendale *, was one of the moſt glorious atchievements performed during the whole courſe of the war, and proved of infinite importance to the allies; ſince, if the convoy had been taken, the ſiege muſt have been raiſed. Much about the ſame time, the elector of Bavaria ſuffered a check before Bruſſels, which he had aſſaulted with a body of ten thouſand men; but was repulſed with great loſs by the garriſon; and hearing that the duke of Marlborough was marching towards him, he thought fit to retreat with great precipitation.

Mean while the beſiegers proſecuted their operations with ſuch incredible fury, that the garriſon was unable to reſiſt their attacks. All this, however, could not be done without a very conſiderable loſs on the ſide of the beſiegers; the allies themſelves acknowledged, that at the attack on the counterſcarp on the ſeventh of September, they loſt no leſs than two thouſand men, either killed or wounded, and amongſt them ſixteen engineers; and at the ſtorming the outworks, September the twenty-firſt, it is confeſſed they loſt one thouſand more. In this laſt affair prince Eugene was wounded in the head with a muſket-ball, which grazed upon his ſkull, and confined him to his tent for ſome days, during which time the duke of Marlborough commanded at the ſiege. On the thirtieth of September prince Eugene being recovered of his wound, viſited the trenches, and continued the operations with the uſual vigour. Marſhal de Boufflers did every thing that could be expected from a brave and experienced officer; but the allies having, after a moſt bloody and obſtinate action, made themſelves maſters of the covered way, prince Eugene cauſed a battery of fifty pieces of cannon to be raiſed thereon, which played with ſuch incredible fury upon the curtain, that in leſs than twelve hours a breach was made ſufficient for an aſſault. Every thing was accordingly prepared for beginning it, when, on the twenty-ſecond of October, marſhal Boufflers demanded a capitulation for the town. A mutual exchange of hoſtages were made, and prince Eugene, in conſideration of the gallant defence the French general had made, left it to him to propoſe his own terms. On this occaſion the prince wrote the marſhal the following letter:

"SIR,

"This is to congratulate you on the noble defence you have made, and at the ſame time to aſſure you how perfect an eſteem I entertain for your perſon, of which I am deſirous to give you a proof, by leaving it to yourſelf to draw up the articles of capitulation in ſuch manner as you ſhall think proper, proteſting to you that I will not make any alteration therein, unleſs I ſhould find any thing required contrary to my honour and duty; but this is what I can have no reaſon to apprehend from ſo brave a perſon."

The prince was as good as his promiſe, excepting in regard to one article only, whereby it was ſtipulated, that the citadel ſhould not be attacked from the town; he, however, gave a verbal promiſe to that effect, which he ſtrictly obſerved.

On the twenty-fifth of October prince Eugene entered the town in triumph, and the French garriſon marched into the caſtle, which ſtill continued to make a vigorous defence 'till a letter arrived from the French king to marſhal Boufflers, wherein he highly praiſed him for his gallant behaviour, and gave him permiſſion to ſurrender the citadel whenever he thought proper. Hereupon the marſhal beat a parley on the eighth of December, and on the tenth marched out at the head of his garriſon with the uſual marks of honour, and was conducted to Douay; and, which is very extraordinary, the detachment which eſcorted them thither, took up their quarters in the town on the faith of the marſhal's word, where they paſſed all the night, and met with all kind of civility and good treatment.

In the mean time the numerous army that had looked on under the dukes of Burgundy, Berwick, and Vendoſme, while Liſle was taken, began to diminiſh by little and little; and having ſuffered the duke of Marlborough to take Ghent, then Bruges, and all the poſts one after another, at laſt retreated to their own country; and the generals of the allies having ſettled the plan of winter quarters, repaired to the Hague, leaving the forces under the command of count Tilly. The duke of Marlborough and prince Eugene were every-where received with the higheſt acclamations and the moſt diſtinguiſhed marks of honour. Medals were ſtruck repreſenting them under the characters of Caſtor and Pollux; the States-general had ordered moſt magnificent fire-works to be prepared to celebrate their arrival at the Hague; which being made known to the two generals, they requeſted that the money deſtined for that exhibition might be diſtributed amongſt the brave ſoldiers who had been maimed and wounded during this bloody campaign *.

Little was done on the Upper Rhine this campaign: the electors of Bavaria and Hanover were oppoſed to each other there; but ſuch large detachments had been made from both their armies, for Flanders, that neither ſide was in a condition to undertake any action of importance.

The duke of Savoy this year made himſelf maſter of Exilles and la Perouſe, and of the Valley of St. Martin and Feneſtrelles, which are looked upon as the keys of Italy on that ſide: he alſo made a diverſion in favour of king Charles, by obliging the enemy to abandon Pignerole; and ſent a large detachment from Rouſſillon, to the aſſiſtance of marſhal Villars, who was not able to make head againſt the duke.

The affairs of king Philip began to proſper after the battle of Almanza, on all ſides. The duke of Orleans commanded the beſt part of the year; and, after making himſelf maſter of Tortoſa, had certainly carried his conqueſts farther, if the French court had not thought proper to recall him; the reaſons of which extraordinary ſtep have been ſomewhat differently reported. It is alleged by ſome writers, that the princeſs of Urſini, who at that time entirely governed king Philip, fell into a correſpondence with the enemies of the duke of Orleans at the French court, and, by a multitude of intrigues, rendered him ſuſpected to his uncle, Lewis XIV. Others, again, as confidently affirm, that his royal highneſs held a ſecret correſpondence with the allies, and had actually formed a project for ſupplanting king Philip. Whatever his political ſcheme might be, he certainly ſhewed himſelf an able politician, ſince by keeping count Staremberg employed in Catalonia, he gave the chevalier d'Asfeldt time to conquer Valencia. On the other hand, our miniſtry applied themſelves in a particular manner, this year, to put his Catholic majeſty's affairs into better order, and to repair, if it was poſſible, the untoward conſequences of the fatal battle of Almanza. Sir John Leake, who commanded the grand fleet, was ſo early at ſea, that by the twenty-ſeventh of March he was in Liſbon harbour: on the twenty-third of April he ſailed from thence for Barcelona, with near twenty ſail of the line, beſides tranſports, where he arrived on the fifteenth of May. There was an abſolute neceſſity of ſending ſo ſtrong a fleet to the relief of king Charles, who was now in a manner ſhut up in his city of Barcelona, and had no other hopes of being delivered, but by our fleet's tranſporting the German troops, that lay ready for his ſervice in Italy. The firſt thing, therefore, that the admiral did, was to ſend the tranſports, under the protection of a ſtrong ſquadron, to waft over thoſe forces; after which it was determined to attempt the reduction of the iſland of Sardinia †. The conqueſt of this place was made almoſt as ſoon as projected: the admiral appeared before Cagliari, the capital town, on the firſt of Auguſt, O. S. After having bombarded it for a day and a night, general Wills landed, with about eight hundred men, and made the neceſſary diſpoſitions for an attack, when the Spaniſh garriſon ſaved his troops any farther trouble, by coming to a ſpeedy capitulation. The reduction of this iſland was of great advantage to king Charles's affairs, as it enabled him to ſupply himſelf, as often as he had occaſion, with corn and other proviſions; the greateſt part of the inhabitants alſo entered into his ſervice ‡.

Scarce had the Engliſh admiral completed this conqueſt, when his aſſiſtance was required towards another: general Stanhope (afterwards earl Stanhope and ſecretary of ſtate) having formed a plan for the reduction of the iſland of Minorca ¶, concerted with the admiral the meaſures neceſſary for carrying it into execution; when they obtained from count Staremberg, the commander in chief of the allied army in Spain, a few battalions of Engliſh, Spaniards, and Portugueſe, with which the admiral and general ſet ſail from Barcelona on the twenty-third of Auguſt, with a fine train of Britiſh artillery, and were accompanied by brigadier Webb and colonel Petit, an engineer of great reputation; and on the twenty-ſixth, landed about two miles from fort St. Philip, with about three thouſand men, and formed the ſiege of the town. The garriſon conſiſted of one thouſand Spaniards and ſix hundred French mariners: the ſiege was carried on with ſuch vigour, that by the end of September, the place ſurrendered, and the garriſon marched out, and were afterwards tranſported on board our veſſels, ſome to France and others to Spain, according to the articles of the capitulation. Fort St. Philip being thus reduced, with the loſs of only forty men, the reſt of the iſland gladly ſubmitted to the Engliſh government, and general Stanhope appointed colonel Petit governor of Fort St. Philip, and deputy-governor of the whole iſland. Being thus poſſeſſed of this important iſland, our government thought proper to keep it to themſelves, as we had thereby the advantage of an excellent harbour, which during the war, was exceeding uſeful to us in the cleaning and refitting ſuch of our ſhips as were employed in the Mediterranean. The poſſeſſion of this iſland was confirmed to the Engliſh by the treaty of Utrecht, and remained in our hands till the year 1756, when it was moſt ſtrangely ſuffered to be retaken by the French, after a forty-nine years poſſeſſion. After this important conqueſt, the general returned to the army in Spain, where an unſucceſsful attempt to ſurpriſe Tortoſa finiſhed the operations of the campaign. Admiral Leake ſet ſail, with the largeſt ſhips, for England, and arrived ſafely at St. Helen's on the nineteenth of October †.

† This iſland lies to the north of Corſica, from which it is divided by a ſmall and ſhallow arm of the ſea. It has, on the eaſt, the ſea of Sicily; on the weſt the Mediterranean; on the ſouth the coaſt of Africa, from which it is not diſtant above fifty leagues. It is divided into two parts by the rivers Credo and Lerſo, and is extremely fruitful in corn, oil, honey, and all the neceſſaries of life.

¶ Minorca (ſo called from being leſs than Majorca, another iſland about ſix leagues from it), lies in the Mediterranean. Its greateſt length is forty-five, and greateſt breadth twenty-four Engliſh miles. The chief places are, 1. Citadella on the ſouth-weſt ſide, about the middle of the iſland, in the bottom of a bay, thought to be the Samma of Ptolemy: 2. Fort Formelli, on the eaſt ſide, over againſt Citadella: 3. Port Mahon, at the bottom of a large bay which runs about three Spaniſh miles to the ſouth-eaſt. The harbour is guarded by Fort St. Philip, and is accounted the beſt and largeſt in the Mediterranean. Minorca lies in latitude thirty-nine degrees forty-five minutes.

Our trade was pretty well ſecured by ſea this year, ſo that our merchants ſuffered very few loſſes: the cruiſers were numerous and active; and convoys were regularly furniſhed, and of a proper ſtrength. In the Weſt Indies, commodore Wager had the good fortune to meet with a fleet of Spaniſh galleons off Carthagena; but, being ill ſeconded by ſome of his captains, moſt of the enemy's ſhips eſcaped; however, the Spaniſh admiral, computed to be worth three millions of pieces of eight, blew up in the engagement, and the commodore took the rear-admiral, which was very rich, the commodore's own ſhare amounting to one hundred thouſand pounds ſterling. Two of the Engliſh captains, who had been wanting in their duty, were tried by a court martial, and degraded ‡. It was the misfortune of the naval adminiſtration, during the greateſt part of this reign, that men were preferred by intereſt rather than merit.

In the middle of the ſummer of this year, a reſolution was taken to make a deſcent on, or at leaſt to alarm, the coaſt of France; and ſir George Byng, as admiral, and lord Durſley, as vice-admiral of the blue, were appointed to command the fleet deſtined for that purpoſe; and lieutenant-general Erle had the command of the land-forces.

On the twenty-ninth of July the fleet, with the tranſports having the troops on board which were intended for the deſcent, ſailed from Spithead, and, after hovering ſome days upon the French coaſt, they anchored, on the eleventh of Auguſt, in the bay of La Hogue, with an intent to land the next day; but, upon reconnoitring the coaſt, they found ſo ſtrong a force collected to oppoſe the deſcent, and ſo many forts and batteries in a condition to defend the ſhore, that it was deemed impracticable; upon which the fleet returned to Spithead, on the twenty-eighth of Auguſt: after thus alarming the French coaſt, the troops on board were, at the deſire of the duke of Marlborough, landed at Oſtend, on the twenty-third of September, and proved greatly inſtrumental in the reduction of Liſle. Another ſquadron of the Britiſh fleet, under the command of ſir George Byng, carried over the archduchеſs Mary Anne, to be married to the king of Portugal, which ceremony was performed with great pomp and magnificence. She had a quick and eaſy paſſage, and arrived at Liſbon on the twenty-ſeventh of October ¶.

Before I proceed to relate the domeſtic tranſactions of our own country, I think it requiſite juſt to take notice that the elector-palatine was this year reſtored to the poſſeſſion of the Upper Palatinate, with the title and rank which had been veſted in the houſe of Bavaria by the treaty of Munſter: and George-Lewis of Hanover (afterwards king George I. of Great Britain) was at length acknowleged as elector of Brunſwick Lunenburg by the electoral college, to which dignity he had been raiſed by the intereſt of king William in the year 1692 *.

The court of England was this ſummer involved in a very diſagreeable altercation with the czar of Muſcovy, on account of an inſult offered to the perſon of his ambaſſador count Mattheoff, who was arreſted in the ſtreet at the ſuit of one Morton, a laceman, and inſolently treated by the bailiffs, who dragged him to a ſpunging-houſe, where he continued until he was bailed by the earl of Feverſham and a merchant in the city. Enraged at this inſult, he demanded redreſs of the government, and was ſeconded in his remonſtrance by the ambaſſadors of the emperor, the king of Pruſſia, and ſeveral other foreign potentates. Notwithſtanding all poſſible aſſurances were made him of ſatisfaction, and that the authors of this outrage were taken into cuſtody, Mattheof demanded a paſſport for himſelf and family, refuſed the preſents that are uſually made to ambaſſadors at their departure, and retired in diſguſt to Holland. The czar wrote a ſharp letter to the queen, inſiſting upon her puniſhing with death all the perſons concerned in offering this affront to the perſon of his ambaſſador; but as ſuch a ſatisfaction could not be granted him conſiſtent with the laws of England, the queen and her miniſtry were thrown into the utmoſt perplexity, and ſeveral councils were held to conſider how to proceed in this critical ſituation.

On the twenty-eighth of October, about ten in the forenoon, died his royal highneſs George prince of Denmark, lord high-admiral of Great Britain, and her majeſty's conſort, at Kenſington, of an aſthma, in the fifty-ſixth year of his age. He was married to her majeſty the twenty-eighth of July, 1683, and on the thirteenth of November, 1708, he was interred in the abbey-church of Weſtminſter, at ten in the evening. Biſhop Burnet gives us the following character of him: "This prince had ſhewn himſelf brave in war, both in Denmark and in Ireland: his temper was mild and gentle; he had made a good progreſs in mathematics; he had travelled through France, Italy, and Germany, and knew much more than he could well expreſs, for he ſpoke acquired languages ill and ungracefully. His royal highneſs was very much lamented by thoſe who knew him; and her majeſty, who had been, during the whole courſe of her marriage, an extraordinary tender and affectionate wife, was inconſolable for his loſs; they had indeed been the happieſt pair that ever adorned a court." Her majeſty was pleaſed to keep the admiralty in her own hands for about three weeks, and on the twenty-fifth of November ſhe appointed Thomas earl of Pembroke lord high admiral of Great Britain and Ireland, to the great ſatisfaction of the whole nation.

This event was followed by ſome changes in the miniſtry: the earl of Wharton was conſtituted lord-lieutenant of Ireland, the lord Somers appointed preſident of the council, and the earl of Dorſet was made conſtable of Dover caſtle, and lord-warden of the Cinque-ports. Notwithſtanding theſe promotions of Whig noblemen, the duke of Marlborough declined apace in his credit with the queen, who was privately under the direction of Mr. Harley and the Tory party.

The new parliament (being the ſecond of Great Britain) met the ſecond of November, when the Whigs appeared to have a great majority. The queen, not thinking it decent to appear in the houſe ſo ſoon after the death of her conſort, appointed, by a commiſſion under the great-ſeal, the archbiſhop of Canterbury, the chancellor, the lord-ſteward, and the maſter of the horſe, to repreſent her royal perſon, and to open the ſeſſion. Sir Richard Onſlow being choſen ſpeaker of the lower houſe, received the queen's approbation. After which the lord chancellor made a ſpeech to both houſes, importing, "That the commiſſioners were appointed by her majeſty to acquaint them, that ſhe expected they would continue to proſecute the war with the ſame vigour and reſolution, with which it had hitherto been conducted: that ſhe hoped they would enable her to make ſuch augmentation of her forces as they ſhould judge neceſſary for preſerving and improving the advantages which the allies had gained in the Netherlands: that ſhe deſired they would prepare ſuch bills as might confirm and perfect the union: that, if they would propoſe means for the advancement of trade and manufactures, ſhe would take pleaſure in enacting ſuch proviſions; and that, as ſhe had the moſt ſincere regard for the preſervation of their liberties and the ſupport of the proteſtant ſucceſſion, ſhe would continue to exert her utmoſt endeavours to defeat the deſigns of the pretender, and of all his open and ſecret abettors †."

The addreſſes of condolance, both of lords and commons, to her majeſty, for the death of the prince her conſort, and thoſe of congratulation on the ſucceſs of her arms under the duke of Marlborough, being matters of form, I ſhall paſs them over, to come to other buſineſs of the parliament, the chief of which was concerning the ſupply, the Scots elections and invaſions, the naturalization of foreign proteſtants, and the trials of treaſon in Scotland.

Having conſidered the different branches of the ſupply, they approved of an augmentation of ten thouſand men as neceſſary for the more vigorous proſecution of the war; and they voted above ſeven millions for the ſervice of the enſuing year, which was to be raiſed by a land-tax of four ſhillings in the pound, the duty on malt, and other articles: theſe funds however would have fallen very ſhort of the ſum voted, had not the bank of England agreed to circulate two millions five hundred thouſand pounds in Exchequer-bills for the government, on condition that the term of their continuance as a bank ſhould be prolonged for twenty-one years, from the firſt of Auguſt, 1711, and their ſtock of two millions two hundred and one thouſand one hundred and ſeventy-one pounds ſhould be doubled by a new ſubſcription: the two-third ſubſidy was appropriated for the intereſt of the money raſed by this expedient.

The Scottiſh elections occaſioned great debates in both houſes; the queſtion chiefly turned upon this point, Whether the eldeſt ſons of Scottiſh peers were capable of ſitting in the Britiſh parliament? What was principally urged againſt them was, their incapacity to ſit in the parliament of Scotland before the union, and therefore ought to be ſo in reſpect to the parliament of Great Britain. Council was heard in behalf of the claimants; but little being offered on their ſide againſt this argument, the eldeſt ſons of the peers of Scotland were declared incapable to ſit in parliament. In conſequence of this deciſion, given in the month of December, the ſpeaker was ordered to iſſue writs for electing new members for the ſhires of Aberdeen and Linlithgow, in the room of William lord Haddo, and James lord Johnſton, the firſt eldeſt ſon to the earl of Aberdeen, and the other of the marquis of Annandale ‡. A petition, of a new nature, was much about the ſame time brought into the houſe of lords by ſome Scottiſh peers, claiming a right to vote and ſign proxies in the election of the ſixteen peers of Scotland. There were very warm debates in the houſe upon this ſubject; but at length, upon a diviſion, it was carried, "That a Scottiſh lord, created a peer of Great Britain, ſhould no longer retain his vote in Scotland; and that the noblemen who were under confinement in the caſtle of Edinburgh, under ſuſpicion of being concerned in the late invaſion, had a right to ſign proxies, after having taken the oaths to the government."

But the principal affair that came under parliamentary conſideration this ſeſſion was, the naturalization of foreign proteſtants. This point was debated with great vehemence in both houſes, and many ſhrewd arguments were advanced on both ſides of the queſtion. The Whigs ſpoke in favour of the bill; the Tories argued againſt it: the former affirmed that it would prove an effectual means to encourage induſtry, improve trade and manufactures, and repair the waſte of men which the war had occaſioned. They inſtanced the conduct of the king of Pruſſia, who by inviting the French refugees to ſettle in his dominions, had fertilized a barren and ill-peopled country, improved its trade and manufactures, augmented its revenues, and procured many other conſiderable benefits. But the chief motive of the Whigs in puſhing this bill, was to throw an addition of foreigners into the balance againſt the landed intereſt. The oppoſers of an act of naturalization objected thereto, that ſuch a ſwarm of aliens as ſuch a meaſure would neceſſarily bring over, might bring with them many dangerous conſequences to the conſtitution; that it was in fact inviting ſo many ſpies and informers amongſt us, ſince it could not be ſuppoſed that they would leave all affection for their mother-country behind them, though they might gladly embrace for the preſent the aſylum offered them here. It was ſaid, they would find means to inſinuate themſelves into many places of truſt and profit, and even to ſeats in the great aſſembly of the national repreſentatives, and by frequent intermarriages, contribute to the extinction of the Engliſh race. Laſtly, that they would greatly increaſe the number of our poor, already ſo great a burthen to this country, and take out of the mouths of Engliſh tradeſmen and labourers great part of the bread they now earned by their induſtry *. Cogent as theſe arguments appeared to be, the Whigs carried their point, and the bill, with ſome amendments, paſſed through both houſes, and was at laſt confirmed by the royal aſſent †, though not without a number of proteſts entered by the Tory members, particularly the duke of Buckingham, and the lords Nottingham, Guernſey, Scarſdale, North, Grey, Angleſey, and Guildford.

Part of the time of the lords, as well as of the commons, was taken up in examining papers about the pretender's invaſion. The Tories were for charging the miniſtry with great neglect of duty, in not providing timely and effectually againſt it. Thoſe attacks, however, ſerved only to betray the animoſity, as well as weakneſs, of their party; for the Whigs having the lead in parliament, it was reſolved by a great majority that the miniſtry had behaved with all the care and fidelity which could reaſonably be expected from men in their ſtation. This enquiry however gave riſe to a bill for regulating trials in caſes of high-treaſon in Scotland: it was brought in under the title of "An act for improving the union of the two kingdoms." By this law trials for treaſon in Scotland were to be conducted in the ſame manner as in England, with ſome ſmall variation. This bill was warmly oppoſed by the Scottiſh members; but maugre all their efforts, it paſſed rapidly thro' both houſes, and finally paſſed into a law; to render which the more palatable, her majeſty was pleaſed to grant an act of grace, by which all treaſons were pardoned, except thoſe committed on the high-ſeas; and an excepting clauſe was inforced againſt thoſe who had been aiding and aſſiſting to the pretender, in his embarkation for his laſt expedition againſt this country ‡.

On the firſt of March 1709, the duke of Marlborough came over from Flanders, when the lords gave him the thanks of their houſe for his great ſervices this campaign; and it being conjectured that he had brought over ſome propoſals of peace, both houſes addreſſed her majeſty on this ſubject, wherein they deſire her majeſty, that the French king may be obliged to own her title and the proteſtant ſucceſſion, and that the pretender may be removed out of his dominions, never to return again, and that the harbour of Dunkirk and its fortifications might be demoliſhed.

An order of council having been made about this time for leaving out the prayer for the queen's having iſſue, on preſumption that her majeſty would continue in the ſtate of widowhood; Mr. Watſon, ſon to lord Rockingham, moved in the lower houſe to addreſs her majeſty, "That ſhe would not ſuffer her juſt grief to prevail ſo far, but that ſhe would, in compliance with the earneſt wiſhes of her ſubjects, entertain thoughts of a ſecond marriage." This motion was carried, and the addreſs actually preſented to the queen, who returned for anſwer, "That the proviſion ſhe had made for the proteſtant ſucceſſion would always be a proof of her hearty concern for the happineſs of the nation; but that the ſubject of their addreſs was of ſuch a nature, that ſhe was perſuaded they did not expect a particular anſwer:" a moſt gracious and prudent reply to a very impertinent and ill-timed addreſs.

The affair of the Muſcovitiſh ambaſſador, which ſtill continued greatly to embarraſs the queen and council, gave occaſion to the bringing in and paſſing a bill in both houſes, for preſerving the privileges of ambaſſadors and other foreign miniſters. By this act the perſons of ambaſſadors, and thoſe of their ſervants, were effectually ſecured from the danger of arreſt; though with this reaſonable exception in favour of tradeſmen, that no perſon ſhould be proſecuted for arreſting the ſervant of an ambaſſador or public miniſter, unleſs the name of ſuch ſervant was firſt regiſtered in the office of one of the ſecretaries of ſtate, and by him tranſmitted to the ſheriffs of London and Middleſex, who ſhould hang it up in ſome conſpicuous place in their office. Her majeſty alſo thought proper ſome time after to make ſolemn excuſes by her ambaſſador at the Ruſſian court (Mr. Whitworth) to repair Mattheoff's honour by a letter, to order the offenders to be ſeverely proſecuted, and to indemnify the ambaſſador for all his coſts and damages, conceſſions with which the czar and his ambaſſador declared themſelves well ſatisfied; and thus this troubleſome affair ended.

Theſe were the tranſactions of this ſeſſion of parliament, which was prorogued on the firſt of April by the lord-chancellor, in virtue of a commiſſion from her majeſty, who ſtill continued indiſpoſed.

In conſequence of the naturalization act, there came over in the month of May this year near ſeven thouſand of the poor Palatines and Swabians from the borders of the Rhine in Germany, who had been utterly ruined, and driven from their habitations by the French. It was never known who encouraged them to this emigration. Certain it is, there was no ſettled or concerted plan for their eſtabliſhment any where. Had they been all ſent to ſome of our colonies on the continent of America, they would probably before now have raiſed a conſiderable addition to our ſtrength in thoſe parts. It was propoſed by ſome to ſettle them in the new foreſt of Hampſhire, where land might be parcelled out for them by ſhares or lots. Upon

† By this act it was provided, I. the whole, it was an ill conducted, though it might be a well meant affair. Being however come, there was a neceſſity of keeping them from periſhing: a ſufficient number of tents was erected for them on Blackheath and near Camberwell, and a brief was granted throughout Great Britain for a collection for them. Some were taken into private houſes; 500 families of them were ſent into Ireland, where twenty-four thouſand pounds were granted by parliament for their ſupport. Three thouſand of them were at length ſent over to New-York, and ſettled upon Hudſon's river; but being badly received there, many of them removed to Penſylvania, where they were kindly entertained by the quakers, which afterwards proved the means of drawing thither many thouſands of German and Swiſs proteſtants, whereby Penſylvania is ſince become by far the moſt populous and flouriſhing colony for its ſtanding of any in Britiſh America *.

This year her majeſty thought proper, on account of the great multiplication of buſineſs, to appoint a third ſecretary of ſtate; and accordingly James duke of Queenſberry and Dover was ſworn into that office.

France was now not only compleatly humbled, but even trembled for its own ſafety. Reſources began to fail, credit was at a ſtand; and the people, who had idolized their monarch in his proſperity, began to murmur againſt him when he became unfortunate. The ſeverity of the winter compleated the deſpair of the nation. The olive trees, which bring in a great deal of money in the ſouth of France, were all deſtroyed; almoſt all the fruit-trees were killed by the froſt †: there were no hopes of an harveſt, and there was little corn in the granaries; and what could be brought at a very great diſtance from the ſea-port towns of the Levant and the coaſt of Barbary, was liable to be taken by the fleets of the confederates, to whom the French had hardly any ſhips to oppoſe. On the other hand, the allies were ſtill fruitful in reſources, eſpecially the Dutch, who had been ſo long the carriers of other nations, that they had magazines ſufficiently ſtored to ſupply the ſtrongeſt armies the allies could bring into the field in a plentiful manner, while the French troops, diminiſhed and diſheartened, ſeemed ready to periſh for want.

Under theſe fatal circumſtances, Lewis determined to ſacrifice all the conſiderations of pride and ambition, as well as the intereſt of his grandſon, to his deſire of peace, which was become ſo neceſſary and indiſpenſible. Accordingly, in the beginning of the year 1709, he diſpatched the preſident Rouillé privately to Holland with general propoſals of peace, and the offers of a good barrier to the States-general, in hopes by thoſe offers to detach them from the confederacy. This miniſter had a ſecret conference with Buys and Vanderduſſen, the penſionaries of Amſterdam and Gouda, at Mardyke; from whence he was permitted to proceed to Woerden, a place between Leyden and Utrecht. The ſtates, unwilling to take any ſteps in an affair of this nature without the participation of their allies, communicated the propoſals of France to the courts of Vienna and Great Britain; whereupon prince Eugene and the duke of Marlborough went over to the Hague in the beginning of April, and conferred with the grand penſionary Heinſius, Buys, and Vanderduſſen, on the ſubject of the French propoſals, which were deemed unſatisfactory.

Lewis then ſent the marquis de Torcy, his ſecretary for foreign affairs, to the Hague, with freſh offers. By this time the queen had ſent over the lord viſcount Townſhend as her ambaſſador-extraordinary and joint plenipotentiary with his grace the duke of Marlborough. The conferences began about the middle of May; but, conſidering the diſpoſition of the victors, very little was to be expected from them. Prince Eugene, Marlborough, and the penſionary Heinſius, were all three for continuing the war: the prince, becauſe it at once gratified his glory and his revenge; Marlborough, becauſe he gained both reputation and immenſe riches, of which he was equally fond; the third, who was guided by the other two, took a ſecret pleaſure in returning upon the miniſter of the proudeſt of all princes, the arrogance with which his republic had been treated in 1672. The offers made by the French miniſter in his maſter's name were as follow; "That Lewis would conſent to the demolition of Dunkirk; that he would abandon the pretender, and diſmiſs him from his dominions; that he would acknowlege the queen's title and the proteſtant ſucceſſion; that he would renounce all pretenſions to the Spaniſh monarchy, and cede the places in the Netherlands which the States-general demanded for their barrier; that he would treat with the emperor on the footing of the treaty of Ryſwick, and even demoliſh the fortifications of Straſburgh." The miniſters of the allies ſpoke in the ſtile of conquerors; and without taking any notice of the French king's conditions, demanded the reſtitution of the Upper and Lower Alſace to the empire, and inſiſted upon Lewis reſtoring Straſburg in its preſent condition; upon his ceding the town and caſtellany of Liſle, demoliſhing Dunkirk, New Briſac, Fort Louis, and Hunningen: they even went ſo far as to require that he ſhould aſſiſt in driving his grandſon from the throne of Spain within two months; and that, as a ſurety for his performance of this treaty, he ſhould begin by ceding to the States-general for ever ten towns in Flanders, among which was Tournay, not yet taken. "Lewis little expected (ſays a celebrated French writer ‡) ſome years before, when he refuſed a company of horſe to prince Eugene ‖, when Churchill was only a colonel in the Engliſh army, and the name of Heinſius was hardly known, that one day theſe three men ſhould impoſe ſuch laws upon him." Indeed candour obliges us to confeſs, however we may deteſt the artifice and duplicity of the French in moſt of their political dealings, that theſe were rather the demands of perſons rendered proud and wanton by ſucceſs, than the endeavours of patriots and friends to mankind, to remedy the evils and inconveniencies of a long, bloody, and expenſive war, by a juſt and equitable peace. In vain did Torcy make uſe of every argument to obtain leſs rigorous terms; in vain had he recourſe to ſoothing ſupplications and conceſſions in the name of his ſovereign: he found the plenipotentiaries implacable, and therefore pretended to ſubmit to theſe preliminaries, which were ſigned on the twenty-eighth of May, and Torcy returned to carry his maſter the orders of his enemies. Lewis XIV. received them with the mingled ſentiments of grief, ſhame, and indignation: he rejected them with diſdain, and now did what he had never before done towards his ſubjects: he expoſed the extravagance and unreaſonableneſs of the demands of the allies, in a circular letter addreſſed to his people; and after acquainting them with the farther burthens he was obliged to lay upon them, he endeavoured to excite their indignation, to rouſe their honour, and even to move their pity. This procedure had the deſired effect: the French, a people remarkable for their affection to their kings, though impoveriſhed and half-ſtarved by the war, reſolved to expend their whole ſubſtance in his ſupport, and rather to fight his battles without pay, than abandon him to the infamy of accepting ſuch diſhonourable terms ¶.

† The ſcourge of this dreadful winter was general all over Europe: with us it began to freeze the night before Chriſtmas-day, and was followed by great and heavy ſnows. The weather was moſtly dark and gloomy: the froſt laſted three months, during which time many cattle, eſpecially ſheep, and likewiſe birds, periſhed. The Thames was frozen over, and on the third of January people began to erect booths and ſet up tents on the ice. The ſummer which ſucceeded this froſt was very near as comfortleſs as the winter, by reaſon of the coldneſs and moiſture of the air, pouring almoſt continual rains on the earth, which, as it retarded the maturity of the fruits, ſo in many places it occaſioned a thin harveſt, and conſequently a ſcarcity of corn.

The preliminaries being thus rejected by the French king, the conferences were broken off, Rouillé was ordered to quit Holland in twenty-four hours, and the confederate generals reſolved to open the campaign without farther delay.

Prince Eugene and the duke of Marlborough repaired to Flanders, and on the twenty-ſecond of June the allied army was aſſembled on the plain of Liſle to the number of one hundred and ten thouſand men. Lewis, on his part, ſent the marſhal Villars, whom the French ſtiled the Fortunate General, to replace Vendôme, and make head againſt his enemies. Villars took poſſeſſion of a very advantageous camp on the plain of Lens, where he threw up ſuch intrenchments, that the allies did not think fit to attack him, but reſolved to open the campaign with the ſiege of Tournay *. Accordingly that place was inveſted by the confederate troops on the twenty-ſeventh of June, N. S. On the twenty-ſeventh of July the trenches were opened: the town itſelf was eaſily taken; but the citadel was ſo ſtrong, both by art and nature, and the governor, lieutenant-general Surville, ſuch an experienced officer, that, though he had a garriſon of four thouſand men only, and the place was ſcantily provided with proviſions, he continued to hold out for the ſpace of a month with incredible valour. As the beſiegers proceeded by the method of ſap, this ſiege proved extremely bloody, the miners on both ſides frequently meeting underground, in the midſt of mines and countermines, big with ruin and deſtruction. Of all the horrid ſcenes of war, this was the moſt dreadful: thoſe who had braved death in every ſhape aboveground, were ſhocked at theſe encounters, and dreaded entering thoſe diſmal caverns, where they were not only in danger of being choked by rubbiſh, and periſhing by the ſword of the enemy, but very often by their friends, who were not eaſily to be diſtinguiſhed from the foe. About four hundred of the confederates were blown into the air by the exploſion of one of theſe mines. At length the beſiegers having effected a breach, and made the neceſſary diſpoſitions for a general aſſault on the ſecond of September, the governor ſurrendered, upon condition that all the officers and ſoldiers ſhould retain their ſwords and baggage, and be permitted to return into France, with this reſtriction, that they ſhould not ſerve until a like number of officers and ſoldiers of the allies that were priſoners, ſhould be exchanged for them, and that they ſhould leave their colours and firearms behind them †.

Tournay being reduced, the allies next reſolved upon the ſiege of Mons ‡. With this view prince Eugene and the duke of Marlborough made the army paſs the Scheld, and diſpatched the prince of Heſſe Caſſel to attack the French lines from the Haiſne to the Sombre, which were abandoned at his approach. On the ſeventh of September, marſhal Boufflers arrived in the French camp, and joined Villars, who, after making ſeveral motions, in order to cover Mons, poſted himſelf behind the woods of la Merte and Trainiere, in the neighbourhood of Malplaquet. On the ninth the allies made a motion to the left, by which the two armies approached ſo near, that they began to cannonade each other. The French army amounted to one hundred and twenty thouſand men, that of the confederates was nearly the ſame number: it being found impracticable to form the ſiege of Mons until the French were driven from their poſt, which they had fortified in the ſtrongeſt manner, it was reſolved to attack them at all events. This occaſioned the bloodieſt battle that ever was fought in Flanders. Accordingly, on the eleventh of September, in the morning, the duke ordered

* Tournay is one of the moſt ancient cities of Flanders; it had belonged, time out of mind, to France, till, in 1513, it was taken by king Henry VIII. of England. It was ſoon after reſtored by the intrigues of cardinal Woolſey. The Spaniards took it in 1618, and kept it till 1667, when it was retaken by Lewis XIV. This prince had ſpared no coſt to fortify it, and had made it one of the ſtrongeſt places in the Netherlands. It is very advantageouſly ſituated, of a great compaſs, and is divided by the Scheld, as the army that beſieges it muſt alſo be, which is always very incommodious and dangerous. Tournay is a biſhopric, under the archbiſhop of Cambray; about fifteen miles eaſt of Liſle, twenty north-eaſt of Douay, thirty-two almoſt weſt of Mons, and thirty ſouth of Ghent.

‡ Mons, or Bergen, a very large, fine, ſtrong, and rich city of the Auſtrian Netherlands, and the capital of Hainault, ſituated on a hill, at the junction of the Haine and Trouille. The country round it may be ſo overflowed as to render an enemy's approaches very difficult. The French took it in 1691, but ceded it to Spain by the treaty of Ryſwick, in 1697; it was confirmed to the houſe of Auſtria by the peace of Utrecht, in 1713, and made part of the barrier. The French, under count Saxe, took this city in the late war; but it was reſtored by the treaty of Aix la Chapelle, in 1748, after demoliſhing its fortifications. It lies twenty-four miles ſouth-ſouth-eaſt of Tournay, and thirty ſouth-weſt of Bruſſels; latitude fifty degrees thirty minutes north, longitude three degrees thirty-ſix minutes eaſt.

batteries to be erected on the wings and in the center, and prepared for the attack.

The duke of Marlborough commanded the right wing, compoſed of the Engliſh and German troops in Engliſh pay; prince Eugene was in the center, and baron Fagel and the prince of Orange on the left, with the Dutch. Marſhal Villars took the command of the left wing of his army, and left the right to marſhal Boufflers, who was his ſenior officer.

About eight o'clock in the morning the attack was began by general Schuylemberg and the duke of Argyll, from the right, at the head of eighty ſix battalions, ſupported by twenty-two battalions under count Lottum: theſe fell upon the left of the enemy with ſuch fury, that in ſpite of all the reſiſtance they could make, which was indeed extremely obſtinate and well maintained, they were, in leſs than an hour, driven from their entrenchments into the woods of Sart and Trainiere. The prince of Orange and baron Fagel, with thirty-ſix Dutch battalions, advanced againſt the right of the enemy, who were poſted in the wood of la Merte, and had ſecured themſelves in ſuch a manner, by triple entrenchments, with lines, cannon, and trees laid acroſs, that they ſeemed to be quite inacceſſible. The battle was here fought with the moſt deſperate courage on both ſides: the Dutch obliged the French to quit the firſt entrenchment, but were repulſed from the ſecond with great ſlaughter: the prince of Orange, in order to encourage his men, took a ſtandard and planted it on the entrenchments, but not a man was found hardy enough to follow him. This gallant prince had two horſes killed under him, moſt of his officers were either ſlain or diſabled, and it is hard to ſay which ſide victory would have taken, had not marſhal Villars, who had quitted his ſtation to come and oppoſe the prince of Orange, received a wound in his knee, which obliged him to quit the field of battle, in order to have it dreſſed. The French, ſtruck with this news, abated conſiderably in the vigour of their reſiſtance; the prince of Orange returned to the charge with double fury, and at length forced the enemy's entrenchments, and drove them out of the wood into the plain, where their horſe was all drawn up; and ours advancing upon them, the whole army engaged, and fought with great fury till three in the afternoon, when the French cavalry began to give way and retire. The allies purſued them to the defile of Bavay with great ſlaughter. Marſhal Boufflers, who had taken the command upon the accident which had befallen marſhal Villars, made a retreat in as good order as poſſible, with the aſſiſtance of the prince of Montmorenci, afterwards marſhal Luxemburg. The French army reſted between Queſnoi and Valenciennes: ours encamped upon the field of battle *.

It muſt be readily believed that the loſs muſt have been very great on both ſides, from ſo bloody a conflict. This was, indeed, the deareſt victory the confederates had ever purchaſed, above eighteen thouſand of them being either killed or wounded in the action, and among the former ſeveral officers of diſtinction: nevertheleſs the enemy had little reaſon to boaſt of their ſucceſs; for, although they did not loſe above eight or nine thouſand men, they ſuffered the diſgrace of a total defeat, and were ſo ſeverely handled, that they were not able to make any other attempt to relieve Mons, which ſurrendered about the end of October; and the French not caring to hazard another battle, remained inactive during the reſt of the campaign, which was cloſed about the middle of November, when both armies retired to winter-quarters. If the glory of a victory conſiſts in the number of lives ſacrificed to gain it, the allies had, indeed, great reaſon to plume themſelves upon this: the greateſt maſters in the military art were, however, very liberal of their cenſures on the duke of Marlborough's conduct, for not attacking the enemy before they began to form their intrenchments: the battle would certainly have been leſs bloody, and the proſpect of victory was far more favourable, than after the French had ſo far fortified their camp as to render it almoſt impregnable. It muſt, however, be acknowleged, that few generals were leſs guilty of raſh actions than the duke of Marlborough; and it was generally believed he had ſuffered himſelf to be over-perſuaded by the Dutch generals, who were ever remarkably ſlow, and ridiculouſly cautious in all their motions †.

This year's campaign on the Rhine proved very inconſiderable: the court of Vienna had taken ſo little care to provide for its army there, that it was ſome time before the elector of Brunſwick could be prevailed on to aſſume the command of them: at length, however, he put himſelf at their head; but the whole of the operations was confined to one ſharp action between a detachment of the French army commanded by the count de Borgh, and a body of Germans under count Merci, on the twenty-ſixth of Auguſt, N. S. in which about two thouſand men were ſlain on each ſide, but without any manifeſt advantage to either party, farther than that the French obliged the count to abandon an enterprize he had formed upon the Franche Compté, and to repaſs the Rhine ‡.

The campaign in Piedmont was equally inactive. Field-marſhal count Thaun commanded the confederates in that quarter, the duke of Savoy having refuſed to take the field, on account of ſome differences between him and the emperor, occaſioned by the latter's refuſing to confirm Vigevano, and other dependencies in the Milaneſe, which had by agreement been made over to the duke. Count Thaun had formed the deſign of beſieging Briançon; but the duke of Berwick, who commanded for the French, took ſuch precautions, as effectually diſconcerted the count's enterprize, who found himſelf obliged to repaſs the Alps, which he had croſſed, and marched his troops into winter-quarters in Piedmont, towards the latter end of September §.

The moſt important tranſaction relating to Italy, this year, was the emperor's obliging the pope (Clement XI.) to acknowlege the archduke for king of Spain, which his holineſs had hitherto delayed to do, under various pretexts, until he ſhould ſee what turn the affairs of the houſe of Bourbon might take during this campaign. This Clement had, at the inſtigation of France, ventured to unſheathe the ſword laſt year for a ſhort time; but he had no ſooner taken up arms, than he repented of it. He perceived the Romans were incapable of wielding the ſword under a ſacerdotal government; he therefore put Commachio (a ſmall city and imperial fief in the duchy of Ferrara) into the emperor's hands, as a pledge of his future peaceable conduct, and acknowleged Charles as king of Spain, Naples, and Sicily *.

The military operations in Spain and Portugal were not by much ſo favourable to the allies, as thoſe in Flanders. The caſtle of Alicant, garriſoned by two Engliſh regiments, had been beſieged, and held out during the whole winter againſt a very numerous army of the enemy under count d'Asfeldt, with a very large train of heavy artillery, excellently ſupplied with ammunition: at length the city being abſolutely untenable, colonel Richards, the commander, retired with his garriſon into the caſtle, which had hitherto been deemed impregnable. There colonel Sibourg, a French refugee officer, took the command, determined to hold it out to the laſt extremity. At length d'Asfeldt, who conducted the ſiege, cauſed the ſolid rock on which the caſtle ſtands to be undermined, and having lodged fifteen hundred barrels of gunpowder therein, on the thirtieth of March ſummoned the caſtle to ſurrender on the moſt honourable terms; threatening however, if theſe were neglected, to ſhew no mercy to thoſe who might fall into his hands; at the ſame time he deſired the governor, Sibourg, to depute ſome of his moſt experienced engineers to examine the condition of the works. This offer was accepted, and the officers, at their return, aſſured the governor that nothing could preſerve the whole caſtle from being carried up by the exploſion, unleſs it took vent in their own counter-mines. D'Asfeldt had allowed Sibourg twenty-four hours to conſider what he would do; the other remained firm to his purpoſe, and with an obſtinacy which ſurpriſed the enemy, reſolved to ſtand the exploſion. The beſiegers finding him immoveable, ſet fire to the mine at the appointed hour. The centinels on the ramparts obſerving ſome ſmoke from the lighted matches and other combuſtible matter near the train, gave the alarm, upon which the governor ordered the guard to retire, and walked out to the parade, attended by ſeveral officers: the mine at laſt blew up, the whole rock felt the concuſſion, and opening ſuddenly under their feet, and cloſing ſuddenly again, buried them in the abyſs; about fifty other perſons were ſwallowed up in different quarters. After the loſs of the governor and chief officers, the command fell to lieutenant-colonel d'Albeaume, of Sibourg's regiment, who immediately drew out a detachment of the whole garriſon, and with it made a deſperate ſally upon the enemy, who thought hardly a man was alive within the place; as would in all probability have been the caſe, had not the force of the exploſion forced a vent through the veins of the rock and the counter-mine. D'Albeaume ſtill continued to defend the caſtle †.

At length, a ſquadron of eighteen Engliſh men of war, under the command of ſir Edward Whitaker, ſailed from Barcelona to the relief of the place, and came into Alicant road on the ſeventeenth of April, from whence they made a furious fire upon the town, and endeavoured to land ſome forces, to throw into the caſtle; but don Pedro de Ronquillo, who had taken the command thereof, on its being ſurrendered, had taken ſuch meaſures to prevent their landing, that the Engliſh thought proper to deſiſt from the deſign. General Stanhope, who commanded the land-forces on board the fleet, ſeeing the impoſſibility of relieving the place, ſent a boat aſhore with a flag of truce, and an officer with a letter to the Spaniſh governor, wherein he offered to ſurrender the caſtle of Alicant upon honourable terms, which was done accordingly; and thus Alicant was reduced, the only ſtrong place that king Charles had in Valencia ‡.

On the frontiers of Catalonia, general Staremberg not only maintained his ground, but even embarraſſed the enemy. Having paſſed the river Segra in ſpite of all the oppoſition they could make, he reduced the fortreſs of Balaguer; and having left a ſtrong garriſon to keep poſſeſſion thereof, repaſſed the river, and ſent the forces into winter-quarters.

In Portugal, the earl of Galway, to whom the late defeat at Almanza does not appear to have taught more prudence and circumſpection, ventured upon a ſecond battle, in which he was as unſucceſsful as in the former: the Portugueſe, who compoſed the major part of his army, according to their uſual behaviour, left the Engliſh to encounter the whole ſtreſs of the fight, who, notwithſtanding their inferiority in numbers, ſuſtained with an amazing intrepidity the charge of the Spaniſh army, under marſhal de Bay, who defeated them with great ſlaughter, obliging them to retreat with great precipitation, leaving behind them their colours, cannon, and a great number of priſoners. This unfortunate action happened on the ſeventeenth of May, N. S. on the banks of the Caya, a river in the province of Eſtremadura, not many miles from Badajox ‖.

A fatal cataſtrophe befel the affairs of that martial and reſtleſs prince the king of Sweden, this ſummer: he attacked the czar of Muſcovy at Pultowa, on the thirty-firſt of July, N. S. and received ſuch a total defeat, that he loſt his camp, artillery, and baggage: Charles himſelf, with a ſmall number of attendants, paſſed the Nieper, and with great difficulty ſheltered himſelf in the Turkiſh dominions, and ſettled at Bender, a town in Moldavia. A confederacy was now entered into by king Auguſtus, the kings of Denmark and Pruſſia, and the czar of Muſcovy, to wreſt from him his paternal dominions; which they would certainly have effected, had not the emperor, the Engliſh, and the Dutch prevented it, by entering into a guaranty for preſerving the peace of the empire, by which means the Swediſh dominions in Germany were ſecured §.

Nothing of importance paſſed at ſea this year. Towards the end of it, the earl of Pembroke, finding the management of naval affairs a load too heavy for him to bear, though he had diſcharged the office of lord high-admiral with univerſal approbation, reſolved to lay it down. This high office was offered to the earl of Oxford, who abſolutely refuſed it, though he declared himſelf at the ſame time ready to accept a ſhare in the direction of the admiralty. The queen thought proper therefore to iſſue a commiſſion, appointing the ſaid earl of Oxford with ſir John Leake, ſir George Byng, George Doddington, and Paul Methuen, eſquires, commiſſioners for executing the office of lord high-admiral of Great Britain and Ireland, in the room of the earl of Pembroke, on whom her majeſty ſettled a yearly penſion of three thouſand pounds, payable out of the revenue of the poſt-office, in conſideration of his great and faithful ſervices. Soon after, Mathew Aylmer, eſq. was appointed admiral and commander in chief of her majeſty's navy; the lord Durſley, vice-admiral; and Charles Wager, eſq. rear-admiral of the red; ſir John Jennings admiral, and ſir Edward Whitaker vice-admiral of the white; ſir John Norris, admiral, and John Baker, eſq. vice-admiral of the blue ¶.

Though the events of this ſummer had been more favourable to France than Lewis had reaſon to expect, yet the domeſtic affairs of that kingdom were ſtill in ſo languid a ſtate, that he once more ſolicited peace at the cloſe of the campaign; but not in ſo ſuppliant a manner as before. His miniſter, Torcy, maintained a correſpondence with Mr. Petkum, the duke of Holſtein's reſident at the Hague, and through him propoſed to the States-general a renewal of the negociation. Their High Mightineſſes could not well help taking ſome notice of theſe overtures; however, they refuſed to grant paſſes for the French plenipotentiaries to come to the Hague, but permitted Petkum to make a journey to Verſailles. In the mean time, Lewis, to inſpire the allies with a good opinion of his ſincerity, withdrew his troops from Spain, as if he meant to leave his grand-ſon to take care of his own intereſts. This ſtep might poſſibly have wrought the effect upon the minds of the confederated powers which was intended by it, had not Philip, at the ſame time, publiſhed a manifeſto, proteſting againſt all that ſhould be tranſacted at the Hague to his prejudice: he named the duke of Alva and count Bergheyc for his plenipotentiaries, and ordered them to notify their credentials in form to the maritime powers; but no regard was ſhewn to their intimation. Petkum, after a ſhort ſtay at Verſailles, returned to the Hague on the ſeventh of December, bringing with him a memorial, importing, that the French king was ready to acknowlege the archduke Charles for king of Spain; to withdraw all aſſiſtance from his grandſon and leave him to his fate; to deliver up four towns as cautionary places; to reſtore Straſburgh and Briſac; to reſign the ſovereignty of Alſace; to demoliſh all the fortified places between Baſil and Philipſburgh; to fill up the long formidable harbour of Dunkirk, and demoliſh its fortifications; and to leave Liſle, Tournay, Ypres, Menin, Furnes, Condé, and Maubeuge in the hands of the States general. Theſe were in part the articles propoſed to ſerve as a baſis for the peace which he ſolicited; for the perfecting which, he declared himſelf ready to ſend plenipotentiaries to begin the conferences with thoſe of the allies, on the firſt of January enſuing. The States-general treated theſe offers as evaſive and inſincere, and came to a reſolution, that it was abſolutely neceſſary to proſecute the war with vigour; and they wrote preſſing letters on that ſubject to all their allies *.

On the fifteenth of November, the parliament of Great Britain met. The queen, who had not been in perſon there the whole ſeſſion before, was pleaſed to go that day to the houſe of peers, and in her ſpeech to both houſes told them, "That the enemy had, in the beginning of the year, endeavoured, by falſe appearances, and deceitful inſinuations of a deſire after peace, to create jealouſies and diviſions among the allies; but they had been diſappointed in their expectations; and ſuch meaſures had been taken as made it impoſſible for them to diſguiſe their inſincerity: that God Almighty had been pleaſed to bleſs the arms of the confederates with a moſt remarkable victory, and other ſucceſſes, which had laid France open to the impreſſion of the allied arms, and conſequently rendered peace more neceſſary to that kingdom than it was at the beginning of the campaign; that ſhe hoped they would enable her to proſecute the advantages ſhe had gained, by reducing within proper limits that exorbitant and oppreſſive power, which had ſo long threatened the liberties of Chriſtendom."

The parliament appeared to fall in entirely with the queen's opinion: they preſented addreſſes of thanks for her ſpeech, congratulated her on the ſucceſs of her arms this campaign, and thanked the duke of Marlborough for his ſignal ſervices; and ſo eager did they ſhew themſelves for the continuation of the war, that in leſs than a month the commons granted upwards of ſix millions for the ſervice of the enſuing year, and provided funds to anſwer the ſame. Theſe immenſe grants of parliament ſtruck the French prodigiouſly; for they demonſtrated our credit to be in full vigour, while theirs was at its loweſt ebb; and likewiſe ſhewed the diſpoſition of our government to continue the war till the Grand Monarque was compleatly humbled.

The affair of Dr. Sacheverel made the principal buſineſs of this ſeſſion. There were many reaſons to believe that the queen had for ſome time been much diſpoſed to change her miniſtry; and it is probable the ſame would have been effected, tho' perhaps not quite ſo ſoon, nor with ſo much noiſe, animoſity, and violence. It happened, however, that Dr. Henry Sacheverel, rector of St. Saviour's, Southwark, preached a ſermon on the fifth of November, at St. Paul's cathedral, before ſir Samuel Garrard, lord-mayor, which he afterwards printed under the odd title of "The Perils of falſe Brethren in Church and State." In this ſermon he ſtrenuouſly aſſerted the high notions of hereditary indefeaſible right, paſſive obedience, and non-reſiſtance; and made uſe of ſome expreſſions that ſeemed to reflect againſt the Revolution, the proteſtant ſucceſſion, the union, and the toleration granted to the diſſenters; and inſinuating the church to be in danger under the preſent adminiſtration. Complaint was made of this ſermon in the houſe of commons, who impeached the doctor before the lords for high crimes and miſdemeanors, upon four ſeveral articles; to which he put in his anſwers about the end of the old year. To this the commons made their reply. A day of trial was appointed by the lords, which came on at Weſtminſter-hall on the twenty-ſeventh of February, 1710. Twenty managers were appointed by the commons, who were preſent in a grand committee at the trial, and the articles were opened againſt him by the attorney-general and Mr. Lechmere. The queen herſelf went incog. every day during the trial, which laſted till the tenth of March, when the doctor was at laſt ſentenced "not to preach for three years, and his ſermon to be burnt by the common hangman."

It would ſwell this part of my hiſtory to an unreaſonable bulk, was I to relate the ſeveral arguments uſed as well at the bar as in both houſes of parliament, in arraignment or ſupport of this man, and the doctrine contained in his ſermon: they may be found at large in Tindal, and ſome other of our voluminous writers; as alſo in the printed trial of Sacheverel, and the collection of Parliamentary Debates. I ſhall content myſelf with obſerving, that nothing could equal the ferment this affair raiſed in the nation. The enemies of the miniſtry ſeized this occaſion to inflame the minds of the populace, by repreſenting both in their converſation and writings, that the Whigs had formed a deſign to pull down the church, and that this proſecution was intended to try their ſtrength before they would proceed openly to the execution of their project. Theſe aſſertions had ſuch an effect, that as the doctor paſſed to and from Weſtminſter-hall the ſeveral days of his trial, he was attended by vaſt multitudes of people, who abuſed all that would not pull off their hats to him, and cry out, "God bleſs the church and Sacheverel!" Nay, they proceeded ſo far as to demoliſh ſeveral diſſenting meeting-houſes, and make bonfires of the materials, with loud huzzas of "High-church and Sacheverel!" In ſhort, he was cried up as the patron of the church, and as perſecuted for its ſake; and the queen herſelf ſeemed to be not a little affected by it. If Mr. Harley and the Tory party were not at the bottom of this, they certainly made their advantage of it, to haſten the change they were aiming at; but it was ſome time before they could bring their matters to bear. However, the lenity of the ſentence paſſed upon Sacheverel, which was in great meaſure owing to the dread of popular reſentment, was conſidered by them as a victory obtained over their adverſaries the Whigs, and celebrated as ſuch by bonfires and illuminations.

This remarkable trial over, and ſuch other buſineſs as came before the parliament being diſpatched, the queen ordered it to be prorogued on the fifth day of April, 1710, after having in her ſpeech to both houſes, expreſſed her concern for the neceſſary cauſe which had taken up the greateſt part of their time towards the latter end of the ſeſſion: ſhe declared that no prince could have a more true and tender concern for the welfare and proſperity of the church than herſelf; and therefore it was very injurious, ſhe ſaid, to take a pretence from wicked and malicious libels, to inſinuate that the church was in danger under her adminiſtration *

Lewis XIV. ſtill continued to ſollicit peace, and to defend himſelf. His miniſters ſtill kept up a correſpondence with Petkum, and by means of that envoy obtained of the States-general a renewal of the negotiation. In order the more eaſily to obtain their conſent, he diſpatched a new plan of pacification, in which he promiſed to renounce his grandſon, and to comply with all their other demands, provided the electors of Cologne and Bavaria ſhould be re-eſtabliſhed in their eſtates and dignities.

The allies, determined to have the triumph of diſcuſſing the ſubmiſſive propoſals of the French monarch, permitted his plenipotentiaries to come to the little town of Gertruydenberg, in the beginning of the year 1710, to preſent their maſter's ſupplications. Lewis made choice of the marquis d'Uxelles, a man of great coolneſs and compoſure of temper: with him he joined the abbé, afterwards cardinal, Polignac, one of the brighteſt wits and moſt eloquent orators of his age; but wit, prudence, and eloquence, are of no ſervice in a miniſter, when the maſter is unſucceſsful. The ambaſſadors of Lewis were rather confined in Gertruydenberg than received there. Buys and Vanderduſſen, the deputies of the ſtates, came to hear their propoſals, which they communicated to prince Eugene, the duke of Marlborough, and count Zinzendorf, the imperial plenipotentiary then at the Hague. Though the French plenipotentiaries carried their ſubmiſſion ſo far as to promiſe for their king, that he ſhould furniſh money to dethrone Philip V. they were not liſtened to: the Dutch deputies inſiſted upon his effecting the ceſſion of Spain and the Indies to the houſe of Auſtria; and in caſe his grandſon ſhould refuſe to grant the ſame to his requiſition, that he ſhould engage alone to drive him out of Spain by force of arms. The negotiation laſted from the nineteenth day of March to the twenty-fifth day of July, during which time the conferences were frequently interrupted, and a great many diſpatches went to and from the court of Verſailles. At length the French plenipotentiaries, wearied out with the abſurd inſolence of the Dutch negotiators, returned to Paris, after having wrote a letter to the penſionary Heinſius, importing, that the demands of the allies could not be granted.

The States-general, to give ſome colour of juſtice to their proceedings, came to a reſolution, "That the enemy had departed from the foundation on which the negotiation had begun; had ſtudied pretences to evade the execution of the capital points, the reſtitution of Spain and the Indies; and, in a word, that France had no other view than to ſow jealouſies and diſſenſions among the allies." This reſolution was tranſmitted to the ſeveral powers in the grand alliance. The court of Great Britain anſwered it by another memorial, in which the queen was made to declare, that ſhe entirely approved of their reſolution, and all the ſteps they had taken in the courſe of the negotiation; and that ſhe was fully determined to proſecute the war with all poſſible vigour, until the enemy ſhould be compelled to accept ſuch terms of peace as might ſecure the tranquility of the Chriſtian world.

While the allies were thus treating Lewis XIV. in the cabinet like maſters irritated againſt his pride and grandeur, the operations of the field were not ſuffered to languiſh. On the fifteenth of April prince Eugene and the duke of Marlborough ſet out from the Hague for Tournay, in order to aſſemble the forces which were quartered on the Maeſe, in Flanders, and Brabant. Their firſt operation was the ſiege of Doway *, which they carried, after a reſiſtance of two months, in which the allies, by their own computation, loſt eight thouſand men killed and wounded, with upwards of fifty officers of diſtinction. The place ſurrendered on the twenty-ninth of June. As ſoon as the trenches and other works before the place were levelled, and the breaches repaired, the confederate army, by ſeveral detachments, advanced towards Arras †, near which marſhal Villars, who ſtill commanded in Flanders, was ſtrongly encamped, deſigning to bring that general to a battle, or lay ſiege to the laſt-named town, the poſſeſſion of which would have laid all Picardy open to them; but Villars acted with ſuch precaution, that the allies could bring neither the one nor the other of theſe projects to bear; they therefore turned their arms againſt Bethune ‡, which was inveſted on the fifteenth of July, and on the twenty-ninth of Auguſt was ſurrendered by the governor. During the ſiege of this latter place Villars quitted his intrenchments, with a deſign to oblige the allies to raiſe it; but upon viewing their ſituation, he thought the attempt too hazardous, and returned to cover Picardy, leaving the prince and the duke to make themſelves maſters of St. Venant ‖ and Aire §, places of leſs conſequence. St. Venant ſurrendered the thirtieth of September, and Aire the ninth of November; and then the confederate army broke up, and marched into winter-quarters ¶.

The campaign on the Rhine this year afforded no tranſaction worthy notice, both ſides being equally incapable of entering upon action. The elector of Brunſwick, who commanded the Imperial army, not brooking ſo inactive a life, thought proper to reſign a command, from which he ſaw neither honour to himſelf, nor advantage to the general cauſe, was to be expected: his ſerene highneſs's place was ſupplied by count Gronsfelt. The military operations were equally languid on the ſide of Piedmont: the duke of Savoy being indiſpoſed, the command of the forces ſtill remained veſted in count Thaun, who attempted to croſs the Alps, and force his way into Dauphiné; but the duke of Berwick, who commanded on the frontiers of that country, had ſecured the paſſes by ſuch ſtrong intrenchments, that the Imperial general found himſelf obliged to deſiſt from his enterprize, and march his army back to their quarters.

In Spain the war was carried on with more ſpirit, and each party experienced ſucceſs and diſgrace in its turn. Count Staremberg, whom the court of Vienna had ſent to retrieve the honour of king Charles's arms, was one of the moſt accompliſhed captains of his time: he had for colleague in the command, general Stanhope, an officer of unqueſtioned courage, but too fiery and impetuous. Lewis XIV. had been obliged to do that out of neceſſity, which the allies had exacted of him at Gertruydenberg, to abandon the cauſe of Philip, by ſending for thoſe troops that were yet in Spain, for his own defence. This, with a conſiderable reinforcement of troops which the allies had received out of Germany, had made them more than a match for Philip's army in Spain; upon which conſideration it was reſolved to come to a deciſive action as ſoon as poſſible. General Stanhope, at the head of the horſe and dragoons, attacked the whole cavalry of the enemy at Almennara, on the ſeventeenth of July, O. S. Stanhope charged in perſon, and with his own hand ſlew general Ameſſaga, who commanded the body-guards of Philip: the Spaniſh horſe were entirely defeated, together with nine battalions of foot, that eſcaped by favour of the night; and the main body of the army, which was encamped at ſome diſtance from the place of action, retreated with great precipitation to Lerida. General Staremberg purſued them to Saragoſſa, where he found them drawn up in order of battle; and an engagement enſuing on the nineteenth of Auguſt, O. S. the Imperialiſts gained a complete victory over that army, in which Philip and his adherents had placed their chief hopes, and which was commanded by the marquis de Bay, an unfortunate general. On this occaſion the enemy loſt five thouſand men killed, ſeven thouſand taken, together with all their artillery, and a great number of colours and ſtandards. It is obſervable, that though the two rival kings were both within reach of their armies, and had actually reviewed them ſome few days before, yet neither were preſent at this battle: of all the princes for whom Europe was up in arms, the duke of Savoy was the only one who fought his own battles. In conſequence of this victory, king Charles entered Saragoſſa  in triumph; while Philip retired with the remains of his army to Madrid, from whence having

 Saragoſſa is a fine large city, and the capital of Arragon, in Spain, ſurrounded with old walls and other antique fortifications, at the confluence of the rivers Ebro, Galleyo, and Guerva, which run in a ſerpentine manner through the neighbourhood, rendering the country very fruitful. It lies one hundred and fifty-ſix miles weſt of Barcelona, and one hundred and eighty north-eaſt of Madrid. The ſtreets are broad and long, adorned on both ſides with ſtately palaces, belonging to the grandees of the kingdom of Arragon. This city was the de-having ſent his queen and ſon to a place of greater ſafety, he repaired to Valladolid *, in order to aſſemble his ſcattered troops, and compoſe another army.

It is acknowleged on all hands, that Charles was indebted for this victory to the bravery of the Engliſh troops, who, in this action, ſurpaſſed their uſual proweſs: his triumph, however, proved but ſhort-lived. A council was held at Saragoſſa, to deliberate on the moſt effectual means for improving the late ſucceſs, when general Staremberg propoſed remaining in Arragon and Catalonia, and for the army to form the ſiege of Lerida; but general Stanhope ſtrongly inſiſted on the expediency of marching immediately to Madrid, alleging, that the city was altogether defenceleſs; that the ſoldiers would have an opportunity greatly to enrich themſelves; that the army might be refreſhed with all kind of proviſions; and laſtly, that king Charles being in poſſeſſion of the capital of the kingdom, would have a great influence in bringing the Spaniards over to his ſide. Unfortunately this advice prevailed; and, after ſtaying ſome time at Saragoſſa, to refreſh his troops, Charles ſet out for Madrid, into which city he made his entry on the twenty-eighth of September, from whence he ſent a detachment to take poſſeſſion of Toledo, which, lying upon the Tagus, was looked upon as an advantageous poſt for facilitating a conjunction with the Portugueſe, under the earl of Galway. But that people having had ſuch ill ſucceſs in their former march to Madrid, could never be brought to attempt that route again.

The day that Charles entered Madrid proved the moſt diſgraceful of his life; he found the city abandoned by all the grandees, and had the additional mortification to perceive that the Caſtilians were to a man attached to his competitor. Hardly would the people deign to look upon him, the citizens ſhut up their ſhops, and kept themſelves cloſe within their houſes; the money which he ordered to be thrown to the populace in the ſtreets, was left untouched; a company of players having acted a piece compoſed in honour of him and his ſucceſſes, many of them were knocked on the head, and the author who had written it was found murdered in the ſtreets the next day. Charles, a day or two after his entry, had ſent to the marquis de Manſera to come to kiſs his hand: this nobleman, deſcended from one of the moſt illuſtrious families in Spain, and preſident of the council of Caſtile, was near an hundred years of age, and it was thought that his ſubmiſſion would have great weight in determining the reſt of the nobility, as well as the people, in favour of the Auſtrian prince; but the marquis was not to be ſhaken: he ſent by the perſon who came to him from Charles, the following remarkable anſwer; "I have but one faith, and one king, who is Philip V. to whom I have ſworn allegiance. I reſpect the archduke as a great prince, but can never acknowlege him as my ſovereign. I have lived near an hundred years, and have never done any thing contrary to my duty, and I am determined not to bring diſhonour upon myſelf during the little time I have to live."

Theſe were not the only mortifications Charles had to encounter: his rival, Philip, was ſoon in a condition to face him again in the field. The king of France, at the earneſt requeſt of his grand-ſon, ſent the duke of Vendoſme to take the command of the Spaniſh army, which was at the ſame time reinforced by detachments of French troops. Vendoſme's reputation was alone worth an army; the Caſtilians flocked in crowds to his ſtandard; in fine, within three months after his fatal defeat at Saragoſſa, Philip found himſelf at the head of thirty thouſand men, and now marched in queſt of thoſe before whom he had formerly fled.

Charles III. was by no means in a condition to keep the field againſt ſo powerful an enemy: he had been neglected by thoſe whoſe intereſt it was to ſupport him; the Engliſh government, under the influence of a great general, had all along ſlighted the war in Spain, to laviſh millions in the Netherlands; Charles therefore, about the middle of November, found himſelf under the diſagreeable neceſſity of marching back to Saragoſſa, and cantoned his troops in the neighbourhood of Cifuentes, where general Staremberg fixed his head-quarters. Vendoſme, well knowing the weakneſs of the allies, immediately marched in purſuit of them, in order to force them to an engagement before they ſhould be able to reach Catalonia: he came up with their rear at Brihuega, on the twenty-ſixth of November, where he ſurpriſed general Stanhope, with a body of two thouſand men, who, with the general and all their officers †, were obliged to ſurrender themſelves priſoners of war.

General Stanhope, upon the firſt approach of the enemy, had ſent an account of his ſituation to Staremberg, who immediately aſſembled the troops, and ſet out to his relief; but all was over before he arrived, and he had the additional misfortune to find himſelf compelled to come to action near Villa Vicioſa ‡, with an enemy near double his number. They fell upon his left wing, but this gallant officer made ſuch a noble defence, that, though he had only ſeven hundred horſe to oppoſe againſt a body of ſix thouſand horſe and foot, the enemy were conſtrained to bring up their whole army to the charge: then, overpowered by numbers, courage could no longer avail, and the left wing of the allies was entirely routed; but the victors, inſtead of purſuing their blow, began to plunder the baggage, which Staremberg perceiving, brought up his right wing, and charged the enemy with ſuch bravery and conduct, that he put them to the rout, retook the cannon which had fallen into their hands, toge-light of Julius Cæſar, who erected here a very magnificent palace for himſelf (now inhabited by the archbiſhop), and built a large ſtone bridge over the Ebro, oppoſite to the middle of the town, conſiſting of a great number of arches, which is now as firm and ſtrong as if it was a modern ſtructure. To perpetuate his munificence to this city, he called it after his own name, Cæſaris Auguſta, which we eaſily trace in the name Saragoſſa.

* Valladolid is an ancient city of Old Caſtile, in Spain, on the banks of the Piſuerga, in a moſt delightful ſituation on a fertile plain. The inhabitants make up about four thouſand families, among whom whom is a great number of nobility and gentry. It is the ſee of a biſhop, has an univerſity, and a conſiderable trade. Among the other ſtately buildings, the Great Piazza is one of the nobleſt, being the model of that of Madrid, conſiſting of five hundred arches, with gilded balconies. The city is encircled with a wall, but is not a place of ſtrength. Here are about ſeventy convents, for both ſexes. It lies eighty-ſix miles north-weſt of Madrid.

ther with the Spaniſh artillery, and remained maſter of the field, where he continued till eight o'clock next day, the enemy retiring in diſorder: but the allied army had ſuffered ſo ſeverely in the action, that the general found he could not maintain his ground, and therefore, having cauſed the cannon to be nailed up, he returned to Saragoſſa, from whence he marched into Catalonia, whither he was followed by Vendoſme, who obliged him to take refuge under the walls of Barcelona. In the mean time the duke de Noailles, another French general, laid ſiege to Gironne, which he took, notwithſtanding the ſeverity of the ſeaſon (it being now the month of December); ſo that Charles was now confined to the ſingle province of Catalonia, and even that lay open to the incurſions of the enemy ‖

After the battle of Villa Vicioſa, Charles's affairs became every day more and more deſperate. The Portugueſe were ſo far from being in a condition to afford him any ſuccours, that it was with difficulty they could defend their own country againſt the encroachments of the enemy. The earl of Galway had returned to England, to ſolicit ſupplies of men and money from the miniſtry, but they were too much taken up with party diſtractions at home to attend to foreign affairs; or, indeed, the Engliſh were now almoſt weary of laviſhing their treaſures, and draining the veins of their brave countrymen, without any proſpect of advantage to themſelves. They began to feel the evils of ſo long and burdenſome a war, and a ſudden revolution of affairs at length put an end to the public calamities, and to the triumphs of thoſe who had alone profited by them. This great change ſeems to have been chiefly brought about by the affair of Dr. Sacheverel. In the courſe of that gentleman's trial, and in the debates in parliament conſequent thereupon, the Whig party had declaimed againſt monarchical power in ſuch indecent terms as had given great offence to the queen, who had aſſiſted at them all incognita, and found herſelf, by their doctrine, reduced to a mere creature of the people's, and that ſhe had in effect given her confidence to a ſet of people who were, by their very principles, the profeſſed enemies to monarchy. Her majeſty, however, did not ſuffer herſelf to be carried away by theſe firſt impreſſions; ſhe reſolved to examine the matter more cloſely. She had for ſome time been cooled in her affection towards the ducheſs of Marlborough, who had hitherto governed her in the moſt abſolute manner: this change of diſpoſition towards the favourite was not occaſioned by caprice or inconſtancy, but was the pure reſult of reaſon, repeatedly offended by the inſupportable haughtineſs with which that lady had treated her royal miſtreſs.

I have already obſerved, that the queen had taken into her favour Mrs. Maſham, a lady poſſeſſed of every requiſite to make her the agreeable companion and confidante. The ducheſs became extravagantly jealous: ſhe reproached the queen with her coolneſs towards her, in terms that would hardly be ſupportable from an equal. This naturally widened the breach; her majeſty languiſhed for want of that liberty which the meaneſt of her ſubjects enjoyed, that of thinking and chuſing for themſelves. Whilſt the ducheſs thus governed the queen, her huſband governed the ſtate; he had the Treaſury at his command, through the means of the lord-treaſurer Godolphin, his ſon-in law; Sunderland, who had married another of his daughters, and was ſecretary of ſtate, ſubmitted every thing in the cabinet to him; and the queen's houſhold, where his wife had unlimited controul, was at his devotion: he was maſter of the army, and had the diſpoſal of all military poſts.

It happened, about the beginning of this year, that Mrs. Maſham, the queen's new favourite, aſked a vacant regiment for her brother, Mr. Hill. The queen wrote to the duke, deſiring him to beſtow it upon Mr. Hill; the duke refuſed it, upon which ſhe gave it to him herſelf. Matters grew warm between both parties; his grace affected to think himſelf ill uſed, and refuſed to come to council; but the queen was ſo ſurrounded by his partiſans, that, finding they were determined to clog the wheels of government, rather than their patron ſhould be thwarted in any of his meaſures, ſhe was forced to write to the duke, to diſpoſe of the regiment as he ſhould think proper, and to deſire he would appear as uſual in the cabinet.

It was at this juncture that a certain ſet of men, called Tories, reſolved to reſcue their ſovereign from the domeſtic ſlavery in which ſhe was held, and to give peace to their country, exhauſted by a war, in which it had been made the tool of half Europe. I am well aware that it has been alleged by a great number of writers, copying the one after the other, that this was the laſt effort of a party, determined, if poſſible, to place the pretender on the throne of England; but there appears no juſt foundation for charging the Tories with harbouring any ſuch deſign: it is, indeed, very probable there might be ſome Jacobites among them, who ſecretly wiſhed for ſuch a revolution; nay, who would, perhaps, have ventured a great deal to effect it; but it is certain they carefully concealed their deſigns from the party with whom they aſſociated, well knowing that the Tories could never be brought to alter that ſucceſſion which they themſelves had eſtabliſhed.

The Tories made uſe of Mrs. Maſham's intereſt with the queen to operate the change they meditated. That lady, as I have elſewhere obſerved, was intimately connected with Mr. Harley, the late ſecretary of ſtate, who, from time to time, directed her in what manner ſhe was to carry it with the queen, and what ſprings to put in motion, in order to effect the deſired purpoſe. Maſham, agreeable to her inſtructions, left no one winning art untried to fix herſelf in the eſteem of her royal miſtreſs. She ſucceeded to the height of her wiſhes: ſhe then ventured to engage her majeſty in converſations of a political turn, in the courſe of which ſhe took opportunities of acquainting her with many things to which ſhe had hitherto been kept an utter ſtranger; and when ſhe found ſhe had awakened her curioſity, ſhe referred her for farther ſatisfaction to her relation Mr. Harley, of whom the queen had entertained an high opinion. That ſtateſman was admitted to ſeveral private conferences with the queen, to which he was introduced by Mrs. Maſham, at certain appointed hours: by him her majeſty was informed of the general diſcontent which prevailed throughout the kingdom, at ſeeing its moſt eſſential intereſts ſacrificed to gratify the ambitious and greedy views of a private family, who lorded it even over majeſty itſelf. He aſſured her, that the majority of the kingdom were inſpired with principles of true loyalty, and entirely devoted to her ſervice; and engaged, if ſhe would remove from about her perſon the petty tyrants who kept her enſlaved, and call a new parliament, ſuch repreſentatives would be ſent up as were the trueſt friends to monarchy and the eſtabliſhed church, as well as to the proteſtant ſucceſſion.

Won by theſe arguments, the queen reſolved upon a total change of the miniſtry. It was, however, ſome time before ſhe declared herſelf, for theſe matters were agitated as early as the ſpring of this year. In the mean time the ducheſs of Marlborough, finding a viſible alteration in her majeſty's behaviour towards her, deſired an audience, in order to juſtify herſelf of any thing that might be laid to her charge: ſhe hoped to work upon the queen's tenderneſs, and retrieve the influence ſhe had loſt; ſhe had recourſe to tears and ſupplications, but they proved in vain; the queen began to taſte the ſweets of acting independent of the haughty will of an inferior, and diſmiſſed her with this reply, "You deſired no anſwer, and none you ſhall have;" alluding to an expreſſion the ducheſs had uſed in one of her letters to her majeſty *. After this interview, which happened on the ſixth of April, the queen never ſaw the ducheſs, nor had any correſpondence with her, except twice on public occaſions; for ſhe was not yet diveſted of her employments, it being, perhaps, not yet determined who ſhould ſucceed her.

At length the queen reſolved to break through all obſtacles, which that family and its numerous friends and adherents had laid in her way, and ſhew the Whigs ſhe could reign without them. In the firſt place, about the beginning of June, ſhe removed the earl of Sunderland from his office of ſecretary of ſtate, and gave the ſeals to the earl of Dartmouth, one of the lords commiſſioners of trade, and ſon-in-law to the earl of Nottingham; when the moneymongers, who had fattened on the public taxes, fearing that another miniſtry might not be for keeping up the war ſo warmly as the preſent, tried every expedient to ſupport the tottering intereſt of the Whigs: ſeveral rich citizens, as well in private life as in public offices, waited on the queen with an addreſs, repreſenting, that the public credit could not be ſupported but by the preſent miniſtry. The city of London have, indeed, more than once affected to make the intereſt of a party that of the nation, and to dictate to their ſovereign in the choice of miniſters. But the moſt aſtoniſhing piece of inſolence was that offered by the Dutch, who ſeeing that they could never find a miniſtry and a general more completely their friends than thoſe who had now the management of the cabinet and the field, commiſſioned their envoy, Mr. Vryberge, to preſent a memorial to her majeſty, repreſenting the diſmal effects a change in her miniſtry would produce abroad. The queen with great juſtice highly reſented this procedure, and returned for anſwer, "that ſhe was ſurpriſed a matter of this kind ſhould come from the States; that it was the greateſt inſult that was ever offered to the crown of England: however, it ſhould not leſſen the eſteem ſhe had of her allies, or alter her reſolution in her own affairs."

Accordingly her majeſty proceeded to make other changes. On the eighth of Auguſt, the treaſurer's ſtaff was taken from the earl of Godolphin; and John, earl Powlett, Robert Harley, eſq. ſir Thomas Manſel, baronet, and Robert Benſon, eſq. were made commiſſioners of the treaſury; and at the ſame time Mr. Harley was appointed chancellor of the Exchequer and under-treaſurer, in the room of Mr. Smith: Mr. St. John was made ſecretary of ſtate, in the room of Mr. Boyle; ſir Simon Harcourt lord-keeper, in the room of lord chancellor Cowper, who reſigned; the earl of Rocheſter preſident of the council, in the room of lord Somers; the duke of Buckingham ſteward of the houſhold, in the room of the duke of Devonſhire; the earl of Portmore was appointed general of the forces in Portugal, in the room of lord Galway; and the duke of Ormond was made lord-lieutenant of Ireland, in the room of the earl of Wharton: an alteration was alſo made in the lieutenancy of London. All theſe changes were in favour of the Tories, and were ſoon followed by others; and finally, in favour of them, the parliament was diſſolved in September, and a proclamation iſſued for calling a new one, in which, notwithſtanding the utmoſt efforts of the Whigs, they were able to carry the elections of a very few members only. Before theſe changes, upon the death of lord chief-juſtice Holt, ſir Thomas Parker, a famous manager againſt Dr. Sacheverel, was made lord chief-juſtice of the Queen's Bench.

The new parliament met on the twenty-fifth of November, when Mr. Bromley was choſen ſpeaker without oppoſition, and approved by the queen, who, on the twenty-ſeventh, made a ſpeech to both houſes, in which ſhe recommended proſecuting the war with vigour, eſpecially in Spain; ſhe declared herſelf reſolved to ſupport the church of England, to preſerve the Britiſh conſtitution agreeable to the Union, to maintain the indulgence allowed by law to ſcrupulous conſciences, and to employ none but ſuch as were heartily attached to the proteſtant ſucceſſion in the houſe of Hanover. The lords and commons, in their reſpective addreſſes, at preſent concurred with her majeſty's ſentiments of carrying on the war vigorouſly, eſpecially in Spain, and in embracing all reaſonable meaſures towards procuring an honourable peace. The commons were particularly warm and hearty in their aſſurances, exhorting her majeſty to diſcountenance all ſuch principles and meaſures as had lately threatened her royal crown and dignity; "meaſures which (ſay they), whenever they might prevail, will prove fatal to the whole conſtitution, both in church and ſtate †." By this, perhaps, they would be underſtood to mean the antimonarchical and levelling principles ſo freely broached by the Whigs in Sacheverel's affair, who, in their proceedings in relation to that madman (for he was little better), ſeemed rather to aim at caſting an odium on the clergy in general, and on the friends of kingly government, than to correct him for his private errors or miſtaken zeal. But to return.

The commons ſet about granting the ſupplies for the enſuing year ſo heartily, that the queen, by the twenty third of December, paſſed the land-tax bill, of four ſhillings in the pound. In the houſe of peers, the earl of Scarborough moved, that the thanks of the houſe ſhould be returned to the duke of Marlborough; but ſome objections being ſtarted thereto, that general's friends did not think proper to puſh it, for fear of meeting with a rebuff, that would ſtill leſſen his and their credit.

About the beginning of December the earl of Peterborough was nominated to go ambaſſador extraordinary to the court of Vienna, as was the earl of Rivers to that of Hanover, and Mr. Hill was appointed envoy extraordinary to the States-general, in the room of lieutenant-general Cadogan. About the ſame time lieutenant-general Meredith, major-general M'Cartney, and brigadier Honeywood, on information laid and proved againſt them for having drank "damnation to the new miniſtry and the enemies of the duke of Marlborough," were deprived of their regiments, as an example to deter other officers of the army, many of whom had let fallen expreſſions that favoured ſtrongly of ſupporting their general in an unwarrantable manner. Indeed, this period of the Engliſh hiſtory appears diſgraced by the violent and rancorous conduct of two turbulent factions; for when the duke of Marlborough arrived in England, towards the latter end of December this year, the party in power, not contented with humbling him by the diſmiſſion of all his friends, ſuffered him to be inſulted and reviled in the groſſeſt manner by their underſtrappers and hirelings; while his grace, in juſtice be it acknowleged, acquieſced in his ſovereign's will with a moderation that did him great honour: he avoided all ſhew of popularity, he attended his duty at the council-board, nor did he take the leaſt notice of the rancorous libels in which he was every day traduced: however, perceiving the queen's affection was wholly alienated from his ducheſs, he carried to her majeſty a reſignation of her places, which were thoſe of groom of the ſtole, miſtreſs of the robes, and keeper of the privy-purſe: the two firſt the queen beſtowed on the ducheſs of Somerſet, and the laſt upon the new favourite, Mrs. Maſham.

News being arrived at court of the ill ſucceſs of our affairs in Spain, her majeſty, on the third of January, 1711, ſent a meſſage to the two houſes to impart to them the ſubſtance of the diſpatches ſhe had received; upon which they returned an addreſs, by way of anſwer, importing, "that as the misfortune in Spain might have been occaſioned by ſome preceding miſmanagement, they would uſe their utmoſt endeavours to diſcover it, ſo as to prevent the like for the future." Some attempts had been made before, in the houſe of lords, to procure the thanks of that houſe to the earl of Peterborough, for his ſervices in that country, but the ſame had been eluded by the Whigs, under various pretences; but now, upon the duke of Beaufort's motion, their lordſhips made application to the queen, to ſtay for ſome days the earl's journey to Vienna, that they might make uſe of ſuch lights and informations as he was able to give them, concerning the affairs in Spain: and having taken thoſe affairs into conſideration on the fifth of January, in a committee of the whole houſe, his lordſhip was examined by them, when he gave a full relation of all facts and tranſactions in the courſe of the war, in which he obliquely charged the earl of Galway, lord Tyrawley, and general Stanhope, with all the miſcarriages which had happened therein. The lords, either being, or affecting to be perfectly ſatisfied with this nobleman's teſtimony, came to the following reſolution: "That the earl of Peterborough had given a faithful account of the councils of war in Valencia." Several lords, indeed, entered their diſſent againſt this vote After this the lords ordered the earl of Galway and lord Tyrawley to appear before them the next day, which they did accordingly; when the firſt of theſe noblemen gave their lordſhips an account of his conduct, from his firſt ſetting out for Portugal till the time he was recalled; but deſired, as he ſaid his memory might fail him, that he might be allowed to give in writing what he had delivered by word of mouth, which was granted. The lord Tyrawley was more upon the reſerve, ſaying, "He kept no diary, and always carried a ſword, which he uſed the beſt he could, upon occaſion."

On the ninth, the lords entered into a very memorable debate upon this affair, at which the queen was preſent, and heard it all. Upon ſumming up the matter, it was thought by all impartial perſons, that if the earl of Peterborough's advice had been followed, both before, at, and after the council of war in Valencia, things would have ſucceeded better in Spain. Be that as it may, it having been carried, upon the queſtion, to give the earl the thanks of the houſe, it was accordingly done by the lord-keeper Harcourt, who could not help taking this opportunity to reflect obliquely on the great rewards that had been beſtowed on the duke of Marlborough. The houſe alſo came to the following reſolutions: "That the earl of Galway, lord Tyrawley, and general Stanhope, by adviſing an offenſive war in Spain, had been the unhappy occaſion of the battle of Almanza, and one great cauſe of our misfortunes in Spain, and of the diſappointment of the expedition againſt Toulon. They farther voted, "That the proſecution of an offenſive war in Spain, was approved and directed by the miniſters, who were therefore juſtly blameable, as having contributed to our misfortunes in that kingdom, and to the diſappointment of the expedition againſt Toulon: that the earl of Peterborough, during his command in Spain, had performed many great and eminent ſervices; and if his opinion had been followed, it would have prevented the misfortunes that ſucceeded."

Finding alſo that the earl of Galway had given the right of the combined army (which is the poſt of honour) to the Portugeſe, at the battle of Almanza, they reſolved, "That the earl, in yielding that point, had acted contrary to the honour of the imperial crown of Great Britain." The earl had alleged in his defence, that, by the treaty with Portugal, the troops of that crown were to have the right in their own country, and that, in order to engage them to march to Madrid, he was obliged to allow them the ſame honour, without which they would not have ſtirred out of Portugal. Though this apology carried great reaſon with it, yet, leſt ſuch a condeſcenſion ſhould be drawn into precedent, they thought fit to paſs the above reſolution, which was carried by a majority of ſixty-four againſt forty-four. The ſeveral reſolutions above recited were included in an addreſs to the queen, and to every ſeparate vote was attached a ſevere proteſt*. In ſhort, both ſides ſeemed to be leſs actuated with a regard for candour and national juſtice, than with the venom of party zeal and rancorous animoſity.

While the lords were employed in this enquiry, the commons examined certain abuſes which had crept into the management of the navy; and ſome cenſures were paſſed upon certain perſons concerned in contracts for victualling the ſeamen. An enquiry was alſo made upon what invitation or encouragement the poor Palatines had come to England; and ſeveral votes were paſſed againſt the adviſer of that meaſure. This enquiry begat ſuch an heat in the houſe, that they paſſed a bill to repeal the act for a general naturalization of all proteſtants; but this was rejected by the houſe of lords. Another bill was enacted into a law, importing, that no perſon ſhould be capable of repreſenting a county in parliament, unleſs he poſſeſſed an eſtate of ſix hundred pounds a year; and that every burgeſs ſhould have an annual income of half that ſum. The deſign of this bill was to exclude trading people from the houſe of commons, and to lodge the legiſlative power with the landed gentlemen †.

About the latter end of January the duke of Argyll was appointed ambaſſador extraordinary to king Charles III. and commander in chief of her majeſty's forces in Spain. In the ſame month, ſir John Leake was made admiral and commander in chief of the fleet, in the room of Matthew Aylmer, eſq. and ſir Thomas Hardy was made rear-admiral of the blue. Not long after, the lord viſcount Townſhend, her majeſty's ambaſſador extraordinary and plenipotentiary to the States general was recalled, and the lord Raby was appointed to ſucceed him.

On the eighth of March, being the day of her majeſty's acceſſion to the throne, the marquis de Guiſcard, a French refugee, was apprehended for high-treaſon, by virtue of a warrant from Mr. Secretary St. John. This was the ſame perſon, of whoſe project for the invaſion of France I have already taken notice. The late miniſtry had ſuch a confidence in him, that they had procured him a penſion, for which it may be juſtly ſuppoſed he was to act the part of a ſpy for them; but inſtead of that he played the counterpart, which was diſcovered by Mr. Harley, who got poſſeſſion of ſome letters he was ſending to the court of France, upon which he was ſeized.

While he was under examination at the council-board, the deſperate villain took an opportunity to ſtab Mr. Harley in two places in the breaſt, with a pen-knife he had concealed about him. One or two of the lords preſent ſeeing Mr. Harley fall, drew their ſwords, and wounded the aſſaſſin in ſeveral places: the door-keeper, alarmed with the noiſe, ruſhed in and ſecured him, though with difficulty (for he made a deſperate reſiſtance), and conveyed him to Newgate, where he ſoon after died of the wounds he had received. Mr. Harley continued for ſome time in a dangerous way, but at length happily recovered This attempt upon his life, however, by an emiſſary of France, did great ſervice to his political character. The two houſes, in addreſſes to the queen, declared their belief that Mr. Harley's fidelity to her majeſty, and his zeal for her ſervice, had drawn upon him the hatred of all the abettors of popery: they entreated her to take all poſſible care of her ſacred perſon. A proclamation was accordingly iſſued, commanding all papiſts to remove a certain diſtance from the metropolis; and the queen returned a very affectionate anſwer to the addreſſes of her parliament. At the ſame time, in order to prevent the like deſperate attempts for the future, an act was paſſed, making it felony without benefit of clergy, to attempt the life of a privy-counſellor, in the execution of his office.

On the ſeventeenth of April, 1711, an expreſs arrived at court, with the news that the emperor Joſeph I. died of the ſmall-pox, at Vienna, on the ſeventeenth of April, N. S. He left the dominions of the houſe of Auſtria and the German empire, together with the pretenſions to Spain and the Weſt Indies, to his brother Charles, who was elected emperor, ſome months afterwards.

The earl of Rocheſter dying this ſpring, who was the only competitor in the royal favour with Mr. Harley, that gentleman ſoon became ſole miniſter; and on the fourteenth of May was created baron of Wigmore, in the county of Hereford, and raiſed to the rank of earl by the ancient and noble titles of Oxford and Mortimer; and, as a farther inſtance of her regard towards him, her majeſty was pleaſed to appoint him lord high-treaſurer of Great Britain. The new prime miniſter, upon his acceſſion to power, ſaw it to be his intereſt, as well as that of his country, to put an end to the war with France and Spain as ſoon as poſſible: yet, as he could not avoid carrying on the war at leaſt for this year, and until he could more firmly fix himſelf in power, he judged it principally neceſſary to find means to quiet the minds of the moneyed people, and reſtore the public credit, which the Whig party, on their diſmiſſion, had uſed all their endeavours to impair; and to bring all parties into good humour, he this ſeſſion introduced the great project of paying the public debts, by incorporating a trading company to the South Seas: upon this plan, however, more was built than the foundation would bear. The original deſign of allowing ſix per cent. to people who had truſted the government with their money, was certainly a very commendable ſcheme, and an eaſy method of liquidating that great debt; though poſſibly the giving out, that the ſtock would produce fifty or ſixty per cent. might do more miſchief than all the other projects for raiſing money, whether by lottery or otherwiſe, ſince the war commenced.

Before the ſeſſion broke up, the commons, in conſequence of an addreſs from the houſe of convocation, then ſitting, and a meſſage from the queen, enforcing the ſame, paſſed a bill for building fifty new churches in the ſuburbs of London and Weſtminſter, and allotted for this purpoſe a duty upon coals, which had been granted for the rebuilding the cathedral of St. Paul, now finiſhed. Towards the cloſe of the ſeſſion, the commons preſented a very ſevere remonſtrance, or repreſentation to the queen, charging the late miniſtry with great malverſation in the management of the treaſury, the navy, and the army, by which the nation had been needleſsly loaded with a very heavy debt. This remonſtrance being circulated through the nation, awakened the kingdom to a ſtrict conſideration of its condition: beſides, the death of the emperor Joſeph had in part diſſipated thoſe prejudices, which had put arms into the hands of ſo many nations. The Engliſh in particular began to reflect, that as the war had been undertaken to prevent Lewis XIV. from governing Spain, America, Lombardy, and the kingdoms of Naples and Sicily, in the name of his grand-ſon, it would be highly abſurd for us to exhauſt our treaſures, and weary ourſelves in efforts, to unite all theſe kingdoms in the family of Charles, whoſe ſucceſſion to the empire was in a manner ſecured. We had already been at greater expence in the war than Germany and Holland together: the expence of this year alone amounted to near ſeven millions ſterling; what ſufficient reaſon then could be brought, for the nation's ruining itſelf merely to procure a part of Flanders for the Dutch, our avowed rivals in trade? Such were the arguments made uſe of by the unprejudiced part of the people, by the partiſans of the new miniſtry, and in fine by all thoſe who had not private and lucrative views to anſwer by the continuation of the war; and theſe arguments emboldened the queen and her new counſellors to prepare matters for a general peace.

On the twelfth of June her majeſty came to the houſe of peers, and the commons being ſent for up, ſhe made a ſpeech to both houſes, and then put an end to the ſeſſion.

The king of Pruſſia, and ſeveral other princes in the grand alliance, inſiſting on the arrears due to their forces from the States-general, before they would ſuffer them to march out of their winter-quarters, the campaign did not begin ſo ſoon in Flanders as it was intended; but theſe difficulties being adjuſted, the duke of Marlborough, to whom the queen ſtill continued the command of her army, with the diſpoſal of all military offices, repaired to the continent, and aſſembled the army, on the thirtieth of April, at Orchies, between Liſle and Douay: the next day he paſſed the Scarpe, and encamped between Douay and Bouchain; while the enemy, under marſhal Villars, poſted themſelves behind the Sanſet, in a camp that was looked upon as inacceſſible. Prince Eugene of Savoy being detained at Vienna on occaſion of the emperor's death, did not join the duke of Marlborough till the twenty-third of May.

On the fourteenth of June the army under the duke reſumed its march, and having paſſed the canal of Arleux and the Scarpe, near Vitri, in preſence of the enemy, encamped in the plains of Lens; the ſame day prince Eugene marched with the Imperial and Palatine troops, conſiſting of fifty ſquadrons and twelve battalions, to the Upper Rhine, to make head againſt the French on that ſide, who gave out, that they intended to penetrate again into Bavaria, and harraſs the empire while it remained without a head.

On the other hand, marſhal Villars thought his lines ſo ſecure and impenetrable, that he bid defiance to all the efforts of the duke of Marlborough. Theſe lines began at Bouchain, on the Scheld, and were continued, along the Sanſet and the Scarpe, to Arras; and from thence, along the Upper Scarpe and the river Ugy, to the Canche, the opening between theſe rivers being entrenched and fortified, with all poſſible care, by a large ditch, defended with redoubts and other works. But Marlborough, whoſe knowlege in the art of war could be only equalled by the conſtant ſucceſs that ever waited on his arms, by a feigned march ſo diverted the mind of Villars, that he entered the French lines on the fourth of Auguſt, O. S. near Arleux, without any oppoſition; Villars taking it for granted, that his grace's intention was to attack him on the ſide of St. Omer's, whither he had for ſome time ſeemed to have directed his manœuvres. This was acknowleged to be the boldeſt attempt that had been made during the whole war, and did infinite honour to Marlborough; while Villars was not only cenſured at Paris, but even ridiculed by his own officers. Malevolence is ever blind to merit: notwithſtanding this maſter-piece of military ſkill, the hirelings of faction were ſet to work at home, to depreciate the Engliſh general by every method they could deviſe; they not only endeavoured to ridicule the laſt action, as a thing of no importance, but they even taxed the duke with having removed his camp from a convenient ſituation to a place where the troops were in danger of ſtarving. Whatever might be the errors or weakneſſes of the duke of Marlborough, nothing could be more provoking and ungrateful than ſuch treatment of a great man, who had done ſo much honour to his country, and was then actually expoſing his life in its ſervice: at a time too, when he knew himſelf to be in diſgrace with his ſovereign, and ſingled out by a powerful party as the object of their reſentment. Thus much candour exacts from the hiſtorian, who, while he fearleſsly lays open the failings, ſhould never invidiouſly conceal or detract from the merit of diſtinguiſhed perſonages. But to return.

On the tenth of Auguſt the duke inveſted Bouchain, contrary to the opinion of the deputies of the States-general, who propoſed that he ſhould give battle to the enemy, who had paſſed the Scheld at Creveœur, in order to cover Bouchain; but the duke prudently reſolved not to hazard an engagement within the French lines, rightly judging, that any misfortune there might be attended with the moſt fatal conſequences. The reduction of Bouchain, however, was in general conſidered as impracticable, inaſmuch as it was ſituated in the middle of a moraſs, ſtrongly fortified, ſupplied with ſtore of proviſions, defended by a numerous garriſon, and in the neighbourhood of an army ſuperior to that of the allies, who were likewiſe expoſed to the excurſions of the garriſon of Valenciennes and Condé. It was, indeed, hazarding a great deal; but daily experience ſhews, that a general accuſtomed to conqueſt, will attempt with confidence what the leſs fortunate cannot look upon without ſhuddering: perhaps, likewiſe, his grace might think his honour concerned, to excel himſelf, if poſſible, this campaign, becauſe his enemies had given out that nothing would be done this year in Flanders, the duke, they ſaid, being reſolved that nothing ſhould ſucceed under the preſent adminiſtration, if he could help it. However this might be, Marlborough, by his ſuperior ſkill and capacity, rendered ineffectual all the attempts that Villars made to raiſe the ſiege, baffled a ſcheme that general had formed to ſurpriſe Douay, and, by the aſſiſtance of the valour and intreintrepidity of the confederate troops, who idolized him, carried his purpoſe into execution. In twenty days after the trenches were opened, viz. on the thirtieth of Auguſt, O. S. Bouchain was compelled to ſurrender, on no better terms than the garriſon remaining priſoners of war. The duke would next have proceeded to the reduction of Queſnoy, in order to ſecure the whole quarter; but the deputies of the States refuſing their conſent, he was obliged to relinquiſh his intentions. The conqueſt of Bouchain was the laſt military atchievement performed by the duke of Marlborough, for by that time the breaches in the place were repaired, and the fort put into a proper poſture of defence, the ſeaſon of the year obliged the oppoſite armies to ſeparate, and the allied troops were quartered in the frontier towns, that they might be ready at hand to take the field early in the ſpring. The campaign in Flanders thus concluded, the duke returned to the Hague the latter end of October, and about the middle of November arrived in England *.

In the beginning of this year the duke of Argyll was appointed embaſſador extraordinary to king Charles III. and commander in chief of her majeſty's forces in Spain. His grace landed at Barcelona on the twenty ninth of May, and found the Britiſh troops in the utmoſt diſtreſs for want of ſubſiſtence, ſo that it was very late before they could take the field; at length count Staremberg with the Spaniards and Germans, and the duke of Argyll with the Engliſh, advanced towards the enemy, who attacked him at the Prato del Rey, a conſiderable paſs, which was ſo vigorouſly defended by the confederates, that the duke of Vendoſme was obliged to retire, and leave them in poſſeſſion of the paſs. The duke of Argyll was ſoon after ſeized with a violent fever, and obliged to be carried back to Barcelona. In the beginning of June ſir John Jennings with a fleet arrived before that city, and ſuperſeded ſir John Norris, who returned to England. Vendoſme laid ſiege to the caſtle of Cardona in the month of Auguſt, which was gallantly defended till the end of December, when a detachment being ſent to the relief of the place by count Staremberg, defeated the beſiegers, killed two thouſand on the ſpot, and made themſelves maſters of all their artillery, ammunition, and baggage. Nothing farther of importance was tranſacted in this quarter this campaign; and the duke of Argyll being recovered from his illneſs, returned to England.

The electors of the empire appearing unanimouſly diſpoſed to beſtow the imperial crown on Charles, that prince, leaving his queen at Barcelona, ſet ſail for Italy in the month of September, and, after having had a conference with the duke of Savoy, who of late had appeared very cool in the proſecution of his engagements, repaired to Germany, where he was ſoon after elected to the imperial dignity, and declared emperor, by the name of Charles VI. and crowned with the uſual ſolemnity at Frankfort. No action happened on the Rhine this campaign, prince Eugene having taken effectual precautions againſt the attempts threatened by the enemy †.

Charles VI. ſoon after his acceſſion to the empire, concluded a treaty of pacification with the Hungarian malecontents ‡.

No action happened at ſea this year of any importance. The marine of France was in too deplorable a ſituation to make any figure on that element. The famous du Gué Trouin, who had not as yet any rank in the ſea-ſervice, with the aſſiſtance of ſome merchants who furniſhed him with money, fitted out a ſmall fleet, and ſailed to the Braſils, where he took one of the principal cities the Portugueſe had on that coaſt, called St Sebaſtian de Rio Janiero. He and his crew returned home laden with riches, and the Portugueſe ſuffered a very conſiderable loſs by this expedition; but the miſchief he had done in the Braſils did not alleviate the miſeries of France §.

The new Britiſh miniſtry had laid a plan, in the ſpring of this year, at the ſolicitation of general Nicholſon (who came to England purpoſely on that deſign) for the attack of Placentia, in Newfoundland, and (which was ſtill of more importance) for the conqueſt of Quebec, and the reſt of Canada, from France: troops were accordingly brought over early in the year from Flanders; and in the month of May, a powerful armament, conſiſting of twelve ſail of the line and fifty tranſports, having on board five thouſand men, under the command of brigadier Hill (brother to Mrs. Maſham), ſailed from Plymouth: ſir Hovenden Walker had the command of the fleet. At Boſton, in New England, they were joined by two regiments of provincials, and about four thouſand men, compoſed of American planters, Palatines, and Indians. At this place they were detained ſo long for want of proviſions, which it is ſaid they ought to have carried out with them from England, that it was the beginning of Auguſt before they ſailed into the river St. Lawrence, which was conſiderably too late in the year. General Nicholſon, with the provincials, Palatines, and Indians, proceeded overland to Albany, which was to be the general rendezvous. But when the fleet had got a little way up that dangerous river, they were attacked, on the twenty-firſt of Auguſt, by a violent ſtorm, and driven among the rocks, where eight tranſports were loſt, with about eight hundred men; and many other of the ſhips were miſerably ſhattered. The admiral, after this loſs, ſailed immediately back to Spaniſh River Bay, where it was reſolved, in a council of war, that, as the fleet and forces were victualled for ten weeks only, and as they could not depend upon ſupplies from New England, they ſhould return, which they accordingly did in October, without having made any attempt on the French at Placentia. This unſucceſsful expedition was the firſt and only warlike one undertaken by the new miniſtry; and the diſappointment was no ſmall mortification to them, as it had coſt the public a great ſum of money. To complete the misfortune, the admiral's ſhip, the Edgar, blew up at Spithead, with a great number of perſons on board (beſides the crew, conſiſting of four hundred men) who were come to welcome their friends home: the admiral, and the greateſt part of the officers happened fortunately to be on ſhore.

* Broderick. Life of the Duke of Marlb. Hiſt. of Europe. † Burnet. ‡ Idem.
§ Voltaire's Age of Lewis XIV.

Having given an account of the military tranſactions of this year, I ſhall next take a view of our civil affairs: and firſt of Ireland.

About the middle of June his grace the duke of Ormond, lord-lieutenant of Ireland, ſet out for that kingdom, and arrived at Dublin the third of July. On the twelfth of the ſame month the parliament aſſembled, to whom he made a ſpeech ſuitable to the preſent ſituation of affairs. I ſhall not enter into a detail of the particular matters tranſacted this ſeſſion, but only obſerve, that the majority of the peers ſhewed themſelves to be ſtrong friends to the Tory party and the new miniſtry in England; while the commons expreſſed no leſs zeal for the Whig intereſt. The commons being informed that the lords, in an addreſs to the queen this ſeſſion, had reflected on the honour of their houſe, and a paper, alleged to be a copy of the ſaid addreſs, being read, they immediately addreſſed the queen upon it. The lords, in their turn, addreſſed in vindication of their former addreſs; and alſo drew up a repreſentation, at the ſolicitation of the biſhops, againſt the diſſenters in that kingdom. In fine, the heats between the two houſes grew to an alarming height, ſo that the lord lieutenant found himſelf under a neceſſity to put an end to the ſeſſion, which he did on the ninth of November, after giving the royal aſſent to ſuch acts as were ready, and then returned to England.

In Scotland, the Jacobite party began to grow extremely inſolent upon the change in the miniſtry. The ducheſs of Gordon preſented the faculty of advocates with a ſilver medal, repreſenting the pretender, and on the reverſe the Britiſh iſlands, with the motto, REDDITE (return): the faculty received it, and even voted thanks to the ducheſs for this token of her regard. This affair made a very great noiſe: the matter was laid before the queen, who ordered the lord-advocate of Scotland to enquire into the particulars. The faculty, dreading the conſequences of their fooliſh proceeding, paſſed a ſolemn act, by which they declared their attachment to the queen and the proteſtant ſucceſſion, and alleged in their excuſe, that the affair of the medal had been tranſacted by a party at an occaſional meeting, and not by general conſent. The court was ſatisfied with this conceſſion; but the Hanoverian reſident having preſented a memorial to the queen, deſiring that ſome puniſhment might be inflicted on the principal perſons concerned in accepting the medal and returning thanks for the ſame, the government ordered a proſecution to be commenced againſt Dundaſs of Arniſtoun, and one Horne; and ſir David Dalrymple, the lord-advocate, was removed, on account of his remiſſneſs: and thus the affair was dropped ‖.

Both the queen and the miniſtry being now intent upon peace, and the French king having made new overtures this ſpring, Mr. Prior was ſent to France, in company with the abbot Gualtier. This perſon, during marſhal Tallard's embaſſy to king William, had acted as his chaplain; and ſoon after getting into the earl of Jerſey's acquaintance, who was ambaſſador in France after the peace of Ryſwick, and whoſe lady was a Roman Catholic, was retained in that nobleman's family: here he got acquainted with Mr. Prior, who was that earl's ſecretary. Afterwards, returning to England, he became chaplain to count Gallas, ambaſſador from Charles III. of Spain. The earl of Jerſey recommended him to Mr. Harley and Mr. St. John, as a proper perſon to go over with Mr. Prior to ſound the intentions of the court of France. They were to let the king of France know, that the preſent miniſtry were deſirous of peace; but that they would make it only on ſuch terms as ſhould be to the ſatisfaction of the allies of Great Britain, agreeable to the treaties and ſtipulations entered into by the confederates. They then propoſed, "That the trade of Holland ſhould be reſtored, and the Dutch have a barrier, as well as the emperor and the duke of Savoy, for their ſecurity: that care ſhould be taken to keep the balance in Italy; and that the crowns of France and Spain ſhould never be united. In relation to Great Britain, that our commerce ſhould be ſettled to the ſatisfaction of the Britiſh ſubjects; the government to be acknowledged in France, as now ſettled in Great Britain; Dunkirk to be demoliſhed; the Aſſiento to be enjoyed by Great Britain, after the peace, as the French had it at preſent; Newfoundland to be entirely given up to the Engliſh, but the trade of Hudſon's Bay to be continued in the hands of the French and Engliſh; and all things in America to remain in the ſtate they ſhould be found in, at the concluſion of the peace: that all advantages of trade granted to the French by the Spaniards, ſhould be equally granted to the Britiſh ſubjects; and in the laſt place, the ſecret ſhould be inviolably kept, till allowed to be divulged by the mutual conſent of both parties concerned."

With theſe propoſitions Mr. Prior went to France, in the beginning of July this year, but without any powers to negociate, and was ordered to return immediately, if the French ſtarted any difficulties, and was particularly directed to ſee if they had full powers from Spain. The French not finding him ſufficiently empowered to treat, ſent over Meſnager, deputy of the council of commerce in France (with whom Mr. Prior returned). Meſnager remained here till the latter end of September, when, having finiſhed his negociations, he took leave of the Britiſh court, and returned home, having firſt obtained liberty for marſhal Tallard, who had remained a priſoner here ever ſince the battle of Hochſtet, to go to France for four months, upon his parole. On the ninth of October the offers made by France were communicated to count Gallas, and to the other miniſters of the allies. The propoſals obtained the name of Preliminaries, though they were ſigned only by the French agents, and contained only the offers made on the part of France: what thoſe were, the reader will find in the note *.

Theſe

‖ Burnet. Tindal.

* Theſe articles imported, that Lewis acknowleged the title of the queen of Great Britain, and the ſucceſſion of that crown, according to the preſent ſettlement: that he would freely, and bonâ fide, conſent to the taking all juſt and reaſonable meaſures for hindering the crowns of France and Spain from ever being united on the head of the ſame prince; perſuaded that ſuch exceſs of power would be dangerous to the peace and tranquility of Europe: that all the parties, engaged in the preſent war, ſhould, each of them, obtain a reaſonable ſatisfaction in the treaty of peace which ſhould be concluded; and that trade ſhould be eſtabliſhed and maintained for the future, to the advantage of Great-Britain and Holland, and of the other nations, who had been accuſtomed to exerciſe commerce:

Theſe offers being communicated to the foreign miniſters reſiding in London, by Mr. ſecretary St. John, who at the ſame time notified to them, that her majeſty had pitched upon the city of Utrecht for the place of congreſs, and that the conferences would begin on the firſt of January, O. S. count Gallas, now the Imperial ambaſſador, was pleaſed to treat them in a manner ſo diſreſpectful to our government, that the queen ſent him a meſſage forbidding him her court, and at the ſame time to acquaint him, that the ſooner he left England, the more agreeable it would be to her. The States-General alſo thought proper to ſend over M. Buys, one of their deputies, in whoſe eloquence they had great confidence, to perſuade her majeſty not to give ear to any propoſals made by the court of France: but they were diſappointed in their expectations: the queen was determined to procure peace, and put a ſtop to the vaſt effuſion of blood, which had for many years deluged half Europe, nor would longer ſuffer ſuch numbers of her faithful ſubjects to throw away their lives, not in defence of their own country, but to gratify the covetouſneſs and ambition of our allies. Accordingly the earl of Strafford, the Engliſh ambaſſador at the Hague, was ordered to demand the immediate concurrence of the States, declaring, in the queen's name, that ſhe ſhould look upon any delay as a refuſal to comply with her propoſitions. Their High Mightineſſes, conſidering that they were altogether unable to proſecute the war without the aſſiſtance of England, and that by ſeparating their intereſts from thoſe of Great Britain, they ſhould not be able to obtain a barrier to their mind, thought it moſt adviſeable, after long deliberation, to fall in with the queen's meaſures. Baron Bothmar, envoy extraordinary from his electoral highneſs of Hanover, alſo preſented a memorial, diſſuading her majeſty from treating with the court of France, until the demands of the allies were fully complied with, by way of preliminaries. In order to quiet the apprehenſions which that count had been inſpired with by the Whig party, who repreſented all theſe meaſures as ſo many ſteps to bring in the pretender, the earl of Rivers, the Engliſh ambaſſador at Hanover, was ordered to aſſure the elector, that his ſucceſſion to the crown ſhould be effectually ſecured in the treaty. Charles, the new emperor, wrote to the queen on the ſame ſubject, and with the like arguments of diſſuaſion; but her majeſty, for certain reaſons, did not honour his letter with an anſwer. She had already done a great deal, perhaps even more than, in juſtice to her ſubjects, ſhe ought to have done, in favour of the houſe of Auſtria; but there was no reaſon for aggrandizing that family any more than the houſe of Bourbon, at the expence of her own kingdom, and that of the peace of all Europe.

But that all parties might be made as eaſy as poſſible, her majeſty wrote a letter to the allies, explaining to them the ſteps ſhe had taken, and inviting them to the congreſs; ſhe even condeſcended to have a conference with the dukes of Marlborough, Grafton, and St. Albans, the earls of Dorſet and Scarborough, the lords Somers, Cowper, and others, on the ſame ſubject; but they remained fixed and ſteady in their oppoſition to a pacification. Her majeſty, however, proceeded ſtedfaſtly in her meaſures, notwithſtanding all the oppoſition ſhe met with, both at home and abroad: and the parliament being aſſembled on the ſeventh of December, ſhe made a ſpeech to both houſes, in which ſhe expreſſed herſelf to the following purport: "That, notwithſtanding the arts of thoſe who delighted in war, the time and place for a general congreſs were finally appointed: that her allies, eſpecially the States-general, whoſe intereſts ſhe conſidered as inſeparable from her own, had, by their ready concurrence, expreſſed an entire confidence in her conduct: that her chief concern was, that the Proteſtant religion, and the laws and liberties of the nation ſhould be preſerved inviolate, by ſecuring the ſucceſſion as it was limited by parliament, in the houſe of Hanover: that ſhe ſhould make it her endeavour, in the enſuing negociation, to obtain all the advantages of trade and commerce, which a tender and affectionate ſovereign could procure for a dutiful and loyal people: that, with regard to the princes and ſtates who were engaged in the war, ſhe would leave no means unattempted to obtain for each of them all reaſonable ſatisfaction: that, as the beſt way to forward the treaty, would be to make early proviſion for opening the campaign, ſhe hoped they would grant the neceſſary ſupplies for the enſuing year; and ſhe begged they would proceed in this affair with ſuch diſpatch, as might convince the enemy, that if ſhe could not obtain a good peace, ſhe was ready to proſecute the war with vigour."

The earl of Nottingham, from being one of the chief ſupports of the Tory party, had of late aſſociated with the Whigs in oppoſing the meaſures purſued by the court towards a pacification, and therefore, when her majeſty's ſpeech came to be canvaſſed in the houſe of lords, he objected to that part of it which related to this matter, aſſerting that the preliminary offers of the French court were vague, looſe, and indeterminate; and on a motion being made for returning her majeſty the thanks of the houſe for her ſpeech, he propoſed that a clauſe ſhould be inſerted in the addreſs, importing, "that it was the humble opinion and advice of that houſe, that no peace could be ſafe or honourable to Great Britain or Europe, if Spain and the Weſt Indies were allotted to any branch of the houſe of Bourbon." This occaſioned a violent debate, in the merce: that he would faithfully obſerve the conditions of peace when it ſhould be concluded; and as the only object which he propoſed to himſelf was, to ſecure the frontiers of his kingdom, without diſturbing the neighbouring ſtates, he readily agreed by the enſuing treaty, that the Dutch ſhould be put in poſſeſſion of the fortified places which ſhould be mentioned in the Netherlands, to ſerve for the future as a barrier for ſecuring the quiet of the republic of Holland againſt any attempts from the part of France: that he likewiſe conſented, that a ſufficient and convenient barrier ſhould be formed for the empire, and the houſe of Auſtria: that, though he had expended very large ſums, as well in purchaſing, as fortifying Dunkirk; and though an additional expence would be neceſſary for razing the works, he would yet engage to cauſe them to be demoliſhed, immediately after the concluſion of the peace, on condition, that, for the fortifications of that place, a proper equivalent ſhould be given him; and as it could not be expected that England ſhould furniſh that equivalent, the manner of raiſing it ſhould be left to the plenipotentiaries appointed to conduct the negociations for peace: and that, when the general conferences for peace ſhould be opened, the pretenſions of all the princes and ſtates, engaged in the war, ſhould be carefully conſidered, and nothing ſhould be omitted to regulate and ſettle them to the entire ſatisfaction of all the parties. Burnet. Tindal.

courſe of which the earl of Angleſey repreſented the neceſſity of eaſing the nation of the burthens incurred by an expenſive war: he affirmed, that a good peace might have been procured immediately after the battle of Ramillies, if it had not been prevented by ſome perſons, who prolonged the war for their own private intereſt. The duke of Marlborough, conceiving himſelf ſtruck at by this aſſertion, roſe up, and, in a very long ſpeech, endeavoured to vindicate himſelf from ſuch a charge, and, with a moſt ſolemn oath, declared that he was always very far from entertaining any deſign of prolonging the war for his own private advantage, as his enemies had moſt falſly inſinuated. At laſt, the queſtion being put upon that clauſe, it was carried for inſertion by a ſmall majority. To this addreſs her majeſty returned for anſwer, that ſhe was very ſorry any one could think ſhe would not do her utmoſt to recover Spain and the Weſt Indies from the houſe of Bourbon. The commons, in their addreſs, inſerted no ſuch article, and therefore her majeſty anſwered them in a more gracious ſtyle*.

Duke Hamilton, one of the ſixteen peers for Scotland, having been created duke of Brandon in England, his right of ſitting in the houſe of peers as a peer of Great Britain, was queſtioned, and counſel being heard on both ſides of this point, it was reſolved, upon the queſtion, "That Scots peers created peers of Great Britain ſince the Union, have no right to ſit in the houſe of peers, as peers of Great Britain." The bill againſt occaſional conformity was revived this ſeſſion by the earl of Nottingham, but in more moderate terms than the former, ſo that it paſſed both houſes. On the twenty-ſecond of December, her majeſty being indiſpoſed with an agueiſh diſorder, granted a commiſſion to the lord keeper and ſome other peers, to give the royal aſſent to this bill, and another for the land tax. Then the commons adjourned to the fourteenth of January, and the lords to the ſecond of the ſame month, but not till they had, at the motion of the earl of Nottingham, preſented an addreſs to the queen, deſiring ſhe would inſtruct her plenipotentiaries in the enſuing negociation, to act in perfect concert with the miniſters of the allies; an addreſs which was very diſagreeable to her majeſty, as it implied a ſuſpicion of her miniſters, as if they had clandeſtine views in their tranſactions with the enemy.

All this time the duke of Marlborough, equally inſatiable of glory and riches, tried every poſſible expedient, both by himſelf and his adherents, to render the propoſed peace abortive; but his influence was now in its wane, and his enemies, the more effectually to ruin him with the queen, cauſed a charge of peculation to be brought againſt him in parliament, by the commiſſioners for examining the public accounts, who reported, that they had diſcovered, that the duke had received an annual preſent of five or ſix thouſand pounds, from ſir Solomon Medina, a Jew, concerned in contracting for bread for the army; and that he had pocketed a deduction of two and an half per cent. from the foreign troops maintained by England. His grace alleged in his juſtification, "That the preſent from the Jew was a cuſtomary perquiſite, which had always been enjoyed by the general of the Dutch army; that the deduction of two and an half per cent. was granted to him by an expreſs warrant from the queen; that all the articles in the charge, joined together, did not exceed thirty thouſand pounds, a ſum much inferior to that which had been allowed by king William for contingencies; that the money was expended in providing intelligence, which was ſo exact, that the allied army under his command had never been ſurpriſed." Upon the whole, however, the great caution and ſecrecy with which this money was conſtantly received, gave reaſon to ſuſpect, that it was not thought a juſtifiable perquiſite; for Mr. Edward Cardonnel, the duke's ſecretary, and auditor of the bread-account, declared upon oath, that he never knew or heard of ſuch perquiſite, till the rumour of this affair being brought before the commiſſioners. However this might be, her majeſty was pleaſed, on the thirtieth of December, to declare in council, that ſhe thought fit to diſmiſs the duke of Marlborough from all his employments, that the matter might be impartially examined. This declaration was next day imparted to him, in a letter under the queen's own hand, in which ſhe took occaſion to complain of the treatment ſhe had received from him and his friends. The royal protection thus withdrawn from this great man, it ſoon appeared how little reliance is to be placed on the opinion of the people. He, whom they had in a manner deified and adored, whoſe praiſes had filled every mouth, was now pointed at, as an object of the moſt indecent ſatire and moſt bitter invectives: he, who had ſo lately poſſeſſed the confidence of almoſt every court in Europe, and had ſeen his friendſhip ſought after by their reſpective ſovereigns, now found himſelf obliged, to elude the perſecution of his enemies, to ſeek refuge in foreign country.

The miniſtry finding how ſtrongly the houſe of lords oppoſed the meaſures for a peace, perſuaded the queen to make uſe of an expedient, which nothing but neceſſity could juſtify, and which no Engliſh prince had ever before attempted. This was, to create no leſs than twelve new peers; a number which they imagined would ſecure them the majority in the upper houſe. Accordingly, on the laſt day of December, lord Compton and lord Bruce, ſons to the earls of Northampton and Ayleſbury, were called up by writ; and the other ten were created by patent †.

The new emperor, Charles VI. thinking that of all the allies he was likely to be the greateſt ſufferer by a peace with France, thought proper to diſpatch prince Eugene to the Britiſh court, as the moſt likely perſon to promote his intereſt with the queen in this conjuncture, and hoping that his preſence, with the aſſiſtance of the Whigs, who were very liberal of their invectives againſt the new miniſtry, might raiſe ſuch a flame of diſcontent in the nation, as would turn out to the advantage of the advocates for war. His highneſs arrived at Harwich on the firſt of January, 1712, O. S. and on the ſeventh was introduced, by Mr. ſecretary St. John, to a private audience of her majeſty: after a ſhort compliment, which her majeſty very graciouſly returned, his highneſs delivered to her a letter from the emperor, which he deſired her majeſty to peruſe, ſaying, it contained all his errand. After reading the letter, the queen was pleaſed to tell the prince, "ſhe was ſorry that the ſtate of her health did not permit her to ſpeak with his highneſs as often ſhe would be glad to do; but that ſhe had ordered thoſe two gentlemen (meaning the ſecretary and treaſurer, then preſent) to receive his propoſals, and confer with his highneſs as frequently as he ſhould think proper."

The chief buſineſs with which the prince was charged, was to diſſuade the queen from agreeing to the ſettlement of the crown of Spain on the houſe of Bourbon; and his memorial conſiſted of propoſals and methods to carry on the war in that country with ſucceſs. Mr. ſecretary St. John accordingly acquainted the houſe of commons, when they met, that he had received her majeſty's commands to communicate to that houſe a propoſition made to her majeſty by prince Eugene, in the name of the emperor, for the ſupport of the war in Spain; viz. "that his Imperial majeſty judges that forty thouſand men will be ſufficient for this ſervice, and that the whole expence of the war in Spain may amount to four millions of crowns; towards which his Imperial majeſty offers to make up the troops which he has in that country thirty thouſand men, and to take one million of crowns upon himſelf." It was obſerved that no miniſter ſtood up to ſay any thing to this meſſage, which gave the prince a bad preſage of the ſucceſs of his negociation; and therefore, ſoon after taking leave of her majeſty, he haſted back to the continent, to end the war alone, with the freſh incentive of a proſpect of victory without a companion to ſhare the glory.

In the mean while the duke of Marlborough's poſts were all filled up, and the duke of Ormond was pitched upon as the fitteſt perſon to be captain-general: a commiſſion was accordingly made out, appointing him commander in chief of her majeſty's forces within the kingdom of Great Britain, and of thoſe employed abroad in conjunction with the troops of the allies ‡. But to reſume our parliamentary affairs.

The lords reaſſembled, agreeable to their adjournment, on the ſecond of January, when the queen was pleaſed to return the following anſwer to their late addreſs: "That ſhe thought her ſpeech to both houſes would have given ſatisfaction to every one; and that ſhe had given inſtructions to her plenipotentiaries according to the deſire of their addreſs." This done, the lord-keeper delivered to the houſe a meſſage from the queen, importing, "That her majeſty having matters of great importance to communicate to both houſes of parliament, ſhe deſired the houſe of lords to adjourn immediately to the fourteenth, being the ſame day to which the commons had adjourned themſelves." A warm debate aroſe upon this meſſage, many lords being againſt an adjournment; but it was carried in the affirmative by eighty-one againſt ſixty-eight.

The ſame day many of the Scots peers in town preſented to the queen an humble repreſentation concerning the late judgment of the lords in relation to the validity of the duke of Hamilton's patent, as duke of Brandon, which her majeſty communicated to their lordſhips; who, when they came to debate this affair, reſolved, that it was cognizable only by their houſe, and at laſt dropped it.

Her majeſty, by reaſon of her indiſpoſition, being unable to go to the houſe in perſon on the fourteenth, ſent a meſſage to the commons, importing, that the plenipotentiaries were arrived at Utrecht, and were employed in concerting meaſures for procuring ſatisfaction to all her allies; that the terms of peace ſhould be communicated to the parliament before they were finally concluded; that in the mean time ſhe was reſolved to make preparations for an early campaign; and ſhe therefore hoped the commons would grant the neceſſary ſupplies for that purpoſe ‖.

The duke of Devonſhire having, in conſequence of a motion he had formerly made, prepared a bill for giving precedence to the elector of Hanover, as duke of Cambridge, before the reſt of the Engliſh nobility, the treaſurer, Harley, not to be behindhand, introduced a bill for giving precedence to the whole electoral family, as children and nephews of the crown; and when it was paſſed into an act, he ſent it over to Hanover, by his brother, Mr. Thomas Harley *.

The commons now entered on the obſervations of the commiſſioners for the public accounts, which had been laid before them on the twenty-firſt of December; and finding that Mr. Robert Walpole, who had for ſome time enjoyed the poſt of ſecretary at war, had received the ſum of five hundred guineas, and taken a note for five hundred more, on account of two contracts for forage for her majeſty's troops quartered in North Britain, they voted him guilty of a high breach of truſt and notorious corruption, and, on the twentieth of January, expelled him their houſe, and committed him to the Tower †.

This done, they proceeded, on the twenty-fourth of January, to take the duke of Marlborough's affairs into conſideration, when, after a long debate, it was reſolved, by two hundred and ſeventy voices againſt one hundred and ſixty-five, "That the taking ſeveral ſums of money annually by the duke of Marlborough, from the contractors for furniſhing the bread and bread-waggons for the army in the Low Countries, was unwarrantable and illegal." After which it was alſo reſolved, by a great majority, "That the two and an half per cent. deducted from the foreign troops in her majeſty's pay, was public money, and ought to be accounted for; and that the ſaid reſolution ſhould be laid before her majeſty by the whole houſe;" which was done accordingly on the twenty-ſixth. Whereupon her majeſty gave orders to her attorney-general to proſecute the duke for the money he had ſo deducted. It muſt be confeſſed, indeed, that he had the queen's own warrant for doing it; but ſtill ſuch practices were mean and mercenary, and greatly tarniſhed thoſe glories which the duke had juſtly acquired by his military abilities and other ſhining qualities.

An affair of a more public nature next engroſſed the attention of the commons, namely, the barrier-treaty with the Dutch, which had been concluded with the States by the lord Townſhend, after the conferences at Gertruydenberg. By this treaty England guarantied a barrier in the Netherlands to the Dutch; and the States bound themſelves to maintain, with their whole force, the queen's title and the proteſtant ſucceſſion. The places to be guarantied to the States as a barrier, were chiefly Liſle, Tournay, Menin, and Douay, and they were to be kept ſtill by them. The commons, after examining this treaty, voted, "That there were ſeveral articles therein deſtructive to the trade and intereſt of Great Britain: that the lord viſcount Townſhend had no orders or authority to conclude ſeveral articles in that treaty; and that he, and all thoſe who had adviſed its being ratified, were enemies to the queen and kingdom *." On this occaſion the Whigs, or low-church party, were, or at leaſt pretended to be, ſtrangely alarmed, as if there was a real deſign on foot to overturn the proteſtant ſucceſſion, and no induſtry was wanting to propagate that notion among the people. But the event ſhewed, that this was not the thing intended by ſuch a procedure, and that the negociators of that treaty were thoſe chiefly aimed at.

On the fourth of February, the commons, having deliberated on the ſtate of the war, came to the following reſolutions in regard to our allies the Dutch: "That the forces ſupplied by the States for the ſervice of Spain, from 1705 to 1708, were no more than twelve thouſand two hundred men; and that they had ſince ſent thither no forces at all: that the States, during the courſe of the war, had furniſhed leſs than their proportion in Flanders, twenty thouſand eight hundred and thirty-ſeven men: that the queen had paid in ſubſidies, more than her proportion, three millions one hundred and fifty-five crowns." Theſe reſolutions, with the votes concerning the barrier-treaty, were all digeſted into a long and ſpirited repreſentation, which they preſented to the queen, and in which they aſſerted, that, during the war, England had been over-charged nineteen millions; a circumſtance which, they ſaid, implied either fraud or miſmanagement in the late miniſtry †.

The States-general, alarmed at theſe reſolutions, and fearful of loſing their beloved barrier, thought proper to write a reſpectful letter to the queen; at the ſame time they ſent over a memorial, in which they endeavoured to vindicate their own conduct in the courſe of the war, againſt the repreſentation of the commons. This memorial was inſerted in one of the Engliſh news-papers, evidently with a view to make an impreſſion upon the minds of the people to the diſadvantage of the preſent adminiſtration; whereupon the commons voted the ſaid memorial a falſe, ſcandalous, and malicious libel, reflecting on the reſolutions of the houſe; and cauſed the printer and publiſher to be taken into cuſtody, as guilty of a breach of privilege ‡.

The commons in fact ſeemed determined to alter every thing that had been done by the late miniſtry: they repealed the naturalization act; they paſſed a bill for tolerating the epiſcopal clergy in Scotland; and paſſed ſeveral other bills which greatly diſguſted that nation, particularly an act for diſcontinuing the courts of juſticiary during Chriſtmas (called, An Act for diſcharging the Yule Vacance), as the obſerving of holidays was contrary to the principles of the preſbyterians; and an act for reſtoring patronages, which their parliament had aboliſhed by law, as a grievance. Theſe meaſures occaſioned much altercation; but the Scots were at length obliged to ſubmit ‖. They had enjoyed their days of triumph over the church of England, which they had not exerciſed in the moſt tender manner; it ſeemed therefore but juſt that they ſhould experience ſome little mortification in their turn. The houſe of lords were ſo diſguſted with the ſudden and unprecedented introduction of the twelve new peers among them, that a ſtrong party was formed to revive, and if poſſible to carry into an act, the place-bill; but the miniſtry beſtirred themſelves ſo effectually, that all the Whig faction could effect, was to have the bill paſſed to take place after the demiſe of the queen, inſtead of after the determination of the preſent parliament, which was what they puſhed for, ſo that it was no more thought on §. Soon after the commons proceeded to the conſideration of the ſupplies, which they readily granted, amounting in the whole to about ſix millions, part of which was to be raiſed by two lotteries. About the ſame time the treaſurer formed a bill for reſuming all the grants made ſince the Revolution; but this ſcheme was ſtrenuouſly oppoſed by all the Whig party, and the bill was rejected, though but by a ſmall majority ¶. But it will be neceſſary, before we bring this ſeſſion to a concluſion, to look back a little, and obſerve how the negociations for peace proceeded at Utrecht.

The Britiſh plenipotentiaries were Dr. Robinſon, biſhop of Briſtol, lord privy-ſeal, and the earl of Strafford; the chief of the Dutch deputies were Buys and Vanderduſſen; and the French king granted his powers to the marſhal d'Uxelles, the abbot de Polignac, and monſ. Meſnager, who had been in England; the miniſters of the emperor and of Savoy likewiſe aſſiſted at the congreſs, to which the empire and the other allies afterwards ſent their plenipotentiaries, though not without reluctance. The conferences began on Friday, the twenty-ninth of January, N. S. 1712. On the eleventh of February the plenipotentiaries of France delivered their propoſals in writing: and upon the twenty-fifth of March the miniſters of the allies delivered to thoſe of France their reſpective demands, and inſiſted on the latter giving in a ſpecific anſwer in writing to their ſpecific demands. This the French miniſters declined, though at the ſame time they declared themſelves ready to enter into a negociation with all the allies, in the uſual manner obſerved at other treaties. But it appearing very plain, that the Imperial and Dutch miniſters had no inclination to treat at all, and refuſing abſolutely to enter into any meaſures with the Britiſh miniſters, the latter found themſelves under an abſolute neceſſity of carrying on the treaty without them. The Dutch, to ſhew their averſion to peace, ordered a faſt to be proclaimed in April for the ſucceſs of the war, which was obſerved with unuſual ſtrictneſs: their general, the earl of Albemarle, alſo opened the campaign with burning the magazines of Arras.

The ſpecific explanation of the offers of France for a general peace being tranſmitted to England, were found to be (ſo far as related to Great Britain) as follow:

"The French king will acknowlege, at the ſigning of the peace, the queen of Great Britain in that quality; as alſo the ſucceſſion of that crown according to the preſent ſettlement, and in the manner her Britannic majeſty ſhall pleaſe.

"His majeſty will cauſe all the fortifications of Dunkirk to be demoliſhed immediately after the peace, provided an equivalent be given him to his ſatisfaction.

"The Iſland of St. Chriſtopher, Hudſon's Bay and ſtreight of that name, ſhall be yielded up entire to Great Britain; and Acadia, with Port Royal and the Fort, ſhall be reſtored entire to his majeſty.

"As to the iſland of Newfoundland, the king offers to yield up that alſo to Great Britain, reſerving only to himſelf the fort of Placentia, and the right of catching and drying fiſh, as before the war.

"It ſhall be agreed to make a treaty of commerce, before or after the peace, as England ſhall chuſe; the conditions of which ſhall be made as equal between the two nations as they can poſſibly."

When theſe offers came to be debated upon in parliament, they gave riſe to long and very warm debates, eſpecially in the houſe of peers, ſeveral lords treating them as trifling, arrogant, and injurious to her majeſty and her allies. Some endeavours were uſed to adjourn the debates, but in vain; and it was reſolved, without dividing, to preſent an addreſs to the queen, repreſenting the juſt indignation that houſe entertained at the inſolence of France, in having propoſed to acknowlege her majeſty's title to theſe realms no ſooner than when the peace ſhould be ſigned; as alſo at the terms of peace offered to her and her allies by the plenipotentiaries of France; declaring at the ſame time, that they would aſſiſt her majeſty to the utmoſt of their power in proſecuting the war, until they ſhould obtain a ſafe and honourable peace *.

It muſt be confeſſed, that the ſpecific demands delivered in by the miniſters of the allies, ran as high as the French explanation another way. The emperor aſked the whole Spaniſh monarchy; England demanded the reſtitution of Newfoundland, and the demolition of Dunkirk; the States required their whole barrier; and every ally inſiſted upon ſatisfaction to all the other allies as well as to himſelf. England and the States-general declared, that they demanded Spain and the Weſt Indies for the emperor; in fine, the high pattern ſet by the French was fully imitated by the allies.

The duke of Ormond being appointed to command the queen's forces in Flanders, went over in the beginning of April to Holland, and had ſeveral conferences with the deputies of the States, who aſſured his grace, that they had given orders to their generals to live in a good correſpondence with his grace. On the twenty-firſt of May his grace, in concert with prince Eugene, aſſembled the army between Douay and Marchiennes, which, upon a review, was found to conſiſt of two hundred and ninety-five ſquadrons, and one hundred and forty-three battalions, amounting in the whole to one hundred and twenty-two thouſand two hundred and fifty men; with which forces the generals marched towards the enemy, and paſſing the Scheld, encamped at Solemnes and Keufville. But prince Eugene propoſing to attack the French army under marſhal Villars, or to inveſt the town of Queſnoy; the duke of Ormond, who had by this time received freſh orders from Mr. ſecretary St. John, gave the prince and the deputies of the States-general to underſtand, that her Britannic majeſty having a proſpect that the negociations for peace would prove ſucceſsful, had given him orders not to act offenſively againſt the enemy.

The prince, and the deputies of the States were thunderſtruck at this intimation, and immediately tranſmitted advice thereof to the Hague. Whereupon the Dutch plenipotentiaries at Utrecht had orders to complain to the biſhop of Briſtol, in the name of their maſters, againſt theſe orders, which the duke ſaid he had received, as they were given without their concurrence: to which that prelate made anſwer, that he was inſtructed to intimate to the States-general, that as their High Mightineſſes had not thought proper to concur with her majeſty in the meaſures ſhe had taken for procuring a ſalutary peace, they ought not to be ſurpriſed if ſhe now thought herſelf at liberty to procure that convenience for herſelf. The plenipotentiaries of the States then remonſtrating, that ſuch a ſtep would be contrary to all the alliances between the queen and the States-general; the biſhop ſaid, his inſtructions farther imported, "That, conſidering the conduct of the States towards her majeſty, ſhe thought herſelf diſengaged from all alliances and engagements with their High Mightineſſes"

The States-general hereupon ſent over a letter to the queen, and ordered their envoy at London to deliver it into her own hand. It contained an excuſe for the backwardneſs they had ſhewn to act in concert with her majeſty: "That all the difference between her majeſty and them was a diſparity of ſentiments; and if for ſuch a cauſe, confederates united by the ſtrongeſt ties, might quit their engagements, no engagements could be relied on for the time to come." It ſeems the States-general, at the time of ſending over this letter, had given orders to their envoy (with what view may be eaſily gueſſed) to publiſh copies of it in the public papers, which he did; and they were printed and diſperſed in England at the very inſtant, if not before, the letter came to the queen's hands.

The queen was ſo highly incenſed at this procedure of the Dutch, which ſhe conſidered as a remonſtrance rather than a repreſentation, and an appeal to the people rather than an addreſs to the ſovereign, that ſhe wrote them a very ſharp anſwer thereupon: nor was this all; the commons took it under conſideration, and voted an addreſs to her majeſty, wherein they aſſured her "of the juſt ſenſe the houſe had of the indignity offered to her by printing and publiſhing a letter from the States-general to her majeſty; and humbly deſired her that ſhe would ſo far reſent ſuch indignities, as to give no anſwer for the future to any letters or memorials that ſhould be ſo printed and publiſhed." Nevertheleſs, her majeſty, hoping ſhe might at length bring the confederates to join with her in procuring a general peace, did condeſcend to permit the duke of Ormond to concur with the confederates in a ſiege, who thereupon inveſted Queſnoy on the eighth of June †.

Great efforts, however, were made in the houſe of lords, to procure the cenſure of that illuſtrious aſſembly upon the orders given to the duke of Ormond, not to act offenſively. The friends of the Marlborough family, and the Whig party in general, clubbed their united ſtrength on this occaſion. Lord Halifax made a motion for this purpoſe: many and harſh were the reflections thrown out by both parties againſt each other, which at length went ſo far, that the duke of Marlborough, on coming out of the houſe, ſent a challenge to earl Powlett, for certain expreſſions of his highly reflecting upon his grace; but the government interpoſed, and prevented any ill conſequences; and the Whig faction had the mortification to find their attempts baffled on this occaſion, and the motion was rejected ‡.

A motion of the ſame nature being made in the houſe of commons, it was not only rejected by a great majority (viz. two hundred and three againſt thirty-ſeven), but they came to this reſolution, namely, "that this houſe hath an entire confidence in her majeſty's moſt gracious promiſe, to communicate to her parliament the terms of the peace, before the ſame ſhall be concluded; and that they will ſupport her majeſty in obtaining an honourable and ſafe peace, againſt all ſuch perſons, either at home or abroad, who have endeavoured, or ſhall endeavour, to obſtruct the ſame." To this addreſs the queen returned the following moſt gracious anſwer: "That ſhe thanked her faithful commons very heartily for this reſolution, as being dutiful to her, honeſt to their country, and very ſeaſonable, at a time when ſo many artifices were uſed to obſtruct a good peace, or force one diſadvantageous to Great Britain."

The articles of the treaty being now in ſome meaſure adjuſted, the queen thought fit to propoſe a ceſſation of arms to the allies. On the fifth day of June her majeſty came to the houſe of peers, and communicated the plan of peace ‖, according to the promiſe ſhe had made; upon which an addreſs of thanks and approbation was immediately voted, and preſented to the queen by the commons in a body. But the lords were not ſo acquieſcent, the Whig party predominating in that houſe. The Tories had embarraſſed them in their adminiſtration during the laſt year of the war, and the Whigs in return were reſolved to make the Tories as uneaſy as poſſible: both parties were, in their turns, gainers by this manner of acting; but both parties were gainers at the expence of the nation, and therefore they had no reaſon, they had no right, to reproach each other. When the houſe of lords took the ſpeech into conſideration, the duke of Marlborough aſſerted, that the meaſures purſued for a year paſt were directly contrary to her majeſty's engagements with the allies; that they ſullied the glories and triumphs of her reign, and would render the Engliſh name odious to all nations. To this the earl of Strafford, who was lately returned from Utrecht, anſwered, that the allies would not have ſhewn ſuch backwardneſs to a peace, had not they been perſuaded and encouraged to carry on the war by a member of that illuſtrious aſſembly, who had fed them with hopes of being ſupported by a ſtrong party in England; but if England had it not in her power, without infringing the laws of juſtice and honour, to withdraw herſelf from a confederacy which ſhe could no longer ſupport, and treat for peace on her own bottom, then was ſhe not an aſſociate, but a ſlave to the alliance. In fine, after a great diſplay of rhetoric, for and againſt the plan of a peace, the majority agreed to an addreſs, in which they thanked the queen for her extraordinary condeſcenſion in communicating the conditions to her parliament, and expreſſed an entire ſatisfaction in her conduct.

On the twenty-firſt of June, the queen thought fit to put an end to the ſeſſion by prorogation, after having made a ſhort ſpeech to both houſes, in which ſhe expreſſed her ſatisfaction at the addreſſes and ſupplies ſhe had received; obſerved, that ſhould the treaty be broke off, many miſchiefs would enſue; their burdens would be continued, if not encreaſed; Britain would loſe the preſent opportunity of improving her own commerce, and eſtabliſhing a real balance of power in Europe; and, though ſome of the allies might be gainers by a continuance of the war, the reſt would ſuffer in the common calamity *."

In the mean time the duke of Ormond, purſuant to the directions he had received from court, declared to prince Eugene, that if he purpoſed to carry on the ſiege of Queſnoy, he could no longer continue to co-operate therein, as he ſhould, within three days, publiſh a ſuſpenſion of arms between his army and that of the French; and ſhould ſend off a detachment to take poſſeſſion of Dunkirk, which place the king of France had offered to put into the hands of the Engliſh, as a ſecurity for the performance of his promiſes; and that he himſelf muſt march off with the reſt of his army in three days: and propoſed that the ſuſpenſion of arms ſhould be generally publiſhed by the whole confederate army. Prince Eugene, and the deputies of the States, deſiring ſome time to write about this to their reſpective ſovereigns, the duke of Ormond ſuſpended the march of his troops ſome days beyond which he had limited, to give time to the reſt of the allies to come into the ceſſation of arms ¶.

The biſhop of Briſtol executed his inſtructions at Utrecht with no leſs punctuality than the duke of Ormond had done in the army. A meeting of the miniſters being held, he communicated to the other plenipotentiaries the conceſſions which France would make to the allies; and propoſed a ceſſation of arms for two months, that they might confer in a friendly manner, and adjuſt the demands of all the confederates. To this propoſal they made no other anſwer, but that they had no inſtructions on this ſubject.

On the twenty-eighth of June, N. S. the duke of Ormond ſent his adjutant with a written order to the generals of the foreign troops in the Britiſh pay, to hold their forces in readineſs to march; but, to his grace's unſpeakable ſurprize, they all refuſed to obey his orders, except four ſquadrons and a battalion of the troops of Holſtein Gottorp, and a regiment of dragoons of the troops of Liege. This refuſal, on the part of the others, was owing to prince Eugene's having before tampered with them: and, indeed, it was not in the leaſt to be wondered at, that theſe mercenaries ſhould prefer their trade of war to any peace whatever. But to proceed: on the third of July, Queſnoy ſurrendered to the allies, the armies not being yet ſeparated, and the garriſon being made priſoners of war, were ſent home. The earl of Strafford, having returned to Holland after the prorogation of the parliament, propoſed a ceſſation of arms to the States-general, by whom it was rejected: then he repaired to the army of the duke of Ormond, where he arrived a few days after the ſurrender of Queſnoy. The duke of Ormond, on the ſixteenth of July, marched off with his forces towards Ghent and Bruges; while prince Eugene marched from his camp at Haſpre, and was followed by all the auxiliaries in the Britiſh pay, except thoſe already mentioned. The elector of Hanover himſelf, who was to ſucceed queen Anne on the throne of England, notwithſtanding her remonſtrances, continued his troops in the pay of the allies, which plainly ſhewed that he did not think the pretenſions of his family to the Britiſh crown depended upon the queen's will †.

Prince Eugene, though deprived of the aſſiſtance of the Engliſh, was ſtill ſuperior by twenty thouſand men to marſhal Villars, as likewiſe by his poſition, and by his numerous and well-furniſhed magazines; ſo that Villars could not prevent him from laying ſiege to Landrecy, from whence he detached ſeveral conſiderable bodies, who entered Champagne, ravaged the country, and advanced as far as the gates of Rheims. The alarm produced by this irruption reached as far as Paris; all France was ſeized with conſternation. The death of the king's only ſon, which fell out this year; the duke of Burgundy, the ducheſs his wife, and their eldeſt ſon, all carried to their graves the ſame day, and the only remaining child at the point of death; all theſe domeſtic misfortunes, added to thoſe from without, and the ſufferings of the people, made the cloſe of Lewis XIV.'s reign conſidered as a time pointed out for calamities. Preciſely at this period the duke of Vendôme died in Spain: the general diſpiritedneſs which ſeized the French nation upon this occaſion is hardly to be expreſſed; they placed no great dependence on the conferences at Utrecht, which might be all overthrown by the ſucceſſes of prince Eugene. Lewis therefore ſent notice to queen Anne, that notwithſtanding the allies refuſed to concur with Great Britain in a general ceſſation of arms; yet, to ſhew his ſincere intentions for peace, and the confidence he repoſed in her majeſty, he was ready to deliver up Dunkirk into her hands, not doubting of her endeavours to bring the allies into the plan of peace concerted between the crowns of France and Great Britain. Hereupon Sir John Leake, and brigadier Hall, with a body of troops, ſailed from the Downs on the ſeventh of July, and the ſame day came to an anchor before Dunkirk; and the next day, the troops being landed, the French marched out of the citadel, and all the other forts, of which the Engliſh took poſſeſſion, and placed guards at all the gates; after which the count d'Aumont, the French governor, delivered to brigadier Hill the keys of the town. Notice of this being ſent to the duke of Ormond, who with the Engliſh forces now lay in camp at Aveſne le Sec, in the road to Ghent, his grace proclaimed by ſound of trumpet a ceſſation of arms for two months between the French army and ours; and the ſame day marſhal Villars did the like in his camp ‡.

Some little time before the ſeparation of the confederate troops, the deputies of the States-general did not ſcruple to ſay publicly, that they hoped the duke of Ormond did not intend to march thro' any of their towns (would any one imagine that they meant the towns that had been conquered for them by the Engliſh arms? but ſo it was); and now, being farther exaſperated by the ceſſation of arms lately publiſhed, they ſent orders to the reſpective governors not to allow the earl of Strafford to enter Bouchaine, nor the Britiſh troops to paſs through Doway, though in the latter of theſe towns we had left a great quantity of ſtores, together with our principal hoſpital. The duke of Ormond hereupon, in order to reduce their High Mightineſſes to reaſon, bent his march immediately for the city of Ghent, where part of his artillery and ſtores were laid up. Prince Eugene, and the deputies, ſenſible that his grace would ſoon have it in his power to revenge the affront that had been put upon the Engliſh, diſpatched count Naſſau Woodenburgh to excuſe the inſolent behaviour of the commandants of Bouchain and Doway, pretending that what had been done was without their authority or privity. The duke, however, continued his march, and, with the earl of Strafford, arrived at Ghent the twenty-third of July; which place, together with Bruges, he took poſſeſſion of for the queen of England, and then detached ſix battalions to reinforce the garriſon of Dunkirk, with a train of artillery and ammunition.

It was not long before the confederates felt the fatal effects of ſeparating themſelves from the Britiſh troops, and refuſing to come into the queen's meaſures. Prince Eugene had formed the ſiege of Landrecy, without having conſulted the duke of Ormond; however, he continued to puſh the ſiege with vigour: but he committed ſome eſſential faults, which ended in his diſgrace; for his lines were too much extended, and his magazines at Marchiennes were at too great a diſtance; ſo that the earl of Albemarle, who was poſted at Denain on the Scheld, to ſecure the communication with Marchiennes and the prince's camp, was not within reach of the latter's aſſiſting him ſoon enough in caſe he was attacked. Marſhal Villars ſaw this error, and like a ſkilful general made a proper advantage of it; he put a deceit upon prince Eugene. A body of dragoons was ordered to advance in ſight of Landrecy, as if going to attempt the relief of that place: in the mean time the marſhal himſelf marched towards Denain, with his army drawn up in five columns, forced the earl of Albemarle's entrenchments, defended by thirteen battalions, and thirty ſquadrons, who were all killed or made priſoners. The general himſelf ſurrendered priſoner of war, with five princes of the houſe of Naſſau, the prince of Holſtein Gottorp, the prince of Anhalt, and all the officers of the detachment; and the French found in the camp twelve braſs cannon, great quantities of horſes, and a very conſiderable booty. Prince Eugene, on the firſt news of this attack, marched in haſte to the aſſiſtance of the earl, but did not come up till the action was over; and in endeavouring to get poſſeſſion of a bridge that led to Denain, he loſt a number of his men, and was obliged to return to his camp, after having been witneſs of a defeat which was big with fatal conſequences to the intereſt of his maſter. This action happened on the twenty-fourth of July, 1712.

Landrecy, which ſtill continued inveſted, had not ammunition for holding out a week longer, while the army of the beſiegers were provided for twice that length of time; notwithſtanding which, prince Eugene thought proper to abandon the ſiege with precipitation, while marſhal Villars carried all the poſts belonging to the confederates upon the Scarpe, as far as Marchiennes, one after another, with the utmoſt rapidity. He then puſhed for Marchiennes itſelf, which was defended by four thouſand men: the French carried on the ſiege with the greateſt vigour, and in three days time the garriſon were made priſoners of war. All the ammunition and proviſion that the confederates had laid up for the whole campaign, fell into the hands of the enemy. The ſuperiority was now wholly on the ſide of Villars; the confederates in deſpair retreated every where before thoſe very troops whom they had ſo lately held in contempt; and ſoon afterwards ſaw Douay, Queſnoy, and Bouchain, retaken by the French. Lewis XIV. now beheld his frontiers in ſafety. Prince Eugene drew off his army, after having loſt near fifty battalions, forty of whom were made priſoners between the fight of Denain and the end of the campaign. All the compenſation they obtained for this great loſs, was the conqueſt of Fort Knocque, which was ſurpriſed by de Rue, a famous partiſan in the allied army. About the end of October, both ſides put their troops into winter quarters *.

While theſe military tranſactions were going on, the Britiſh miniſters at Utrecht continued to preſs the Dutch and other allies to join in the ſuſpenſion of arms; but they declared their reſolution to continue the war with the utmoſt vigour. It was then propoſed to admit the plenipotentiaries of king Philip to the congreſs; but this the other miniſters would not hearken to. Upon which the queen, and her miniſtry, finding that the allies were determined to purſue their own meaſures, thought ſhe had equal right to do the ſame; and in the beginning of Auguſt, ſecretary St. John (now created viſcount Bolingbroke) was diſpatched to the court of Verſailles, to put a finiſhing hand to the treaty between France and Great Britain. He was received at the French court with the moſt diſtinguiſhed marks of reſpect; and having adjuſted, with the marquis de Torcy, the principal intereſts of the duke of Savoy, and the elector of Bavaria, he fixed the time and manner of the renunciations that were to be made, and conſented to a renewal of the ſuſpenſion of arms between the crowns of France and England, for four months longer, viz. from the twenty-ſecond of Auguſt to the twenty-ſecond of December. His lordſhip then returned to England, leaving behind him Mr. Prior, in the character of reſident at the French court †.

The Britiſh miniſters at Utrecht had inſiſted that Philip V. now ſettled on the throne of Spain, ſhould renounce his right to the crown of France, which he had hitherto conſtantly maintained, and that the duke of Berry, his brother, preſumptive heir to that crown, after the only remaining great-grandſon of Lewis XIV. then at the point of death, ſhould likewiſe renounce all pretenſions to the crown of Spain, in caſe he ſhould come to be king of France. They likewiſe exacted the ſame of the duke of Orleans. Theſe conditions being all accepted by the ſeveral parties concerned, lord Lexington was ſent from England to Madrid, in the month of September, to be preſent at the renunciation of king Philip, which was drawn up in form, and ſigned by that monarch on the fifth of November, N. S. the cortes or ſtates of Spain being aſſembled on that occaſion, to add greater force to it. Philip in that aſſembly formally renounced all pretenſions which he or his deſcendants might have to the crown of France, and deſired the concurrence of the ſtates therein ‡.

In Catalonia there was little action this year. On the eighth of September brigadier Pierce, who commanded the Britiſh troops there, notified to count Staremberg, that a ceſſation of arms having been agreed upon between England and France, he ſhould ſeparate from the army with his troops. Accordingly he marched to Sitias, on the coaſt between Barcelona and Terragona; and ſoon after the Germans as well as the Spaniards went into winter-quarters.

The Portugueſe had hitherto continued obſtinately to refuſe their concurrence with the pacific meaſures going forward; but at length, conſulting their own intereſt, they thought fit to come into the ceſſation of arms; and a treaty to that effect was ſigned between their miniſters and thoſe of France at Utrecht, on the ſeventh of November, which put an end to the war on that ſide. Much about the ſame time the duke of Argyll was ſent from England to take poſſeſſion of Port Mahon, and the iſland of Minorca, for her Britannic majeſty, which he accordingly did. The campaign in Flanders being over, the duke of Ormond returned to England, and on the fourth of November was graciouſly received by her majeſty.

On the fifteenth of November, a duel was fought between his grace the duke of Hamilton and the lord Mohun, principals, and colonel Hamilton and colonel Macartney, their ſeconds. The two principals died upon the ſpot; Macartney diſappeared, and found means to eſcape in diſguiſe to the continent; colonel Hamilton ſurrendered himſelf to a committee of the council, and made a depoſition, in which he charged Macartney with having ſtabbed the duke of Hamilton, after he had fallen by the ſword of his antagoniſt, and lay wounded on the ground. Hereupon a reward of five hundred pounds was offered by the government for apprehending Macartney, to which the ducheſs of Hamilton added a promiſe of three hundred pounds. The falſeneſs of this report, however, appeared ſufficiently in the ſequel: Macartney ſubmitted to a fair trial, and, upon the cleareſt evidence, was acquitted of the crime laid to his charge; and colonel Hamilton incurred ſuch diſgrace by his behaviour, that he was obliged to ſell his company in the guards. As this had been a party-duel, ſeveral ſevere reflections were thrown out againſt the duke of Marlborough, who was ſaid to have taken all opportunities of fomenting the animoſities between the two factions; upon which account, as alſo ſeeing that his enemies became every day more powerful, his grace thought fit to retire to the continent, whither he was followed by his ducheſs; and they took up their reſidence at Aix la Chapelle, and returned no more to England till the day the queen died. His friend Godolphin, the late treaſurer, had died in September, with the character of an upright and honeſt ſtateſman. This year was alſo diſtinguiſhed by the death of Richard Cromwell, once lord protector, and ſon of the great Oliver, in an advanced age.

The Britiſh miniſtry conſidering themſelves as anſwerable to their country, and to all Europe, for their actions at this critical conjuncture, neglected nothing that concerned the intereſt of England and its allies, and the ſafety of the public weal. In the month of November, a new plan of peace was tranſmitted to the earl of Strafford in Holland, who preſented it to the States-general, for their approbation. In this new plan the queen promiſed to procure to the States-general the city of Tournay, and ſome other places, which they could not expect to poſſeſs, ſhould ſhe conclude a ſeparate treaty. Their High Mightineſſes having conſidered the new plan propoſed, and ſenſible of the circumſtances they had reduced themſelves to, by haughtily contemning all former propoſitions made them by her majeſty, determined at length to reconcile themſelves to her; and on the twenty-ninth of December, N. S. wrote a very ſubmiſſive letter to her majeſty, wherein they told her, "They thought themſelves obliged to return her majeſty thanks for the overtures ſhe cauſed the earl of Strafford to lay before them, and for the aſſurances, no leſs obliging than ſtrong, ſhe had added to them both of her majeſty's deſire to procure a good peace for all Europe, and to provide for the ſafety, and even augmentation of their ſtate: and declared, they were reſolved to join with her majeſty in the meaſures ſhe had taken, and to conclude and ſign the peace at the ſame time jointly with her; alſo to enter into a new treaty with her majeſty, about the ſucceſſion and barrier, and to conclude and ſign it before the peace."

For the better underſtanding the latter part of this letter, it will be neceſſary to inform the reader, that when the earl of Strafford preſented the new plan of peace, he at the ſame time told the States-general, that he had alſo brought with him a plan of a new treaty of ſucceſſion and barrier, and muſt inſiſt that this treaty might be ſigned before the peace; for in the preſent treaty of barrier, made in 1709, many things were inſerted diſadvantageous to Great Britain, and which could not be reconciled either to the letter or ſpirit of the grand alliance.

The ceſſation of arms being near expiring, it was again continued for four months longer, viz. from the twenty-ſecond of December to the twenty-ſecond of April, N. S.

On the fifth of December, the marquis de Monteleone, whom king Philip appointed to be one of his plenipotentiaries at Utrecht, arrived at London, in his way thither, when he had an audience of her majeſty, to whom he addreſſed the following ſhort compliment (which was moſt graciouſly received by her majeſty):

"Madam,

"The Catholic king, my maſter, hath ſent me to give your majeſty a thouſand thanks for the great pains you have been pleaſed to take to procure peace to Europe; the whole Spaniſh nation in particular, owe their lives to your majeſty; for had the war continued, there is not one faithful Spaniard who would not have ſpent the laſt drop of blood in my maſter's quarrel.

Her majeſty having named the duke of Shrewſbury, lord chamberlain of her houſhold, to be her ambaſſador to the court of France, in the room of the duke of Hamilton, deceaſed, his grace ſet out for that kingdom on the fourteenth of December; and before the end of the month the duke d'Aumont arrived at London, as ambaſſador from the French king.

The queen, extremely well pleaſed with the compliment the Dutch had made her, and their promiſe of coming into her meaſures, ſent a letter to the States, expreſſing her ſatisfaction on that head: and the Dutch having received advice that the Turks threatened to revive the troubles in Hungary, in which caſe they knew the emperor would recall great part of his troops from the Netherlands, and leave the burthen of the war upon their ſhoulders, they reſolved to come into the new treaty of barrier and ſucceſſion propoſed by queen Anne, which was accordingly ſigned on the nineteenth of January, 1713, and ſent over to England to be ratified. By this treaty, to which the Dutch were indebted for a mighty acceſſion of territory, and a very great increaſe of power, "the States engage to aſſiſt and defend the ſucceſſion of the crown of Great Britain, according to the act of ſettlement, againſt all oppoſers; and her majeſty ſtipulated and agreed, that the States ſhould garriſon Furnes, Fort Knocque, Ypres, Menin, the town and citadel of Tournay, Mons, Charleroy, the town and caſtle of Namur, the caſtle of Ghent, the forts La Perle, Philip, and Damme; and fort Rodenhugſen by Ghent ſhould be demoliſhed, and that the revenues of thoſe towns which had been taken from France (over and above what was neceſſary for the ſupport of the civil government, ſhould belong to the States, for the maintenance of their garriſons: that a million of florins yearly, or an hundred thouſand crowns every three months, ſhould be paid alſo to the States, out of the cleareſt and moſt certain revenues of the Spaniſh Low Countries, which the late king Charles was in poſſeſſion of at the time of his death, towards the expence of the other garriſons.

" That the Engliſh and Dutch ſhall be upon the ſame foot in point of trade in the Netherlands.

" That England ſhall aſſiſt the Dutch with ten thouſand men, and twenty men of war, in caſe they ſhould be attacked: and the States ſhall aſſiſt the Engliſh with ſix thouſand men and twenty men of war; and if this ſhould not be ſufficient, they ſhall aſſiſt each other with their whole forces."

The coming in of the Dutch to the meaſures of the Britiſh court ſeems to have had a conſiderable influence upon the other powers; even the emperor's plenipotentiaries ſeemed to talk in more moderate terms. Count Zinzendorf declared, that his maſter was well diſpoſed to promote a general peace, and no longer inſiſted on a ceſſion of the Spaniſh monarchy to the houſe of Auſtria; he alſo conſented to evacuate Catalonia, and accept of a neutrality for Italy, under the guaranty of her Britannic majeſty. Philip's miniſters, together with thoſe of Bavaria and Cologne, were admitted to the congreſs, and now the plenipotentiaries of Great Britain acted as mediators for the reſt of the allies. On the firſt of March the inſtruments relating to Catalonia and Italy were executed; and on the fourth of the ſame month the dukes of Berry and Orleans renounced their right to the crown of Spain in the parliament of Paris, to which renunciation the duke of Shrewſbury and Mr. Prior, her Britannic majeſty's miniſters, and the duke d'Oſſuna, miniſter from the court of Spain, were witneſſes. Theſe preliminaries being thus ſettled, the great work of peace advanced more briſkly, and by the end of the month was brought to its concluſion *.

On the firſt of April, O. S. the famous treaty of Utrecht was ſigned, as ſome would have it believed in a clandeſtine manner: the fact, however, ſtood thus. The Britiſh miniſters having the day before preſented a memorial to the plenipotentiaries of France, in behalf of the French proteſtants, they went to count Zinzendorf, the Imperial miniſter, to communicate to him the plan of peace they had agreed on with France for the emperor and empire, which his Imperial majeſty was to have time to conſider of till the firſt of June, and declared again they were going to ſign the peace between Great Britain and France; and they afterwards made the like declaration to the miniſters of the reſt of the allies, but without notifying the preciſe time, to prevent diſputes and proteſts, which might have furniſhed matter for factious and dangerous diſputes at home: with the ſame view it was reſolved to ſign the treaty privately, at the houſe of the biſhop of Briſtol, lord privy-ſeal, which was accordingly done, under pretence of a conference, which being a thing frequent during that congreſs, rendered the matter the leſs ſuſpected. The earl of Strafford and the biſhop of Briſtol ſigned firſt, then the miniſters of the duke of Savoy (declared king of Sicily by that treaty), thoſe of the king of Portugal after them, then the plenipotentiaries of the king of Pruſſia, and thoſe of the States-general laſt of all: the whole was over about two in the morning, occaſioned by the length of the treaties that were to be read before they were ſigned; and when the buſineſs was over, the reſpective miniſters withdrew to their own places, and expreſſes were diſpatched by them to notify this tranſaction to their reſpective courts †.

Peace being thus happily concluded between France and all the allies, except the emperor and empire, I ſhall here give an abſtract of the moſt material articles in the ſeveral treaties, paſſing over matters of mere form, and ſuch other particulars as have no relation to Great Britain.

By this treaty the French king acknowleged the proteſtant ſucceſſion of the houſe of Hanover to the crown of Great Britain, and engaged, for himſelf and his heirs and ſucceſſors, not to ſuffer the pretender to return into France, nor any way to ſuccour or aſſiſt him.

" That the crowns of France and Spain ſhould never be united under one head, and renunciations made on both ſides in due form; and that they ſhould never be united under any pretence whatſoever.

" That the trade between France and Spain ſhall be on the ſame foot as in Charles II's time.

" That the fortifications of Dunkirk ſhould be demoliſhed, and the harbour filled up, never to be repaired. That the queen and kingdom ſhould be fully reſtored to the Bay and Straights of Hudſon, and ſatisfaction made to that company for damages ſuſtained.

" That the whole Iſland of St. Chriſtopher be only hereafter poſſeſſed by the Engliſh, and alſo Nova Scotia or Acadia, with the port now called Annapolis Royal.

" That the Iſland of Newfoundland ſhould belong of right wholly to Great Britain; the French to have only huts to dry their fiſh, and liberty to fiſh only from Cape Bonaviſta to the northern point of that iſland, and ſo down to the weſtern ſide as far as port Riche; only they were to retain Cape Breton and the other iſlands in the mouth of the river St. Lawrence.

" The French in Canada not to moleſt the Five Nations of the Indians ſubject to Great Britain; and we to do the ſame by them.

" All letters of reprizal, marque, and countermarque, to be annulled.

" That juſtice ſhould be done to the Hamilton family concerning the duchy of Chatelrault; to the duke of Richmond, concerning ſuch requeſts as he had to make in France; and to Charles Douglas, concerning certain lands to be reclaimed by him.

As for the allies, Portugal and Savoy were ſatisfied; the latter had the iſland of Sicily given him, with the title of king, and on the continent the towns of Feneſtrelles and Exilles, with the valley of Pragelas; ſo that they took from the houſe of Bourbon to aggrandize him. The title of King was allotted to the elector of Bavaria, together with the iſland of Sardinia, as an indemnification for his loſſes. The Dutch had a conſiderable barrier given them, which they had always been aiming at: and if the houſe of Bourbon was deſpoiled of ſome territories, in favour of the duke of Savoy, the houſe of Auſtria was on the other hand ſtripped to ſatisfy the Dutch, who were become, at its expence, the guarantees and maſters of the ſtrongeſt cities in Flanders. Due regard was paid to the intereſt of the Duch with reſpect to trade; and there was an article ſtipulated alſo in favour of Portugal. The ſovereignty of the ten provinces of the Netherlands was reſerved for the emperor, together with the advantageous lordſhip of the barrier-towns: they likewiſe guarantied to him the kingdom of Naples and Sicily, with all his poſſeſſions in Lombardy, and the four ports on the coaſt of Tuſcany. But the court of Vienna would not ſubſcribe to thoſe conditions, as thereby the emperor had not ſufficient juſtice done him; and the Imperial miniſters gave out, that they would ſtill carry on the war, and hazard all rather than ſubmit to ſuch uſage. The king of Pruſſia had Upper Gueldres, in lieu of Orange and the other eſtates belonging to his family in Franche Compte. For France, who demoliſhed Dunkirk, and gave up ſo many places in Flanders that her arms had formerly conquered, and that had been ſecured to her by the treaties of Nimeguen and Ryſwick, ſhe got back Liſle, Aire, Bethune, and St. Venant. Thus did the Engliſh miniſtry, to all appearance, do juſtice to every one; but this was denied them by the Whigs, who reviled the memory of queen Anne for having done the greateſt good that a ſovereign could poſſibly do, in giving peace to ſo many nations. Every unprejudiced perſon, however, attributed their clamours to the true ſource from whence they ſprung, madneſs and reſentment at being excluded from the management of public affairs, and not from any principle of real patriotiſm or love for their country. We muſt not forget to take notice of one glorious act of her's in this treaty of peace; I mean her having engaged Lewis XIV. to conſent to ſet at liberty a great number of his proteſtant ſubjects, who were confined in priſon and in the gallies on account of their religion: this was dictating laws, but laws of a very reſpectable nature.

At the ſame time with the treaty of peace the Engliſh plenipotentiaries concluded another of navigation and commerce with France, by which a free trade was eſtabliſhed, according to the tariff of 1664, except in ſome commodities that were ſubjected to new regulations in the year 1699. It was agreed, that no other duties ſhould be impoſed on the productions of France, imported into England, than thoſe that were laid on the ſame commodities from other countries; and that commiſſaries ſhould meet at London to adjuſt all matters relating to commerce. As for the tariff with Spain, it was not yet finiſhed. This treaty might not, perhaps, be ſo advantageous to Great Britain, in point of commerce, as might have been eſtabliſhed; but to ſay that the treaty of Utrecht did nothing, and that all our expences, and all our victories, in this long war, were abſolutely thrown away, is paying no regard to truth: but that a better treaty might have been made, I ſhall not take upon me to diſpute.

The parliament, after many prorogations, was at length permitted to ſit on the ninth of April, 1713, when the queen, in her ſpeech, acquainted the two houſes, that the treaty of peace was ſigned, and that in a few days the ratifications would be exchanged: ſhe hoped, ſhe ſaid, that what ſhe had done for the proteſtant ſucceſſion, and the perfect friendſhip that ſubſiſted between her and the houſe of Hanover, might convince ſuch who wiſhed well to both, and had the quiet and ſafety of their country at heart, how vain all attempts were to divide them. Addreſſing herſelf to the commons in particular, ſhe ſaid, ſhe left it entirely to them to determine what force might be neceſſary for the ſecurity of trade by ſea, and for guards and garriſons: "Make yourſelves eaſy (continued this excellent princeſs), and I ſhall be ſatisfied: next to the protection of divine Providence, I depend upon the loyalty and affection of my people: I want no other guaranty." She then recommended to their care thoſe brave men who had ſerved well by ſea and land, during the war, and could not be employed in time of peace. Then, directing herſelf to both houſes, ſhe ſaid, ſhe hoped they would concert proper meaſures for eaſing the foreign trade of the kingdom; for improving and encouraging manufactures and the fiſhery; for employing the hands of idle people; for ſuppreſſing the ſcandalous and ſeditious libels that were every day publiſhed; and for putting a ſtop to the impious practice of duelling: concluding with this pathetic exhortation: "Now we are entering upon peace abroad, let me conjure ye all to uſe your utmoſt endeavours for calming mens minds at home, that the arts of peace may be cultivated. Let no groundleſs jealouſies, contrived by a faction, and fomented by party-rage, effect that which our enemies could not. I pray God to direct all your conſultations for his glory, and the welfare of my people."

Addreſſes of thanks and congratulation were immediately preſented by both houſes of parliament, and their example was followed by the houſes of convocation, and all the principal corporations in the kingdom. The ratifications of the treaty being exchanged, the peace was proclaimed on the fifth day of May, the very day the war had been declared, eleven years before. It was about this period that the chevalier de St. George cauſed a printed remonſtrance to be conveyed, under covers, to the ſeveral miniſters at the congreſs, proteſting againſt whatever might be tranſacted there to his prejudice.

Mean while, in purſuance of the convention for evacuating Catalonia, ſir John Jennings was commanded to carry the empreſs (conſort of the late Charles III. of Spain, now the emperor Charles VI.) from Barcelona to Italy; and accordingly he ſet ſail with her Imperial majeſty from Barcelona, and landed her ſafely at Genoa, from whence ſhe afterwards proceeded to Milan, whither admiral Jennings followed her; and having had ſeveral conferences with the miniſters there, about the tranſportation of the German troops from Catalonia, he afterwards proceeded to the court of Turin, to confer with the duke of Savoy concerning his taking poſſeſſion of the kingdom of Sicily, in which ſervice the Britiſh fleet was to be employed *.

The commons having preſented an addreſs, entreating her majeſty to communicate to the houſe, in due time, the treaties of peace and commerce with France, her majeſty on the ninth of May, ſent a meſſage to them, which, by ſeveral, was cenſured as rather too authoritative, though in itſelf true, viz. "That as it was the undeniable prerogative of the crown to make peace or war, ſhe had ratified the treaties of peace and commerce with France, which had been ſigned by her orders; and had concluded a treaty with Spain, which would be ſigned as ſoon as the Spaniſh miniſters were arrived: that ſhe determined from the firſt, on this extraordinary occaſion to commnnicate theſe treaties to her parliament, and had therefore now ordered them to be laid before the houſe." This meſſage was delivered to the houſe by Mr. Benſon, chancellor of the Exchequer, who at the ſame time preſented to the houſe the copies of the treaties of peace and commerce made at Utrecht, with tranſlations of the ſame *.

The treaties being read, a day was appointed to conſider of the treaty of commerce; when it appeared that the miniſtry had not paid all the attention to the commercial intereſts of the kingdom which might have been expected from men of their talents and abilities. By the VIIIth and IXth articles, for inſtance, it was agreed that Great Britain and France ſhould mutually enjoy all the privileges in trading with each other, that either granted to the moſt favoured nation: and that no higher cuſtoms ſhould be exacted on the commodities of France than what were drawn from the ſame productions of any other people. After a violent diſpute, in which ſome inſiſted upon the advantages which would accrue to the nation by a free trade with France, and others as ſtiffly upon the prejudices of it, it was reſolved, however, by a great majority, that a bill ſhould be brought in, to render this treaty more effectual. The Portugueſe miniſter, alarmed at this reſolution, preſented a memorial, declaring, that ſhould the duties on French wines be reduced to a level with thoſe that were laid on the wines of Portugal, his maſter would prohibit the importation of the woollen manufactures and other commodities of Great Britain. The whole trading part of the nation exclaimed alſo againſt this treaty, which was univerſally allowed by all, who underſtood the ſubject, to be a wretched piece of politics, inaſmuch as the ſaid VIIIth and IXth articles did in general terms put France on an equal footing with Portugal, or any of our beſt allies, in point of commerce: but the IXth article ſtruck more directly at the very root of our Portugal trade, ſince by introducing the tariff of 1664, the wines and brandies of France would be poured in upon us in lieu of thoſe of Portugal, which latter country took off great quantities of our woollen cloth, iron, and other manufactures, and ſent us in return a large yearly balance of money in our favour, over and above all the wines, oil, and fruits, which we took from them.

In fine, the clamour againſt this treaty grew ſo loud, that it was no longer to be ſlighted; and although a great majority of the houſe of commons was, in other reſpects, cloſely attached to the miniſtry, the bill for agreeing to the purport of the ſaid two articles was rejected by a majority of nine voices, after the moſt eminent merchants had been heard at the bar of that houſe, to the great joy of the whole trading part of the nation, and indeed of all other impartial people. Thus the commerce between us and France has ever ſince remained in a kind of a ſtate of prohibition on both ſides, eſpecially with reſpect to the principal points.

Bad as our miniſtry managed at this time with reſpect to commerce, we ought, however, to do them the juſtice to acknowlege their circumſpection in regard to our then treaty with king Philip of Spain, which was ſigned at Utrecht, on the twenty-ſecond of July, O. S. by the biſhop of Briſtol, the lord privy ſeal, and the earl of Strafford, her majeſty's plenipotentiaries, and the duke d'Oſſuna and the marquis de Monteleone, plenipotentiaries from his catholic majeſty. As a proor of this, I ſhall here give an abſtract of *what is material in that treaty. By this agreement, the kingdoms of France and Spain were ſeparated for ever; Philip acknowleged the proteſtant ſucceſſion, and renounced the pretender. By the Xth article, "The full and entire property of the town and caſtle of Gibraltar, with all things thereto belonging, are given up to the crown of Great Britain in property, to be held and enjoyed abſolutely with all manner of right for ever, without any impediment or exception whatſoever." By the IXth article, "His catholic majeſty doth in like manner, for himſelf, his heirs, and ſucceſſors, yield to the crown of England the whole iſland of Minorca, transferring to the ſaid crown for ever all right and moſt abſolute dominion over the ſaid iſland, and in particular over the town, caſtle, and fortifications of Port Mahon; all that Spain reſerved to itſelf being no more than the right of pre-emption, in caſe the crown of Great Britain ſhall at any time think fit to alienate or diſpoſe of the ſaid fortreſs of Gibraltar or iſland of Minorca." The XIIth article grants "to her Britannic majeſty, and to the company of her ſubjects appointed for that purpoſe [i. e. the South Sea company] (as well the ſubjects of Spain as all others being excluded), the contracts for introducing of negroes into ſeveral parts of the dominions of his Catholic majeſty in America (commonly called el Pacto del Aſſiento de Negros), at the rate of four thouſand eight hundred negroes yearly, for the ſpace of thirty years ſucceſſively, beginning from the firſt of May, 1713, on the ſame conditions on which the French company had formerly enjoyed it."

As it has been peremptorily aſſerted, that queen Anne, after having drawn the Catalans into a war, in ſupport of the intereſt of Charles III. did, by this treaty with king Philip, leave them wholly at the mercy of their enraged ſovereign, without ſtipulating any thing in their behalf; therefore, once for all, to confute this groundleſs and impudent calumny, I ſhall here recite verbatim the XIIIth article of this treaty of peace between her Britannic majeſty and king Philip, viz.

"Whereas the queen of Great Britain has continually preſſed, and inſiſted with the greateſt earneſtneſs, that all the inhabitants of the principality of Catalonia, of whatſoever ſtate or condition they may be, ſhould not only obtain a full and perpetual oblivion of all that was done in the late war, and enjoy the entire poſſeſſion of all their eſtates and honours, but ſhould alſo have their ancient privileges preſerved ſafe and untouched; the Catholic king, in compliance with the ſaid queen of Great Britain, hereby grants and confirms to all the inhabitants of Catalonia whatſoever not only the amneſty deſired, together with the full poſſeſſion of all their eſtates and honours, but alſo gives and grants to them all the privileges which the inhabitants of both Caſtilles, who, of all the Spaniards, are moſt dear to the Catholic king, have and enjoy, or hereafter may have and enjoy."

The Scots, during this ſeſſion of parliament, ſhewed themſelves very uneaſy, and particularly on account of the duty upon malt, which, after the peace, was to extend to that kingdom. Their nobility and gentry had ſeveral conſultations in London upon this affair, during the adjournment of parliament on account of the Whitſun holidays, when the duke of Argyll, the earl of Mar, Mr. Lockhart of Carnwath, and Mr. Cockburn of Ormiſtoun, were deputed to lay their grievances before the queen. A remonſtrance was accordingly drawn up, and preſented to her majeſty, importing, that their countrymen, with great impatience, bore the violation of ſome of the articles of Union, and that the laying ſuch an inſupportable burthen as the malt-tax upon them, was like to raiſe their diſcontent to ſuch an height as to prompt them to declare the Union diſſolved. Her majeſty anſwered this addreſs by ſaying, that this was a precipitate reſolution, and ſhe wiſhed they might not have reaſon to repent it; but, however, ſhe would endeavour to make all things eaſy.

The Scots, not content with this anſwer, reſolved to lay their grievances before the houſe of lords; and accordingly, on the twenty-eighth of May, the earl of Finlater (one of the ſixteen peers for Scotland) made a motion in the houſe of peers, that ſome day might be appointed to conſider of the ſtate of the nation; and the firſt of June being fixed upon, he then made a repreſentation of the grievances of the Scots, which he reduced to theſe four heads, viz. "I. That they were deprived of a privy-council. II. That the laws of England, in caſes of high-treaſon, were extended to Scotland. III. That the Scots were made incapable of being peers of Great Britain, as was adjudged in the caſe of the duke of Hamilton. And IV. That the Scots were hardly dealt with in being ſubject to the malt-tax, in time of peace, when they had reaſon to expect to enjoy the benefits of peace; and it was the more inſupportable now, in that they had never borne it during the war."

He then concluded with ſaying, that ſince the Union between the two nations had not been attended with thoſe good effects that were expected and hoped from it, he therefore moved, that leave might be given to bring in a bill for diſſolving the ſaid Union, and ſecuring the proteſtant ſucceſſion in the houſe of Hanover, eſtabliſhing the queen's prerogative in both kingdoms, and preſerving an entire amity and good correſpondence between the two nations." Hereupon aroſe a very great and memorable debate; the Scots lords, and thoſe who had been moſt zealous in promoting the Union, now urging many arguments for the diſſolution of it. Upon the whole, the court lords were all againſt diſſolving the Union, arguing, that the very moving of ſuch a thing was of very ill conſequence, and therefore deſired ſuch an effectual ſtop might be put to it, that no one ſhould ever offer the like again; and ſo the matter ended *.

There was another affair which gave the queen no leſs uneaſineſs than the buſineſs of Scotland: it ſeems, great part of the revenue, which uſed to be applied to the civil liſt, having been by a former parliament appropriated to other uſes, her majeſty found herſelf under very great difficulties in paying her ſervants, and ſome other private demands; and this was more grievous to that princeſs, having been always remarkable for her œconomy, and regular and punctual payments; whereupon ſhe ſent a meſſage to the commons, in conſequence of which that houſe reſolved, that the ſum of five hundred thouſand pounds ſhould be raiſed on the civil liſt revenue. About this time advice being received that the chevalier St. George had for ſome time taken up his reſidence in Lorrain, the two houſes of parliament ſeverally addreſſed her majeſty, that ſhe would uſe the moſt preſſing inſtances with the duke of Lorrain, and with all the princes and ſtates in amity with her majeſty, that they would not receive or ſuffer the pretender to her crowns to continue in any of their dominions; which ſhe promiſed them ſhe would do.

Some little time before, the commons had addreſſed the queen to let them know what equivalent ſhould be given for the demolition of Dunkirk; and ſhe gave them to underſtand, that this was already in the hands of his moſt Chriſtian majeſty: what it was, however, ſhe did not think proper to explain, ſo that the commons were left as much in the dark as ever. They afterwards beſought her majeſty, that ſhe would not evacuate the towns in Flanders, which were in her poſſeſſion, until thoſe who were entitled to the ſovereignty of the Spaniſh Netherlands, ſhould agree to ſuch articles for regulating trade, as might place the ſubjects of Great Britain upon an equal footing with thoſe of other nations: to which her majeſty returned a favourable anſwer †.

On the ſixteenth of July her majeſty came to the houſe of peers, and having given the royal aſſent to ſeveral bills, cloſed the ſeſſion with a ſpeech to both houſes, which was not at all agreeable to the violent Whigs, becauſe it did not contain a word about the pretender and the proteſtant ſucceſſion, from whence they inferred that ſhe was biaſſed in favour of the chevalier de St. George. The lord-chancellor, by her majeſty's command, prorogued the parliament to the twenty-eighth of Auguſt, but it never ſat more; for on the eighth of Auguſt a proclamation was iſſued for diſſolving the preſent parliament, and declaring her majeſty's intention of calling a new one. Accordingly, on the eighteenth of the ſame month, writs were iſſued in due form, and the new parliament appointed to meet on the twelfth of November.

This ſummer the magiſtracy of Dunkirk ſent a deputation with an addreſs to the queen, humbly imploring her majeſty to ſpare the port and harbour of that town, and repreſenting that they might be uſeful to her own ſubjects. To this addreſs lord Bolingbroke, by her majeſty's order, returned this anſwer; "That the queen had read, with attention, the addreſſes he had preſented to her in the name of the magiſtrates of the town of Dunkirk, and ſhe had commanded him to tell them, that ſhe beheld with ſorrow the damages which the inhabitants of that town would ſuſtain by the demoliſhing of its ramparts and harbour; but that ſhe did not think it convenient to make any alteration in a thing agreed on and determined by a treaty." Hereupon monſ. Fugghe, the principal deputy, preſented a ſecond addreſs or memorial to her majeſty on the ſame ſubject, which he cauſed to be printed and publiſhed. The arguments it contained were anſwered and refuted by Addiſon, Steele, and Mainwaring. Commiſſioners were ſent to ſee the fortifications of Dunkirk entirely demoliſhed. They were accordingly razed to the ground, and the harbour was filled up. On the other hand, the queen, by her inſtances at the court of Verſailles, had procured the enlargement of one hundred and thirty-ſix proteſtants from the gallies; but hearing that one hundred and eighty-five more were detained on the ſame account (that of religion), ſhe made ſuch application to the French miniſtry, that they too were releaſed, and thus by her powerful influence reſtored to the greateſt of all human bleſſings, liberty, they proclaimed her majeſty's piety and goodneſs through the world.

On the twenty-fourth of Auguſt, the queen was ſeized with a violent ague-fit, which at firſt proved alarming; but her majeſty ſoon appeared abroad again, to the great joy of all her ſubjects.

I ſhall here take notice of ſome promotions that were made in the courſe of this year. In February, Dr. Offly was made biſhop of St. Davids, in the room of Dr. Bliſs, who was tranſlated to the ſee of Hereford; in April, the lord-keeper Harcourt was made lord-chancellor of Great Britain; on the eighth of June, ſir Thomas Powys took his place as one of the judges of the Queen's Bench; and ſir John Banniſter ſat the firſt time as baron of the Exchequer: and about the ſame time the Rev. Dr. Atterbury was made biſhop of Rocheſter and dean of Weſtminſter; Robert Benſon, eſq. chancellor of the Exchequer, was created baron Bingley; Dr. Robinſon, biſhop of Briſtol, late plenipotentiary at the congreſs of Utrecht, was tranſlated to the ſee of London; and the lord Willoughby of Brooke, was made dean of Windſor. Her majeſty was alſo pleaſed to beſtow ſome marks of her favour on the earl of Peterborough, by creating him knight of the Garter, in the room of the late duke Hamilton, and appointed him to go ambaſſador to the new king of Sicily.

After the peace there were nothing but quarrels and contentions among the miniſters: Bolingbroke was for undermining the treaſurer, as not enduring to be ſecond in the adminiſtration; and, the better to gratify his ambition, was for puſhing matters to extremity againſt the Whigs, and was even ſuſpected of deſigns againſt the proteſtant ſucceſſion. Bolingbroke found means to inſinuate himſelf into the confidence of lady Maſham, to whom the earl of Oxford had given ſome cauſe of diſguſt: by the intrigues of this favourite he daily gained ground in the good opinion of his ſovereign, while the treaſurer loſt in the ſame proportion. Bolingbroke had formed a ſcheme to put himſelf and chancellor Harcourt at the head of the High-church party, and had oppoſed the duke of Shrewſbury's being ſent over to France. The lord-treaſurer, however, brought his own ſcheme to bear, which was, "That the duke of Ormond ſhould ſtay in England to attend the army-affairs, which was neceſſary at the time of diſbanding; that the duke of Shrewſbury ſhould go to Ireland as lord-lieutenant, upon his return from France; that the earl of Finlater ſhould be chancellor of Scotland; the earl of Mar, third ſecretary of ſtate; the lord Dartmouth, privy-ſeal; Mr. Speaker Bromley, ſecretary of ſtate; and ſir William Wyndham, chancellor of the Exchequer, in the room of Robert Benſon, eſq. lately created lord Bingley, and named ambaſſador extraordinary to the court of Madrid. This new ſcheme perfectly defeated that of lord Bolingbroke and his friends, which threw them into a great rage; and the lord chancellor declared the promotion of the earl of Finlater to be againſt law, and would not treat that nobleman with decency; and lord Mar and ſecretary Bromley received many inſtances of ill uſage. Moſt of theſe changes were declared from the middle of Auguſt to the middle of September; and about that time Thomas Foley was appointed auditor of the impreſt accounts, in the room of Mr. Maynwaring deceaſed; the lord Lanſdown, treaſurer of the houſehold, in the room of the earl of Cholmondeley, formerly removed; ſir John Stonehouſe, comptroller of the houſhold, in the room of the lord Lanſdown; the lord Delawar, treaſurer of the chamber, in the room of the lord Fitzharding, deceaſed; Francis Gwin, ſecretary of war, in the room of ſir William Wyndham; and Thomas Moore, brother to Arthur Moore, pay-maſter of the land-forces abroad, in the room of Mr. Bridges. About this time likewiſe the duke of Northumberland and ſir John Stonehouſe were ſworn of the privy-council; and the earl of Denbigh made one of the tellers of the Exchequer*.

The duke of Shrewſbury being appointed lord-lieutenant of Ireland, convoked the parliament of that kingdom on the twenty-fifth day of November, when it ſoon appeared that the diviſions in England had affected that iſland. Prodigious riots were made at the elections, and one in particular at Dublin, which could not be appeaſed without the ſoldiery: however, by the choice of a ſpeaker (Mr. Allan Broderick), chairman of the committee of elections, and other methods, the Whigs got the majority in the houſe of commons, who began the buſineſs of the ſeſſion by ordering a proſecution againſt one Edward Lloyd, for publiſhing a book entitled, "Memoirs of the Chevalier de St. George." Then they fell upon ſir Conſtantine Phipps, the chancellor, one of the violent Tory party, and voted an addreſs to the queen, to remove him. This gentleman's conduct had, indeed, been very exceptionable; and it was no ſecret, that he had an attachment to the exiled family. The houſe of lords, however, who were chiefly Tories, oppoſed the commons by a counter-addreſs to the queen, in favour of the chancellor, as did likewiſe the convocation. During theſe convulſions, the duke of Shrewſbury behaved with wonderful temper and prudence; and left nothing undone to keep things in ſome order; but finding that the commons were reſolved to oppoſe all the meaſures of the court, he thought proper to prorogue the parliament; and leaving chancellor Phipps, with the archbiſhops of Armagh and Tuam, juſtices of the kingdom, he returned to England in the beginning of the year 1714.

* See the earl of Oxford's letter to the queen, in the report of the ſecret committee, anno 1715.

All this while the party-writers and managers on both ſides were extremely buſy in England in preparing the minds of the people to favour their reſpective intereſts in the new elections for parliament-men; but, notwithſtanding the weight and influence of the court, and the viſible partiality of ſome returning officers, a far greater number of Whigs were choſen than was by many expected: the meeting of the parliament, however, was delayed by repeated prorogations to the tenth day of December, a delay partly owing to the queen's ill ſtate of health, partly to the conteſts that prevailed among her miniſters, which were frequently carried to very indecent lengths even in the royal preſence. Bolingbroke was powerfully ſupported by the lord-chancellor Harcourt, ſir William Wyndham, and Mr. ſecretary Bromley: Oxford perceived the decline of his own influexce, and began to think of retirement.

In the mean time, the queen was, on the twenty-fourth of December, taken very ill at Windſor. It was given out to be no more than an ague-fit, for which ſhe took the bark, which had its effect; but, whatever the diſtemper was in reality, it was ſo ſudden and violent, that for ſome minutes ſhe was thought to be dead. The Jacobites appeared greatly elated at this period, while thoſe who were friends to the proteſtant ſucceſſion in the illuſtrious houſe of Hanover, trembled at the proſpect of what might happen. The public funds immediately fell, and a great run was made upon the Bank: the queen, being made acquainted with theſe circumſtances, ſigned a letter to ſir Samuel Stanier, lord-mayor of London, declaring that ſhe was recovered of her late indiſpoſition, and that ſhe was determined to open the new parliament on the ſixteenth day of February.

While England was harraſſed by theſe inteſtine commotions, the emperor Charles III. now left to contend ſingly with all the power of France, wrote circular letters to all the princes of the empire, to acquaint them with the reaſons why his miniſters could not concur in the peace, and ſoliciting their aid: to which the diet of the empire returned for anſwer, that they had reſolved to ſupport his imperial majeſty, in the proſecution of the war, with all poſſible vigour, not doubting, they ſaid, but by the effects of this reſolution, ſo unanimouſly taken by the whole body of the empire, and their united forces, to reduce the exorbitant power and intolerable ambition of France, and reſtore Germany to its former flouriſhing condition. But they found themſelves miſerably miſtaken; for marſhal Villars having (as I have already related) ſecured the reſt of French Flanders, marched towards the Rhine, and, after making himſelf maſter of Spires, Worms, and all the circumjacent country, he took Landau, which the emperor might have kept by acceding to the peace; forced the lines which prince Eugene had ordered to be drawn from Briſgau; defeated marſhal Vaubanne who defended thoſe lines; and laſtly beſieged Friburg, the capital of Upper Auſtria, which ſurrendered on the thirtieth of October, 1713. The court of Vienna preſſed the circles of the empire to ſend the ſuccours they had promiſed, but no ſuccours came. The emperor now began to be ſenſible, that without the aſſiſtance of England and Holland he could never prevail againſt France, and reſolved upon peace when it was too late. Accordingly conferences were opened, at the inſtances of the electors of Cologne and Palatine, at the caſtle of Al Raſtadt, between marſhal Villars and prince Eugene, on the twenty-ſixth of November. In the beginning of February, 1714, they ſeparated, without ſeeming to have come to any concluſion; but all the articles being ſettled between the courts of Vienna and Verſailles, they met again at the latter end of the month; the treaty was ſigned on the third of March; and orders were ſent to the governors and commanders on both ſides to deſiſt from all hoſtilities.

There was no notice taken in this treaty of the pretenſions which the emperor ſtill maintained to the Spaniſh monarchy, nor of the empty title of Catholic King which he continued to bear after Philip V. was in quiet poſſeſſion of that kingdom. Lewis XIV. however agreed to yield to the emperor Old Briſac, with all its dependencies, Friburg, the forts in the Briſgau and Black Foreſt, together with fort Kehl. He engaged to demoliſh the fortifications oppoſite to Hunningen, the fort of Sellingen, and all between that and fort Louis. The town and fortreſs of Landau were yielded to the king of France, who acknowleged the elector of Hanover. The electors of Bavaria and Cologne were reſtored to all their dignities and dominions. The emperor was put in immediate poſſeſſion of the Spaniſh Netherlands; and the king of Pruſſia was permitted to retain the high quarter of Gueldres. In concluſion, the contracting parties agreed, that a congreſs ſhould be held in the month of May at Baden in Switzerland, for terminating all differences; and prince Eugene and mareſchal de Villars were declared their firſt plenipotentiaries*.

Her majeſty, as ſoon as ſhe was able, came from Windſor to St. James's, when ſhe was pleaſed to tranſlate ſir William Dawes from the ſee of Cheſter to the archbiſhopric of York. On the ſixteenth of February, 1714, the new parliament (the fourth of Great Britain), was opened by commiſſion, and ſir Thomas Hanmer, who had diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the laſt ſeſſion by his oppoſition to the bill for rendering effectual the treaty of navigation and commerce with France, was choſen ſpeaker of the houſe of commons: then the houſe adjourned to the ſecond of March. During this adjournment, the ratifications of the treaty between Great Britain and Spain (of which I have already taken notice) being exchanged, the peace was proclaimed in London, and the articles were approved by the greateſt part of the nation. On the ſecond of March, the queen, who ſtill continued in a bad ſtate of health, was carried in a chair to the houſe of lords, when ſhe made a ſpeech to both houſes, importing, "that ſhe had obtained an honourable and advantageous peace for her own people, and for the greateſt part of her allies; and ſhe hoped her interpoſition might prove effectual to complete the ſettlement of Europe: that ſome perſons had been ſo malicious as to inſinuate, that the proteſtant ſucceſſion in the houſe of Hanover was in danger under her government; but thoſe, who endeavoured to diſtract the minds of men with imaginary dangers, could only mean to diſturb the public tranquillity: that, after all she had done to secure the religion and liberties of her people, and to transmit them safe to posterity, she could not mention such proceedings without some degree of warmth; and she hoped her parliament would agree with her that attempts to weaken her authority, or render the possession of the crown uneasy to her, could never be proper means to strengthen the protestant succession."

It is not very easy to account for the queen's expressing her hope, that her interposition might prove effectual to complete the settlement of Europe, seeing that the emperor, who was at this very time engaged in a treaty with France, would neither admit her ambassador to the conferences, nor even acquaint her with the substance of the negociation. But this, and some other inconsistencies which were contained in this speech, were overlooked by the parliament; and both houses, together with the convocation, concurred in very affectionate addresses to the queen, who returned most gracious answers *.

It was not long, however, before the lords presented another address to her majesty, against a pamphlet, entitled, "The Public Spirit of the Whigs," which was principally levelled against the duke of Argyll, though, through him, the sixteen Scottish peers who sat in the house, were reflected upon, and the Union treated with great contempt: Barber (afterwards lord-mayor of London), the printer, and Morphew, the publisher, were both taken into custody of the black-rod, and a proclamation was issued, offering a reward of three hundred pounds to any person for discovering the author †.

On the other hand, a complaint was made in the house of commons, by Mr. auditor Foley, against the author of certain scandalous papers called "The Englishman," and "The Crisis," as containing several paragraphs tending to sow sedition, reflecting upon her majesty, and arraigning her administration and government. Mr. Richard Steele, a member of the house, acknowleging himself the author of those pieces, a day was appointed for his trial. On the thirteenth of March Mr. Steele made a very long defence, in which he was assisted by his friends, Mr. Addison, general Stanhope, and Mr. Walpole. The attack against him was managed by sir William Wyndham, Mr. Foley, and the attorney-general. In a word, he was cast by a great majority of two hundred and forty-five against one hundred and fifty-two, and it was voted that he should be expelled the house.

The lords taking into consideration the state of the nation, addressed her majesty to acquaint them with the steps that had been taken for removing the pretender from the dominions of the duke of Lorrain; that she would communicate to them an account of the negociations of peace; an account of the instances that had been made in favour of the Catalans; and an account of the moneys granted by parliament since the year 1710, for carrying on the war in Spain and Portugal. They afterwards agreed to other addresses, beseeching her majesty to lay before them the debts and state of the navy, the particular writs of "Noli prosequi" granted since her accession to the throne, with several other matters; and then the house adjourned itself to the last day of March.

A report being industriously propagated about this time, of a design undertaken by France in behalf of the pretender, the ambassador of that crown at the Hague disowned it in a public paper, by command of his most Christian majesty. Nevertheless, the minds of the people had been too deeply practised upon to be convinced by this or any other declaration; and what seemed to rivet their apprehensions, was the great alteration now made in military and civil posts, which were bestowed upon professed Tories, some of whom were at the bottom attached to the pretender. This measure, however, is to be imputed rather to Bolingbroke than the treasurer, who advised moderate measures, and who is said to have made advances towards a reconciliation with the leaders of the Whig party, who, alarmed at a change so much to their disadvantage, and either apprehending, or affecting to apprehend, that a design was formed to secure the pretender's accession to the throne of Great Britain, held secret consultations with baron Schutz, the resident from Hanover. They also maintained a correspondence with that elector and the duke of Marlborough, who, in case of necessity, would have easily procured the States-general to support any design he thought proper to form. Not content with this, they actually formed a plan for seizing the Tower, upon the first appearance of danger in regard to the queen's life (who now visibly decayed from day to day), and confining in it such persons as were obnoxious to them. This conduct of the Whigs was resolute, active, and would have been laudable, had their zeal been confined within the bounds of truth and moderation; but they were moreover guilty of unpardonable falshoods, to excite and encourage the fears and jealousies of the people.

The house of lords being again met, the distressed state of the Catalans, the pretender, and the danger that threatened the protestant succession, furnished a variety of changes upon the alarm-bell of sedition and party malevolence; but nothing so much disgraced this illustrious assembly as that spirit of persecution and rancorous hatred, which they exerted with respect to the pretender. Not contented with hunting him from one country to another, they seemed earnestly bent to extirpate him from the face of the earth, as if it had been a crime in him to be born; they even proceeded so far as to address the queen to set a price upon his head. To this address, which was delivered by the chancellor and the Whig lords only, the queen replied in these words: "My lords, it would be a real strengthening to the succession in the house of Hanover, as well as a support to my government, that an end was put to those groundless fears and jealousies, which have been so industriously promoted: I do not, at this time, see any occasion for such a proclamation: whenever I judge it to be necessary, I will give orders for having it issued: with regard to the other particulars of this address, I will take care to give the proper directions ‡."

‡ About this time an agent of the late king James's queen offered to file a bill in chancery, wherein he demanded in her name, the sum of six hundred and fifty thousand pounds due to her by the crown of England, for the dowry of fifty thousand pounds per annum, since the death of king James; but the agent having in the bill, given her the title of "Queen-mother," the

The Whig party were not a little diſſatisfied with this anſwer; and in order to give her all the mortification poſſible, the earl of Wharton propoſed this queſtion in the houſe of lords, Whether the proteſtant ſucceſſion was in danger under the preſent adminiſtration? A warm debate enſued, but at length the ſucceſſion was voted out of danger, by a majority of voices.

About this period an accident happened, which was not a little ſurpriſing, and occaſioned many ſpeculations at this time. Baron Schutz, the Hanoverian envoy, demanded of the lord-chancellor a writ for the electoral prince to ſit in the houſe of peers, as duke of Cambridge. The chancellor, in ſome ſurprize, ſaid it was a matter that demanded ſome conſideration, to make out writs for peers who did not reſide in the kingdom; however, he would immediately acquaint the queen with it. The envoy replied in a menacing tone, that he doubted not but his lordſhip knew the nature of his office; but as to the difficulty by the prince's abſence, he was reſolved to come over, and very poſſibly might be landed before the writ was made out. The queen was ſo offended with the baron's applying to the chancellor, without firſt ſignifying his intention to her, that ſhe forbad him the court; and, reſolved not to afford her enemies the malicious pleaſure of turning their backs upon her in her life-time, to worſhip the riſing ſun, ſhe wrote the following letter to the princeſs Sophia, which, from the good ſenſe and ſpirit that diſplay themſelves in the compoſition, well deſerves a place in this work.

"Madam, ſiſter, aunt,

"Since the right of ſucceſſion to my kingdoms has been declared to belong to you, and your family, there have always been diſaffected perſons, who, from particular views of their own intereſt, have entered into meaſures to fix a prince of your blood in my dominions, even while I am yet living. I never thought, till now, that this project would have gone ſo far, as to have made the leaſt impreſſion on your mind. But, as I have lately perceived, by public rumours, which are induſtriouſly ſpread, that your electoral highneſs is come into this ſentiment, it is of importance, with reſpect to the ſucceſſion of your family, that I ſhould tell you, ſuch a proceeding will infallibly draw along with it ſome conſequences, that might be dangerous to the ſucceſſion itſelf, which is not ſecure any other way than as the prince, who actually wears the crown, maintains her authority and prerogative. There are here (ſuch is our misfortune) many perſons, who are ſeditiouſly diſpoſed. So I leave you to judge, what tumults they may be able to raiſe, if they ſhould have a pretext to begin a commotion. I perſuade myſelf, therefore, you will never conſent, that the leaſt thing ſhould be done, which may diſturb the repoſe of me and my ſubjects.

"Open yourſelf to me with the ſame freedom I do to you, and propoſe whatever you think may contribute to the ſecurity of the ſucceſſion. I will come into it with zeal, provided it do not derogate from my dignity, which I am reſolved to maintain. I am, with great affection, &c."

At the ſame time, ſhe wrote a letter to the duke of Cambridge, in theſe terms:

"Couſin,

"An accident, which has happened in my lord Paget's family, having hindered him from ſetting forward ſo ſoon as he thought to have done, I cannot defer any longer letting you know my thoughts with reſpect to the deſign you have of coming into my kingdoms. As the opening of the matter ought to have been made to me, ſo I expected you would not have given ear to it, without knowing my thoughts about it. However, this is what I owe to my own dignity, the friendſhip I have for you, and the electoral houſe to which you belong, that I ſhould tell you, that nothing can be more dangerous to the tranquility of my dominions, and the right of ſucceſſion in your line, and conſequently more diſagreeable to me, than ſuch a proceeding at this juncture. I am, with great friendſhip,

"Your very affectionate couſin,

"ANNE R."

Another letter was written to the elector himſelf, the contents of which were never communicated to the public.

The lord-treaſurer took this opportunity, by his brother, Mr. Thomas Harley, to aſſure the elector of his inviolable attachment to the houſe of Hanover. The electoral prince, who, in all probability, had been wrong adviſed by ſome of the Whig party, who wanted to make him an inſtrument to compaſs their own ends, was ſo convinced, by the queen's letter, of the impropriety of coming to England during her life-time, that, though he obtained the writ, he never thought proper to uſe it. Towards the latter end of April, the lords took into conſideration the treaties of peace and commerce, to which many exceptions were taken; but at length the majority carried the queſtion in favour of an addreſs, "acknowleging her majeſty's goodneſs in delivering them, by a ſafe and advantageous peace with France, from a burthen of a conſuming land-war, unequally carried on, and become at laſt impracticable *."

In the beginning of May, the rev. Mr. Bedford, who had been convicted of publiſhing a book, ſhewing the monarchy of England to be hereditary, was ſentenced in the court of Queen's Bench to pay a fine of one thouſand marks, and to remain in priſon for three years, and afterwards to be bound in a recognizance, with four ſufficient ſureties, in the ſum of five thouſand pounds, for his good behaviour during life; and he was ordered to be brought to all the courts in Weſtminſter-hall, with a paper on his breaſt ſignifying his offence: but the latter part of his ſentence her majeſty was pleaſed to remit, out of regard to the delinquent's ſacerdotal character.

On the demand of the duke of Cambridge's writ, by the baron Schutz, a conſultation had been held by the miniſtry, wherein it was debated, Whether the queen ſhould invite over the duke?

the officer refuſed to file it, upon which the agent changed the title, and preſented it in the name of "the moſt illuſtrious princeſs Maria, relict of James II. king of England." Though no notice was taken of this formal demand, yet, purſuant to a private agreement made in France by the lord Bolingbroke, about fifty thouſand pounds were remitted thither for her uſe.

the lord-treaſurer, the lord-chancellor, the lord privy-ſeal, and another privy-counſellor, were for it; but the lord Bolingbroke having oppoſed it, and carried the negative, reſolved to puſh his point, and, by his ſubſequent behaviour, gave but too much reaſon to ſuſpect him of a deſign to defeat the proteſtant ſucceſſion. However that might be, from this time he broke all meaſures with the treaſurer. On the twelfth of May, ſir William Wyndham made a motion for a bill "to prevent the growth of ſchiſm, and for the farther ſecurity of the church of England, as by law eſtabliſhed." The deſign of it was to prevent diſſenters from teaching in ſchools and academies. It was accordingly prepared, and eagerly oppoſed in each houſe, as a ſpecies of perſecution, which in truth it was: nevertheleſs, it made its way through both houſes, and received the royal aſſent; but the queen dying before it took place, this law was rendered ineffectual.

On the twenty-ninth of June, baron Bothmar, envoy extraordinary from the elector of Hanover, arrived in London, and having had a private audience of her majeſty, he notified the death of the princeſs Sophia. This princeſs, walking in the gardens of Herenhauſen, on the eighth of June, in the evening, was taken with an apoplectic fit, and died in the arms of the electoral princeſs (afterwards queen Caroline), before any one could come to her aſſiſtance. She was the fourth and youngeſt daughter of Frederic, king of Bohemia, and Elizabeth his conſort, daughter of king James I. and was born at the Hague, on the third of October 1630. Upon her death the court of England appeared in deep mourning, and the elector of Brunſwick was ordered to be prayed for by name, in the Liturgy of the church of England.

About this time the houſe of commons concurred with the lords in voting the proteſtant ſucceſſion out of danger. The Whigs, however, had great advantage over the Tories in the upper houſe, in reference to the treaty of commerce with Spain; and all that could be ſaid in defence of the miniſtry availed very little. Sir William Hodges, Mr. Mead, and about thirty more eminent merchants trading to Spain being called into the houſe of lords, unanimouſly averred, that unleſs the explanation of the third, fifth, and eighth articles were reſcinded, they could not carry on their commerce without loſing twenty or twenty-five per cent. Theſe explanations had been made at Madrid, after ſigning the treaty at Utrecht. It was obſerved the treaſurer joined with the lords who inſiſted on hearing the Spaniſh merchants, which was ſtrenuouſly oppoſed by the lord Bolingbroke. But, after a long debate, it was reſolved to addreſs the queen "to cauſe all the papers relating to the negociation of the treaty of commerce with Spain, to be laid before the houſe, together with the names of the perſons who adviſed her majeſty to that treaty." The miniſtry were ſo confounded at this ſudden attack, that they could think of no better anſwer to put into the queen's mouth, than "that ſhe had been given to underſtand the three explanatory articles of the treaty of commerce with Spain were not detrimental to the trade of her ſubjects, and therefore ſhe had conſented to their being ratified with the ſaid treaty."

This anſwer was excepted to by ſeveral members, as unſatisfactory; and, among the reſt, the earl of Wharton and lord Halifax ſaid openly, "that if ſo little regard was ſhewn to the addreſſes and applications of that auguſt aſſembly to the ſovereign, they knew not what buſineſs they had in that houſe." The ſame lords then moved for a repreſentation to the queen, to lay before her the inſuperable difficulties that attended the Spaniſh trade upon the foot of the late treaty; which being agreed to, and preſented, the queen returned this general anſwer, "that it had been her care to procure all poſſible advantages for her ſubjects in trade, and that ſhe ſhould continue her endeavours to obtain farther benefits, and particularly in the trade with Spain, which was ſo uſeful to her people." The lords were as little pleaſed with this anſwer as with the laſt, and ſome of them took occaſion to complain of her majeſty's ſilence in relation to the deſire of the houſe, that ſhe would be pleaſed to name the perſons who had adviſed her to ratify the treaty of commerce with Spain; and it was moved that another addreſs might be preſented, in which the houſe ſhould inſiſt in ſtronger terms on her majeſty's naming the perſons who had adviſed her to ratify the three explanatory articles, and ſome hot ſpeeches were made on both ſides on that affair; but the lottery bill being ready for the royal aſſent, the queen came the very next day (July 9) to the houſe of peers, and put an end to the ſeſſion. It was the general opinion, that if the parliament had ſat one day longer, the lords would have ordered a proſecution againſt Mr. Arthur Moore, a member of the lower houſe, who was an agent of lord Bolingbroke's, and had the chief management of the treaty, and who by ſeveral circumſtances appeared to have been corrupted by the Spaniſh court: nay, many expected that their lordſhips would have carried their reſentment of his and Bolingbroke's conduct in relation to this treaty, ſo far as to commit them both to the Tower.

Her majeſty, in her ſpeech to the two houſes at the end of this ſeſſion, and which was the laſt ſhe made in parliament, after thanking them for the ſupplies they had granted, aſſured them, that her chief care was to preſerve the proteſtant religion, the liberty of her ſubjects, and to ſecure the tranquility of her kingdom: ſhe then concluded in theſe words: "But I muſt tell you plainly, that theſe deſirable ends can never be attained, unleſs you bring the ſame diſpoſitions on your parts; unleſs all groundleſs jealouſies, which create and foment diviſions among you, be laid aſide, and unleſs you ſhow the ſame regard for my juſt prerogative, and for the honour of my government, as I have always expreſſed for the rights of my people." The parliament was then prorogued to the tenth of Auguſt; a day, however, the queen lived not to ſee.

Her majeſty's conſtitution was now quite broken; one fit of ſickneſs ſucceeded another; and what completed the ruin of her health, was the anxiety of her mind, occaſioned partly by the diſcontents which had been raiſed and fomented by the enemies of her government, and partly by the diſſenſions among her miniſters, which were now become intolerable; for, forgetting their duty to her, and regard for their country, they conſulted only their ambitious views, ſo that whenever they met in council, they ſtudied rather to croſs each other's propoſals, than to ſettle or purſue any regular plan: and to ſuch a monſtrous extravagance did theſe jealouſies arrive at laſt, that it is believed a quarrel between the treaſurer and lord Bolingbroke, in her preſence, proved in ſome meaſure the cauſe of her death. In the mean time, the latter prevailed, and the earl of Oxford was, on the twenty-ſeventh day of July, diveſted of all his employments. This occaſioned the dukes of Somerſet and Argyll to come into the council, who were followed by ſome other privy-counſellors, friends to the Hanover ſucceſſion, which gave a turn to that board; and, by their advice, the queen, two days after, gave the white ſtaff to the duke of Shrewſbury, tho' he was lord-chamberlain and lord-lieutenant of Ireland at the ſame time. This was no ſmall mortification to Bolingbroke, who did not doubt of ſucceeding his rival as prime miniſter in the adminiſtration of affairs, and is ſaid to have formed a deſign of a coalition with the duke of Marlborough, who at this very time embarked at Oſtend for England. It has been aſſerted that Oxford had attempted the ſame expedient, but had met with a repulſe from the duke, who had ſolemnly vowed never to be reconciled to that miniſter.

The general confuſion that followed at court, upon the diſmiſſion of the treaſurer, and the fatigue of attending a long cabinet-council on the event, had ſuch an effect upon the queen's ſpirits, that, on the twenty-ninth of July (being then at Windſor) ſhe was ſeized with a lethargic diſorder, and the next day, about ſeven in the morning, was ſtruck with an apoplexy; and from that time continued in a dying condition. About three in the afternoon ſhe recovered her ſenſes a little, and then it was that, at the requeſt of her privy-council, ſhe gave the treaſurer's ſtaff to the duke of Shrewſbury, bidding him uſe it for the good of her people. This was the laſt act of her government, for the council now took upon themſelves the direction of public affairs, appointing the earl of Berkeley to command the fleet, and ſending general Witham to take the command of the troops in Scotland. Orders were diſpatched to four regiments of horſe and dragoons, quartered in remote counties, to march up to the neighbourhood of London and Weſtminſter; ſeven of the ten Britiſh battalions in the Netherlands, were directed to embark at Oſtend for England, with all poſſible diſpatch: an embargo was laid upon all ſhipping; and directions were given for equipping all the ſhips of war that could ſooneſt be got ready for ſervice: in a word, no one ſtep was omitted, that ſeemed likely to over-awe the Jacobite faction, and ſecure the peaceable acceſſion of that illuſtrious prince on whom the crown of theſe realms was now about to devolve.

In the mean time the queen continued in the hands of her phyſicians and domeſtics, ſome of whom flattered themſelves with falſe hopes to the laſt; but the bliſters, which had been applied as the laſt reſort, not riſing, her majeſty, about ſeven in the morning of the firſt of Auguſt, 1714, breathed her laſt, in the fiftieth year of her age, and the thirteenth of her reign.

Queen Anne was, in her perſon, of the middle ſtature, and well proportioned; her complexion and ſhape excellent, till her conſtitution was impaired by grief and ſickneſs. She appeared to beſt advantage ſpeaking, for ſhe had a clear harmonious voice, great good ſenſe, and a very happy elocution. Her piety was unaffected, her humility was ſincere, her good-nature conſpicuous: ſhe was a pattern of conjugal fidelity and affection, a tender mother, a warm friend, and a munificent patron.

Her character, viewed in a political light, is ſufficiently apparent from the tranſactions of her reign, the greateſt part of which was glorious, and the whole might have been ſo, had ſhe not been abuſed by thoſe in whom ſhe repoſed her confidence. That there were ſeveral ſchemes formed to reſtore the pretender to the crown of theſe realms, during the latter part of her reign, cannot be doubted; but that ſhe herſelf deſigned him to be her ſucceſſor (as is to this day believed by many weak or prejudiced perſons), does not appear from any part of her conduct. Beſides, it will be very difficult to make any honeſt thinking perſon believe that, after ſo many repeated and ſolemn aſſurances from the throne, of her being entirely in the intereſt of the houſe of Hanover and its ſucceſſion, there could be ſo much hypocriſy lodged in the breaſt of a princeſs, who was otherwiſe ſo conſpicuous for her virtue and piety, and who had given ſuch evident proofs of her zeal for the proteſtant religion, in the moſt dangerous and worſt of times. It is not the leaſt addition to the glory of her reign, that it may be called Bloodleſs, no perſon having been executed, at leaſt beheaded for treaſon, during the courſe of it; which cannot be ſaid of any one of her predeceſſors ſince the reign of Edward I. who died in 1307. To conclude, nothing was wanting to have made her adminiſtration the moſt illuſtrious of any in the annals of hiſtory, but to have had ſubjects more united among themſelves, and more capable of diſcerning the tenderneſs and ſincerity of her affection for them.

Her majeſty had iſſue, by the prince of Denmark,

1. A daughter that was ſtill-born, the twelfth of May, 1684.

2. Lady Mary, a ſecond daughter, born June 2, 1685, and died in February, 1690.

3. Anne Sophia, born May 12, 1686, and died the February following.

4. William, duke of Gloceſter, born July 24, 1689, who lived to be eleven years of age.

5. The lady Mary, born in October 1690, who lived no longer than to be baptized.

6. George, another ſon, who died alſo ſoon after he was born.

PART XIII.

GEORGE I. A. D. 1714.

I Am now to enter upon a new period of time, and a total change in the order of ſucceſſion to the throne of theſe realms; a change, however, to which we owe innumerable bleſſings, and which ſtamps upon this part of our hiſtory a ſtill greater value than even the important Revolution, with which we uſhered in this volume. The birth of a ſon to king James II. having been judged an impoſture, calculated to anſwer the ends of tyranny and popery, the pretended prince of Wales was ſolemnly abjured by act of parliament, and all acceſs to the throne of Great Britain for ever ſhut againſt him. Hereupon the houſe of Savoy came to be next in claim to the Britiſh dominions, as they drew their right from the princeſs Henrietta, daughter of king Charles I. but all catholics having been declared incapable of ſucceeding to the crown, as the only effectual means to preſerve the proteſtant religion and the liberties of the ſtate, it devolved of courſe to the houſe of Hanover, as the neareſt proteſtant family to the line of ſucceſſion. Upon this foundation it was, that, upon the death of the duke of Gloceſter, by a ſtatute made in the twelfth year of king William III. for limiting the ſucceſſion of the crown, it was provided, that after the death of the queen, then princeſs Anne, without iſſue, it was to paſs to the princeſs Sophia, of the moſt illuſtrious houſe of Hanover, as the next proteſtant heir, and that princeſs was acknowleged for lawful heir to the imperial crown of Great Britain.

Sophia, electreſs-dowager of Hanover, was daughter to the queen of Bohemia, who, before ſhe married Frederick, elector Palatine and king of Bohemia, was ſtyled the Princeſs Elizabeth of Great Britain, daughter to James VI. of Scotland and I. of England, in whom united all the hereditary claims to the crown of theſe realms. But the princeſs Sophia dying a very little while before the queen, George Lewis, elector of Hanover, her ſon, became heir of this crown on the demiſe of queen Anne. The proteſtant ſucceſſion in the houſe of Hanover had been ſo firmly eſtabliſhed by ſeveral acts of parliament, that it happily took place immediately on the queen's death, Auguſt 1, 1714, and king George had an eaſy and peaceable acceſſion to the throne.

This prince poſſeſſed every qualification requiſite to form a great ſovereign. Endowed by nature with an extenſive genius, which had been cultivated by a liberal education, he was perfectly capable to ſupport the weight of a crown; at the ſame time his mature age, being then fifty-four years old (for he was born May 28, 1660), his experience, and his perſonal qualities, were ſuch as ſeemed to leave his new ſubjects nothing to apprehend from his conduct. He had waged war in perſon with ſucceſs, and his valour had gained him the eſteem of the Engliſh, even before he came to be their ſovereign. Filled with thoſe ſentiments that diſtinguiſh great minds, he loved to render juſtice impartially to all men, and delighted in conferring benefits on the deſerving: "My maxim (ſaid he, ſoon after his arrival in England) is never to abandon my friends; to do juſtice to all men; and to fear no man." As he had been born and educated in the boſom of the proteſtant church, the bulk of the Engliſh nation had fixed their hopes on him for the preſervation of the conſtitution both in church and ſtate. In a word, if ever a king mounted a throne with a proſpect of taſting all the ſweets of royalty, without experiencing any of its chagrin, it was George I. But, however, he was not without his diſturbances.

By an act of parliament in the laſt reign, the adminiſtration of the government was veſted in lords-juſtices: thoſe expreſly appointed by the act were the archbiſhop of Canterbury and the great officers of ſtate for the time being. Theſe were,

Dr. Tenniſon, archbiſhop of Canterbury.

Lord-chancellor Harcourt.

John Sheffield, duke of Buckinghamſhire, lord-preſident.

Charles Talbot, duke of Shrewſbury, lord-treaſurer.

William Legge, earl of Dartmouth, lord privy-ſeal.

Thomas Wentworth earl of Strafford, firſt commiſſioner of the admiralty.

Sir Thomas Parker, lord chief-juſtice of the King's Bench.

Beſides theſe, the ſucceſſor was empowered, by the ſame act, to add what other regents he pleaſed, by three inſtruments, one of them to be depoſited with the archbiſhop of Canterbury, another with the lord-chancellor, and the third with the Hanover reſident, which were to be opened at the queen's death. Accordingly his grace of Canterbury, as ſoon as he heard that her majeſty was expired, immediately repaired to court, where he had not been for ſome time, and with his colleagues, produced the inſtruments, wherein his electoral highneſs had, under his own hand, nominated the following lords to be added to the others in the regency, viz.

The duke of Shrewſbury.
The duke of Somerſet.
The duke of Bolton.
The duke of Devonſhire.
The duke of Kent.
The duke of Argyll.
The duke of Montroſe.
The duke of Roxborough.
The earl of Pomfret.
The earl of Angleſey.
The earl of Carliſle.
The earl of Nottingham.
The earl of Abingdon.
The earl of Scarborough.
The earl of Orford.
The lord viſcount Townſhend.
The lord Hallifax.
The lord Cowper *.

The regency thus fixed, the form of a proclamation was ordered by the lords of the council, for proclaiming "The high and mighty prince, George, elector of Brunſwick Lunenburg, king of Great Britain, France and Ireland;" which was accordingly performed the ſame day, with the uſual ſolemnity, in the cities of London and Weſtminſter, and as ſoon as poſſible all over England. His majeſty was likewiſe proclaimed at Edinburgh on the fifth of Auguſt, and the next day at Dublin; at the ſame time the lords juſtices of Ireland iſſued a proclamation for diſarming papiſts and ſeizing their horſes. There was not the leaſt diſturbance or interruption given in any place to the proclaiming the king, only at Oxford, where the mayor received from a perſon, in a bachelor's gown, a letter, requiring him to proclaim the pretender. This being communicated to the vice-chancellor, a copy of it was immediately tranſmitted to Mr. ſecretary Bromley, member of parliament for the univerſity, and the vice-chancellor offered a reward of one hundred pounds to any perſon who ſhould diſcover the author.

On the thirty-firſt of July, the queen being then declared by her phyſicians paſt all hopes of recovery, Mr. Craggs had been diſpatched to Hanover with the news, and the next day baron Bothmar, the Hanoverian reſident, ſent Mr. Godick, his ſecretary, with advice that ſhe was actually deceaſed, and that his majeſty had been joyfully and peaceably proclaimed: the lords-juſtices alſo appointed the earl of Dorſet to carry the king the news of his acceſſion, and to wait on him in his journey to England. They ſoon after appointed Mr. Joſeph Addiſon their ſecretary, and ordered the poſt-maſter to ſend to him all the letters and packets directed to the ſecretaries of ſtate, whereby the management of affairs was entirely taken out of the hands of the lord viſcount Bolingbroke.

The parliament being continued after the queen's demiſe, purſuant to the act for regulating the ſucceſſion, met in the afternoon of the day ſhe died, though it was Sunday; and four days after, viz. Auguſt 5, the lord-chancellor, in the name of his brethren the lords juſtices, made a ſpeech to both houſes, ſuitable to the preſent occaſion. Both houſes immediately agreed upon addreſſes of condolance for the death of the queen, and congratulations for his majeſty's happy acceſſion, promiſing to ſupport his undoubted right to the imperial crown of theſe realms againſt the pretender and all other perſons whatſoever: and deſiring his ſpeedy preſence amongſt them. Theſe addreſſes were tranſmitted to his majeſty by their excellencies the lords juſtices, and received moſt affectionate anſwers. That to the lords was as follows:

"I take this firſt opportunity to return you my hearty thanks for your addreſs, and the aſſurances you have given me therein. The zeal and unanimity you have ſhewn upon my acceſſion to the crown, are great encouragements to me; and I ſhall always eſteem the continuance of them, as one of the greateſt bleſſings of my reign. No one can be more truly ſenſible than I am, of the loſs ſuſtained by the death of the late queen, whoſe extraordinary piety and virtues ſo much endeared her to her people, and for whoſe memory I ſhall always have a particular regard. My beſt endeavours ſhall never be wanting to repair this loſs to the nation. I will make it my conſtant care to preſerve our religion, laws, and liberties inviolable, and to advance the honour and proſperity of my kingdoms. I am haſtening to you, according to your deſire, ſo affectionately expreſſed in your addreſs *."

The anſwer to the commons was much to the ſame effect.

On the thirteenth of Auguſt, Mr. Craggs arrived in London, with letters from his majeſty to the lord-juſtices, who thereupon went to the houſe of lords, and acquainted the parliament therewith, when both houſes reſolved upon an addreſs of thanks to his majeſty for the ſatisfaction he expreſſed in the loyalty and affection of his ſubjects. After this, the commons having finiſhed the bill for the civil liſt, and one for making ſome alterations in the act for a ſtate lottery, which, with ſome other bills, received the royal aſſent from the regency, the two houſes were by his majeſty's command, prorogued to the twenty-third of September.

Mr. Prior having intimated the queen's death to the court of Verſailles, Lewis XIV. declared that he would inviolably maintain the peace of Utrecht, particularly with regard to the ſettlement of the Britiſh crown in the houſe of Hanover. The earl of Strafford alſo having notified the ſame event to the States general, and Mr. Klingraef having preſented them with a letter, in which his maſter demanded the performance of their guaranty, they promiſed to fulfil their engagements, and congratulated his electoral highneſs on his acceſſion to the throne of Great Britain, invited him, at the ſame time, to paſs through their dominions, aſſuring him that his intereſts were as dear them as their own.

On the twenty-eighth of Auguſt, Mr. Murray arivived expreſs from Hanover, with an account that the king had deferred his departure for ſome days; and brought ſeveral orders for the lords-juſtices and council, particularly one for removing the lord viſcount Bolingbroke from his poſt of ſecretary of ſtate, which was done on the thirty-firſt, not without ſome marks of the royal diſpleaſure; the dukes of Shrewſbury and Somerſet, and the lord Cowper, three of the lords-regents taking the ſeals from him, and locking and ſealing up all the doors of his office. The lord viſcount Townſhend was ſoon after appointed to ſucceed him.

It may be neceſſary to acquaint the reader, that by this time the duke of Marlborough was come over to England. He had been here ſome days ſooner, had he not been detained at Oſtend by contrary winds. He happened to land at Dover the very day the queen died: it is ſaid he knew nothing of this event any more than the mayor and jurats of Dover, by whom he was received in their formalities, with the acclamations of the people, and with a diſcharge of a great number of guns. He had been invited over, firſt by the lord-treaſurer Harley, when he thought to ingratiate himſelf with the Whigs, and laſtly by lord Bolingbroke, who wanted a colleague to ſupport him in power, and great promiſes were made to the duke. His grace, indeed, ſeemed to be ſo elated with the proſpect of returning greatneſs, that he for once loſt ſight of that prudence which had hitherto been the invariable guide of his conduct: he affected to make a kind of public entry; about two hundred of the inhabitants of Southwark, with their member at their head, reſolved to meet and attend him through the Borough; he was likewiſe eſcorted as he paſſed through the city by a like number on horſe-back. He was deſervedly cenſured by all moderate people for his conduct, which was a flagrant inſult upon the queen's memory, who was but juſt dead, and to whoſe partial friendſhip, when living, he had owed perhaps as much as to his own merit (conſummate as that was repreſented), the ſurpriſing pitch of grandeur and power to which he arrived. But to proceed.

The king having entruſted the adminiſtration of his German dominions to his brother, prince Erneſt, and a council, and made all the neceſſary preparations for his journey, ſet out from Herenhauſen† on the laſt day of Auguſt, with the prince royal his ſon. On the fifth of September he arrived at the Hague, where he was complimented on his acceſſion, by a ſolemn deputation from the States, and by all the foreign miniſters. On the ſixteenth he embarked for England, under convoy of a ſquadron of Britiſh and Dutch men of war, commanded by the earl of Berkley, vice-admiral of the red‡, and arrived the next day in the Hope. On the eighteenth he landed, with the prince, at Greenwich, where they they were attended by the lords of the regency, the great officers of ſtate, and a vaſt number of nobility and gentry. Many were honoured with particular marks of reſpect, but the duke of Ormond, and others concerned in the late meaſures, were coldly received; and the next day his grace was removed from his office of captain-general, which was reſtored to the duke of Marlborough. On the twentieth, his majeſty, attended by two hundred coaches and ſix, made his public entry through the city to St. James's, in the moſt grand and magnificent manner, amidſt innumerable crowds of people, and the loudeſt acclamations of joy. In fine, as I have already obſerved, no king ever came to a throne with a greater proſpect of an happy and tranquil reign; however, the event ſhewed, that George knew little of the real diſpoſitions of his new ſubjects, which his miniſters concealed from him, or were themſelves impoſed upon.

The reader may rememember what has been ſaid in ſeveral parts of this hiſtory in relation to the Whigs and Tories: it is well known, the mutual animoſity and hatred of theſe two parties, which were carried to a degree of phrenzy, brought Charles I. to the ſcaffold, and operated a ſurpriſing revolution in affairs towards the latter part of the late queen's reign. The ſame cauſes continuing ſtill to operate, made her ſucceſſor totter on his throne before he was well ſeated in it. Till very lately the whole weight of authority had been in the hands of the Tories, while the Whigs remained without credit or influence, and had the additional mortification to ſee their chief patrons and ſupporters in diſgrace or exile. The high-church men indulged themſelves in an inſolent triumph over their fallen enemies; while the low-church party, bereft of all means of revenge, were obliged to keep a reſpectful ſilence, which proceeded rather from conſcious inability than motives of virtue or patriotiſm. The new government was leſs attentive to the religious cauſes of the hatred that ſubſiſted between the two parties, than to the influence which either of thoſe parties might have on the affairs of ſtate. The king had taken a ſtrong prepoſſeſſion againſt the Tories, whom he had been miſled to look upon as Jacobites, and thought the Whigs his only true friends; upon which he threwaſide all reſerve, and declared openly in their favour. An inſtantaneous and total change was effected in all offices of honour and advantage. I ſhall mention only ſome of the chief: lord Cowper (afterwards earl Cowper) was again made lord-chancellor; the earl of Wharton, lord privy-ſeal; the earl of Nottingham (who had oppoſed the meaſures of the late miniſtry), preſident of the council; the earl of Sunderland, lord-lieutenant of Ireland; the duke of Devonſhire, lord-ſteward of the houſehold; James Stanhope, eſq. (the general), and the duke of Montroſe, ſecretaries of ſtate, the former in the room of William Bromley, eſq. and the latter in the room of the earl of Mar; the duke of Somerſet, maſter of the horſe; the duke of Argyll, general and commander in chief of the forces in Scotland; William Pulteney, eſq. ſecretary of war; Robert Walpole, eſq. pay-maſter-general of the army; and Allan Broderick, eſq. lord-chancellor of Ireland, in the room of ſir Conſtantine Phipps, who had rendered himſelf very obnoxious to the Whig party. On the twenty-ninth of September, his majeſty diſſolved the privy-council, and appointed a new one. Soon after, there were new commiſſions for the treaſury, and admiralty: Charles, lord Hallifax, was made firſt commiſſioner of the treaſury; ſir Richard Onſlow, chancellor of the Exchequer; Edward, earl of Orford, firſt commiſſioner of the admiralty; and John Aiſlabie, eſq. treaſurer of the navy: the duke of Shrewſbury kept his poſt of lord-chamberlain. In a word, the whole nation was delivered into the hands of the Whigs, and the Tories were in their turn reduced to the ſame ſtate of humiliation in which they had ſo lately exultingly beheld their adverſaries.

His majeſty having aſſembled his privy-council two days after his arrival in town, was pleaſed to make a declaration to the following effect: "That it was his firm purpoſe to do all that was in his power for the ſupporting and maintaining the churches of England and Scotland, as they were ſeverally by law eſtabliſhed, which, he was of opinion, might be effectually done, without the leaſt impairing the toleration allowed by law to proteſtant diſſenters, ſo agreeable to Chriſtian charity, and ſo neceſſary to the trade and riches of this kingdom."

The prince-royal George Auguſtus (afterwards our moſt gracious ſovereign George II.) was now declared prince of Wales; and addreſſes, congratulating his majeſty's acceſſion, were preſented by the two univerſities, and by all the counties, cities, boroughs, and corporations of the kingdom. On the 11th of October arrived the princeſs of Wales (afterwards queen Caroline) with her two eldeſt daughters, the princeſſes Anne (afterwards princeſs of Orange) and Amelia; the princeſs Caroline came over ſome time after.

On the twentieth of October his majeſty was crowned at Weſtminſter with the uſual ſolemnity, at which the earl of Oxford and lord Bolingbroke aſſiſted. Previous to this ceremony his majeſty was pleaſed to create ſome new peers, and others were promoted to higher titles, as may be ſeen in the note *.

As the demolition of Dunkirk was repreſented not to go on ſo faſt nor ſo effectually as had been ſtipulated by the treaty of Utrecht, Mr. Prior, our reſident at the French court, was ordered to preſent a memorial to haſten this work; as alſo to prevent the canal of Mardyke from being finiſhed. Lewis having returned an equivocal anſwer, Mr. Prior was recalled, and the earl of Stair appointed ambaſſador to the court of Verſailles, where he proſecuted this affair with great vigour. At the ſame time as the barrier-treaty, which was now on the carpet between the emperor and the States-general, was of great conſequence to the trade of this nation, general Cadogan, an intimate friend of the duke of Marlborough, was ſent to Antwerp to aſſiſt at the conferences.

All this time, the manifeſt partiality ſhewn by the court to the Whig party, greatly inflamed the minds of thoſe who were already but too much diſcontented at the late changes; and the Jacobites, impatient at a revolution that took from them all hopes of having the family of the Stuarts again to rule over them, joined the malcontents. The royal party were in many places interrupted in their rejoicings on account of the coronation, by diſorderly and tumultuous rabbles, who, ſetting up the cry of "Down with the Whigs, Sacheverel for ever!" proceeded to numberleſs diſorders. At Briſtol in particular the mob was quite outrageous; and it was not long before London itſelf was infected with riots and tumults. Seditious pamphlets were written and diſperſed without number or decency: breaking windows and pulling down meeting-houſes was now again practiſed; and the Whig faction thought themſelves hardly ſecure, even under the ſhadow of royal protection.

The pretender being informed of theſe diſturbances, thought this a favourable juncture for him to ſtir. Accordingly, he tranſmitted, by the French mail, copies of a printed manifeſto to the dukes of Shrewſbury, Marlborough, Argyll, and other noblemen of the firſt diſtinction. It was ſigned at the top, James R. and dated at Plombieres, the 29th of Auguſt, 1714, N.S. being a kind of manifeſto or declaration of the pretender, aſſerting his claim to the crown of Great Britain. He ſays, "That the Revolution ruined the Engliſh monarchy, laid the foundation of a republican government, and devolved the ſovereign power upon the people." He obſerves, "That when he found the treaty of peace was upon the point of being concluded, without any regard to him, he then publiſhed, in April, 1712, his proteſtation againſt it." He then gives his reaſon of his ſitting ſtill for ſome time paſt, in theſe remarkable words: "Yet, contrary to our expectations, upon the death of the princeſs our ſiſter (of whoſe good intentions towards us we could not for ſome time paſt well doubt; and this was the reaſon we then ſat ſtill, expecting the good effects thereof, which were unfortunately prevented by her deplorable death) we found that our people, inſtead of taking this favourable opportunity of retrieving the honour and true intereſt of their country, by doing us and themſelves juſtice, had immediately proclaimed for their king a foreign prince, to our prejudice, contrary to the fundamental and inconteſtible laws of hereditary right, which their pretended acts of ſettlement can never abrogate."

* James lord Chandos was created earl of Caernarvon; Lewis, lord Rockingham, earl of that name; Charles, lord Oſſulſton, earl of Tankerville; Charles, lord Halifax, earl of Halifax; Heneage, lord Guernſey, earl of Aylesford; John, lord Hervey, earl of Briſtol; Thomas, lord Pelham, earl of Clare; Henry, earl of Thomond, in Ireland, viſcount Tadcaſter; James, viſcount Caſſleton in Ireland, baron Sanderſon; Bennet, lord Sherrard in Ireland, baron of Harborough; Gervaſe, lord Pierrepont, in Ireland, baron Pierrepont, in the county of Bucks; Henry Boyle, baron of Carleton, in the county of York; ſir Richard Temple, baron of Cobham, in the county of Kent; Henry, lord Paget, earl of Uxbridge.

The copies of this manifeſto being delivered to the ſecretaries of ſtate, his majeſty thought fit to forbid the marquis de Lamberti, miniſter from the duke of Lorraine, to appear at court, alleging that this affair could not have been tranſacted without the knowlege and countenance of his maſter, who gave an aſylum at his court to the Chevalier de St. George. In vain did the duke of Lorraine deny his having been privy to this matter, and make the utmoſt conceſſions. His miniſter was given to underſtand, that the friendſhip of the king of England was to be purchaſed only by driving that wretched wanderer from his dominions; and as the duke would not comply with this condition, his miniſter withdrew from the kingdom.

Religion was now (as it ever had been ſince the firſt riſe of the Whigs and Tories) brought in as a pretext to cover the political views of both factions. The high-churchmen complained, that impiety and hereſy daily gained ground, from the infamous negligence of the Whig prelates. The lower houſe of convocation had, after the queen's death, declared, that a book lately publiſhed by Dr. Samuel Clarke, under the title of "The Scripture Doctrine of the Trinity," contained aſſertions contrary to the orthodox faith. The matter was repreſented to the biſhops. The doctor wrote an apology for his work, which was ſatisfactory to their lordſhips; but the lower houſe reſolved, that it was no recantation of his heretical aſſertions. Thus ſtood the affair at the queen's death; and the diſpute about the Trinity increaſing, on the eleventh of December were publiſhed by authority, "Directions to the archbiſhops and biſhops for preſerving unity in the church, the purity of the Catholic faith concerning the Holy Trinity, and for maintaining the quiet and peace of the ſtate." By theſe every preacher was forbid to deliver any other doctrine concerning the Trinity than what is maintained in the holy ſcriptures, is agreeable to the three creeds, and is conſonant with the thirty-nine articles of religion; to indulge in bitter and virulent invectives againſt any perſons whatever; and to intermeddle in the leaſt with affairs of ſtate or government. The like prohibition was extended to thoſe who ſhould write, harangue, or diſpute on the ſame ſubjects.

The preſent parliament conſiſting chiefly of Tory members, it was judged altogether improper to indulge it in a longer continuance at this critical juncture: it was reſolved to have one that would prove more favourable to the views of the court. Accordingly, on the fifth of January, 1715, a proclamation was publiſhed for diſſolving the parliament, and on the fifteenth another was iſſued for calling a new one. This proclamation ſeems to have been dictated without the leaſt regard to true policy, or the preſent diſpoſitions of the people. The king therein expatiated upon his undoubted right to the crown; he complained of the evil deſigns of men diſaffected to his ſucceſſion; he declared his reſolution to maintain the toleration in its utmoſt force; he repreſented the affairs of the kingdom as in a caſe of utter deſtruction, as well in reſpect to the trade and interruption of its navigation, as to the great debts of the nation, which, he ſaid, had been very much increaſed ſince the concluſion of the laſt war. "We do not therefore doubt, added he, that if the enſuing elections ſhould be made by our ſubjects, with that ſafety and freedom to which by law they are entitled, and which I am firmly reſolved to maintain to them, they will ſend up to parliament the fitteſt perſons to redreſs the preſent diſorders, and to provide for the peace and happineſs of our kingdom, and eaſe of our people for the future; and that in their choice of members, they will have a particular regard to ſuch as had ſhewed a firm attachment to the proteſtant ſucceſſion when it was in danger." What could be a greater ſatire upon the conduct of the preceding miniſtry? and were not thoſe infinitely culpable, who, now they had the power to put into the mouth of a ſovereign, an utter ſtranger to the people over whom he was invited to rule, ſentiments which ſavoured more of the vindictive leader of an incenſed party, than of the father and ſovereign of a divided nation, whoſe party-diſtinction this proclamation ſeemed rather calculated to encourage, than to appeaſe or conciliate.

And in fact what was the freedom of elections ſo warmly recommended by this proclamation, but a mere empty expreſſion, ſince, before the writs were iſſued for the new parliament, the court was well aſſured that ſuch members only would be returned as might be agreeable to them. The perſons were in fact appointed before the returns were made. It is well known that the principal aim of all miniſters is to ſecure a majority in parliament to ſecond their views and projects; and although at firſt ſight it may appear no eaſy matter to get ſuch a number of different perſons, moſt of them wholly unacquainted, or unconnected with a court, and who owe their right of repreſentation, in all outward appearance, to the unbiaſſed ſuffrages of their fellow-citizens, the freeſt of all elections, to concur in promoting the intereſts of one or two particular men: yet ſuch is the weight of miniſterial influence on ſuch occaſions, that they can generally ſecure the greateſt part of the multitude who have the nomination of theſe repreſentatives: they make choice of ſome clever, active, inſinuating perſon; one who has ſome weight and property in the county where he reſides. This man is, as it were, the ſoul of the ſeveral meetings who aſſemble on theſe occaſions; and where he votes, the bulk of the other electors are generally ſure to follow. One or two ſuch perſons in a county once gained, the miniſter is pretty ſure of carrying his point. The common people ſeldom conſult reaſon in their choice of a repreſentative. Imagination does the chief part of the work; and whoever can ſucceed in raiſing their hatred, or exciting their love, by ſome artful repreſentation, may determine them to whatever party he pleaſes. During the greateſt part of the reign of queen Anne, the Whigs were brought into univerſal diſcredit by their enemies, repreſenting the great abuſe the duke of Marlborough and his creatures made of their power, by endeavouring to ſubvert the monarchy and the eſtabliſhed church, and draining the nation of its riches to prolong a ruinous war, in order to fill their own coffers, and get every place of power and profit into their own hands. The light in which theſe things were repreſented operated all the effect that was deſired: the giddy populace, who a moment before were for continuing the war till France was made a province to Great Britain, and Lewis XIV. brought over in chains to London, ſuddenly changed their note, and joined in one general cry for peace. Marlborough, who had for many years been the idol of the nation, was now diſcarded and ſtripped of his employments; and ſo far was he from being pitied in his fall, that it was made a kind of merit to cenſure and revile him. As ſoon as a change of government happened, and that the new court appeared to adopt ſentiments altogether the reverſe of thoſe which had prevailed in the preceding reign, the minds of the people were wrought upon by arguments of a different ſtamp. The former miniſtry were now loaded with the moſt injurious aſperſions: the Tories were repreſented as traitors to the conſtitution of their country, who endeavoured to reſtore popery and tyranny: the peace was vilified as the moſt ſhameful and diſhonourable to the nation that ever had been made; and the moſt enthuſiaſtic praiſes now ſucceeded the venomous obloquies which had been laviſhed upon the character and conduct of the great general. Uncommon was the vigour which each party exerted in the elections for the parliament; the Whigs, however, had the moneyed intereſt on their ſide, and the countenance of the miniſtry; ſo that they had the pleaſure to find a great majority of their party returned both for England and Scotland.

The new parliament met on the fourteenth day of March, when Mr. Spencer Compton was choſen ſpeaker of the commons. On the twenty-firſt the king came to the houſe of peers, and delivered to the chancellor a written ſpeech, which was read in preſence of both houſes, and was conceived in the following terms:

" My lords and gentlemen,

" This being the firſt opportunity that I have had of meeting my people in parliament ſince it pleaſed Almighty God of his providence to call me to the throne of my anceſtors, I moſt gladly make uſe of it to thank my faithful and loving ſubjects for that zeal and firmneſs that hath been ſhewn in defence of the proteſtant ſucceſſion, againſt all the open and ſecret practices that have been uſed to defeat it; and I ſhall never forget the obligations I have to thoſe who have diſtinguiſhed themſelves upon this occaſion.

" It were to be wiſhed that the unparalleled ſucceſſes of a war, which was ſo wiſely and chearfully ſupported by this nation, in order to procure a good peace, had been attended with a ſuitable concluſion: but it is with concern I muſt tell you, that ſome conditions, even of this peace, eſſential to the ſecurity and trade of Great Britain, are not duly executed; and the performance of the whole may be looked upon as precarious, until we have formed defenſive alliances to guaranty the preſent treaties.

" The pretender, who ſtill reſides at Lorraine, threatens to diſturb us, and boaſts of the aſſiſtance which he ſtill expects here to repair his former diſappointments.

" A great part of our trade is rendered impracticable. This, if not retrieved, muſt deſtroy our manufactures, and ruin our navigation.

" The public debts are very great, and ſurprizingly encreaſed ſince the fatal ceſſation of arms. My firſt care was to prevent a further increaſe of thoſe debts, by paying off forthwith a great number of ſhips which had been kept in pay, when there was no occaſion for continuing ſuch an expence.

" Gentlemen of the houſe of commons,

" I rely upon you for ſuch ſupplies as the preſent circumſtances of our affairs require, for this year's ſervice, and for the ſupport of the public faith. The eſtimates ſhall be laid before you, that you may conſider of them; and what you ſhall judge neceſſary for your ſafety, I ſhall think ſufficient for mine.

" I doubt not but you will concur with me in opinion, that nothing can contribute more to the ſupport and credit of the nation, than a ſtrict obſervance of all parliamentary engagements.

" The branches of the revenue formerly granted for the ſupport of the civil government, are ſo far incumbered and alienated, that the produce of the funds which remain, and have been granted to me, will fall much ſhort of what was at firſt deſigned for maintaining the honour and dignity of the crown: and ſince it is my happineſs (as I am confident you think it yours) to ſee a prince of Wales, who may in due time ſucceed me on the throne; and to ſee him bleſſed with many children, the beſt and moſt valuable pledges of our care and concern for your poſterity; this muſt occaſion an expence to which the nation has not for many years been accuſtomed, but ſuch as ſurely no man will grudge; and therefore I do not doubt but you will think of it with that affection which I have reaſon to hope for from you.

" My lords and gentlemen,

" The eyes of all Europe are upon you, waiting the iſſue of this firſt ſeſſion. Let no unhappy diviſions of parties here at home divert you from purſuing the common intereſt of your country. Let no wicked inſinuations diſquiet the minds of my ſubjects. The eſtabliſhed conſtitution in church and ſtate ſhall be the rule of my goverment; the happineſs, eaſe, and proſperity of my people, ſhall be the chief care of my life: thoſe who aſſiſt me in carrying on theſe meaſures I ſhall always eſteem my beſt friends; and I doubt not but that I ſhall be able, with your aſſiſtance, to diſappoint the deſigns of thoſe who would deprive me of that bleſſing which I moſt value, the affection of my people."

There were ſeveral expreſſions in this ſpeech which gave great umbrage to all thinking people, and ſhew the miniſtry either to have had very little policy, or elſe to have been ſure of carrying all their points, when they could put into the mouth of their royal maſter a ſpeech that ſeemed calculated rather to increaſe the unhappy diviſions that already diſtracted the kingdom, than to conciliate the minds of the people to a new government: but ſuch muſt ever be the misfortune of thoſe princes, who, from want of underſtanding the language, manners, and diſpoſition of thoſe they are called to rule over, are obliged to act as others ſhall point out to them, who on ſuch occaſions never fail to conſult the gratification of their own intereſts and paſſions before the real good of their country. Thus it was now; his majeſty was made to expreſs himſelf, in ſuch a manner as portended meaſures that it was the intereſt of the crown to avoid, and ſuited the temper of the majority of the houſe, which breathed nothing but deſtruction to their political adverſaries.

The addreſſes of the two houſes were perfectly agreeable to the king's ſpeech. The lords expreſſed their hopes that his majeſty, aſſiſted by the parliament, would be able to recover the reputation of the kingdom in foreign parts, the loſs of which they would endeavour to convince the world by their actions was by no means to be imputed to the nation in general.

The commons, on their part, declared their aſtoniſhment at finding that any condition of the late peace ſhould not yet be duly executed, and that care had not been taken to form ſuch alliances as might have rendered the peace not precarious; that they could not obſerve, without reſentment, that the duke of Lorraine, notwithſtanding the repreſentations of this court, ſtill continued to furniſh an aſylum to the pretender to the crown of theſe realms, who had the preſumption, by declarations from thence, to ſtir up his majeſty's ſubjects to rebellion; but that what raiſed their indignation to the higheſt degree was, that it appeared from theſe manifeſtos, that his hopes were built upon the meaſures which had for ſome time paſt been taken in Great Britain: that they would make it their buſineſs to enquire into theſe fatal miſcarriages; to trace out the nature of theſe pernicious meaſures, and to bring the authors of them to condign puniſhment.

Theſe addreſſes, ſo flattering to the views of the new miniſtry, were not, however, carried without a warm oppoſition. In the houſe of lords the dukes of Buckingham and Shrewſbury, the earl of Angleſey, the archbiſhop of York, and other peers, as well ſecular as eccleſiaſtical, excepted againſt the laſt expreſſion in the lords addreſs, alleging, among other things, that it was injurious to the late queen's memory, and claſhed with that part of his majeſty's ſpeech which recommended to both houſes the avoiding the unhappy diviſions of parties; and that it was unjuſt to condemn perſons without firſt hearing them.

In the lower houſe ſir William Wyndham, Mr. Bromley, Mr. Shippen, Mr. Hungerford, ſir William Whitelocke, and other members, objected to paſſages of the ſame nature in the addreſs which the commons had drawn up. General Roſs inſiſted, " That the condemning the peace, and cenſuring the miniſters, was a reflection on the deceaſed queen, whoſe act the peace was; and that reflecting on the late queen could not be conceived to be very agreeable to his preſent majeſty." Sir William Wyndham in particular endeavoured to prove, that the peace had been very beneficial to this kingdom, and offered to produce a liſt, by which it appeared that the cuſtoms had increaſed near one hundred thouſand pounds per annum. Theſe gentlemen were anſwered by Mr. Walpole, Mr. Pulteney, Mr. ſecretary Stanhope, and ſir Gilbert Heathcote, who declared that nothing was farther from their intention than to aſperſe the memory of the late queen: on the contrary, their wiſh and deſign was to vindicate her memory, by expoſing and puniſhing thoſe evil counſellors who had deluded her into pernicious meaſures; whereas the oppoſite party endeavoured to blacken and diſgrace her memory, by loading it with all that odium which was only due to their deſtructive counſels: that the addreſs, however, only condemned the peace, without affecting particular perſons, who, as they ought in juſtice, ſo they might depend upon it, they never ſhould be condemned without a fair trial. They obſerved, that the late negotiators had induſtriouſly circulated a report, that the preſent miniſtry would not attempt to call them to an account for their proceedings, but only to cenſure them in general terms; but that the falſity of this report ſhould ſoon be demonſtrated: that notwithſtanding the endeavours which had been uſed to prevent a diſcovery of the late miſmanagment, by conveying away ſecret papers from the Secretaries Office; yet the government had ſufficient evidence againſt the late miniſtry, which would in a little time be laid before the houſe, when ſuch things, they ſaid, would come to light, as would by no means redound to the honour of the late adminiſtration *. After all, the addreſs was carried by a majority of two hundred and forty-four votes againſt one hundred and thirty-eight.

It ſeems, that before the meeting of the parliament, all the papers of the earl of Strafford, late ambaſſador from queen Anne to the States-general, had been ſeized by an order from the new Secretaries Office. Mr. Prior had alſo been recalled from France, and had ſuffered himſelf to be ſo intimidated by the threats of the preſent miniſtry, that he had promiſed to reveal all he knew relating to the ſteps of Oxford's adminiſtration.

The Whig party now drove Jehu-like; and nothing but the blood of thoſe who had firmly oppoſed them ſeemed capable of ſatisfying their vindictive diſpoſition; wherefore lord Bolingbroke, who had hitherto appeared in the houſe of lords, as uſual, and had ever ſpoke in the whole on the addreſs with great freedom and confidence, finding that thoſe in power were determined to puſh matters to extremity; and hearing that Prior, who had ſo ſcandalouſly betrayed his friends, was landed at Dover, thought it now high time to conſult his perſonal ſafety, and on the twenty-ſeventh of March embarked for Calais, and ſo quitted the kingdom. At his departure, however, he left a letter, which was afterwards printed in his Juſtification.

In this paper he declared he had received certain and repeated intelligence, that a reſolution was taken to purſue him to the ſcaffold: that, if there had been the leaſt reaſon to hope for a fair trial, after having been already prejudged by the two houſes of parliament, he ſhould not have declined the ſtricteſt examination: that he challenged the moſt inveterate of his enemies to produce any one inſtance of criminal correſpondence, or the leaſt corruption in any part of the adminiſtration in which he was concerned: that if his zeal for the honour and dignity of his royal miſtreſs, and the true intereſt of his country, had any-where tranſported him to let drop an unguarded expreſſion, he hoped the moſt favourable conſtruction would be put upon it: that he had ſerved her majeſty faithfully, in that eſpecially which ſhe had moſt at heart, relieving her people from a bloody and expenſive war: and that he had always been too much an Engliſhman to ſacrifice the intereſt of his country to any foreign ally whatſoever.

As for the earl of Oxford, he beheld unmoved the ſtorm that was now gathering round his head. He wore an unembarraſſed, and even chearful, countenance; declaring his innocence and freedom from guilt, and expoſed the folly and inveteracy of the Whigs, who laboured to fix upon him the imputation of having ſecretly prepared the way for the reſtoration of the pretender, ſince, as he juſtly obſerved, no miniſtry that had the leaſt regard to their own ſafety, could be ſuppoſed to harbour, and ſeek to promote, a deſign ſo repugnant to the inclinations of the people. Indeed the late miniſtry had the conſolation to find many friends in the midſt of the perſecution raiſed againſt them, who boldly eſpouſed their cauſe; and ſeveral reſpectable counties ſent addreſſes to the king, approving of the peace, and of the meaſures purſued by the late queen's miniſters: the former they declared to be general, ſolid, honourable, and extremely advantageous to the people of England. Nay, ſome individuals had courage enough to attack the preſent adminiſtration. Sir William Wyndham aſſerted in the houſe of commons, that the proclamation which the miniſtry had procured for diſſolving the parliament, was not only unprecedented and unwarrantable, but even of dangerous conſequence to the very being of parliaments. This ſpirited declaration threw the oppoſite party into a violent rage. To the Tower! to the Tower! was the general cry: but that was over-ruled; and ſir William being ordered to withdraw, he was followed by one hundred and twenty-nine members. Thoſe remained in the houſe reſolved that he ſhould be reprimanded by the ſpeaker. He was then called in, and Mr. Speaker rebuked him in the following terms:

"Sir William Wyndham,

"I am to acquaint you, that the houſe is come to this reſolution, that you be reprimanded in your place by me.

"You have preſumed to reflect on his majeſty's proclamation, and made an unwarrantable uſe of the freedom of ſpeech granted by his majeſty.

"This houſe has made their moderation appear, and ſhewn their lenity, by laying the mildeſt cenſure your offence was capable of: I am ordered to reprimand you, and do reprimand you accordingly."

To which ſir William replied:

"Sir,

"I return you many thanks for what you have done, by the duty of your office, in ſo candid and gentlemanlike manner. As I am a member of this houſe, I very well know I muſt acquieſce in the determination of this houſe: but I am not conſcious of any indignity to his majeſty, or any breach of the privilege of this houſe; and therefore I have no thanks to give thoſe gentlemen, who, under pretence of lenity, have brought this cenſure upon me *."

Three days after, the commons entered upon that buſineſs they ſeemed to have moſt at heart, the bringing the late miniſtry to diſgrace and puniſhment. On the ninth of April, Mr. ſecretary Stanhope delivered to the houſe of commons the ſeveral papers (making fourteen large volumes) relating to the negociations of peace and commerce and ceſſation of arms; and moved that they might be referred to a ſelect committee of twenty-one perſons, who ſhould digeſt the ſubſtance of them under proper heads, and report them, with their obſervations, to the houſe. This was agreed to; the members of the committee were choſen by ballot †; and ſo eager were the Whigs to begin their work, that they met the ſame evening. Mr. Robert Walpole, who had been choſen chairman, being taken ill, his place was ſupplied by Mr. Stanhope: the whole number was ſubdivided into three committees, to each of whom a certain number of books (of the papers) were allotted, who proceeded very vigorouſly in their enquiries ‡.

On the thirteenth of May there was a great debate in the houſe of commons about the civil liſt, which the court party were for ſettling on his majeſty in the ſame manner, and to the like amount, as it had been granted to king William. This was ſtrongly oppoſed by the Tories, who alleged, that the ſeven hundred thouſand pounds granted annually to that prince, was ſubject to the payment of fifty thouſand pounds per annum to the late queen, then princeſs of Denmark, twenty thouſand pounds to the duke of Gloceſter, and forty thouſand pounds as a dowry to James's queen; laſtly, they obſerved, that after the late queen's acceſſion to the throne, the parliament finding the civil liſt revenues exceeded what they had been given for, it had taken near two hundred thouſand pounds per annum out of them for other uſes; notwithſtanding which deduction, her majeſty had honourably maintained her family, and ſupported the dignity of the crown. Theſe arguments, however, were of little avail; the Whigs had now every thing in their power, and it was carried without diviſion, that the ſum of ſeven hundred thouſand pounds ſhould be granted annually for the civil liſt, during his majeſty's life ‖. There was another warm debate a few days after, upon a motion for an addreſs againſt penſions, made by the Tory party. Mr. Robert Walpole ſtood up to oppoſe this motion, and urged, "that the houſe ought not to ſtint the king's beneficence, nor to debar him from the exerciſe of the moſt glorious branch of his prerogative, which is to beſtow his favours on ſuch as diſtinguiſh themſelves in his ſervice." He was ſeconded by Mr. Hampden, who obſerved, that all the penſions did not amount to twenty-five thouſand pounds. In the end, the motion was rejected, though by a ſmall majority only §.

On the thirtieth of May, the lords took into conſideration the bill for regulating the land-forces; which, after ſome oppoſition, was paſſed, with a few neceſſary amendments ¶.

About this time the nation was engaged in a diſpute of a very ſerious nature with the court of Sweden. This had begun before the queen's death, and was occaſioned by the Swediſh privateers taking many of our ſhips, which, with their cargoes, they confiſcated, under pretence that we aſſiſted and ſupplied the czar and his ſubjects with ſhips, ammunition, &c. contrary, as was ſuggeſted, to our treaties with the crown of Sweden. Mr. Jackſon, her majeſty's miniſter at Stockholm, had preſented ſeveral memorials on the ſubject of theſe captures, without receiving any ſatisfactory anſwer; and therefore it was now thought expedient to make uſe of more effectual means, namely, the ſending a ſtrong ſquadron of men of war into the Baltic. The States-general alſo, whoſe veſſels had ſhared the ſame fate with ours, found themſelves obliged, after all pacific methods had been tried in vain, to have recourſe to the ſame meaſures, in order to protect the commerce of their ſubjects.

This once reſolved, a ſquadron of twenty ſail was appointed for this ſervice, and the command given to ſir John Norris, who was then admiral of the blue, and who had ſir Thomas Hardy, rear-admiral of the ſame ſquadron, to aſſiſt him. The fleet ſailed from the Nore on the eighteenth of May, and arrived in the Sound on the tenth of June following; where finding the Dutch already arrived, it was determined, in a council of war, that the combined fleet ſhould proceed together, with the Engliſh and Dutch merchantmen under their convoy, for their reſpective ports; which they performed accordingly by the cloſe of the month.

Sir John Norris having ſent an expreſs to the court of Stockholm, in order to be ſatisfied whether the Swedes were determined to continue the ſeizing and confiſcating our ſhips; or if they would enter into a negociation, for determining in an amicable manner all diſputes between the two nations, and receiving only a vague and uncertain anſwer, he reſolved to proceed according to his inſtructions. About the middle of Auguſt the Daniſh fleet, conſiſting of twenty ſhips of the line, with the Ruſſian ſquadron, joined the Engliſh and Dutch, and ſailed up the Baltic. As the czar of Muſcovy was at this time at Copenhagen, and deſigned to command his own ſhips, ſeveral conſultations were held to regulate the command of the ſeveral ſquadrons of different nations then in that road, which together were called the Confederate Fleet. It was at laſt reſolved to give the chief command of it to his czariſh majeſty; but ſo that ſir John Norris ſhould command the vanguard of the united fleet; the czar, the body of the line of battle; the Daniſh admiral, count Gueldenlew, the rear; and the Dutch commodore, with his ſquadron and five Britiſh men of war, ſhould proceed with the trade of both nations for their reſpective harbours in the Baltic. According to this reſolution, on the ſixteenth of Auguſt, the czar hoiſted his imperial flag, as admiral, on board one of his fineſt ſhips, and was thereupon immediately ſaluted by ſir John Norris with a diſcharge of his cannon, which was followed by the Daniſh and Dutch; and theſe compliments being paid, his czariſh majeſty gave the ſignal for ſailing. Being arrived off Bornholm *, they were informed that the Swediſh fleet was returned to Carlſcroon: the Swedes had at this time a numerous fleet, and in pretty good condition; but they were too wiſe was obſerved, that after the light growing fainter and fainter, as the moon advanced over the ſun's diſk, the total darkneſs came on inſtantaneouſly, as when a candle is extinguiſhed by night, as ſoon as the eaſtern limb (or rim) of the ſun was covered; as did the light in the ſame manner, when the moon left its weſtern limb. This extraordinary phænomenon was much obſerved by Dr. Halley, Mr. Whiſton, and all our eminent aſtronomers, who had before, with great exactneſs, calculated the time and manner of it.

The ſame month died Dr. Gilbert Burnet, biſhop of Salisbury, famous for his excellent Hiſtory of the Reformation, and other writings, and a great advocate for the Revolution, which made him many enemies. The marquis of Wharton died alſo about this time, as did the earl of Hallifax not long after. The marquis of Wharton was a man of a fine genius, an able ſtateſman and politician, and a great leader among the Whigs.

¶ Proceedings of the Houſe of Lords.

* Bornhorn, an Iſland of Zealand, in Denmark, lying in the Eaſt-ſea, ſixteen miles from the extreme point of Seeland, and ſix from Yſtad, in Schonen. It is about ſeven miles in length, and four in breadth. The coaſt is, in moſt places, inacceſſible, on account of its dangerous rocks; and the landing-place defended with cannon. Since the inhabitants revolted from Sweden to Denmark, in 1658, Bornholm is become an hereditary part of the latter.

to hazard it againſt ſuch an unequal force as that of the confederates. Sir John Norris therefore, after lying in the Sound till the middle of November, left a ſquadron of ſhips of war, under the command of commodore Cleyland, in the Baltic, to act in conjunction with the Danes and Dutch, for the farther ſecurity of the Britiſh trade, if neceſſary.

It was not the protection of our commerce only, that occaſioned this expedition to the Baltic: his majeſty, as elector of Hanover, had ſome diſputes with the king of Sweden of quite a different nature; for having purchaſed from the crown of Denmark the duchies of Bremen and Verden, which had been taken from the crown of Sweden, he found himſelf obliged, in quality of elector, to concur with Denmark in declaring war againſt Sweden; and even before this was done, ſome Engliſh ſhips joined the Daniſh fleet, in order to diſtreſs the Swedes. Of this the Swediſh miniſter complained by a memorial, delivered to lord Townſhend, then ſecretary of ſtate, dated October 3, 1715†. The Tories were very loud in their invectives againſt the expedition, in which they aſſerted the honour of the Britiſh flag had been proſtituted, to ſerve the intereſt of another ſtate, and in order to create an intercourſe between the king's regal and electoral dominions.

The nation ſeemed now to labour under a general diſcontent. Notwithſtanding proclamations againſt riots and orders of the juſtices for maintaining the peace, repeated tumults were raiſed in the cities of London and Weſtminſter. A letter from one captain Wright, a diſcarded officer, containing ſome traiterous expreſſions, being intercepted, a reward of fifty pounds was offered by the government to any perſon that ſhould apprehend the captain; and about the ſame time Mr. George Jefferies was ſeized at Dublin, with a pacquet directed to Dr. Jonathan Swift, dean of St. Patrick's. Several treaſonable letters being found in this pacquet, were tranſmitted to England. Jefferies was obliged to give bail for his appearance, and Swift thought proper to abſcond. The houſe of lords, to demonſtrate their abhorrence of all who ſhould engage in conſpiracies againſt their ſovereign, rejected, with indignation, a petition preſented to them in behalf of Blackburn, Caſſils, Bernarde, Meldrum, and Chambers, who had continued priſoners ever ſince the year 1696, for having conſpired againſt the life of king William.

By this time the committee of ſecrecy was ready to deliver their report, and on the ninth of June Mr. Walpole, the chairman, moved, that a warrant might be iſſued for apprehending ſeveral perſons, particularly Mr. Prior and Mr. Thomas Harley, who being in the houſe, were immediately taken into cuſtody: then he read the report, which laſted from about one o'clock till about ſix in the afternoon; which may be reduced to the following heads:

"I. The clandeſtine negociations with Meſnager, the French agent, which produced two ſets of preliminary articles; the one private, for Great Britain only; the other general, for all the allies.

"II. The extraordinary meaſures purſued to form the congreſs at Utrecht.

"III. The trifling amuſements of the French plenipotentiaries at Utrecht, by the connivance of the Britiſh miniſters.

"IV. The negociations about the renunciation of the Spaniſh monarchy.

"V. The fatal ſuſpenſion of arms.

"VI. The ſeizure of Ghent, and Bruges, in order to diſtreſs the allies, and favour the French.

"VII. The duke of Ormond's acting in concert with the French general.

"VIII. The lord Bolingbroke's journey to France, to negotiate a ſeparate peace.

"IX. Mr. Prior's and the duke of Shrewſbury's negociations in France.

"X. The precipitate concluſion of the peace at Utrecht.

"XI. The ſacrificing the Catalans.

"XII. Promoting the intereſt of the pretender."

The report having been taken into conſideration, Mr. Walpole, on the tenth of June, impeached Henry, lord viſcount Bolingbroke, of high-treaſon and other crimes and miſdemeanors; the lord Coningſby afterwards ſtanding up, impeached the earl of Oxford in the following remarkable words: "The worthy chairman has impeached the hand, but I impeach the head; he has impeached the clerk, and I the juſtice; he has impeached the ſcholar, and I the maſter: I impeach Robert, earl of Oxford and earl Mortimer, of high-treaſon and other crimes and miſdemeanors." Many members of unqueſtioned integrity, of both parties, ſeemed to condemn theſe precipitate meaſures; and even ſir Joſeph Jekyll, a member of the committee of ſecrecy, ſaid, that he could not think the houſe had ſufficient matter of evidence to impeach the earl of high-treaſon: but the chairman of the committee declaring, that, beſides the proof contained in the report, they had alſo the enforcement of perſonal evidence, it was reſolved to impeach him without a diviſion. Mr. Prior was at the ſame time, and at the inſtance of Mr. Walpole, ordered into ſtrict cuſtody, without the liberty of pen, ink, paper, or the ſight of any one friend.

On the twenty-firſt of June Mr. ſecretary Stanhope impeached James, duke of Ormond, of high-treaſon, and of other high crimes and miſdemeanors. The duke was defended by Mr. Hutchinſon, Mr. Lumley, Sir William Wyndham, Mr. Onſlow, Mr. Ward, Mr. Hungerford, and ſeveral others of both parties. Sir Joſeph Jekyll, in particular, ſaid, "That if there was room for mercy, he hoped it would be ſhewn to that noble, generous, and courageous peer, who had, in a courſe of many years, exerted thoſe great accompliſhments for the good and honour of his country: that as the ſtatute of Edward III. on which the charge of high-treaſon againſt him was founded, had been mitigated by ſubſequent acts, the houſe ought not, in his opinion, to take advantage of that act againſt the duke, but only to impeach him of high crimes and miſdemeanors." Nevertheleſs, after a very long debate, the queſtion being put, was carried for his impeachment. It was thought his grace's name having been made uſe of as a ſignal for mobs and riots, was one thing that haſtened on his impeachment, "High-church and Ormond forever!" being now as much the cry of the Tory mobs as "High-church and Sacheverel!" The duke's enemies did not fail to repreſent and aggravate theſe circumſtances: they ſaid, that he could not be ignorant of theſe tumults and riots, and that as he did not publicly diſown thoſe diſturbers of the peace, his ſilence muſt be conſidered as an approbation of their conduct, and ſeemed to ſummon the people to a general inſurrection. In ſhort, the duke of Ormond perceiving that he was already prejudged by his enemies, conſulted his own ſafety by withdrawing himſelf from the kingdom *.

The Whig party ſtill continued to conduct every thing by a furious ſpirit of revenge. On the twenty-ſecond of June the earl of Strafford was likewiſe impeached by Mr. Aiſlabie, for having adviſed the fatal ſuſpenſion of arms and the ſeizing Ghent and Bruges, and for having treated the moſt ſerene houſe of Hanover with inſolence and contempt. The biſhop of London (Robinſon) was in favour with the party in power, and therefore, though involved in the ſame guilt (if there was any) with the earl, he was paſſed over unnoticed: the Whigs, indeed, pretended that the biſhop was entirely innocent of the ſecret negociation between France and England, and that he was not admitted to any of thoſe ſecrets which conſtituted the criminal part of the earl's conduct.

The articles of impeachment againſt the earl of of Oxford being prepared by the committee of ſecrecy, they were read, on the eighth of July, before the houſe of commons, and were in ſubſtance as follow:

"I. That he, Robert earl of Oxford and Mortimer, had entered into a negociation with France without the allies, and had agreed it ſhould be kept ſecret.

"II. He had adviſed the queen to permit the coming of Meſnager; treated with him, and aſſumed, without authority, the royal power.

"III. He had prepared preliminaries, ſigned by Meſnager, and ſent them to Holland, when a private treaty was, by his advice, concluded with France.

"IV. He had not regarded the repreſentation of Buis, the Dutch miniſter, but declared the queen had made no ſuch treaty, nor would do ſo, without the conſent of the States.

"V. He had ordered the biſhop of London to inſiſt upon Spain, though by the preliminaries the duke of Anjou was acknowleged as king, and though he had perſuaded the queen not to inſiſt upon the reſtitution of Spain.

"VI. He had not procured ſatisfaction for the allies, but acted in concert with France.

"VII. He had adviſed the queen to accept of the duke of Anjou's renunciation, though Torci had declared it to be null and void by the fundamental laws of France.

"VIII. He had, with others, adviſed that the duke of Ormond ſhould be ordered to engage in no battle or ſiege, to the ruin of the affairs of the allies; and afterwards ſent an order to the biſhop of London, to declare that the queen looked upon herſelf to be under no obligation whatſoever to the States.

"IX. He had adviſed that the duke of Ormond, with all the troops in the queen's pay, ſhould ſeperate themſelves from the army of the allies; and not to pay the arrears due to thoſe that refuſed.

"X. He had adviſed the fatal ſuſpenſion of arms, and the ſending lord Bolingbroke to France, to ſettle the terms.

"XI. He had treacherouſly adviſed the enemy how to gain Tournay.

"XII. He had adviſed and aſſiſted in giving up Spain and the Weſt Indies to the duke of Anjou.

"XIII. He had treacherouſly adviſed the ninth article of the treaty of commerce with France, and the giving the French liberty of fiſhing, and drying their fiſh on Newfoundland.

"XIV. He had taken Sicily from the houſe of Auſtria, and given it to the duke of Savoy, without any application from the duke.

"XV. He had cauſed the queen to make ſeveral ſpeeches and declarations to the parliament, wherein the terms of peace and commerce were falſely repreſented.

"XVI. He had, as far as in him lay, deſtroyed the independency of the houſe of lords, by cauſing the queen to create twelve peers at once, to ſerve his ends."

To theſe were afterwards added the ſix following articles:

"XVII. He had not (as prime miniſter) adviſed the queen againſt the deſtructive expedition to Canada.

"XVIII. He had procured a warrant for thirteen thouſand pounds for his own uſe.

"XIX. He had procured a warrant for five thouſand five hundred and ſixty pounds to his relation, Thomas Harley.

"XX. He had paid a large ſum of money to king James's queen.

"XXI. He had received Patrick Lileſh (alias Lawleſs) an Iriſh papiſt, as a foreign miniſter, and cauſed ſeveral ſums of money to be paid to him.

"XXII. He had, with others, cauſed the Catalans to be expoſed to the fury of an enraged revengeful prince, againſt whom the late queen had engaged them to take arms."

The firſt ten were, upon the queſtion, ſeverally agreed to; but a warm debate aroſe upon the XIth, by which he was charged with having counſelled and adviſed the French king in what manner Tournay might be gained from the States-general, although it had been declared that the town of Tournay ſhould remain to the States, towards forming a ſufficient barrier: a great debate aroſe upon the queſtion, Whether this article was high-treaſon? Sir Robert Raymond, formerly ſolicitor-general, Mr. Bromley, ſir William Wyndham, the auditors Harley and Foley, Mr. Ward, and Mr. Hungerford (who had already ſpoken in favour of the earl of Oxford) maintained the negative, and were ſtrongly ſupported by ſir Joſeph Jekyll. They were oppoſed by Mr. Walpole, Mr. Stanhope, lord Coningſby, general Cadogan, Mr. Boſcawen, and Mr. Aiſlabie; and the article, being amended, was agreed to by a majority of one hundred and twenty. The reſt of the articles being agreed to, the lord Coningſby, (attended by moſt of the members who voted for the impeachment) went up to the lords, and at the bar of the houſe impeached the earl of Oxford of high-treaſon, &c. demanding at the ſame time, that he might be ſequeſtered from parliament and committed to ſafe cuſtody. demand demand produced a debate, Whether or not the earl ſhould be ſo committed? in the courſe of which his lordſhip delivered himſelf to the following effect. "The whole charge, he ſaid, might be reduced to the negociations and concluſion of the peace. That the nation wanted a peace, he ſaid, nobody would deny: that the conditions of this peace were as good as could be expected, conſidering the backwardneſs and reluctance which ſome of the allies ſhewed to come into the queen's meaſures: that the peace was approved by two ſucceſſive parliaments: that he had no ſhare in the affair of Tournay, which was wholly tranſacted by that unfortunate nobleman who had thought fit to ſtep aſide: that, nevertheleſs, he would venture to ſay in his behalf, that, if that charge could be proved, it would not amount to treaſon: that, for his own part, he had always acted by the immediate directions and commands of the late queen, without offending againſt any known law; and being juſtified by his own conſcience, was unconcerned for the life of an inſignificant old man: that if miniſters of ſtate, acting by the immediate commands of their ſovereign, were to be accountable for their proceedings, it might, one day or other, be the caſe with all the members of that auguſt aſſembly: that he doubted not but their lordſhips, out of regard to themſelves, would give him an equitable hearing; and he hoped, that, in the courſe of the enquiry, it would appear, that he had merited, not only the indulgence, but even the favour of the government. My lords, ſaid he, I am now to take my leave of your lordſhips, and of this honourable houſe, perhaps for ever. I ſhall lay down my life, with pleaſure, in a cauſe favoured by my dear royal miſtreſs. When I conſider, that I am to be judged by the juſtice, honour, and virtue of my peers, I ſhall acquieſce, and retire with great content: and, my lords, God's will be done."

Before the queſtion for committing him was put, the duke of Shrewſbury having acquainted the houſe that the earl was very much indiſpoſed with the gravel, he was ſuffered to remain at his own houſe, in cuſtody of the black rod. In his way thither he was attended by a great concourſe of people, crying, "High-church, Ormond and Oxford for ever!" Next day he was brought to the bar, where he received a copy of the articles, and was allowed a month to prepare his anſwer: but, as if his enemies were apprehenſive of ſhewing him too much indulgence, it was reſolved to ſend him to the Tower on the ſixteenth day of July, notwithſtanding Dr. Mead declared that his life would be in imminent danger by being carried thither. The earl was attended to the Tower by a prodigious concourſe of people, who all pitied the condition of this great (though now fallen) ſtateſman, and openly exclaimed againſt his perſecutors. In ſhort, the nation in general was ſo exaſperated againſt the Whigs for their rancorous and bloody proceedings, that tumults were raiſed in Staffordſhire, and other parts of the kingdom, againſt the friends and adherents of the new miniſtry. A general ſpirit of diſcontent, ſo openly manifeſted, could not fail to fill them with alarms for their own ſafety; and it was thought expedient that the houſe of commons ſhould addreſs the king to put the laws againſt rioters vigorouſly in force. A new law, called the Proclamation, or Riot-Act, was prepared, and ſoon after received the royal aſſent, decreeing, that if any perſons, to the number of twelve, unlawfully aſſembled, ſhould continue together one hour, after having been required in his majeſty's name to diſperſe, by a juſtice of the peace, or other officer, and heard the proclamation againſt riots read in public, they ſhould be deemed guilty of felony, without benefit of clergy.

On the twentieth day of July the king went to the houſe of peers to give the royal aſſent to this and ſome other bills *, when he made a ſhort ſpeech to both houſes; in which he told them, that a rebellion was actually begun at home, and that the nation was threatened with an invaſion from abroad: he therefore expected that the commons would not leave the kingdom in a defenceleſs condition, but enable him to take ſuch meaſures as ſhould be neceſſary for the public ſafety. Warm and affectionate addreſſes were immediately preſented by the parliament, and both houſes deſired his majeſty to put the kingdom in a poſture of defence, by increaſing the number of forces both by ſea and land. At the ſame time they ſuſpended the Habeas Corpus act, by which his majeſty might detain the perſons of thoſe whom he ſhould ſuſpect of conſpiring againſt his perſon and government. A reward of one hundred thouſand pounds was offered to ſuch as ſhould ſeize the pretender, dead or alive. Sir George Byng was ſent to take the command of a fleet in the Downs, and ſir John Jennings was ſent to Scotland, where he hoiſted his flag on board the Oxford, as commander in chief of the ſquadron then upon the coaſts; general Erle was haſtened to his government of Portſmouth; the guards were encamped in Hyde-Park: in a word, no precaution was neglected to ſecure the peace of the kingdom at home.

In the midſt of theſe tranſactions the commons added ſix articles to theſe they had already exhibited againſt the earl of Oxford; and two days after, Mr. Walpole delivered the articles of impeachment againſt lord Bolinbroke, at the bar of the houſe of lords. The next day (Auguſt 5) a warm debate aroſe upon reading the articles againſt the duke of Ormond, in which ſeveral remarkable ſpeeches were made: the ſeveral articles, however, were agreed to by a great majority. The firſt article charged the duke with correſponding with marſhal Villars, the French general, while he commanded the Britiſh army in Flanders. The ſecond, that he wickedly promiſed and engaged that he would not attack the French army, nor engage in any ſiege againſt France. The third, that he did falſely, maliciouſly, wickedly, and traitorouſly, adhere to the French king; and, in purſuance of a wicked promiſe he had ſecretly made with the marſhal Villars, he endeavoured to perſuade the general of the confederate army to raiſe the ſiege of Queſnoy; and when he could not prevail, marched off with the queen's troops, and gave the enemy's general advice of it. The other articles are, in effect, his conduct in Flanders, reduced into a charge; and both he and the lord Bolingbroke being fled from juſtice, bills were brought in to ſummon them to ſurrender themſelves by the tenth of September, and in default thereof to attaint them of high-treaſon, which paſſed both houſes, and received the royal aſſent.

* Other acts paſſed at this time were, 1. For continuing the impriſonment of the conſpirators againſt king William. 2. For the quakers affirmation, inſtead of their oath. 3. An act for the regulating the forces. 4. The malt-tax. Laſtly, An act to explain an act of 12 Will. III. for the further limitation of the crown, &c.

On the thirty firſt of Auguſt the articles againſt the earl of Strafford were agreed to by the commons, and carried by Mr. Aiſlabie to the lords, when the earl made a long ſpeech in his own defence. He complained that his papers had been ſeized in an unprecedented manner. He ſaid, that if in his letters or diſcourſe he had dropped any unguarded expreſſions againſt ſome foreign miniſters, while he had the honour to repreſent the crown of Great Britain, he hoped they would not be accounted criminal by a Britiſh houſe of peers. He deſired he might be allowed a competent time to anſwer the articles brought againſt him, and to have duplicates of all the papers which had either been laid before the committee of ſecrecy, or remained in the hands of the government, to be uſed occaſionally in his juſtification. This requeſt was warmly oppoſed by ſeveral of the Whiggiſh noblemen, until the earl of Ilay obſerved, that in all civilized nations, all courts of judicature, except the Inquiſition, allowed the perſons arraigned all that was neceſſary for their juſtification; and that the houſe of peers of Great Britain ought not in this caſe to do any thing contrary to that honour and equity for which they were ſo juſtly renowned throughout all Europe. The houſe, influenced by theſe obſervations, reſolved that the earl ſhould be indulged with copies of ſuch papers he might think neceſſary for his defence *.

The duke of Ormond and the lord viſcount Bolingbroke having neglected to ſurrender themſelves within the time limited by the proclamation, the houſe of lords ordered the earl-marſhal to raze out of the liſt of peers their names and armorial bearings. Inventories were taken of their perſonal eſtates; and the duke's atchievement, as knight of the Garter, was taken from St. George's Chapel at Windſor.

By this time a rebellion was actually begun in Scotland, under the earl of Mar, who hoped to be ſupported by a ſtrong party in England. This nobleman, at the death of queen Anne, was ſecretary of ſtate for Scotland, and was one of the firſt to congratulate the preſent ſovereign on his acceſſion; but not meeting with the countenance or encouragement which he expected, occaſioned by his having joined in the meaſures of the late miniſters, he, about the beginning of Auguſt, withdrew from London into the Highlands, where, prompted by reſentment and ambition, he reſolved to make an effort in favour of the pretender. The Scots were undoubtedly at this time univerſally diſguſted, by the introduction of the malt-tax, and ſome other grievances they had ſuffered in conſequence of the Union: and the Jacobites, who fondly and fooliſhly imagined, that all who were diſſatisfied from theſe cauſes entertained the ſame ſentiments with themſelves, tranſmitted a memorial to the pretender, in which they aſſured him that the nation was wholly diſaffected to the new government, and that his appearance in Britain would produce an immediate revolution.

The pretender, on receiving this invitation, reſolved to take advantage of this favourable diſpoſition. He had recourſe to the French king, who ſtill entertained a deſire of raiſing him to the throne of Great Britain, and would, in all probability, have ſupported him powerfully; but he was taken off by death on the firſt day of September. This event occaſioned a total change in the face of affairs: the regency of that kingdom had devolved to the duke of Orleans, who had neither the power nor the inclination to ſacrifice the treaſures of the ſtate he governed, to ſupport the intereſts of a wretched exile, who had very little proſpect of attaining that crown he laid a claim to. Beſides, the duke-regent could not, without manifeſt danger, begin his regency by breaking irretrievably with England, whoſe friendſhip it was at this time his intereſt to preſerve. However, to ſecure appearances, he furniſhed him with a ſum of money, and a ſmall quantity of arms, but never intended to ſupport him in earneſt.

Mean while the Jacobites had proceeded too far to think of retreating with any ſafety, and therefore determined to put their all upon the iſſue of the field; and the earl of Mar having conſulted with the marquiſſes of Huntley and Tullibardine, the earls of Southeſk and Mareſchal, the generals Hamilton and Gordon, and the other chiefs of the diſaffected clans; and having drawn together about three hundred of his own vaſſals, ſet up the ſtandard of the pretender at Brae-Mar on the fifth day of September, and then cauſed him to be proclaimed, firſt at Caſtletown, then at Perth, Aberdeen, Dundee, and ſeveral other places. On the firſt news of theſe proceedings, the government ordered the earls of Hume, Winton, and Kinnoul, the lord Deſkford, Lockart of Carnwath, Hume of Whitefield, and other ſuſpected perſons, to be ſeized and committed cloſe priſoners to the caſtle of Edinburgh. The ſquadron under ſir John Jennings alſo kept a good look-out upon the coaſts; but, notwithſtanding their utmoſt vigilance, two veſſels arrived from France, with arms, ammunition, and a good number of officers, who aſſured the earl of Mar the pretender would ſoon be with him in perſon. They at the ſame time acquainted him, that the duke of Ormond and the lord Bolingbroke, who had retired to France, hearing they were condemned and attainted by the parliament, had engaged in the ſervice of the pretender. This news gave great ſatisfaction to the rebel party for ſome time; but the death of Lewis XIV. ſtruck a general damp upon their ſpirits, and proved a terrible blow to their cauſe. The earl of Mar wrote repeated letters to the pretender to come over with the utmoſt expedition. In the mean time he aſſumed the title of lieutenant-general of the pretender's forces, publiſhed a declaration, exhorting the people to take up arms; and as there were ſtill hopes that the duke of Ormond would make a deſcent upon Great Britain, and depended upon a riſing in England, they were reſolved to puſh their deſign †.

† Patten's Hiſt. of the Rebellion, 1715.

In the mean time the chevalier, finding that the duke of Orleans only amuſed him with empty promiſes, and that he could no longer expect the powerful ſuccours that Lewis XIV. the unwearied friend of his family, had on every favourable occaſion furniſhed them, applied to the Iriſh and Scottiſh regiments in the ſervice of France, on whoſe fidelity he knew he could depend; and thoſe, as well officers as private men, promiſed to ſhed the laſt drop of blood in their veins to procure his reſtoration: they would indeed have proved of infinite ſervice to the chevalier's cauſe, had they accompanied him to Scotland: but the vigilance of our miniſter at the court of France deprived him of their aſſiſtance alſo. This miniſter was the earl of Stair, who then reſided as ambaſſador at Paris. He was a nobleman of unqueſtioned honour and integrity; generous, humane, diſcerning, and reſolute: he had ſignalized himſelf by his military talents during the late war in the Netherlands, and he now acted in another ſphere with uncommon vigour, vigilancy, and addreſs. He detected the chevalier's ſcheme while it was yet in embryo, and gave ſuch early notice of it as enabled our court to take effectual meaſures for defeating the deſign. He had by dint of money won over an Engliſh prieſt, named Strickland, who was one of the pretender's chaplains, and a confidant of his. This man acquainted him with every ſtep that the pretender took, and every project he formed. By means of this ſpy lord Stair obtained a liſt of the French officers who had engaged to accompany the Chevalier into Scotland, with an exact account of the quantity of arms, ammunition, and proviſions that were to be embarked, and the number and names of the veſſels that were to carry them over; and made ſuch repeated and ſpirited remonſtrances to the duke-regent on this ſubject, that the latter found himſelf under a neceſſity of giving our ambaſſador proper ſatisfaction. Accordingly he diſpatched orders to all the ſea-ports, prohibiting the officers and men of the regiments above mentioned, to quit the kingdom on pain of being treated as deſerters. Thus the chevalier found himſelf in an inſtant deprived of the aſſiſtance he had placed ſuch dependance on; and was ſoon after glad to paſs over incog. to ſhew himſelf to his partiſans; not ſo much from any hope of being able to revive their courage by his preſence, as to acquaint them that they muſt no longer lay any ſtreſs upon the promiſes of aſſiſtance they had received from the court of France *.

Some of the adherents of the chevalier having made an attempt to ſurprize the caſtle of Edinburgh, which had been defeated by the vigilance and valour of colonel Stuart, lieutenant-governor of that fortreſs, general Wightman, who was then in Scotland, had orders to form a camp near Stirling, and diſtreſs the rebels as much as he could, till the arrival of the duke of Argyll, who, on the ninth of September, had been appointed commander in chief of the forces in Scotland, and ſoon after ſet out for that kingdom, accompanied by the duke of Roxburgh, the marquiſſes of Annandale and Tweedale, the earls of Sutherland, Selkirk, Loudon, Rothes, Haddington, and Fraſer, with ſeveral other Scots peers, who determined to ſhew their loyalty to king George, by raiſing their reſpective clans to oppoſe the rebels.

Mean while, a dangerous conſpiracy was diſcovered and prevented in England. Lieutenant-colonel Paul was impriſoned in the Gatehouſe for enliſting men in the ſervice of the pretender; the titular duke of Powis was committed to the Tower; the lords Lanſdowne and Dupplin were taken into cuſtody; and a warrant was iſſued for apprehending the earl of Jerſey. The king, by the mouth of Mr. Secretary Stanhope, deſired the conſent of the lower houſe to ſeize and detain the perſons of Sir William Wyndham, Sir John Packington, Mr. Edward Harvey, Mr. Thomas Forſter, Mr. James Anſtis, and Mr. Corbet Kynaſton, who were members of the houſe, and ſuſpected of favouring the invaſion. The commons readily aſſented, and Harvey and Anſtis being in town, were immediately ſeized; Mr. Forſter took up arms in the North; Sir John Packington was, after examination before the council, honourably diſcharged; Mr. Kynaſton abſconded; Sir William Wyndham was ſeized at his own houſe in Somerſetſhire, by colonel Huſke and a meſſenger: he found means, however, to eſcape from him; but being cloſely purſued, he thought proper to ſurrender himſelf, and was committed to the Tower. His father-in-law, the duke of Somerſet, offered to become ſurety for his appearance; but the miniſtry rejected his bail, and even carried their reſentment ſo far as to remove the duke from his office of maſter of the horſe.

While theſe things were tranſacting, the king came, on the twenty-firſt of September, to the houſe of lords, and paſſed the bills that were ready. Then the chancellor read his majeſty's ſpeech, expreſſing his acknowlegement and ſatisfaction for the uncommon marks of their affection which he had received at this juncture; and the parliament was adjourned to the ſixth day of October †.

The friends of the houſe of Stuart were very numerous in the weſtern counties, where they made ſeveral tentatives towards an inſurrection, and had actually formed a plan for the ſeizing of Plymouth and Briſtol; all which attempts were prevented by the timely precautions of the government. On this occaſion, the univerſity of Oxford, who had generally diſtinguiſhed itſelf by its anti-revolution principles, felt the rod of power: a regiment of foot was quartered here to over awe the univerſity. The miniſtry, however, found it more difficult to ſuppreſs the inſurgents in the North; where the earl of Derwentwater, the lord Widdrington, Mr. Forſter, knight of the ſhire for Northumberland, and others, appeared in arms in October. Though their numbers were but ſmall, yet they proclaimed the pretender, firſt at Warkworth, then at Morpeth, Hexham, and other places. They were all horſe; not being able to entertain any foot for want of arms. They were at firſt ſtrengthened by the junction of ſome lords from the weſt of Scotland; who, by the inſtructions of Mar, had raiſed ſome forces to aſſiſt the rebellion, as the viſcount Kenmure, who ſet up the pretender's ſtandard at Loughmaben, the earls of Nithſdale, Carnwath, and Winton, who joined the Engliſh rebels with their ſmall forces at Rothbury. Soon after, they marched to Kelſo, on the borders, and joined a body of Highlanders, whom the earl of Mar, after he had taken poſſeſſion of the fruitful county of Fife, had found means to ſend over the Firth, under the laird of Mackintoſh, and the lord Nairn.

General Carpenter having been ſent by the government in purſuit of the rebels, with Hotham's regiment of foot, Cobham's, Moleſworth's, and Churchill's dragoons, arrived at Newcaſtle on the eighteenth of October, from whence he ſoon ſet out to attack the rebels at Kelſo. At his approach they ſhifted their quarters, and marched to Jedburgh. Here they were much divided in their councils: brigadier Mackintoſh was for engaging the king's forces under general Carpenter, which were inferior in number; but Mr. Forſter, who had now aſſumed the title of general of the Engliſh rebels, was againſt it. The earl was for marching back, and joining the earl of Mar, but the Engliſh were for marching into England, which was at laſt agreed to: but here a mutiny began among the Highlanders, who refuſed to ſtir out of their own country; nor could all the menaces or entreaties of the leading men among them prevail to alter their reſolution; five hundred of them actually ſeparated and returned home.

From Jedburgh they marched to Hawick, from thence to Langholme, and thence to Longtown in Cumberland, ſtill endeavouring to avoid general Carpenter, who continued in purſuit of them. From Longtown they marched to Brampton, where Forſter produced his commiſſion of general, which had been ſent to him by the earl of Mar; and, after having proclaimed the pretender, he proceeded to Penrith, where the ſheriff, aſſiſted by the lord Lanſdown, and the biſhop of Carliſle, had drawn together the whole poſſe comitatus of Cumberland, amounting to nearly twelve thouſand men, who at firſt made a ſhew of oppoſing the rebels; but, upon their nearer approach, ſhamefully threw down their arms and fled. From Penrith, Forſter proceeded to Appleby, being joined by very few in all theſe marches; then to Kendal, and ſo to Kirkby-Lonſdale, and here ſome Lancaſhire papiſts, with their ſervants and tenants, joining them, they marched forward, and arrived at Preſton on the ſeventh of November. Here he having ſeized on ſix or ſeven pieces of cannon, proceeded to Preſton, and would have gone farther; but general Wills, who had marched againſt the rebels with ſix regiments of horſe and dragoons, had advanced to the bridge of Ribbel, before Forſter was informed of his approach; who, on hearing thereof, immediately ſhut himſelf up in the town, barricadoing the ſtreets, and making a proper diſpoſition of his men to receive the attack of the king's troops. General Wills came before the town on the twelfth of November, and ordered brigadier Honeywood to attack that end of it which leads to Lancaſter. The king's troops, however, met with ſo warm a reception, that they were obliged to deſiſt from the attack, after having loſt a conſiderable number of men. Next morning, general Carpenter, who had followed the rebels cloſe at the heels during their marches, arrived, and joining his troops to thoſe already before the place, it was now inveſted on all ſides.

Forſter, finding that all further reſiſtance would be as fatal as fruitleſs, ſent colonel Oxburgh with a trumpet to general Wills to deſire a capitulation. The general replied, he would not treat with rebels: they had killed ſeveral of the king's ſubjects, and they muſt expect to pay for their lives with the forfeit of their own. The colonel ſaid, that as the general was a man of honour, and an officer, he hoped he would ſhew mercy to people who were willing to ſubmit. Wills anſwered, that all he could do for them was, that in caſe of their ſurrendering at diſcretion, he would prevent his men from putting them to the ſword, until he ſhould receive farther orders. He granted them till the next morning to conſider what they would do, upon their delivering the earl of Derwentwater and Mackintoſh as hoſtages.

Forſter and his men accepted the terms propoſed: but the Highlanders declared they would periſh ſword in hand, rather than ſubmit in that manner; upon which general Wills would have ſent their chieftain Mackintoſh back, and have inſtantly attacked the town: in which caſe every man of them would have been cut in pieces. On a little reflection they did not chuſe to run that riſk, but with the reſt of the rebels ſubmitted themſelves priſoners at diſcretion, to the number of four hundred and thirty-ſix Engliſh, and above one thouſand Scots, many having found means to eſcape, and ſeveral had been killed in the attack. They were now diſarmed, and put under a ſtrong guard. All the noblemen and leaders were ſecured. Major Nairn, captain Lockhart, captain Shaftoe, and enſign Erſkine, were tried by a court-martial as deſerters, and executed. Lord Charles Murray, ſon of the duke of Athol, was likewiſe condemned for the ſame crime, but his ſentence was reſpited. The common men were impriſoned at Cheſter and Liverpool; the noblemen and officers of moſt conſideration were ſent to London, and committed to the Tower and other priſons *.

Let us now ſee what became of the rebels in Scotland. It is remarkable, that on the very day that thoſe under Forſter were ſubdued at Preſton, Sunday, November 13, the duke of Argyll, with about four thouſand men, engaged the rebel army under the earl of Mar, conſiſting of about eight or nine thouſand, at Sheriffmuir, near Dumblain, about four miles from Stirling. The battle was obſtinate and bloody; various accounts were given of it, and both ſides claimed the victory. What is certain from all the accounts is this, that the duke of Argyll, with the right of his army, ſoon put the left of the enemy to rout; but whilſt he was purſuing them a conſiderable way with great ſlaughter, the right of the rebels charged the left wing of the royal army with ſuch impetuoſity, that in a few minutes both horſe and foot were totally defeated, with great ſlaughter; and general Witham, who commanded them, fled at full gallop to Stirling, where he declared that the royal army was actually routed. Upon the whole, however, it appears by the conſequences, that the royaliſts had the victory; for the earl of Mar, immediately after the battle, retreated to Perth, and the deſign he had formed of croſſing the Forth to join his ſouthern friends was entirely fruſtrated, and never afterwards attempted. The earl of Ilay, brother to the duke of Argyll, was in the action, behaved with remarkable bravery, and was wounded in his arm and ſide. Among the ſlain were colonel Hamen and captain Armſtrong, his grace's aid de camp. About eight hundred of the rebels were ſlain, and many made priſoners, among whom were ſeveral perſons of diſtinction.

Soon after the rebels ſuſtained a more conſiderable blow, in the loſs of Inverneſs, from which ſir John Mackenzie was driven by Simon Fraſer, lord Lovat, who had hitherto adhered to the pretender's intereſt, but now declared in favour of the government. By this means a free communication was opened with the north of Scotland, where the earl of Sutherland had raiſed a ſtrong body of his vaſſals. The marquis of Huntley and the earl of Seaforth were obliged to abandon the rebel army, in order to ſecure their own territories, and in a little time ſubmitted to the king. A conſiderable number of the clan of the Fraſers, influenced by the example of their chief, lord Lovat, declared againſt the pretender; the marquis of Tullibardine withdrew from the army, to defend his own country; and the clans, ſeeing no likelihood of another action, began, as uſual, to return to their habitations, it being cuſtomary with thoſe people, never to remain long in the field, unleſs they are kept in conſtant employ *.

The reſt of November and all December both ſides remained quiet in their quarters; the duke of Argyll at Stirling, and the earl of Mar at Perth. In the mean time the pretender, notwithſtanding the deſperate ſituation of his affairs in Scotland, reſolved to viſit that kingdom; and poſting through France in diſguiſe, he embarked on board a ſmall veſſel at Dunkirk, and landed, on the twenty-ſecond of December, at Peterhead, with ſix gentlemen in his retinue, one of whom was the marquis of Tinmouth, ſon to the duke of Berwick. He paſſed through Aberdeen incog. to Feteroſſe, where he was met and complimented by the earl of Mar, the earl Mariſchall, general Hamilton, and others of his adherents: from Feteroſſe he went to Dundee, and from thence to Scone, two miles from Perth, where he made his public entry on the ninth of January. Here he publiſhed ſeveral proclamations, particularly one for the convention of the ſtates, and another for his coronation, and exerciſed other acts of royalty, which were all at an end almoſt as ſoon as they were aſſumed: for towards the end of January, the duke of Argyll, aſſiſted by lieutenant-general Cadogan and other general officers, who were ſent down to him, and reinforced by a good train of artillery and ſix thouſand Dutch troops, that were claimed of, and ſent over by, the States-general by virtue of treaty, marched from Stirling to attack the rebels at Perth, who, having now loſt all hopes of any ſuccours from France, upon his approach abandoned the place, and retired with the pretender to Dundee, and from thence to Montroſe; where finding they were cloſely purſued by the king's forces, on the fourteenth of February a council was held, in which it was reſolved that the pretender ſhould go off in the evening. It happened fortunately for him, that there was juſt ready in the harbour a ſmall ſhip that was deſigned to carry over a gentleman the chevalier was then to have ſent to a foreign court; this ſhip was now pitched upon to tranſport himſelf and ſome few of his particular friends, whom he had to attend him; theſe were the ears of Mar and Melfort, the lord Drummond, and ſome other chiefs. There were no leſs than nine men of war cruiſing off the coaſt at that time, but the night proved ſo dark, that there was no ſeeing a veſſel (eſpecially a ſmall one) at a quarter of a mile's diſtance; ſo going on board at nine o'clock in the evening, they put out to ſea, and got out of reach of the king's cruiſers before it was day-light; and coaſting along the German and Dutch ſhores, they arrived in a few days at Graveline, in France. The rebel army had been all along made to believe, that the chevalier was to go along with them; thus, removing all jealouſy, they were very tractable: but as ſoon as they found their prince had left them to ſhift for themſelves, they became deaf to all order and diſperſed; ſome ſubmitted, and ſome were taken priſoners †. Such was the iſſue of a rebellion that proved fatal to many noble families; and that, inſtead of promoting the intereſt of the Stuart family, ſerved only to ſtrengthen the proteſtant ſucceſſion in the houſe of Hanover. It muſt, however, be acknowleged, that this rebellion was, in a great degree, owing to the violent meaſures which the miniſtry had put in practice againſt their adverſaries; and which, by the diſcontent it cauſed in the nation, firſt gave encouragement to the Jacobite party to make an effort in favour of the pretender.

During the progreſs of the rebellion, the parliament of Ireland met at Dublin, and gave proofs of the warmeſt attachment to the preſent government. They paſſed bills for recognizing the king's title; for the ſecurity of his perſon and government; for ſetting a price upon the head of the pretender; for ſuppreſſing tumults and riotous aſſemblies; and for attainting the duke of Ormond. They granted the ſupplies without oppoſition. All ſuch members as had procured addreſſes to the late queen in favour of Sir Conſtantine Phipps, then lord-chancellor of Ireland, were obliged to acknowlege their fault, and were cenſured as guilty of a breach of privilege. They deſired the lords juſtices would iſſue a proclamation againſt the popiſh inhabitants of Limerick and Galway, who, preſuming upon their own interpretation of the articles granted by king William, claimed an exemption from the penalties impoſed upon papiſts. They engaged in an aſſociation to defend the king and the proteſtant ſucceſſion, againſt the pretender and all his open and ſecret abettors; and they reſolved, that whatever forces his majeſty ſhould think fit to raiſe for that purpoſe, they would enable him to defray the expence of the ſame. They voted the earl of Angleſey an enemy to the king and kingdom, becauſe he had adviſed the queen to break the army, and prorogued the parliament, when a bill was depending to attaint the pretender; and they addreſſed the king to remove him from his council and ſervice: a requeſt which was accordingly granted ‡. The lords juſtices granted orders for apprehending the earls of Antrim and

Weſtmeath,

Weſtmeath, the lords Netterville, Cahir, Dillon, and other perſons ſuſpected of diſaffection to the government. Then they adjourned the parliament to the eighth day of March.

In the mean time the barrier treaty, after many difficulties and delays, which gave great reaſon to ſuſpect that the imperial court meant not to conclude it at all, was finally adjuſted, and ſigned at Antwerp by the plenipotentiaries of the emperor, the States-general, and the king of Great Britain, and ſent over to our court to be ratified. By this treaty, the bounds of the imperial dominions in the Netherlands, as alſo of the States-general, were determined, and the emperor became guarantee of the ſucceſſion of the houſe of Hanover to the crown of Great Britain, as the States-general were before ‡.

On the nineth of January, 1716, the parliament met in England, when the king made a ſpeech to both houſes, in which he told them he had reaſon to believe the pretender was landed in Scotland; he congratulated them on the ſucceſs of his arms in ſuppreſſing the rebellion; on the concluſion of the barrier-treaty between the emperor and the States-general, under his guaranty; on a convention with Spain, that would deliver the trade of England to that kingdom from the new impoſitions and hardſhips to which it was ſubjected, in conſequence of the late treaties: he likewiſe gave them to underſtand, that a treaty for renewing all former alliances between Great Britain and the States-general was almoſt concluded; and aſſured the commons, that he would freely give up all the eſtates that ſhould become forfeited to the crown by this rebellion, towards defraying the extraordinary expences incurred on his acceſſion.

Addreſſes of thanks were ſeverally preſented by both houſes. The commons, in theirs, declared, that they thought themſelves obliged, in juſtice to their injured country, to proſecute in the moſt rigorous and impartial manner the authors of thoſe deſtructive counſels, which had drawn down ſuch miſeries upon the nation. Their proceedings tallied exactly with their profeſſions: they began by expelling Mr. Forſter the houſe: they impeached the earls of Derwentwater, Nithſdale, Carnwath, and Winton, the viſcount of Kenmure, and the lords Widdrington and Nairn ‖. Theſe noblemen all pleaded guilty, except the earl of Winton, who petitioned for time to prepare for his defence.

On the twenty-fourth of January, the king coming to the parliament, to give the royal aſſent to the bill for continuing the ſuſpenſion of the Habeas Corpus act, he told the two houſes, that the pretender was actually in Scotland, heading the rebellion, and aſſuming the ſtate and title of king of theſe realms; and demanded of the commons ſuch ſupplies as might diſcourage any foreign power from giving aſſiſtance to the rebels.

On the ninth of February, ſentence of death was paſſed on the ſix lords who had pleaded guilty, by the lord-chancellor Cowper, who was appointed lord high-ſteward upon the occaſion. Derwentwater and Kenmure were beheaded on Tower-hill, on the twenty-fourth of the ſame month: Nithſdale, who was to have been executed with them, had the good fortune to eſcape out of the Tower, the night before, diſguiſed in woman's apparel, furniſhed and conveyed to him by his wife; Winton eſcaped from the ſame priſon afterwards, as did Forſter and Mackintoſh out of Newgate. Some were executed in the country; eleven at Preſton, ſix at Wigan, and five at Mancheſter: ſeveral were hanged at Tyburn, particularly colonel Oxburgh, Mr. Paul a clergyman, and Mr. Hall who had been a juſtice of peace. In ſhort, ſome who were found guilty were tranſported, others reprieved, and thoſe who were untried or reprieved took the benefit of the act of grace which was afterwards paſſed: but the earl of Mar, the marquis of Tullibardine, and ſome others, who fled from Scotland, were attainted by act of parliament §.

While the peers were under ſentence of death, ſtrong applications were made, both to the throne and to the parliament, by their wives, relations, and friends, for the royal mercy to be extended towards them. The king was inflexible; the commons rejected their ſuit; but the houſe of lords, at the inſtance of the earl of Nottingham, who thought mercy might be remembered in the midſt of juſtice, agreed to an addreſs, praying his majeſty would reprieve ſuch of the condemned lords as ſhould deſerve his clemency. To this petition the king anſwered, "That on this and all other occaſions he would do what he thought moſt conſiſtent with the dignity of his crown and the ſafety of his people ¶." The lords were ordered for execution; and the miniſtry, in revenge for the earl of Nottingham's interfering in this buſineſs, procured his lordſhip to be diſmiſſed from his place of preſident of the council; and his brother, the earl of Aylesford, chancellor of the duchy of Lancaſter, his ſon, lord Finch, one of the lords of the treaſury, and his kinſman, lord Guernſey, maſter of the jewel-office, were turned out at the ſame time.

The rebellion was now indeed ſuppreſſed, but the rigour exerciſed towards the delinquents rendered the miniſtry hateful to all who had a ſenſe of humanity. They perceived the effect their conduct had produced, they dreaded the meeting of a new parliament, which was now near at hand, and they reſolved to eſtabliſh their adminiſtration beyond the power of oppoſition to hurt, by a ſtep equally bold and unconſtitutional, viz. by bringing in a bill for enlarging the term of the continuance of parliaments. This is the famous Septennial Act, whereby this and future parliaments were continued ſeven years, unleſs ſooner diſſolved by the crown, inſtead of three years, as by the Triennial Act, paſſed in the reign of king William. There were very great and long debates upon this bill in both houſes: the true and zealous lovers of their country, as well Whigs as Tories, both in and out of the houſe, oppoſed it with all their force; they ſpoke, they wrote againſt it, and, by their arguments and diſcourſes, proved the danger which might reſult from it, beyond all contradiction. The miniſtry, however, were ſure of a majority; they let their adverſaries exhauſt their rhetoric, and when the queſtion for the bill came to be finally put, in the lords houſe, where it had been firſt introduced, it was carried in the affirmative by a majority of ſixty-nine voices againſt thirty-ſix: nevertheleſs twenty-four lords proteſted againſt it; and in the commons, to whom it was afterwards ſent down, by a majority of two hundred and ſixtyfour againſt one hundred and twenty-one; and ſoon after received the royal aſſent. Such of my readers who may be deſirous to ſee the ſeveral arguments uſed for and againſt this bill, may have their curioſity ſatisfied by peruſing the Collection of Parliamentary Debates at this period, an abſtract only of which would be much too bulky for this work; I ſhall therefore content myſelf with obſerving, that, however neceſſary the miniſtry might repreſent this ſtatute to be at that juncture, when they alleged, by reaſon of the ſeditious and rebellious ſpirit that ſtill appeared in the nation, eſpecially among the common ſort, a new election might have thrown the kingdom into a flame; yet it has been thought by many wiſe, able, and diſpaſſionate perſons, that ſuch an act may prove dangerous to the conſtitution, as it muſt give miniſters a great influence over parliaments.

On the twenty-ſixth of April died that great lawyer and ſtateſman, the lord Somers; and ſome time before, Mr. Robert Walpole had been made firſt commiſſioner of the treaſury and chancellor of the exchequer.

The rebellion being now utterly quelled, and tranquility in great meaſure reſtored to theſe kingdoms, his majeſty reſolved to viſit his German dominions, where he foreſaw a ſtorm gathering from the quarter of Sweden. Charles XII. was extremely exaſperated againſt the elector of Hanover, about the affair of Bremen and Verden, and reſolved to be revenged on him as king of Great Britain. His majeſty had received intimations of ſome ſiniſter deſigns adopted by that prince againſt himſelf, and this had chiefly determined him to make a voyage to the continent: but as there was a clauſe in the act of ſettlement, whereby, after it took place, the ſovereign was not to go out of the kingdom without the conſent of parliament, this clauſe was repealed in a new bill, that paſſed through both houſes without any difficulty.

On the twenty-ſixth of June, his majeſty cloſed the ſeſſion with a ſpeech upon the uſual topics, and intimated his deſign of viſiting his dominions in Germany; and gave them to underſtand, that he had conſtituted his beloved ſon, the prince of Wales, guardian of the kingdom in his abſence. About this time his majeſty was pleaſed to make ſeveral creations, among which ſir Richard Onſlow was made a baron, and the earl of Portland was raiſed to the dignity of a duke; general Cadogan, who had ſignalized himſelf in queen Anne's wars, and had been very ſerviceable in ſuppreſſing the rebellion in Scotland, was alſo made a lord, and afterwards an earl; ſir Henry St. John, father to the late lord Bolingbroke, was created baron St. John of Batterſea; prince Erneſt, the king's brother and biſhop of Oſnabrug, was created duke of York, and afterwards made a knight of the Garter, together with prince Frederic, ſon to the prince of Wales, and father to our preſent moſt gracious ſovereign: the duke of Devonſhire was now appointed preſident of the council in the room of the earl of Nottingham. Theſe promotions were attended with unexpected diſgraces: the duke of Argyll and his brother, the earl of Ilay, being deprived of all their employments. The removal of theſe noblemen was the more ſurpriſing, as they had all along been warm advocates for the proteſtant ſucceſſion; had the principal hand in extinguiſhing the rebellion in Scotland, which ſecured to his majeſty the peaceable poſſeſſion of his throne; and were firmly attached to the preſent government. Whatever was the cauſe, certain it is, they were not only diſmiſſed from the ſervice, but, to ſhew that there were no hopes of their being reſtored, their places were diſpoſed of; general Carpenter being appointed commander in chief of the forces in Scotland, and governor of the iſland of Minorca, in the room of the duke of Argyll; and the duke of Montroſe lord-regiſter of Scotland, in the room of the earl of Ilay *.

On the ſeventh of July the king embarked at Graveſend, landed on the ninth in Holland, through which he paſſed incognito to Hanover, and thence ſet out for Pyrmont, to drink the waters for his health. He had ſcarcely left England when the two parties that divided the nation, broke out into freſh animoſities and outrages againſt each other; the looſe diſorderly multitude being ready to run into any exceſſes that their reſpective leaders dictated. The Whigs had formed themſelves into ſocieties or clubs, which were uſed to meet at ſeveral houſes in the city and ſuburbs, called Mug-houſes, from the veſſels they uſed to drink out of, where Whiggiſh healths were toaſted. The Roebuck in Cheapſide was one of the moſt famous of thoſe mug-houſes; and that in Saliſbury-court, Fleet-ſtreet, became ſo by the following circumſtance. The company there having on ſome occaſion given extraordinary demonſtration of their hatred and animoſity to the leading men of the oppoſite party, by malicious healths and reflections, the mob of that party coming to the knowlege of it, were ſo enraged, that on the twentieth of July they came and attacked the mug-houſe, which was kept by one Mr. Read, and would have demoliſhed it, if the company there had not ſent for a reinforcement from another mug-houſe in Taviſtock-ſtreet. This made the aſſailants fly for the preſent, though many of them returned, and kept hovering about the houſe the two following days. At laſt, on the twenty-third, one Vaughan, who had been a blue-coat boy at Bridewell hoſpital, inſtigated the mob to go to the mug-houſe and revenge their late affront: they followed him with loud huzzas of "High-church and Ormond! down with the mug-houſe!" Mr. Read finding they intended to demoliſh his houſe, bid them keep off, or he would fire amongſt them; but they not regarding him, he diſcharged his piece, and killed Vaughan on the ſpot, for which he was afterwards tried and acquitted. The mob ſtill continuing their outrages, breaking the windows, pulling down the ſign, gutting the houſe, breaking and deſtroying the furniture, &c. the ſheriffs of London came and ordered the proclamation againſt riots to be read; but this not availing, a party of the guards were ordered to march to the place, and as ſoon as they approached, the mob diſperſed; but five of the rioters were taken, who, being tried and convicted, were hanged at the end of Saliſbury-court, in September †.

I have already obſerved, that the king's principal intent in going over to the continent was to ſecure his German dominions from the king of Sweden, and Great Britain from the deſigns of the pretender, who, laying hold of the enmity which Charles of Sweden now entertained againſt his Britannic ma-jeſty, prevailed on the Swede to eſpouſe his intereſt, and even to form a regular deſign for effecting his advancement to the throne of Great Britain. It was, indeed, amazing that a prince already overwhelmed by ſo many and ſuch powerful enemies, ſhould think of adding to their number by practices of this kind; but whoſoever conſiders the genius and ſpirit of Charles XII. will eaſily conceive that it was natural enough for him to embrace any expedient, how dangerous ſoever, which ſeemed to promiſe the diſſolving the confederacy by which he was oppreſſed. In order to guard againſt the attempts of his enemies, king George very prudently reſolved to contract alliances with foreign potentates.

The death of Lewis XIV. had greatly altered the ſtate of affairs between Great Britain and France. The regent, duke of Orleans, by virtue of king Philip's renunciation, and the death of all the princes in France ſprung from Lewis XIV. was become next heir to the minor king, and conſequently it was his intereſt to cultivate the friendſhip of ſuch ſtates as were likely to ſupport his title againſt the king of Spain, and particularly of England. King George was well aware of this, and reſolved to make his own advantage of it. He durſt not, as king of Great Britain, declare war againſt the Swedes, though he had done it as elector of Hanover; nor could he be reconciled with him, unleſs he reſtored the two duchies of Bremen and Verden; the only way therefore was, to compel that warlike prince to make peace. In this ſituation it was abſolutely neceſſary for king George to make alliances with ſuch powers as could moſt annoy him, in caſe they became his enemies. Accordingly, he began by ſounding the duke of Orleans, whom he found as ready as he could wiſh to enter into a league with him. The States-general, who only aimed at peace and ſecurity, as readily came into meaſures, from which they had much to expect, and little or nothing to fear. General Cadogan for England, the abbé du Blois for France, and the penſionary Heinſius for the States-general, negotiated this affair with ſo much ſecrecy, that the treaty was finiſhed almoſt before it was known to be in hand *.

By this treaty, which was known by the name of the Triple Alliance, the regent of France engaged that the pretender ſhould immediately depart from Avignon, where he then reſided, to the other ſide of the Alps, and never be ſuffered to return to Lorraine or France on any pretence whatſoever; that no rebellious ſubjects of Great Britain ſhould be allowed to reſide in that kingdom; and that the treaty of Utrecht, with reſpect to the demolition of Dunkirk, ſhould be fully executed to the ſatisfaction of his Britannic majeſty. The treaty alſo contained a mutual guaranty of all the places poſſeſſed by the contracting powers; of the proteſtant ſucceſſion on the throne of England, as well as of that of the duke of Orleans to the crown of France; and a defenſive alliance, ſtipulating the proportion of ſhips and forces to be furniſhed to that power, which ſhould be diſturbed at home, or invaded from abroad.

No ſooner this treaty came to be known than it excited great diſcontents, both in France and England. The people of the former nation exclaimed, that the regent had ſacrificed the honour and intereſt of France to his own ambitious views. In England, the party in oppoſition to the miniſtry found fault with this alliance, not without the appearance of reaſon on their ſide. They alleged, that the ſucceſſion was ſufficiently ſecured by the treaty of Utrecht; nor was there any occaſion for engaging foreign troops, which, on pretence of an invaſion, might be introduced at any time, to force upon the people the meaſures of a miniſtry, however deſtructive to the honour or real intereſt of the nation. The king of England and the regent little regarded theſe clamours, having each ſecured the point he had chiefly at heart.

As to the king of Spain, he was with good reaſon highly offended at this alliance, which he complained of in the bittereſt terms, and from this time took all meaſures to diſconcert this confederacy.

King George did not prove ſo ſucceſsful in his negotiations with Sweden as he had been in thoſe with France. Charles XII. would not hearken to any propoſals until Bremen and Verden ſhould be reſtored. His Britannic majeſty was equally determined not to part with thoſe which he conſidered as a fair purchaſe: in fine, the rupture between the courts of Hanover and Sweden became every day more implacable, and proved extremely prejudicial to the commerce of England, and had well nigh entailed upon the kingdom another invaſion, much more formidable than that which ſo lately miſcarried; for the diſaffected in England, ſtill purſuing their deſigns in favour of the pretender, turned their eyes on the king of Sweden to accompliſh it. Charles reliſhed the enterprize, which at once flattered his ambition and revenge; nor was it diſagreeable to the czar of Muſcovy, who was alſo applied to, and who had taken diſguſt againſt the elector of Hanover for having offered to join the Swede againſt the Ruſſians, provided he would ratify the ceſſion of Bremen and Verden.

Count Gyllemberg, the Swediſh reſident at London, was the perſon pitched upon to manage the conſpiracy in England, and baron Sparr at Paris, with the Engliſh Jacobites there, and other friends of the pretender; while baron Gortz, the prime miniſter and favourite of the king of Sweden, was diſpatched as envoy to the Hague, which he was to ſecure as the center of union to the ſeveral negotiations on this and the other ſide of the water. The ſcheme appears to have been very plauſible; a number of veſſels had been bought up, under different pretexts, which were appointed to rendezvous at the Swediſh port of Gottenburgh, about the latter end of the month of March, the ſeaſon when the eaſterly winds (which are fair for bringing over ſhips to England) generally prevail. On board theſe were to be embarked eight thouſand foot ſoldiers, and four thouſand horſe, all picked men; together with a formidable train of artillery, and proviſions and arms for fifteen or twenty thouſand men. The confederates had made themſelves ſo ſure of being joined by the malcontents here on their firſt landing, that the plot was entruſted to a very few perſons only in England; neither was there any formal treaty drawn up between the parties engaged in this affair: the mutual intereſt

they had in the ſucceſs of their ſcheme was thought a tye more binding than the moſt ſolemn engagements. By the end of the year the project was ripe for execution, and was poſtponed only until the army ſhould be reduced, and the Dutch auxiliaries ſent back to their own country, which was expected to be done as ſoon as the parliament ſhould meet.

Theſe negotiations could not, however, be ſo privately managed but part of them tranſpired; and king George, who was then in Hanover, was informed of the intention of his enemies: upon which, he reſolved to return immediately to England, where he arrived towards the end of January, 1717. His firſt act was, to order a detachment of foot-guards to ſecure count Gyllemberg, the Swediſh miniſter, with all his papers. Baron Gortz, who had been in Holland, and was coming over to England to aſſiſt Gyllemberg in the conſpiracy, hearing what had happened to his colleague, and finding their projects were diſcovered, returned to Holland; and upon the Britiſh miniſter's application to the States, Gortz, with his two ſecretaries, and all his papers, were ſeized at Arnheim in Guelderland, after flying from place to place to avoid the purſuit he knew was made after him. By his and Gyllemberg's papers, the whole plot was diſcovered.

In the mean time, the other foreign miniſters at the court of London, alarmed at the ſeizure of the Swediſh envoy, complained to the miniſtry of this outrage committed againſt the law of nations. The two ſecretaries, Methuen and Stanhope, wrote circular letters to them, importing, that in a day or two they ſhould be made acquainted with the reaſons of this extraordinary proceeding. They were, generally, ſatisfied with this intimation; but the marquis de Monteleone, the Spaniſh ambaſſador, replied, that he was extremely ſorry no other way could be found to preſerve the peace of the kingdom than that of arreſting the perſon of a public miniſter, and ſeizing all his papers, which were the ſacred repoſitories of his maſter's ſecrets; and that, in whatever light thoſe two facts might ſeem to be underſtood, they very ſenſibly wounded the law of nations. This, however, was a mere cavil: the king of England had acted conſiſtently with the ſtricteſt principles of juſtice in impriſoning his enemy. As Gyllemberg, the Swediſh ambaſſador, had violated the law of nations, by conſpiring againſt the prince to whom he was ſent in public character, the Engliſh had an undoubted right to diſpenſe with the obſervance of the ſame law, by arreſting his perſon: but all the world was ſurprized to ſee the Dutch impriſon the baron de Gortz, in order to gratify the king of England, an inſtance of complaiſance not to be paralleled in hiſtory, and by which they not only violated a moſt ſacred law, by ſeizing the perſon of the prime miniſter of the king of Sweden, who had formed no plots againſt them, but they acted in direct contradiction to the ſpirit of that ineſtimable liberty which hath drawn ſo many ſtrangers of other nations into their country, and is the foundation of all their greatneſs †.

The parliament met on the twentieth of February, when, by his majeſty's command, Mr. Secretary Stanhope laid before them copies of letters between count Gyllemberg, the barons Gortz, Sparr, and others, relating to the deſign of raiſing a rebellion in his majeſty's dominions, to be ſupported by a force from Sweden. The letters being read in both houſes, occaſioned addreſſes full of the moſt lively expreſſions of loyalty and zeal, and of reſentment againſt the proceedings of the perſons engaged therein. The commons paſſed a bill prohibiting all commerce with Sweden, a branch of trade which was of the utmoſt conſequence to the Engliſh merchants. They voted ten thouſand ſeamen for the enſuing year, granted about a million for the maintenance of guards, garriſons, and land-forces, and paſſed the bill relating to mutiny and deſertion. The houſe likewiſe voted four and twenty thouſand pounds for the payment of four battalions of Munſter, and two of Saxe Gotha, which the king had taken into his ſervice to ſupply the place of ſuch as might be, during the rebellion, drawn from the garriſons of the States-general to the aſſiſtance of England. This vote was not carried without a violent debate. The demand was inveighed againſt as an impoſition, ſeeing no ſuch troops had ever ſerved. A motion was made for an addreſs, deſiring that the inſtructions of thoſe who had concluded the treaties might be laid before the houſe; but this was over-ruled by the majority. The ſupplies were raiſed by a land-tax of three ſhillings in the pound, and a malt-tax. Orders were alſo iſſued for Sir George Byng to ſail with a ſtrong ſquadron to block up the Swediſh ſhips in their harbours; the letters of Gortz and Gyllemberg were printed, in vindication of the conduct of the king of England towards the Swediſh miniſter. Charles XII. was in Scania when he received theſe printed letters, together with the news of the two miniſters being impriſoned, upon which he gave immediate orders for arreſting the Engliſh intendant at Stockholm, with all his family and domeſtics. The Dutch reſident was forbid the court, and ſtrictly watched in all his motions. Charles, mean while, neither avowed nor diſclaimed the proceedings of de Gortz: too proud to deny a ſcheme which he had once approved, and too wiſe to acknowlege a plot which had thus been ſtifled in its birth, he maintained a diſdainful ſilence towards England and Holland. The czar took a very different courſe: as his name was not expreſly mentioned, but only obſcurely hinted at, in the papers of Gortz and Gyllemberg, he wrote a long letter to the king of England, complimenting him upon the diſcovery of the plot, and aſſuring him of the moſt inviolable friendſhip. King George read his proteſtations without believing them, tho' he thought it moſt prudent in the preſent caſe to pretend that he did *. A plot contrived by private men, ſays Mr. de Voltaire, is annihilated the moment it is diſcovered; but a conſpiracy formed by kings, the more it is known the ſtronger it grows.

Before I proceed to the relation of the events of the year 1717, I muſt take notice that the Turks had, in the year 1715, made an irruption into Chriſtendom, and poſſeſſed themſelves of Peleponneſus, which the renowned Moroſini had taken from them about the cloſe of the ſeventeenth century, and which had been ceded to the Venetians by the peace of Carlowitz. The emperor, who guarantied that peace, found himſelf hereupon obliged to declare war againſt the Turks, and the ſupreme command of the Imperial troops was conferred on prince Eugene, who, about the autumn of the year 1716, obtained a complete victory over the infidels at Peterwaradin upon the Danube. The battle was fought on the fifth day of Auguſt, N. S. The Imperial army did not exceed ſixty thouſand men, that of the Turks amounted to an hundred and fifty thouſand, commanded by the grand vizir Ali, favourite of the ſultan Achmet III. who was mortally wounded in the engagement. The infidels were totally defeated, with the loſs of all their tents, artillery, and baggage; ſo that the victors gained an immenſe booty †. To return to England.

Notwithſtanding the commons had ſhewn themſelves ſo liberal in their ſupplies, the court was ſtill craving; and, on the third of April, Mr. ſecretary Stanhope brought a meſſage from his majeſty, demanding an extraordinary ſupply, that he might be the better enabled to ſecure his kingdoms againſt the danger with which they were threatened from Sweden: and Mr. Stanhope at the ſame time moved, that a ſupply ſhould be granted to his majeſty for that purpoſe. This meſſage rouſed the houſe from that indolent acquieſcence which they had hitherto fallen into, in regard to every propoſition of the court. Several members ſtood forth to oppoſe this motion; but no one diſtinguiſhed himſelf more on this occaſion than Mr. Shippen, who ſaid, it was a great misfortune that the king was as little acquainted with the parliamentary proceedings as the language of the country; that the meſſage was unparliamentary and unprecedented, and in his opinion penned by ſome foreign miniſter. He had been often told, that his majeſty had retrieved the honour and reputation of the nation; a truth which appeared in the flouriſhing condition of trade; that the ſupply demanded ſeemed to be inconſiſtent with the glorious advantages which his majeſty had obtained for the people. He was ſeconded by Mr. Hungerford, who declared, that for his part he could not underſtand what occaſion there was for new alliances; much leſs, that they ſhould be purchaſed with money. He expreſſed his ſurprize, that a nation, ſo lately the terror of France and Spain, ſhould now ſeem to fear ſo inconſiderable an enemy as the king of Sweden. The motion was ſupported by Mr. Boſcawen, Sir Gilbert Heathcote, and others; but ſome of the Whigs ſpoke againſt it; and Mr. Robert Walpole was ſilent. The ſpeaker and Mr. Smith, one of the tellers of the Exchequer, oppoſed this unparliamentary way of demanding the ſupply: the former propoſed, that part of the army ſhould be diſbanded, and the money applied towards the making good ſuch new engagements as were deemed neceſſary. After long and warm debates, it was, however, reſolved, that two hundred and fifty thouſand pounds be granted to his majeſty for the purpoſes mentioned in his meſſage *: but it was carried by a majority of only four voices.

This ſmall majority was owing to a miſunderſtanding about this time among the courtiers. To whatever cauſe it was owing, it is certain there was ſome difference between the king's friends, which occaſioned the removal of ſome, and the reſignation of others. So long ago as in December, the lord Townſhend, on the arrival of an expreſs from Hanover, was removed from his place of principal ſecretary of ſtate, to the great ſurprize of moſt people; and though after the king's return he was appointed lord-lieutenant of Ireland, yet immediately after the debate on the above-mentioned ſupply, the granting of which he had vehemently oppoſed in the houſe of lords, he received a letter from Mr. Stanhope, acquainting him, that his majeſty returned him thanks for his paſt ſervices, but had no farther occaſion for him as lord-lieutenant of that kingdom. The very next day Mr. Robert Walpole waited on his majeſty, and reſigned his poſts of firſt commiſſioner of the Treaſury and chancellor of the Exchequer; as did Mr. Pulteney his of ſecretary at war, and Mr. Methuen that of ſecretary of ſtate: their example was followed ſoon after by the duke of Devonſhire, who quitted the preſidentſhip of the council; and now the miniſtry underwent an almoſt total revolution. The earl of Sunderland and Mr. Addiſon were appointed ſecretaries of ſtate; Mr. Stanhope became firſt commiſſioner of the Treaſury, and chancellor of the Exchequer; Mr. Craggs was declared ſecretary at war; the earl of Berkley was conſtituted firſt commiſſioner of the Admiralty, in the room of the earl of Orford, who reſigned; the duke of Bolton obtained the government of Ireland; and was ſucceeded in the poſt of lord-chamberlain by the duke of Newcaſtle.

The parliament, at his majeſty's deſire, had adjourned from the ſixteenth of April to the ſixth of May; when being met, he, by the mouth of the lord-chancellor, made a ſpeech to both houſes, in which he gave them to underſtand, that the fleet under ſir George Byng, which had ſailed to the Baltic to obſerve the motion of the Swedes, was ſafely arrived in the Sound. He told them, that he had given orders for the reduction of ten thouſand ſoldiers, as well as directions to prepare an act of indemnity. He deſired they would take proper meaſures for reducing the public debts, with a juſt regard to parliamentary credit; and that they would go through the public buſineſs with all poſſible diſpatch and unanimity.

Agreeable to his majeſty's intimation in his ſpeech, the parliament now ſet about reducing the intereſt on the public debts, in order for leſſening the principal thereof gradually. Theſe debts were comprehended under the two heads of redeemable and irredeemable incumbrances. The firſt had been contracted with a redeemable intereſt; and theſe the public had a right to diſcharge: the others conſiſted of long and ſhort annuities, granted for a greater or leſs number of years, which could not be altered without the conſent of the proprietors. Mr. Robert Walpole had projected a ſcheme for leſſening the intereſt, and paying the capital of thoſe debts, before he left the Exchequer. His plan was approved; but when he reſigned his places, the miniſters made ſome ſmall alterations, which furniſhed him with a pretence for oppoſing the ſcheme. The government, however, in order to carry this good and great end into execution with ſucceſs and ſecurity, treated with the Bank and South-ſea companies, to whom a great part of the national debts were due, and brought them to agree not only for the reduction of the intereſt on their own reſpective capitals from ſix to five per cent. but for the Bank's advancing or lending to the public (when wanted) two millions five hundred thouſand pounds, and the South-ſea company the ſum of two millions, at five per cent. intereſt, to be in readineſs for paying off ſuch of the proprietors of the orders of four lotteries in the reign of queen Anne, and of other redeemable annuities, as ſhould demand their principal money to be paid to them, inſtead of accepting of five per cent. in lieu of their preſent intereſt of ſix per cent. This ſalutary ſcheme was at length effected, in conſequence of three ſeveral acts paſſed this ſeſſion of parliament, under the names of the General-Fund act, the Bank act, and the South-ſea act.

By the firſt, entitled, "An act for redeeming the duties and revenues which were ſettled to pay off the principal and intereſt on the orders made forth on four lottery-acts, &c. commonly called the General Fund," the ſaid two companies were empowered to borrow money on their common ſeal, or to make calls on their proprietors for enabling them to advance to the public the two ſums above ſpecified; the ſaid reduction of intereſt to commence from and after Michaelmas 1727: for which intereſt a new annual fund was hereby eſtabliſhed, and has ever ſince been called the General-fund, amounting to ſeven hundred twenty-four thouſand eight hundred forty-nine pounds, ſix ſhillings, and ten pence. Hereby meaſures were ſo well concerted by the government, that all the proprietors of thoſe redeemable debts acquieſced in the ſaid reduction of their intereſt from ſix to five per cent. without borrowing any part of the ſaid two millions five hundred thouſand pounds of the Bank, or of the two millions South-ſea company, ſtipulated as before-mentioned *.

By the ſecond, entitled, "An act for redeeming the ſeveral funds of the Bank, purſuant to former proviſions of redemption," &c. † the governors and company declared themſelves willing to accept of five per cent. intereſt for all the debt due to that corporation, in lieu of their then allowances, and to advance the above-named two millions five hundred thouſand pounds, if called for; and the Bank was hereby to deliver up two millions in Exchequer-bills, for which they were to have an annuity of one hundred thouſand pounds, redeemable on one year's notice after Chriſtmas 1717. This is called the Aggregate Fund, firſt eſtabliſhed by an act of the firſt year of king George (cap. xii.) tho' not particularly applied to the leſſening of the national debts till now. Hereby alſo the Bank was to have three per cent. per ann. and one penny per cent. per diem (inſtead of two pence formerly allowed) for circulating of the ſum of two millions five hundred and ſixty-one thouſand and twenty-five pounds, being the remaining Exchequer-bills, till fully cancelled from Chriſtmas 1717; ſo that the whole capital of the Bank was hereby encreaſed to five millions three hundred ſeventy-five thouſand and twenty-ſeven pounds, ſeventeen ſhillings, and ten-pence. But their original capital of one million ſix hundred thouſand pounds was to continue at ſix per cent. intereſt, to the firſt of Auguſt 1742.

By the third, entitled, "An act for redeeming the yearly fund of the South-ſea company," &c. ‡ the South-ſea company's preſent capital being ten millions, and their preſent annual fund being ſix hundred thouſand pounds, their fund was now reduced from ſix to five per cent. i. e. from ſix hundred thouſand pounds to five hundred thouſand, from and after Midſummer 1718, beſides their yearly allowance of eight thouſand pounds for charges of management. The company was alſo hereby impowered to borrow money on their common ſeal, either for the purpoſes of this act, or for carrying on their trade, or other neceſſary occaſions, at ſuch intereſt as they ſhould think fit, and for any time not leſs than for ſix months; and altho' their fund may hereafter be redeemed, (viz. on one year's notice after Midſummer 1723) yet their trade and corporate capacity was hereby to continue for ever. This was, in the ſtyle of the Exchequer, called the South-ſea fund.

By all which ſavings, viz. by one per cent. on the funds before-named, and by one penny per cent. per day ſaved for the future on the Exchequer-bills hereafter to be circulated, a good beginning, or foundation, was laid for the famous ſinking fund, amounting to three hundred twenty-three thouſand four hundred and thirty-four pounds, ſeven ſhillings, and ſeven-pence half-penny, per ann. Moreover, for the greater conveniency of the proprietors of the before-named lottery orders, and debts at the Exchequer hereby ranged under this new general fund, they were brought from the Exchequer to the Bank, and erected into a tranſferable ſtock, at five per cent. intereſt. The ſaid yearly ſaving or ſurplus was hereby to be ſolely applicable to the diſcharge of the principal and intereſt of ſuch national debts as were contracted before Chriſtmas 1716.

Thus out of the before-named three funds, called the Aggregate, the General, and the South-ſea fund, was formed the Sinking Fund, being purely the ſurplus or ſavings out of thoſe funds by the ſeveral reductions now and afterwards made in the rates of intereſt and allowances; and as theſe have at different times been leſſened, and annual or other payments have been made to the creditors of the public act of the "Sinking Fund," it has proportionally encreaſed. As a proof of the great advantage ariſing from this reduction of the intereſt on the national funds, and the eſtabliſhment of a fund for farther leſſening the public debts, I ſhall here obſerve, that, inſtead of lowering the prices of the ſeveral ſtocks at market, they were found to riſe conſiderably in price; particularly South-ſea ſtock, which, at Lady-day of this year 1717, was but one hundred three-fourths per cent. but got up to eleven hundred and twelve one-half by Michaelmas following.

The earl of Oxford, who had now remained near two years a priſoner in the Tower, finding the ſeſſion likely to come to an end without taking his caſe into conſideration, preſented a petition to the houſe of Lords, praying, that his trial might be brought on. The lords aſſented to his requeſt: Weſtminſter-hall being prepared for the purpoſe, and the lord-chancellor Cowper conſtituted high-ſteward for the occaſion, the earl, on the twenty-fourth of June, was brought from the Tower by water, and conducted to the bar; when Mr. Hampden, one of the managers for the commons, recapitulated the charge againſt his lordſhip in a long ſpeech. Then Sir Joſeph Jekyll (lately made maſter of the rolls in the room of Sir John Trevor, deceaſed) ſtood up to make good the firſt article of the charge; but as he was proceeding, the lord Harcourt ſignified to their lordſhips, that he had a motion to make, and they accordingly adjourned to their own houſe. There he repreſented, that a great deal of time would be unneceſſarily conſumed in going through all the articles of the impeachment; that if the commons could make good the two articles for high treaſon, the earl of Oxford would forfeit both life and eſtate, and there would be an end of the matter; whereas, to proceed in the method propoſed by the commons, would draw out the trial to a prodigious length: and, that it would be a great hardſhip upon a peer, who had already undergone ſo long a confinement, to appear every day at their bar, like a traitor, and be, at laſt, found guilty only of high crimes and miſdemeanors. He therefore moved, that the commons might not be permitted to proceed in order to make good the articles againſt the earl of Oxford for high crimes and miſdemeanors, till judgment ſhould be firſt given upon the articles for high treaſon.

After a long debate this motion was carried in the affirmative: there aroſe upon this a difference between the two houſes, the commons being reſolved to proceed in their own way, and the lords as ſtrenuouſly adhering to theirs. The lower houſe demanded a free conference, which was refuſed by the upper. The diſpute grew more and more warm: the lords ſent a meſſage to the commons, importing, that they intended forthwith to proceed to the trial of the earl of Oxford. The commons anſwered this intimation, by adjourning themſelves to the third day of July. Hereupon the lords repairing to Weſtminſter-hall, took their places, ordered the earl to be brought to the bar, and cauſed proclamation to be made three times, for his accuſers to appear and make good the impeachment againſt him. Having waited for a quarter of an hour, they adjourned to their own houſe, where, one or two excepted, they gave their votes for the diſcharge of the earl of Oxford; then returning to the hall, they ordered him immediately to be ſet at liberty. The commons were enraged at the eſcape of this nobleman, whom they had marked out for deſtruction; and as a laſt effort of their malice, they reſolved that the king ſhould be addreſſed to except him out of the act of grace which was intended to be brought into the houſe. This addreſs his majeſty was pleaſed to comply with, and alſo forbade the earl to appear at court.

On the fifteenth day of July the earl of Sunderland delivered, in the houſe of peers, the act of grace, which paſſed through both houſes without any difficulty. From this indemnity were excepted, the earl of Oxford, Mr. Prior, Mr. Thomas Harley, Mr. Arthur Moore, Criſp, Nodes, Obryan, Kedmayne the printer, and Thomſon, the aſſaſſinators in Newgate confined ſince the reign of king William, and the clan of Macgregor * in Scotland. By virtue of this act, the earl of Carnwath, and the lords Widdrington and Nairn, were immediately diſcharged; but the lord Duffus was continued in priſon, with an allowance of three pounds per week. All the gentlemen who lay under ſentence of death in Newgate were diſmiſſed, as were thoſe that were detained, on account of the rebellion, in the Fleet, the Marſhalſea, and other priſons in the kingdom. The yearly value of the forfeited eſtates in England and Ireland amounted to forty-ſeven thouſand ſix hundred and twenty ſix pounds, eighteen ſhillings and five pence half-penny; the rents of thoſe in Scotland were eſtimated at twenty-nine thouſand ſix hundred and ninety-five pounds, ſix ſhillings, and eight pence, ſterling.

The act of grace being prepared for the royal aſſent, the very day on which it was preſented the king went to the houſe of peers in the afternoon; and having given his ſanction to all the bills that were ready, he cloſed the ſeſſion with a ſpeech on the uſual topics.

A famous controverſy was begun and carried on about this time, occaſioned by Dr. Hoadley, biſhop of Bangor's ſermon before the king, entitled, "The nature of the kingdom of Chriſt, ſhewing it not to be of this world." This ſermon made a great noiſe, and innumerable pamphlets were wrote on both ſides. The biſhop was generally thought to have the better of his antagoniſts, who, not content with their oppoſition in a private capacity, thought to have ſilenced him by means of the convocation which was then ſitting. The lower houſe appointed a committee to draw up a repreſentation to the upper houſe, againſt the poſitions advanced in his ſermon, and in a farther performance of his, entitled, "A preſervative againſt the principles and practices of the non-jurors." The committee cenſured both; but, to put an end to theſe heats, the convocation was prorogued, and have ſcarce ever ſat ſince.

During theſe tranſactions, his majeſty had thought fit to appoint ſir John Norris envoy-extraordinary and plenipotentiary to the czar of Muſcovy; and, as if things began to be ſo diſpoſed as to admit of a peace in the North, a reſolution was taken to diſcharge count Gyllemberg, and that baron Gortz ſhould be releaſed from his confinement in Holland, which was accordingly performed; yet the ſtorm did not entirely blow over,

* It ſeems the family or clan of Macgregors, alias Campbells, had been in rebellion in the time of king James I. and were reduced; but on king James's death they took up arms again, not ſo much on any ſtate account, as to plunder the Lowlands, and injure the country; whereupon a remarkable act paſſed againſt them. By this act they were all, at the age of ſixteen, to appear before the privy-council, and give ſurety for their good behaviour; and, in order to their extirpation, no miniſter, within the bounds of the Highlands, were to baptize any male child with the name of Gregor or Macgregor. The famous Rob Roy, head of the clans, being in the rebellion, occaſioned perhaps the exception, by which the whole family of the Macgregors were excluded the benefit of the act of grace.

but the Swediſh quarrel ſtill proved a ſource of new expence to the Britiſh nation.

In the ſpring of this year the czar made an excurſion to the court of Verſailles, where he propoſed to the duke of Orleans to conclude a treaty, which, had it taken place, would have completed the greatneſs of Muſcovy. His deſign was to compromiſe matters with the king of Sweden, who would yield to him ſome large provinces, to deprive the Danes of the empire of the Baltic Sea, to weaken the Engliſh by a civil war, and make all the trade of the North center in Ruſſia. With this view, he propoſed to the regent of France to act as mediator between Sweden and Muſcovy, and to make a league offenſive and defenſive with theſe two crowns and that of Spain. This propoſal, however, was rejected by the duke of Orleans, and communicated by him to king George. The czar, after leaving France, had an interview with baron Gortz at Amſterdam. This ſtateſman, now at liberty, behaved like an implacable enemy, prompted not only by the powerful motives by which he had been formerly actuated, but inſtigated by a ſpirit of revenge, on account of his late impriſonment. He aſſured the czar, that in leſs than three months he would, in conjunction with a ſingle plenipotentiary from Ruſſia, remove every obſtacle that retarded the concluſion of a peace with Sweden. Peter, over whom Gortz had acquired an abſolute aſcendancy, agreed to ſuſpend all operations againſt Sweden until that term ſhould be expired. A congreſs was opened at Abo, but the conferences were afterwards transferred to Aland. The articles were ſoon adjuſted, and an alliance formed that was wholly to change the face of affairs in Europe: the ſubſtance of which, as it was found among de Gortz's papers after his death, was as follows: the czar was to keep the whole of Livonia, and part of Ingria and Carelia, to himſelf, and to reſtore the reſt to Sweden. He was to join his efforts to thoſe of Charles XII. in order to reſtore Staniſlaus to the throne of Poland, and to enter that country with eighty thouſand Ruſſians, to dethrone the very king in whoſe defence he had waged a war of ten years continuance. He was to furniſh the king of Sweden with a number of ſhips, ſufficient to tranſport ten thouſand Swedes to England, and thirty thouſand to Germany. The united forces of Peter and Charles were to attack the king of England in his German dominions, eſpecially in Bremen and Verden, and were likewiſe to be employed in re-eſtabliſhing the duke of Holſtein, and compelling the king of Pruſſia to agree to a treaty, by which he would be deprived of thoſe territories which he had ſeized.

Baron Gortz ſet out from Aland for Fredericſtadt in Norway, which Charles was then beſieging, with the plan; but before he arrived, Charles was killed by a cannon-ball from the town, while he was viſiting the trenches. Gortz was immediately arreſted and brought to the ſcaffold by the nobles of Sweden, whoſe hatred he had incurred. The death of Charles produced an entire change in the face of affairs: Sweden was obliged to ſubmit, while the czar, the king of Denmark, and king George, as elector of Hanover, remained in poſſeſſion of what they had acquired. Although theſe affairs did not fall out till towards the end of the following year, I have thrown them together in this place, in order to prevent any farther recourſe to them †.

Soon after the cloſe of the ſeſſion of parliament in England, his majeſty received advice by count Volkra, the imperial miniſter, that prince Eugene had gained a deciſive victory over the Turks at Belgrade, which was followed by the ſurrender of that town, the key of the Ottoman empire. King George had not yet received the inveſtiture of the duchies of Bremen and Verden; and until that could be procured, it was neceſſary to eſpouſe with warmth the intereſts of the emperor. This begot a miſunderſtanding between our court and that of Spain. Philip V. taking advantage of the emperor's being engaged in a war with the Turks, had, at the inſtance of the cardinal Alberoni, his prime miniſter, equipped a ſtrong armament in the courſe of this year, the command of which was beſtowed upon the marquis de Leda, who, in purſuance of the order of his court, ſet ſail from Barcelona, and, landing at Cagliari, the capital of the iſland of Sardinia, which belonged to his Imperial majeſty, had reduced the whole iſland to ſubjection. This proceeding Philip pretended to juſtify by a manifeſto, in which he alledged, that the archduke (for he had not yet acknowleged Charles VI. as emperor) had, contrary to the faith of treaties, encouraged and ſupported the rebellion of his ſubjects in Catalonia, by frequent ſuccours from Naples and other places, and particularly that he had cauſed the grand inquiſitor of Spain to be ſeized, though furniſhed with a paſſport from his Holineſs. However, his Catholic majeſty promiſed, by the marquis Beretti Lardi, his ambaſſador at the Hague, to proceed no farther, and to ſuſpend all operations, that the powers of Europe might have time and opportunity to contrive expedients for adjuſting all differences, and ſecuring the peace and balance of power in Italy: and he even agreed to refer the deciſion of this important affair to the king of Great Britain and the States-general. Theſe powers undertook the office. Conferences were begun between the miniſters of the emperor, France, and Holland; and theſe produced, in the courſe of the following year, the famous quadruple alliance, which was intended to ſettle the affairs of Europe on a better foundation than the treaty of Utrecht had left them, and to fix the general tranquility for ever: yet, by unforeſeen accidents, to which human policy will ever be liable, this alliance proved the cauſe of an immediate war between us and Spain, and in its conſequences has been productive of innumerable troubles.

By this treaty, the terms of which were already fixed, though not executed till ſome months afterwards, it was ſtipulated, "That the king of Spain ſhould reſtore to the emperor, within two months after the ratification of the articles, the kingdom of Sardinia, and renounce all right and claim to the dominions of the emperor in Italy and the Netherlands; conſent to the emperor's being put in poſſeſſion of Sicily, and renounce the right of reverſion of that kingdom to the crown of Spain, as ſettled by the treaty of Utrecht; on condition, however, of having Sardinia in exchange: that the emperor ſhould renounce, for himſelf, his heirs and ſucceſſors, all right and pretenſion to any dominions, of which the king of Spain was acknowleged rightful poſſeſſor, by the treaty of Utrecht: that he ſhould own Philip as lawful king of Spain and the Indies, and give him the titles and prerogatives belonging to that dignity: that the duchies of Tuſcany, Parma, and Placentia, ſhould be accounted as male fiefs of the empire, and ſhould deſcend, in default of male heirs, to the queen of Spain's eldeſt ſon; but that none of theſe duchies ſhould ever be poſſeſſed by a prince, who was at the ſame time king of Spain, nor ſhould the king of Spain ever take upon him the guardianſhip of that prince: that the king of Sicily ſhould reſtore that kingdom to the emperor, within two months after the ratification of the articles: that, in return, the emperor ſhould give to the king of Sicily, the iſland of Sardinia, which he ſhould enjoy, with the title of king, but the right of reverſion, in default of heirs male, ſhould be reſerved to the crown of Spain: that the kings of Spain and Sicily ſhould be allowed three months to conſider, whether they would accept to reject the terms propoſed; and if, contrary to the wiſhes of all Europe, they ſhould continue refractory, the meditators ſhould join their forces, and compel them to ſubmit: that, if any of the mediators ſhould be attacked, on account of the ſuccours lent to the emperor, the others ſhould declare war againſt the aggreſſor, and not lay down their arms till the emperor was put in poſſeſſion of Sicily, and eſtabliſhed in the firm enjoyment of his Italian dominions: that, if either of the kings ſhould accept the terms propoſed by the allies, he ſhould join his forces with thoſe of the mediators, in order to oblige the other to comply: and, finally, to ſhow that nothing but juſtice and peace was intended, it was expreſsly ſtipulated, that as ſoon as the emperor was put in poſſeſſion of Sicily, he ſhould renounce all pretenſions to Spain and the Indies, whether king Philip acceded or not, inaſmuch as the guaranty of the mediators would be to his Imperial majeſty, a ſecurity, equal to the renunciations of the Spaniſh monarch, for Sicily, the Italian dominions, and the Netherlands *.

The crown of Spain was highly diſpleaſed with this proviſion made for its intereſt; and though the emperor ſeemed to be very well contented at this juncture, yet, as ſoon as Spain was compelled to accept what was now offered her, he alſo grew diſſatisfied with this partition, and we have never ſince been able to keep them both in temper, or preſerve ourſelves from being involved in their quarrels, as the reader, in the courſe of this work, will be ſufficiently informed. Philip ſtill continuing to make great preparations by ſea and land, king George and the regent of France interpoſed their admonitions, but to no purpoſe. At length his Britannic majeſty reſolved to have recourſe to more ſubſtantial arguments, and ordered a ſtrong ſquadron of ſhips of war to be fitted out with all expedition.

In this critical ſituation things were when the parliament met, on the twenty-firſt of November; but before I relate their tranſactions, I muſt take notice, that on the ſecond of November her royal highneſs the princeſs of Wales was brought to bed of a prince, who, on the twenty-eighth, was chriſtened by the name of George William, the ceremony of whoſe baptiſm occaſioned an unhappy difference between the king and the prince of Wales. It ſeems his royal highneſs had intended the biſhop of Oſnabrug, has uncle, ſhould have ſtood god-father; but his majeſty, in compliance with the cuſtom which preſcribed that one of the principal lords of the court, commonly the lord-chamberlain for the time being, ſhould ſtand as ſecond god-father, had ordered the duke of Newcaſtle to ſtand: the prince imagining the duke had officiouſly forced himſelf into this honour, expreſſed himſelf in very warm terms of reſentment to his grace, after the ceremony was over. The king being acquainted with this, and taking the prince's reſentment as expreſſed againſt himſelf, ſent him orders to leave St. James's; which he did, and went and reſided at Leiceſter-houſe, whither he was accompanied by the princeſs his conſort, though it was ſignified to her, that ſhe might ſtay at St. James's as long as ſhe judged convenient. The young princeſs and the young prince (who died in February following) remained at St. James's with his majeſty, orders having been given that her royal highneſs might have full liberty to viſit them whenever ſhe thought proper. After this, whenever the king went abroad, he committed the adminiſtration of the government to lords-juſtices. This difference farther divided the friends of the royal family; for as all in the king's ſervice were forbid to viſit the prince's court at Leiceſter-houſe, moſt of his royal highneſs's ſervants forbore going to St. James's.

The king, in his ſpeech to both houſes, acquainted them, that he had reduced the army to very near one half, ſince the beginning of laſt ſeſſion; he expreſſed his deſire, that all thoſe who were friends to the preſent happy eſtabliſhment, might unanimouſly concur in ſome proper method for the greater ſtrengthening the proteſtant intereſt, of which as the church of England was unqueſtionably the main ſupport and bulwark, ſo would ſhe reap the principal benefit of every advantage accruing from the union and mutual charity of all proteſtants. Addreſſes of thanks having been preſented by both houſes, the commons proceeded to take into conſideration the eſtimates and accounts, in order to ſettle the eſtabliſhment of the army, navy, and ordnance; ten thouſand men were voted for the ſea-ſervice, and the ſum of two hundred and twenty-four thouſand eight hundred and fifty-ſeven pounds was granted for defraying the expences of the navy.

On the fourth of December, the ſupply for the army fell under deliberation in the houſe of commons, when a very warm debate enſued upon the number of troops that ought to be maintained. Sir William Wyndham, Mr. Shippen, and Mr. Walpole, were for reſtricting them to twelve thouſand men only; the courtiers affirmed, that ſixteen thouſand were abſolutely neceſſary. In the courſe of the debate, Mr. Shippen having made uſe of ſome expreſſions highly reflecting upon the king's perſon and government, he was voted to the Tower by a great majority. At length the number of land-forces was fixed at ſixteen thouſand three hundred and forty-ſeven effective men; and for the maintenance of them, the ſum of ſix hundred and fifty thouſand pounds was allotted.

About this period there appearing to be a conſiderable ſcarcity of ſilver coin in England, by reaſon our gold coin was rated too high in price; and the great ſir Iſaac Newton being thereupon conſulted by the lords commiſſioners of the treaſury, he adviſed the reduction of the value of guineas from twenty-one ſhillings and ſix pence, to twenty-one ſhillings; which was accordingly done by approbation of the houſe of commons, who addreſſed the king for that purpoſe; at which rate they have continued ever ſince: whereby, in ſome meaſure, the ſilver coin, which before had been exported in exchange for gold, was kept at home.

In the beginning of the year 1718, a deſign againſt the king's life was diſcovered; the author of which ſeemed fitter for Bedlam than Newgate. His name was James Shepheard, a young man under twenty, who, by frequenting Jacobite ſeminaries, and reading their books, had worked himſelf up to ſuch a pitch of enthuſiaſm, that he wiſhed ardently for an opportunity to aſſaſſinate the king, and actually wrote a letter to one Mr. Leake, a nonjuring clergyman, propoſing a ſcheme for effecting his horrid deſign, which he called "ſmiting the uſurper in his palace." Leake, terrified at ſuch a letter being left for him at his lodgings, went and communicated the contents of it to ſir John Fryer, an alderman of London, who adviſed him to ſecure the writer when he ſhould call for an anſwer: this was accordingly done, and being carried before the alderman, was by him committed to Newgate. The young traitor was ſo far from repenting of his execrable deſign, that upon his trial he openly avowed it, declaring that he thought it would have been a meritorious deed. He was accordingly convicted upon his own confeſſion, and executed at Tyburn on the ſeventeenth of March.

The ſame day the marquis de Paleotti, an Italian, and brother to the ducheſs of Shrewſbury, ſuffered the like fate, having been convicted and condemned for the murder of his own ſervant, in a tranſport of paſſion. Great interceſſion was made for him by his ſiſter the ducheſs, and ſome foreign miniſters; but his character was ſo deteſtable, that all the favour he could obtain, was to be executed by himſelf.

The principal affair which engaged the attention of the parliament this ſeſſion, and which produced much heat and altercation among the miniſters, was the bill for regulating the land-forces, and puniſhing mutiny and deſertion, which was conſidered as an encroachment on the liberties of the people and the conſtitution of the kingdom, inaſmuch as it eſtabliſhed martial law, and wreſted from the civil magiſtrate the cognizance of crimes and miſdemeanors committed by the officers and ſoldiers of the army. One of the principal arguments made uſe of by the promoters of the bill (among whom general Stanhope, lately created viſcount Mahon and baron Elvaſton, particularly diſtinguiſhed himſelf) was, that by the power of trying ſuch offenders being confined to the civil courts, the affair was frequently ſubject to ſo many delays, that before the trial could be brought on, the friends and relations of the delinquents had opportunity to exert their intereſt and procure their pardon; by which juſtice was eluded, and great encouragement given to mutiny and diſobedience. The futility of this argument was clearly expoſed, and the danger that might ariſe from ſuch a power veſted in the crown, amply ſet forth, by the gentlemen in the oppoſition. But what could an handful of perſons do againſt the much greater number of thoſe who were ready, for the ſake of preſerving their places, or their penſions, to ſacrifice the liberties and intereſts of their fellow-ſubjects to the will of a miniſter? After a violent debate, the bill was carried by a great majority in both houſes, though ſeveral lords entered their proteſts.

This affair being diſcuſſed, a bill was brought in, for veſting in truſtees the forfeited eſtates in Great Britain and Ireland, to be ſold for the uſe of the public; for giving relief to lawful creditors, by determining their claims; and for the more effectually bringing into the reſpective Exchequers, the rents and profits of the ſaid eſtates, till ſold. The time of claiming was prolonged; the ſum of twenty thouſand pounds was reſerved out of the eſtates of Scotland, for erecting ſchools; and eight thouſand pounds for building barracks in that part of the kingdom *.

The ſums granted by the houſe of commons for the ordinary of the navy being found inſufficient to anſwer the deſigns that had been formed by the adminiſtration, the king was prevailed on to ſend a meſſage to the commons, on the ſeventeenth of March, in the following terms:

"Geo. Rex.

"His majeſty being at preſent engaged in ſeveral negociations, of the utmoſt concern to the welfare of theſe kingdoms, and the tranquility of Europe, and having lately received information from abroad, which makes him judge that it will give weight to his endeavours, if a naval force ſhou'd be employed where it was neceſſary; does think fit to acquaint this houſe therewith; not doubting but that, in caſe he ſhould be obliged, at this critical juncture, to exceed the number of men granted this year for the ſea-ſervice, the houſe will at their next meeting, provide for ſuch exceedings †".

This meſſage was brought to the houſe by Mr. Boſcawen; and an addreſs, promiſing to make good ſuch exceedings, if they were found neceſſary, was moved for, by Mr. William Strickland, and agreed to without a diviſion; which was highly agreeable to the court. The next day the king thought fit to make ſome alterations at the navy-board, and alſo to appoint the earl of Berkeley vice-admiral, and Matthew Aylmer, eſq. rear-admiral of Great Britain: the latter was ſoon after raiſed to the dignity of a baron of the kingdom of Ireland.

On the twenty-firſt of March the king went to the houſe of peers; and having paſſed the bills that were ready for the royal aſſent, ordered the parliament to be prorogued. Soon after, viz. on the eighth of April, earl Cowper, lord-chancellor, reſigned the great ſeal, which, after having been a ſhort time in commiſſion, was given to Thomas, lord Parker, lord chief juſtice of the king's Bench, afterwards created earl of Macclesfield; who was ſucceeded as lord chief-juſtice by ſir John Pratt About the ſame time, Mr. Lechmere was made attorney-general, in the room of ſir Edward Northey; the earl of Sunderland preſident of the council, and firſt commiſſioner of the treaſury; John Aiſlabie, eſq. chancellor of the Exchequer; lord Stanhope and James Craggs, junior, eſq. were appointed ſecretaries of ſtate; the latter in the room of Joſeph Addiſon, eſq. to whoſe thoughtful and ſpeculative genius that office was not very agreeable. Lord Stanhope and lord Cadogan were ſoon afterwards made earls, by their reſpective names.

While theſe ſteps were taking, a great number of large ſhips were put into commiſſion, and ſuch other meaſures purſued as rendered it evident, that the fleet now fitting out would not prove a fleet of parade. The king of Spain, on his part, equipped a very conſiderable armament, which in the beginning of June ſet ſail; but the deſtination of it was not known. In the mean time, the marquis de Monteleone, ambaſſador from Spain, preſented a memorial to the Britiſh miniſtry, importing, that his maſter could not, without ſome degree of ſuſpicion, behold ſuch preparations, which ſeemed to indicate an hoſtile deſign; and would prove, if continued, deſtructive to the good intelligence that ſubſiſted between the two crowns. The reaſon the miniſtry aſſigned for acting with ſo much vigour was, their reſolution to maintain the neutrality of Italy, which they thought his Catholic majeſty had lately intringed, by ſeizing on the iſland of Sardinia. Mean while, the negotiations between the Engliſh and French produced the quadruple alliance, of which we have already ſpoken, and by which the king of England and the regent of France preſcribed a peace between the emperor, the king of Spain, and the king of Sicily; but his Catholic majeſty, foreſeeing that Sicily was to be delivered up to the emperor, had reſolved, by the advice of cardinal Alberoni, his prime miniſter, a man of infinite abilities and diſcernment, to ſeize that iſland for himſelf: thither it was the Spaniſh fleet was really bound.

About the middle of the month of March ſir George Byng was appointed admiral and commander in chief of the ſquadron intended for the Mediterranean; and on the twenty-fourth of May following he received his inſtructions, which were to this purpoſe: "That he ſhould, upon his arrival in the Mediterranean, make inſtances with both parties to ceaſe from uſing any further acts of hoſtility; but in caſe the Spaniards do ſtill inſiſt, with their ſhips of war and forces, to attack the kingdom of Naples, or other the territories of the emperor in Italy, or to land in any part of Italy, which can only be with a deſign to invade the emperor's dominions, againſt whom they have declared war by invading Sardinia; or if they ſhould endeavour to make themſelves maſters of the kingdom of Sicily, which muſt be with a deſign to invade the kingdom of Naples; in ſuch a caſe, you are, with all your power, to hinder and obſtruct the ſame. If it ſhould ſo happen that, at your arrival with the fleet under your command in the Mediterranean, the Spaniards ſhould already have landed any troops in Italy, in order to invade the emperor's territories, you ſhall endeavour amicably to diſſuade them from perſevering in ſuch an attempt, and offer them your aſſiſtance to help them to withdraw their troops, and put an end to all farther acts of hoſtility: but in caſe your friendly endeavours ſhall prove ineffectual, you ſhall, by keeping company with, or intercepting their ſhips or convoy; or, if it be neceſſary, by openly oppoſing them, defend the emperor's territories from any farther attempt."

The admiral ſailed the fifteenth of June, 1718, from Spithead, with twenty ſhips of the line of battle, two fire-ſhips, two bomb-veſſels, and a ſtore-ſhip. He arrived at Cape St. Vincent on the thirtieth day of that month, when he diſpatched his ſecretary, Mr. Allix, to Cadiz with a letter to colonel Stanhope (the late earl of Harrington) the king's envoy at Madrid, wherein he deſired that miniſter to acquaint the king of Spain with his arrival in theſe parts in his way to the Mediterranean, and to lay before him the inſtructions he was to act under with his ſquadron, of which he gave a very ample detail in his letter.

The envoy ſhewed the letter to cardinal Alberoni, who, upon reading it, told the colonel with ſome warmth, that his maſter would run all hazards, and even ſuffer himſelf to be drove out of Spain, rather than recal his troops, or conſent to any ſuſpenſion of arms; adding, that the Spaniards were not to be frightened; and he was ſo well convinced of their fleet's doing their duty, that if the admiral ſhould think fit to attack them, he ſhould be in no pain for the ſucceſs. Mr. Stanhope then ſhewed his eminence a liſt of the Britiſh ſquadron, deſiring him to peruſe it, and to compare its ſtrength with that of their own. The cardinal, after running over the paper, threw it on the ground in a great paſſion; which Mr. Stanhope perceiving, uſed all his endeavours to pacify him. At length he promiſed to lay the admiral's letter before the Catholic king, and to let the envoy know his majeſty's reſolution. It was, however, nine days before Mr. Stanhope could obtain this anſwer and ſend it away, the cardinal probably hoping that the admiral would delay taking vigorous meaſures in expectation of it, and perhaps put into ſome of the ports of Spain, and thereby gain time for the fleet and forces to ſecure a good footing in Sicily. At length, however, the admiral's own letter to Mr. Stanhope was ſent back, with a note under it, as follows:

"Sir, His Catholic majeſty has done me the honour to tell me, that the chevalier Byng may execute the order he has from the king his maſter.

Eſcurial, July 15, 1718.

The Cardinal ALBERONI.'

Mr. Stanhope ſeeing things tending to a rupture, gave private and early notice of his apprehenſions to the Engliſh merchants ſettled in the Spaniſh ſea-ports.

The admiral purſuing his voyage with unfavourable winds, was joined off Gibraltar by vice-admiral Cornwall with two ſhips of the line. On the twenty third of July he anchored with the ſquadron off Port Mahon. Here he received advice that the Spaniſh fleet had been ſeen the thirtieth of June off Naples, ſteering ſouth-eaſt; upon which he diſpatched away expreſſes to the governor of Milan and viceroy of Naples, to inform them of his arrival in the Mediterranean; and having relieved the garriſon of Minorca, he ſailed from thence on the twenty-fifth of July, and arrived on the first of August in the bay of Naples, to the great satisfaction of the German government, who, by the lucky arrival of the admiral, were relieved from the terror they had been under of a Spanish invasion. Sir George Byng, on his arrival at Naples, was informed by the viceroy, count Dauhn, that the Spanish army, amounting to thirty thousand men, commanded by the marquis de Leda, had landed in Sicily, reduced Palermo and Messina, and were then employed in the siege of the citadel belonging to this last city. The viceroy at the same time acquainted the admiral, that he had resolved to embark two thousand German foot, under the command of general Wetzel, who were to take possession of the citadel of Messina and fort Salvador, in pursuance of an agreement with the duke of Savoy, who, finding that at all events he was to lose the island, contrived to lose it so as he might get something for it. The German forces were to be escorted by the British fleet, which sailed for that purpose from Naples on the sixth of August, and arrived on the ninth in view of the Faro of Messina *; in doubling which he discovered two Spanish scouts, and also learned from some of the country vessels, that the Spanish fleet was lying to, in order of battle; upon which the admiral immediately detached general Wetzel with the German troops to Reggio, under convoy of two ships of war; then he stood through the Faro after the Spanish scouts that led him to their main fleet, which before noon he discovered in line of battle, amounting to twenty-seven sail, large and small, besides two fire-ships, four bomb-vessels, and seven gallies; they were commanded in chief by Don Antonio de Castaneta, under whom were the four rear-admirals Chacon, Mari, Guevara, and Cammock.

On the sight of the English squadron they stood away large, but still in order of battle. The English admiral followed them all the rest of the day and the succeeding night. In the morning, being the eleventh of August, N. S. rear-admiral Mari, with six Spanish ships of war, and all the gallies, fire-ships, bomb-vessels, and store-ships, separated from the main fleet, and stood in for the Sicilian shore; upon which sir George Byng detached captain George Walton, in the Canterbury of sixty guns, with five more ships, in pursuit of them; and they were soon engaged. The admiral himself continued to chace their main fleet, and about ten o'clock the battle began. The Spaniards were totally defeated, and all their admirals taken, except Cammock, who made his escape to Malta, with three ships of war and as many frigates. Notwithstanding this victory, the Spanish army still prosecuted the siege of Messina with such vigour, that the governor surrendered the place by capitulation on the twenty-ninth day of September, and the garrison was transported to Syracuse and Reggio. A treaty was now concluded at Vienna between the emperor and the duke of Savoy; they agreed to form an army for the conquest of Sardinia, in behalf of the duke, who, in the mean time, engaged to evacuate Sicily; but, until his troops should be conveyed from that island, he engaged that they should co-operate against the king of Spain.

That monarch, excessively provoked at the unexpected blow, which had in a manner totally destroyed the naval force he had been at so much pains and expence to rear, was not slow in expressing his resentment. On the first of September rear-admiral Guevara, with some ships under his command, entered the port of Cadiz, and made himself master of all the English ships that were there; and at the same time all the effects of the English merchants were seized in Malaga, and other ports of Spain, which, as soon as it was known here, produced reprisals on our part ‡: but it is now time to leave the Mediterranean, in order to give an account of what passed at home §.

The parliament met on the eleventh of November; and one of the first things they went upon was the affair of Spain, which had indeed engrossed all public conversation from the time of defeating their fleet, some looking upon that as one of the noblest exploits performed since the Revolution; while others considered it as an action dishonourable to England, being inconsistent with the rules of good faith, for the observance of which she had always been so famous; and when an address of congratulation to his majesty was moved for by lord Carteret on the success of his arms over the Spanish fleet, and to justify that measure, it was warmly opposed by the dukes of Buckingham, Devonshire, and Argyll; the earls of Nottingham, Cowper, Oxford, and Ilay; the lords North, Grey, and Harcourt, in the house of peers; and by Mr. Sheppard, Mr. Freeman, sir Thomas

§ The ministry having, in the course of the preceding year, formed the very laudable design of suppressing the pirates in the West Indies, who, since the close of the war, were become very numerous, and highly insolent, captain Woods Rogers was appointed governor of the Bahama Islands. On the 11th of April he sailed for Providence, which was to be the seat of his government; and after a short and easy passage arriving there, he took possession of the town of Nassau, of the fort belonging to it, and of the whole island, the people receiving him with all imaginable joy, and many of the pirates submitting immediately. He proceeded soon after to form a council, and settling the civil government in those islands, appointing civil and military officers, raising militia, and taking every other step necessary for procuring safety at home, and security from any thing that might be attempted from abroad; in which, by degrees, he succeeded. Some of the pirates, it is true, refused at first all terms, and did a great deal of mischief on the coast of Carolina; but when they saw that governor Rogers had thoroughly settled himself at Providence, and that the inhabitants of the Bahama islands found themselves obliged, through interest, to be honest, they began to doubt of their situation, and thought proper to go and beg that mercy which at first they refused; so that by the first of July, 1719, to which day the king's proclamation had been extended, there were not above three or four of those pirates who continued their trade; and two of them being taken, and their crews executed, the rest dispersed out of fear, and became thereby less terrible. Thus in a short time, and chiefly through the steady and prudent conduct of governor Rogers, this crew of villains were dissolved, who for many years had frighted the West Indies, and the northern colonies, coming at last to be so strong, that few merchantmen were safe, and withal so cruel and barbarous, that slavery amongst the Turks was preferable to falling into their hands. It had been happy for us if the management of the Spanish guarda-costas had been committed to the care of some man of a like spirit, who might have delivered the merchants from being plundered, without involving the nation in a war.

Hanmer,

Hanmer, Horatio Walpole, esq. and Robert Walpole, esq. in the house of commons, but without effect; for the address was carried by a great majority, and presented to his majesty. The parliament therein declare their entire satisfaction in those measures which the king had already taken for strengthening the protestant succession, and establishing a lasting tranquility in Europe, particularly in relation to the crown of Spain, and their resolution to enable him, in concurrence with his allies, not only to resent the injuries that crown had already done to our commerce, in breach of the treaties subsisting between the two nations, but to support him in the most effectual manner, in such farther measures as he shall judge necessary to complete the public tranquility in Europe, and to check the growth of that naval power which must otherwise prove dangerous to the trade of this kingdom, and the repose of Europe *.

On the nineteenth the commons voted thirteen thousand five hundred sailors, and twelve thousand four hundred and thirty-five men for the land-service. The whole estimate amounted to two millions two hundred and fifty-seven thousand five hundred and eighty-one pounds, nineteen shillings. The money was raised by a land-tax of three shillings in the pounds, the malt-tax, and a lottery for half a million. The bills for the land and malt-tax were both presented and passed in one day; an instance of dispatch unknown for many years.

On the thirteenth of December earl Stanhope declared in the house of lords, that, in order to unite the hearts of the well affected to the present establishment, he had a bill to offer, under the title of "A bill for strengthening the protestant interest in these kingdoms." It was accordingly read, and appeared to be a bill for repealing the occasional conformity and schism bills, which, towards the end of last reign, had been enacted against the dissenters, as also some clauses in the corporation and test acts. The Tory lords were astonished at this motion, for which they were altogether unprepared. Nevertheless, they made a strenuous opposition, though it proved a fruitless one for the court party. After violent debates, the bill was passed and sent down to the lower house, where it likewise met with a strong opposition; in spite of which it was carried by the majority.

A rupture with Spain had, for some time, been considered as a thing unavoidable; but, on the seventeenth of December, it was put out of all doubt, his majesty on that day sending a message to both houses, intimating, that all his endeavours to procure redress for the injuries done to his subjects by the king of Spain proving ineffectual, he had found it necessary to declare war against that monarch. This message being read, a motion was made for an address to the king, assuring him that the commons would chearfully support him in the prosecution of the war, till Spain should be obliged to accept of reasonable terms of peace, and agree to such conditions of trade and commerce as the English were entitled to expect. On this occasion many bold things were said as to the expediency of a war with Spain, and especially with regard to the pretensions and intentions of those who made this war; for the ministry insisting strongly that it was made in favour of trade, and upon repeated complaints from the merchants: it was said that the ministers had shewn no great regard for the trade and interest of the nation, since it appeared by the answer given to the marquis de Monteleone's letter, that they would have passed by the violation of the treaties of commerce, provided Spain had accepted the terms of the quadruple alliance; and that his majesty did not seek to aggrandise himself by any new acquisition, but was rather inclined to sacrifice something of his own to procure the general quiet and tranquility: that nobody could yet tell how far that sacrifice was to extend; but certainly it was a very uncommon piece of condescension. This sacrifice was said to be the cession of Gibraltar and Port Mahon, which the regent had offered to the king of Spain, provided he would accede to the quadruple alliance. Mr. Horatio Walpole alleged, that the disposition of Sicily, in favour of the emperor, was a breach of the treaty of Utrecht; and Mr. Robert Walpole exclaimed warmly against the injustice of attacking the Spanish fleet before a declaration of war on either side. They were answered by Mr. Craggs, and sir Joseph Jekyll closed the debate with saying, that when this affair was first mentioned in the house, he had been backward to give his opinion, as not perfectly well understanding the merits of it; but having since had leisure to examine the several steps which had been taken in it, he was now fully convinced, that if there was any injustice, it was on the side of the king of Spain; and that the conduct of his majesty and his ministers was entirely agreeable to the law of nations, and the rules of justice and equity. After these and several other speeches, the address was carried by a majority of one hundred and seventy-eight against one hundred and seven, and presented next day †.

The ministry now continued the pursuit of their scheme, and took such vigorous measures for obliging Spain to accept the terms assigned her by the quadruple alliance, that she lost all patience, and resolved to attempt any thing that might either free her from this necessity, or serve to express her resentment against such as endeavoured to impose it on her. With this view cardinal Alberoni employed all his intrigues, power, and industry, to find the English and French such ample employment at home as should leave them no leisure for disturbing others. The prince de Cellamare, ambassador from Philip V. to the court of Versailles, acted the same part there as count Gyllemberg had done in London, by caballing with the French malcontents, who were numerous and powerful, against the duke of Orleans. A scheme was actually formed for seizing the person of the regent and that of the young king, and entirely change the face of that government; every thing was in readiness for putting this plot into execution, and the conspirators only waited for the last orders, when the whole mystery was discovered. It was to king George that the duke of Orleans owed the first intimation of a conspiracy being formed against his person and government; upon which the regent took ſuch effectual meaſures for watching the conduct of all ſuſpected perſons, that the whole intrigue was brought to light *. The prince de Cellamare was treated in France nearly in the ſame manner as the Swediſh miniſter had been in England; and Alberoni, the firſt mover of this machine, had the vexation to find that he had, without any advantage from his project, offended, in the moſt ſenſible manner, a power whoſe reſentment could not but prove extremely prejudicial, not only to himſelf, but even to the whole Spaniſh monarchy.

At the very time that theſe things were tranſacting in France, and that the regent made diligent preparation for demanding, ſword in hand, reparation for the inſult he had received, the buſy cardinal was forming a ſcheme of a different nature againſt king George, by making an effort to eſtabliſh the pretender on his throne. The duke of Ormond repairing to Madrid, held conferences with his eminence, in which it was agreed to give the chevalier an invitation to come to Madrid, to put himſelf at the head of a large body of auxiliary forces which his Catholic majeſty propoſed to lend him, in order to aſſert with ſucceſs his pretenſions to the Britiſh crown. The chevalier did not ſuffer himſelf to be long intreated: he quitted the papal dominions (where he had lately taken refuge) by ſtealth, and got ſafely to Madrid, where he was received with great cordiality by the king of Spain, and treated as king of Great Britain. The earl of Stair, who was then our miniſter at the court of France, diſpatched the firſt certain intelligence of the deſigns of Spain, which were, to have ſent an armament of ten ſhips of war and tranſports, having on board ſix thouſand regular troops, with arms for twelve thouſand men, to be landed in the weſt of England, under the command of the duke of Ormond, with the title of captain-general of his moſt Catholic majeſty. He was provided with declarations in the name of that king, importing, that for many good reaſons he had ſent part of his troops, as auxiliaries to king James, to act for his intereſt in England and Scotland, and uſe their utmoſt endeavours for his reſtoration; and that the fear of ill ſucceſs might not deter any perſon from openly eſpouſing his intereſt, his moſt Catholic majeſty promiſed a ſafe retreat in his dominions to all ſuch as ſhould be obliged to leave their country, on account of the ſhare they might bear in this undertaking †.

Upon advice of theſe deſigns, the moſt effectual methods were taken here for defeating them. A fleet was immediately ordered to be got ready to put to ſea; a proclamation iſſued for apprehending James Butler, late duke of Ormond, with a promiſe of five thouſand pounds to the perſon that ſhould ſeize him; and an embargo was alſo laid on all ſhipping. On the tenth of March, 1719, his majeſty acquainted the parliament, that he had received certain intelligence of an invaſion, intended from Spain, in favour of the pretender. Both houſes hereupon concurred in an addreſs, promiſing to ſupport him againſt all his enemies: they deſired him to augment his forces by ſea and land, aſſuring him they would make good the extraordinary expence ‡. Upon this, orders were given for haſtening the fleet, which was fitted out with ſo much expedition, that on the fifth of April ſir John Norris ſailed from Spithead to the Weſtward with nine men of war, and on the twenty-ninth the earl of Berkley ſailed from St. Helen's with ſeven other ſhips to join him. The government likewiſe took ſome other very ſalutary meaſures to oppoſe this intended invaſion of the Spaniards. The troops in the weſt of England, where it was conjectured they deſigned to land, were reinforced by ſeveral regiments quartered in other parts of the kingdom; four battalions were brought over from Ireland. About the middle of April two Swiſs battalions arrived in the river of Thames, and three Dutch battalions arrived in the north of England. Beſides this, the French regent and the emperor ordered bodies of troops to march, ſo as to be in readineſs to be tranſported to England upon occaſion. Theſe preparations made by our king and his allies would have of themſelves been ſufficient to have defeated the invaſion, had it been actually carried into execution; but the elements fought the cauſe of the houſe of Hanover, and rendered ineffectual the deſigns of its enemies: for the Spaniſh fleet deſigned for this expedition, conſiſting of five ſhips of war, and about forty tranſports, having on board the duke of Ormond, and upwards of five thouſand men, a great quantity of ammunition, ſpare arms, and one million of pieces of eight, which ſailed from Cadiz on the twenty-third of February, O. S. being, on the twenty-eighth of that month, about fifty leagues to the weſtward of Cape Finiſterre, met with a violent ſtorm which laſted forty-eight hours, and entirely diſperſed them. What loſs they ſuſtained is uncertain; but ſeveral of their veſſels returned to the ports of Spain in a very ſhattered condition: a very ſmall part, however, of this embarkation, had ſomewhat a different fortune; for the earls Mareſchal and Seaforth, and the marquis of Tullibardine, with about four hundred men, moſtly Spaniards, on board three frigates and five tranſports, landed in the ſhire of Roſs in Scotland, where they were joined by fifteen or ſixteen hundred Scots, and had inſtructions to wait the duke Ormond's orders, and the account of his being landed in England, before they put themſelves in motion. The whole deſign, however, being quaſhed by the diſperſion of the Spaniſh fleet; and general Wightman being ſent with a body of regular troops from Inverneſs, fell upon theſe inſurgents at the paſs of Glenſhiel, which they had made themſelves maſters of, and entirely defeated them, the Spaniards ſurrendering themſelves priſoners of war. Mareſchall, Seaforth, and Tullibardine, with ſome other officers, retired to one of the weſtern iſles, and from thence found means to make their eſcape to the continent *.

* The diſcovery, however, was partly owing to accident: the prince de Cellamare intruſted his diſpatches, for the greater ſecurity, to the abbé Portocarrero, and to a ſon of the marquis de Monteleone. They ſet out from Paris in a poſt-chaiſe, and were overturned on the road. The poſtilion obſerved, that Portocarrero was extremely anxious for the ſafety of his portmanteau, and heard him ſay he would not have loſt it for an hundred thouſand piſtoles. The man, at his return to Paris, informed the government of theſe circumſtances. The Spaniards being purſued, were overtaken and ſeized at Poitiers, with the portmanteau, in which the duke of Orleans found two letters that made him acquainted with the whole conſpiracy. The prince de Cellamare was immediately conducted to the frontiers of the kingdom: the duke and ducheſs of Maine, the marquis de Pompadour, the cardinal de Polignac, and many other perſons of diſtinction, were committed to different priſons.

During theſe tranſactions the regent of France declared war againſt Spain; and though marſhal Villars, and ſome other officers of great rank, refuſed to command an army againſt a grandſon of France; yet the duke of Berwick, who, by the victory of Almanza, had fixed Philip V. upon his throne, accepted the command of theſe troops, which were appointed to invade his territories, in order to force him to ſuch conditions as were thought neceſſary for eſtabliſhing the general tranquility of Europe. It was the opinion of ſome ſhrewd politicians on this ſide the water, that this would be a war of parade only; but the event proved them to be greatly deceived; for the marquis de Cilly advanced, in the month of April, as far as Port Paſſage, where he found ſix men of war juſt finiſhed, upon the ſtocks; all which he burned, together with timber, maſts, and naval ſtores, to the value of half a million ſterling, which was a greater real loſs to the Spaniards than what they had ſuſtained by our beating their fleet in the Mediterranean. Soon after the duke of Berwick beſieged Fontarabia; both which actions ſhewed that the French were in earneſt †.

In the month of February this year, the Whig party brought into the houſe of lords "A bill for limiting the peerage;" by which it was propoſed that the number of Engliſh peers ſhould not be enlarged beyond the preſent number, which, upon failure of male-iſſue, might be ſupplied by new creations; and that, inſtead of the ſixteen elective peers from Scotland, twenty-five ſhould be made hereditary, on the part of that kingdom; and that this number, upon failure of heirs male, ſhould be ſupplied from the other members of the Scottiſh peerage.

Although this bill carried with it ſome reſtraint upon the prerogative of the crown; yet it was ſo far favoured by the court, that earl Stanhope delivered a meſſage from the king during its dependence in the houſe, importing, that as they had under conſideration the ſtate of the Britiſh peerage, his majeſty had ſo much at heart the ſettling it upon ſuch a foundation as might ſecure the freedom and conſtitution of parliaments in all future ages, that he was willing his prerogative ſhould not ſtand in the way of ſo great and neceſſary a work.

Long and violent were the debates on this bill: this meaſure having alarmed the generality of the Scottiſh peers, as well as the more diſtinguiſhed of the Engliſh commoners, who found themſelves precluded from the hopes of ever arriving at dignity and title, they did not fail to exclaim againſt it as a violent encroachment upon the conſtitution of the kingdom. In ſhort, the clamour became ſo univerſal, that earl Stanhope obſerved in the houſe, that as the bill had raiſed ſtrange apprehenſions, he thought it adviſable to delay the farther conſideration of it till a more proper opportunity. It was accordingly dropped, and the parliament prorogued on the eighteenth day of April, when his majeſty made a ſpeech to both houſes, in which he thanked them for the zeal and affection they had ſhewn to his perſon and government during the late projected invaſion ‡. About the ſame time the duke of Argyll was created duke of Greenwich; the earl of Manchеſter, duke of Manchеſter; the earl of Caernarvon, duke of Chandos; and lieutenant-general Carpenter, baron Carpenter. Soon after, viz. on May 11, his majeſty having appointed lords-juſtices to govern in his abſence, ſet out for his German dominions, where he concluded a peace with Sweden. Charles XII. was now no more: the princeſs Ulrica, his ſiſter, had ſucceeded him on the throne, and entertained very different views from thoſe of that ambitious monarch: ſhe ſaw her kingdom exhauſted of men and money; unable to ſupport a war, ſhe ardently wiſhed for a good peace. The Swediſh council having conſented to make the ceſſion of Bremen and Verden to the elector of Hanover, all the difficulties which had hitherto retarded a pacification were removed: the duke of Orleans acted the part of mediator on this occaſion, being, as well as his Britannic majeſty, deſirous to reſtore the general tranquility of Europe. With this view king George, during his ſtay abroad, offered his mediation to bring about a peace between Sweden, the Danes, the Ruſſians, and the Poles. The czar, however rejected his mediation, and reſolved to proſecute his ſchemes of conqueſt. He ſent his fleet to the Scheuron, or Baties, of Sweden, where his troops landed, to the number of fifteen thouſand men, and committed the moſt ſhocking cruelties. To protect our new friends the Swedes againſt theſe deſtroyers, ſir John Norris was ordered into the Baltic with a large ſquadron, which joined the Swediſh fleet in the beginning of September. This junction of the Engliſh and Swedes broke all the meaſures of czar Peter the Great, who, dreading leſt his fleet ſhould experience the ſame fate with that of Spain in the Streights of Meſſina, thought proper to recal his ſhips; and the winter ſeaſon coming on, ſir John Norris returned home, and arrived ſafe in England about the latter end of November.

While the Spaniards were amuſing themſelves with chimerical notions of invaſions they were incapable of effecting againſt us, ſir George Byng, our admiral in the Mediterranean, was diſtreſſing them effectually; for having early in the ſpring ſailed from Port Mahon (where he had wintered) to Naples, he there adjuſted every thing for the reduction of Sicily; in which he acted with ſuch zeal, and met with ſo great ſucceſs, that not only the imperial army was tranſported into that iſland, and ſo well ſupplied with all things neceſſary from our fleet (which at the ſame time attended and diſturbed all the motions of the enemy's army) that it may truly be ſaid the ſucceſs of that expedition was as much owing to the Engliſh admiral as to count de Mercy, the German general; and that the Engliſh fleet did no leſs ſervice than the army. To enter into all the particulars of this Sicilian expedition would take up much more room than I have to ſpare. The reader may inform himſelf fully as to theſe circumſtances, by peruſing Corbet's Account of the Expedition to Sicily, which is a very ample hiſtory of that memorable war which embarraſſed us ſo much while it continued, and which has been buried in oblivion ever ſince. There is, however, one circumſtance which deſerves relation. The Imperialiſts having taken Meſſina, on the eighth of Auguſt, 1719, the admiral landed a body of Engliſh grenadiers, who very quickly made themſelves maſters of the tower of Faro; by which, having opened a free paſſage for their ſhips, he came to an anchor in Paradiſe Road; and this being obſerved by the commander of the Spaniſh men of war in the mole (the remains of the fleet which had eſcaped from the ſea-fight) he began to deſpair of getting out to ſea, and therefore unbent his ſails and unrigged the ſhips, and reſolved to wait their fate, which he knew muſt be the ſame with that of the citadel. This gave great ſatisfaction to our admiral, who now found himſelf at liberty to employ his ſhips in other ſervices, which had been for a long time employed in blocking up that port. But, while all things were in this proſperous condition, a diſpute aroſe among the allies about the diſpoſition of theſe ſhips, when taken. The admiral, in order to prevent all animoſity, propoſed to count de Mercy to erect a battery, and deſtroy them as they lay in the baſon. The count at firſt ſeemed unwilling to aſſent to this propoſal; but the admiral inſiſted on it with ſo much firmneſs, that a battery was raiſed, which in a little time ſunk and deſtroyed the ſhips, and thereby completed the ruin of the naval power of Spain. In a word, our admiral continued to exert his activity and talents in the Mediterranean, until he had ſeen the iſlands of Sicily and Sardinia evacuated by the Spaniards, and the mutual ceſſions executed between the emperor and the duke of Savoy; in conſequence of which, four battalions of Piedmonteſe troops were tranſported from Palermo to Sardinia, and took poſſeſſion of Cagliari in the name of their maſter *. On his return to England, the latter end of this year, he was, in reward for his ſervices, appointed treaſurer of the navy, and rear-admiral of Great Britain. In a little time he was ennobled by the title of viſcount Torrington, declared a privy-counſellor, and afterwards made a knight of the Bath, on the revival of that order.

The more effectually to humble Spain, and at the ſame time to convince the whole world that we could not only contrive, but execute an invaſion, the miniſtry propoſed the conqueſt of Corunna, and of Peru in South America. Four thouſand men, commanded by lord Cobham, were embarked at the Iſle of Wight, and ſailed on the twenty-firſt day of September, under the convoy of five ſhips of war, commanded by captain Mighels, who was to be joined by captain Johnſon, then cruizing off Fontarabia. When the ſquadron arrived on the coaſt of Galicia, it kept cruizing three days, in the ſtation appointed for Johnſon to join them; but he not appearing, and the danger of lying on the coaſt at this ſeaſon of the year with tranſports, rendering it neceſſary to take ſome meaſures of acting without him; and the wind offering fair for Vigo, his lordſhip took the reſolution to attempt the reduction of that place, in which he ſucceeded with very little difficulty, the citadel capitulating on honourable terms the fifth day after he appeared before it. This conqueſt is ſaid to have coſt us but two officers, and three or four men killed. There were in the town about ſixty pieces of large iron cannon which the enemy abandoned, and theſe they nailed and damaged as much as their time would give them leave; and in the citadel were forty-three pieces, of which fifteen were braſs, and two large mortars, beſides above two thouſand barrels of powder, and ſeveral cheſts of arms, amounting to eight thouſand muſquets; all of which ſtores and braſs ordnance were lodged there from on board the ſhips that were to have viſited Great Britain in the ſucceeding ſpring; and the very troops that gave up Vigo were alſo part of thoſe which were to have been employed in that expedition: ſeven ſhips were ſeized in the harbour, three of which were fitting up for privateers, one to carry twenty-four guns; the reſt were trading veſſels †.

Vigo being thus taken, lord Cobham ordered major-general Wade to embark with a thouſand men on board four tranſports, and to ſail to the upper end of the bay of Vigo, which he accordingly did; and having landed his men, marched to Ponta Vedra, which place ſurrundered without oppoſition. Here was alſo found a great quantity of braſs artillery, ſmall arms, and military ſtores, which had been intended for the invaſion of England. Major general Wade returned with his booty and troops to Vigo on the twenty-third of October. The next day lord Cobham, finding it would be impoſſible for him to maintain his ground any longer in Spain, ordered the forces to be embarked, as likewiſe the cannon, &c. which being done by the twenty-ſeventh, he ſailed that day for England, where he arrived about the middle of November, having loſt in the whole expedition about three hundred men only, killed, dead, or deſerted. The expedition to the Weſt Indies was long delayed by contrary winds, and at laſt prevented by the concluſion of the peace.

Spain was now obliged to drain the cup of humiliation to the very dregs, her enemies being not only too powerful for her to ſubdue, but even to think of reſiſting. The French had made themſelves maſters of Fontarabia and Roſes, two of the principal keys to the kingdom, and threatened to carry their victorious arms into its very bowels, while Philip V. had no longer a fleet to ſend to ſea, and ſaw his armies deſtroyed, the trade of the nation ruined, and his ſubjects deſponding and ripe for revolt. In this ſituation, he had recourſe to peace, as the only means to ſecure him the poſſeſſion of a throne which ſhook under him; and ſent orders to the duke de Boretti Landi, his miniſter at the Hague, to accede to the quadruple alliance. To complete his humiliation, he was obliged to diſmiſs cardinal Alberoni from his ſervice, and even baniſh him the kingdom. The king of England and the regent of France, to whom that miniſter had rendered himſelf perſonally diſagreeable, refuſing to hearken to any propoſals while he continued in office. The war with Spain, though drawn out to a greater length than is here ſpecified, it was thought proper to comprehend it in one general view, that the reader might be able to form an idea of the whole, and might not have his attention diſtracted by foreign affairs, while purſuing the courſe of the Engliſh hiſtory *.

On the fourteenth day of November the king returned to England, and on the twenty-third opened the ſeſſion of parliament with a ſpeech; in which he told them, that all Europe, as well as Great Britain, was on the point of being delivered from the calamities of war, by the influence of Britiſh arms and councils. He exhorted the commons to concert proper means for leſſening the debts of the nation. The addreſſes of both houſes were as warm as he could deſire: they in particular thanked him for having interpoſed in favour of the proteſtants of Hungary, Poland, and Germany, who had been oppreſſed by the practices of the popiſh clergy, and preſented to him a memorial containing the detail of their grievances.

The peerage-bill was now revived by the duke of Buckingham; and, notwithſtanding the vigorous oppoſition made by ſeveral members, paſſed through the upper houſe with great diſpatch; but when it was ſent down to the commons, Mr. Robert Walpole attacked it with great vehemence; it was alſo oppoſed by a conſiderable number of Whig members, and, after warm debates, rejected by a large majority. The next object that engroſſed the attention of the parliament, was a bill for better ſecuring the dependency of Ireland upon the crown of Great Britain. This bill took its riſe from an appeal to the houſe of peers in England, by Maurice Anneſley, againſt a decree of the houſe of peers in Ireland, which the Britiſh houſe of peers received, and ordered the barons of the Exchequer in Ireland to put Mr. Anneſley in poſſeſſion of certain lands he had loſt by the decree in that kingdom. The barons obeyed this order, and the Iriſh houſe of peers paſſed a vote againſt them, as having acted in derogation to the king's prerogative in his high court of parliament in Ireland, as alſo of the rights and privileges of that kingdom and of the parliament thereof: they likewiſe ordered them to be taken into cuſtody of the uſher of the black-rod. They tranſmitted a long repreſentation to the king, demonſtrating their right to the final judicature of cauſes; and the duke of Leeds, in the upper houſe, urged fifteen reaſons to ſupport the claim of the Iriſh peers. Notwithſtanding theſe arguments the houſe of lords in England reſolved, "That the barons of the Exchequer in Ireland had acted with great courage, according to law, in ſupport of his majeſty's prerogative, and with fidelity to the crown of Great Britain. They addreſſed the king to confer on them ſome marks of his royal favour, as a recompence for the ill uſage they had undergone. Finally, they prepared the bill, by which the Iriſh houſe of lords was deprived of all right to paſs ſentence, affirm or reſerve any judgment or decree, given or made in any court within that kingdom. The bill was carried by a conſiderable majority, and received the royal aſſent †.

The king had, in his ſpeech, earneſtly recommended the conſideration of all proper means for leſſening the debts of the nation: accordingly a ſcheme was laid to reduce all the public funds into one, for diſcharging that debt. The ſcheme was projected by ſir John Blount, who had been bred a ſcrivener, and was poſſeſſed of all the cunning, plauſibility, and boldneſs, requiſite for ſuch an undertaking. He communicated his plan to Mr. Aiſlabie, chancellor of the Exchequer, as well as to one of the ſecretaries of ſtate, and the project was adopted.

In the month of January, 1720, the South Sea Company, of which Blount was one of the directors, propoſed to the houſe of commons to give three millions five hundred thouſand pounds, for the privilege of taking in all the irredeemable debts (amounting in all to very near eight hundred thouſand pounds per annum), and alſo the redeemable debts then at the Exchequer and Bank (moſtly bearing five per cent.) either by purchaſe from the proprietors, or by ſubſcriptions into their capital ſtock. This project exciting the jealouſy of the Bank of England, the directors of the latter company, on the very ſame day, offered above five millions for the ſame privilege. This rivalſhip proved, in effect, the bane of the whole plan; for a ſecond propoſal of the South Sea Company amounted to no leſs than ſeven millions and an half, in caſe thoſe debts ſhould be ſubſcribed, and in that proportion for any part of them; and alſo farther propoſed to pay to the uſe of the public one year's purchaſe of all ſuch of the long irredeemable annuities as ſhould not be brought into their capital. The Bank made a ſecond propoſal ſtill more advantageous to the public in ſundry reſpects, and therein obliged themſelves to give ſeventeen hundred pounds Bank ſtock for every hundred pounds irredeemable long annuities. But the South Sea Company being reſolved, at any rate, to obtain the liberty of taking in the public debts, and fluſhed with their late ſucceſs in taking in the greateſt part of the annuities of the lottery of 1710, carried their aims ſo far as to offer to incorporate all the funds of the Bank, Eaſt India Company, and the Exchequer, into their own capital: but although that was not reliſhed, the very rumour of ſuch a ſcheme raiſed their ſtock to one hundred and twenty-ſix per cent. Let any perſon of common underſtanding conſider one moment how it could be poſſible for either company to effect what they now propoſed (ſo as not to be loſers themſelves), without egregiouſly deceiving and injuring the proprietors of theſe debts; was it not therefore moſt unaccountable in a Britiſh parliament and miniſtry, to give encouragement to a propoſal of ſo obviouſly pernicious a nature? Such, however, was the caſe; and while this affair of the South Sea Company was debating in the houſe of commons, the ſtock of that company roſe gradually from one hundred and twenty-ſix, to above three hundred, and advanced to near four hundred; but,

* The celebrated Joſeph Addiſon, eſq. ſome time ſecretary of ſtate, well known for his fine genius, diſplayed in the Spectator and other elegant writings, died in June this year, 1719; and not long before, that eminent phyſician ſir Samuel Garth departed this life, famous, as well for his knowlege in the art of poetry, as for his ſkill in his profeſſion: he was phyſician general to the army.

In November, John Matthews, a printer in Little Britain, was executed at Tyburn, for printing and publiſhing a treaſonable libel, intitled Vox Populi Vox Dei, in which the pretender's right to the crown of theſe realms was aſſerted, in breach of the ſtatute of the fourth of queen Anne, which makes the aſſerting any ſuch thing in writing or printing, high treaſon.

after ſome fluctuation ſettled at about three hundred and thirty, in which ſtate, with little variation, it continued to the end of March. This great riſe was chiefly owing to the rejection of a motion for a clauſe in the South Sea bill, to fix what ſhare in the capital ſtock of the company the proprietors of the annuities ſhould have, who would voluntarily ſubſcribe; or how many years purchaſe in money they ſhould receive upon ſubſcribing; at the choice of the proprietors. In concluſion, the South Sea company's laſt propoſal was accepted in parliament, and a bill brought in, on the ſecond of April, 1720, "for enabling that company to increaſe their preſent capital ſtock by redeeming ſuch public debts and incumbrances as are therein mentioned; and for raiſing money to be applied for leſſening ſeveral of the public debts and incumbrances; and for calling in the preſent Exchequer-bills remaining uncancelled, and for making forth new bills in lieu thereof, to be circulated and exchanged upon demand, at or near the Exchequer."

This bill paſſed the commons by a very great majority (one hundred and ſeventy-two againſt fifty-five), and was ſent to the lords for their concurrence, where it occaſioned a long debate, being vigorouſly oppoſed by the lord North and Grey, the earl Cowper, the dukes of Wharton, Buckingham, and other peers. They urged what afterwards proved but too true: "That it was calculated for the enriching of a few, and the ruin of many: that it countenanced the pernicious practice of ſtock-jobbing, thereby diverting the proper genius of the people from trade and induſtry: that the artificial raiſing of South Sea ſtock ſo high as its then price, while the bill was depending [viz. 319l. per cent.] was a dangerous bait for decoying the unwary to their ruin, by a falſe propoſal of gain, to part with what they had gotten with labour and induſtry, for imaginary wealth: that it would give foreigners an opportunity of perhaps trebling the great ſums they already poſſeſſed in our funds, and it would thereby drain the kingdom of its treaſure, when they ſhould realize their ſtock: that a national bargain ſhould wiſely be made, with more advantage to the public than to individuals; but this ſcheme was quite the reverſe, ſince, if the South Sea ſtock ſhould be kept up at three hundred per cent. its old members would gain above thirty millions, whilſt the public was only to avail themſelves of but a quarter of that ſum: that although neither of the propoſals of the two rival companies were fit to be received, yet that of the Bank was fairer, as they declared plainly what they would give the long annuitants in their ſtock: but if, nevertheleſs, the South Sea company's propoſals ſhould be accepted, the riſe of their ſtock ſhould be limited, for preventing the pernicious effects of ſtock-jobbing in ſo high a degree as was like to happen."

To all which, and much more ſaid againſt the ſcheme, the earl of Sunderland, and others of the miniſterial advocates, anſwered, by declaring, that thoſe who encouraged the ſcheme of the South Sea company, had nothing in view but the eaſing the nation of part of the heavy load of debts under which it laboured; that the managers for that company had undoubtedly a proſpect of gain, either to themſelves or to their corporation; but that when the ſcheme was accepted, neither the miniſtry nor the company could foreſee this great riſe of their ſtock; that if it had continued as it was when the bargain was ſtruck, viz. at one hundred and thirty-ſeven per cent. the public would have been the greater gainer; and laſtly, that it was but reaſonable that the South Sea company ſhould enjoy the profits procured to it by the wiſe management and induſtry of the directors, which would enable it to make large dividends, and thereby accompliſh the purpoſe of the ſcheme. After theſe and ſome other ſpeeches, the bill paſſed without amendment, and on the ſeventh of April received the royal aſſent *.

By this act the company was declared willing, and was accordingly authorized, to take in, by purchaſe or ſubſcription, the irredeemable debts of the nation, ſtated at ſixteen millions five hundred forty ſix thouſand four hundred and eighty-two pounds, ſeven ſhillings, and one penny farthing, at ſuch times as they ſhould find convenient, before the firſt day of March of the enſuing year, without any compulſion of any of the proprietors, at ſuch rates and prices as ſhould be agreed upon between the company and reſpective proprietors.

For the liberty of taking in the national debts, and increaſing their capital ſtock accordingly, the company conſented that their preſent and to be increaſed annuity ſhould be continued at the rate of five per cent. till midſummer, 1727; and from thence to be reduced to four per cent. and to be redeemable by parliament. In conſideration of this and other advantages, expreſſed in the act, the company declared themſelves willing to make ſuch payments into the receipt of the Exchequer as were therein ſpecified, for the uſe of the public, to be applied to the diſcharge of the public debts incurred before Chriſtmas, 1716.

The ſum they were obliged to pay for the liberty of taking in the redeemable debts, four years and a half purchaſe for all the long and ſhort annuities that ſhould be ſubſcribed, and one year's purchaſe for ſuch long annuities as ſhould not be ſubſcribed, amounted, on the execution of the act, to about ſeven millions. For enabling the company to raiſe this ſum, they were impowered to make calls for money from their members, to open books of ſubſcription, to grant annuities redeemable by the company, to borrow money upon any contract or bill, under their common ſeal, or on the credit of their capital ſtock; without, however, making any addition to the company's annuities.

It was enacted, that out of the firſt moneys ariſing from the ſums paid by the company into the Exchequer, ſuch public debts carrying intereſt at five per cent. incurred before the twenty-fifth of November, 1716, founded upon any former act of parliament, as were now redeemable, or might be redeemed before the twenty-fifth day of December, 1722, ſhould be diſcharged in the firſt place; and that all the remainder ſhould be applied towards paying off ſo much of the capital ſtock of the company as ſhould then carry intereſt at five per cent. It was likewiſe provided, that after Midſummer, 1722, the company ſhould not be paid off in any ſum leſs than one million at a time †.

Such was the nature of the South Sea ſcheme; which, however promiſing in appearance, was afterwards productive of ſo much miſchief to the nation.

† See Stat. 6 George I. cap. iii.

The year 1720 is remarkable beyond any other which can be pitch upon by hiſtorians, for extraordinary and romantic projects, propoſals and undertakings, both private and national, and which therefore might be recorded as a perpetual memento to all legiſlators and miniſters of our own nation, never to leave it in the power of any ſett of deſigning men hereafter to put in practice ſo ſhameful and baneful an impoſition on the credulity of the people, thereby diverted from their lawful induſtry.

Among the ſeveral projects ſet on foot at this period, the two principal were for eſtabliſhing the two companies of the Royal Aſſurance, headed by lord Onſlow, and of the London Aſſurance, by the lord Chetwynd; who hearing that the civil liſt was conſiderably in arrear, they offered to the miniſtry ſixty thouſand pounds, towards the diſcharge of thoſe incumbrances, provided they might obtain the king's charter, with a parliamentary ſanction, for the eſtabliſhment of their reſpective companies. The propoſal was accepted, and the king imparted it to the houſe of commons, deſiring their concurrence. A bill was immediately framed, and paſſed, enabling his majeſty to grant letters of incorporation to the two companies; which ſoon obtained the royal aſſent *.

On the eleventh of June the king put an end to the ſeſſion with a ſpeech, in which he ſignified his intention of viſiting his German dominions; for which he actually ſet out ſome few days after the prorogation of the parliament. But before his departure from Great Britain he was reconciled to the prince of Wales, chiefly through the mediation of the duke of Devonſhire and Mr. Robert Walpole, who, with lord Cowper, lord Townſhend, Mr. Methuen, and Mr. Pulteney, were received into favour, and re-aſſociated with the miniſtry. The earls of Dorſet and Bridgewater were advanced to the title of dukes, the lord viſcount Caſtleton was made an earl, Hugh Boſcawen was created lord viſcount Falmouth, John Wallop viſcount Lymington, Matthew Ducie Morton, and John Barrington of Becket, were both of them promoted to the dignity of barons.

While the king was employed abroad in reconciling the reſpective intereſts of the different ſtates of Europe, the South-ſea ſcheme produced a kind of national phrenzy in England, and nothing was now minded but the buſineſs of ſtock-jobbing. Exchange-alley, where theſe affairs were tranſacted, was in a continual hurry, where crowds of all ranks and qualities daily reſorted, on a report being propagated that Gibraltar and Mahon would be given up to the Spaniards for ſome places in Peru, by which means the Engliſh trade to the South-ſea would be protected and enlarged. This rumour, diffuſed with great induſtry, inſpired the people with ſuch extravagant hopes, that in five days after paſſing the bill, no leſs than two millions of original ſtock was ſubſcribed. It would be altogether inconſiſtent with the deſign of a general hiſtory, and afford very little entertainment to the reader, ſhould I enter into a detail of the proceedings, or explain the various or unwarrantable acts that were practiſed to enhance the value of the ſtocks: ſuffice it to ſay, that by the promiſe of larger dividends, and other illegal acts, Blount, the firſt projector (who, with very moderate talents, led all the other directors) raiſed the ſtock of the company to above 1000 l. per cent. The deſperate, who ventured firſt, were generally gainers, while the wiſer and more ſedate, who came in later, were many of them great ſufferers; and ſo the Wrongheads (as was then the term) had the better of the Longheads.

"This, of all others (to uſe the words of a modern author †) is the moſt unfavourable æra for an hiſtorian: a reader of any ſentiment and imagination cannot be entertained or intereſted by a dry detail of ſuch tranſactions as admit of no warmth, no colouring, nor embelliſhment; a detail of which ſerves only to exhibit an inanimated picture of taſteleſs vice, and mean degeneracy." This was the æra of intereſted projects, inſpired by a venal ſpirit of adventure, and deſervedly called Bubbles, which grew up from the corruption of the great bubble, or South-ſea ſtock. They were near one hundred in number, and it was reckoned that almoſt a million and a half was won or loſt in them. In ſhort, the nation was ſo tranſported with a ſpirit of gaming, that people became a prey to the moſt impudent impoſtors; and this infatuation continued to prevail till the eighth of September, when the ſtock began to fall faſter than it had roſe, having nothing but an imaginary foundation to ſupport it, till by Michaelmas-day it ſunk to 150. Some of the leading men of the nation, who were deeply concerned in theſe fraudulent practices, ſeeing the price of ſtocks ſinking daily, employed all their intereſt with the Bank to ſupport the South ſea; that corporation agreed, or, more properly ſpeaking, it was reported that it had agreed, to take a quantity of the South-ſea ſtock at 400 per cent. in payment for three millions ſeven hundred and ſeventy-five thouſand pounds, redeemable debt, which the company was to repay on Lady-day and Michaelmas of the enſuing year. This was afterwards called the Bank-contract, the very ſurmiſe of which had run up South-ſea ſtock prodigiouſly, which however fell ſoon after as faſt, when it was found that the ſaid ſuppoſed contract was no reality, but a mere temporary and very unjuſt expedient, to quiet the clamours of the people; for the directors of the Bank finding their property in danger of being ſwept away by the portentous tide of ruin, which now bore down every thing before it, renounced their agreement, which they were not obliged to perform; and the South-ſea company being deprived of this ſupport, ſoon ſunk under its own weight; in conſequence of which, many ancient and good families were impoveriſhed or ruined, whilſt a few upſtarts got thouſands. Public credit received a terrible ſhock: the nation was thrown into a dangerous ferment, and nothing was heard but the ravings of grief, diſappointment, and deſpair. Succeſſive ceſſive expreſſes were diſpatched to Hanover, repreſenting to the king the ſtate of affairs, and earneſtly preſſing him to haſten his return. He accordingly ſhortened his ſtay in Germany, and arrived in England in the month of November.

* This was the original riſe of the preſent two very uſeful and flouriſhing inſurance corporations, who are alſo empowered to lend money on bottomree; and each of them afterwards obtained charters for inſuring from loſs by fire: yet neither of them are, by the before-mentioned ſtatute, nor by their conſequent charters, excluſive in any reſpect relating to private perſons, who may and ſtill do enjoy and practiſe inſurance on ſhips and merchandize as formerly; but with reſpect to all other corporarions they are both excluſive, excepting however the Eaſt India and Soth Sea companies, both which continue to advance money (ſays the ſtatute) by bottomree on their own ſhips.

The parliament being re-aſſembled on the eighth day of December, his majeſty made a ſpeech to both houſes, acquainting them, that during his abſence from England, the face of our affairs abroad had become more favourable: the peace in the South, he ſaid, wanted only the form of a congreſs, and that in the North was brought much nearer to a concluſion: he promiſed to lay before them, at a proper time, the ſeveral treaties he had entered into, by which they would perceive the ſucceſs of his endeavours to eſtabliſh a peace throughout Europe, and to ſecure and ſupport the proteſtant religion: he expreſſed his concern for the unhappy turn of affairs, which had ſo deeply affected the public credit at home; and he earneſtly deſired the houſe of commons to conſider of the moſt effectual and ſpeedy methods to reſtore the national credit, and fix it upon a laſting foundation.

The lower houſe was too much intereſted in the calamity to poſtpone the conſideration of that ſubject: the members ſeemed to lay aſide all party-diſtinction, and vie with each other in promoting an enquiry: they ordered the directors to produce an account of all their proceedings. Sir Joſeph Jekyll moved that a ſelect committee ſhould be appointed to examine the particulars of theſe tranſactions. In the courſe of the debate, Mr. Walpole told the houſe he had formed a ſcheme for reſtoring public credit, which was, to ingraft nine millions of the South-ſea ſtock into the Bank of England, and the like ſum into the Eaſt India company, on certain conditions. This ſcheme was approved of, and a bill for that purpoſe was prepared, paſſed through both houſes, and received the royal aſſent. Another bill was enacted into a law for reſtraining the ſub-governor, deputy-governor, directors, treaſurer, under-treaſurer, caſhier, ſecretary, and accountants, from quitting the kingdom for the ſpace of one year; and for diſcovering their eſtates and effects, ſo as to prevent them from being tranſported or alienated; a committee of ſecrecy was choſen by ballot to examine all books, papers, and proceedings, relating to the execution of the South-ſea act.

The lords ſhewed an equal earneſtneſs with the commons to proſecute the enquiry into this iniquitous tranſaction, though divers members in both houſes were deeply involved in the guilt of it. The ſub governor, the deputy-governor, the directors and officers of the South-ſea company, were examined at the bar of the houſe, when all of them were declared criminal, and ſeverely reprimanded for their illegal conduct. Soon after, a bill was brought in to diſable them from enjoying any office in that company, or in the Eaſt India company, or in the Bank of England. Three brokers were examined, and made great diſcoveries. Mr. Knight, the treaſurer of the South-ſea company, who had been intruſted with the ſecrets of the whole affair, thought proper to withdraw himſelf from the kingdom. A proclamation was iſſued for apprehending him, and another for preventing any of the directors from eſcaping as he had done. About the ſame time, at the deſire of the committee of ſecrecy, the books and papers of Knight, Surman, and Turner, were ordered to be ſecured, and their bodies (thoſe of the two laſt) taken into cuſtody, together with thoſe of ſir George Caſwell, ſir John Blount, ſir John Lambert, ſir John Fellows, and Mr. Grigſby; ſir Theodore Janſſen, ſir Robert Chapman, Mr. Sawbridge, and Mr. Eyles, members of the lower houſe, were expelled from their ſeats, and impriſoned. Mr. Aiſlabie reſigned his employments of chancellor of the Exchequer and lord of the Treaſury; and orders were given to remove all directors of the South-ſea company from any places they might enjoy under the government *.

In the beginning of February, 1721, the lords propoſed to have examined ſir John Blount, the principal projector of the South-ſea ſcheme, in hopes that his evidence would give them great lights into that myſterious tranſaction; but Blount effectually diſappointed them, by refuſing even to be ſworn to ſuch interrogatories as ſhould be put to him, alleging, that he had already been examined before the ſecret committee of the houſe of commons, and that concerning ſuch a variety of affairs, that unleſs he had a copy of his examination he could not remember every particular; and as no man was obliged to accuſe himſelf, he would not run the riſk of being guilty of prevarication. The lords were provoked at this frivolous excuſe; but having had intimation that Blount's deſign was to engage the two houſes in a quarrel, they thought proper to ſacrifice their reſentment to the preſervation of that unity which was neceſſary between the two houſes during the ſettling of this great and national concern. In the debate how they ſhould proceed in this unprecedented caſe, the duke of Wharton made ſuch ſevere reflections on the miniſtry, that earl Stanhope, conſidering himſelf perſonally levelled at, replied with ſuch vehemence as produced a violent head-ach, and obliged him to quit the houſe and retire home. He was bled and cupped that night, and the next morning was pretty well recovered; but in the evening of the ſame day he fell into a drowſineſs, which was ſucceeded by a ſuffocation, in which he inſtantly expired. The king deeply regretted the loſs of a ſubject, who at all times, and on all occaſions, had diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his zeal for the houſe of Hanover. Lord viſcount Townſhend was appointed to fill his place of ſecretary. Two days after the death of earl Stanhope, Mr. James Craggs, the other ſecretary, was ſeized with the ſmall-pox, of which he died the next day, viz. the ſixteenth of February. Thus in the ſpace of eleven days England loſt two ſecretaries of ſtate. The lord Carteret ſucceeded Mr. Craggs in his place.

Knight, the caſhier of the South-ſea company, being ſeized at Tirlemont, by the vigilance of Mr. Gandot, ſecretary to Mr. Leathes, the Britiſh reſident at Bruſſels, was confined in the citadel of Antwerp; but the ſtates of Antwerp inſiſting upon their privilege, called the Joyful Entry, granted by the emperor Charles V. and ſolemnly recognized by all his ſucceſſors, that no perſon apprehended for any crime in Brabant ſhould be tried in any other country, refuſed to deliver him up to the meſſenger ſent over from hence by the government: and while expreſſes were paſſing to and fro on this occaſion, Mr. Knight found means to make his eſcape from his priſon in Antwerp. Several members of the houſe of commons were very loud in their invectives againſt the puſillanimity and little influence of our miniſtry abroad, who were to be ſatisfied with ſuch a frivolous excuſe, as they called it, and had not peremptorily inſiſted on Knight's being immediately ſent over. On this occaſion we have a remarkable inſtance how party animoſity and national pride will ſometimes blind the moſt able and diſcerning. How elſe are we to account for the proceedings of the houſe of commons on this occaſion? Is it not ſurpriſing that a nation, which had ſpilt ſeas of blood in defence of its own liberties, ſhould yet repreſent the preſervation of liberty in another ſtate as a frivolous pretence, and cenſure a miniſtry for not inſiſting upon the violation of it? The Engliſh had fooliſhly ſuffered themſelves to be deſpiſed and ruined, with their eyes open; and therefore, to ſave them from the effects of their folly, or rather to give them an opportunity of puniſhing the perſon who had taken advantage of that folly, the Brabantines muſt be deprived of their liberties! The truth however ſeems to be, that it was never the deſign or wiſh of many of the leading men at home, that Knight ſhould ever be compelled to reviſit his native country; they were ſenſible he knew enough to make them tremble.

A ſufficient diſcovery was, however, made by the ſecret committee, to convince the world that there had been tranſacted a ſcene of the deepeſt villainy and fraud that hell ever contrived to ruin a nation (theſe are the very words of one of that committee in the houſe of commons.) In ſome of the books falſe and fictitious entries had been made; in others, entries with blanks; and ſome entries with razures and alterations; in others, leaves had been torn out. It appeared alſo that, before any ſubſcription could be made, a fictitious ſtock of five hundred and ſeventy-four thouſand pounds had been diſpoſed of by the directors, to facilitate the paſſing the bill. Great part of this was diſtributed among the earl of Sunderland, Mr. Craggs, ſenior, the ducheſs of Kendal, the counteſs of Platen and her two nieces, Mr. ſecretary Craggs, and Mr. Aiſlabie, chancellor of the Exchequer. In conſequence of the commons report, the houſe came to ſeveral ſevere, though juſt reſolutions, againſt the directors and officers of the South-ſea company; and a bill was prepared for the relief of the unhappy ſufferers, out of the eſtates of the delinquents. The earl of Sunderland and Mr. Stanhope, one of the ſecretaries of the Treaſury, who was likewiſe charged with fraudulent practices on this occaſion, had the good fortune to obtain a majority in their favour, and ſo were acquitted, though Sunderland thought proper to reſign his place of firſt commiſſioner of the Treaſury, in which Mr. Robert Walpole was reinſtated; but Mr. Aiſlabie did not eſcape ſo eaſily: the evidences againſt him were ſo ſtrong, that he was expelled the houſe, committed to the Tower, and almoſt the whole of his eſtate ſequeſtered. Sir John Blount, the projector of this deſtructive ſcheme, had fled the land about the ſame time with Knight. Mr. Craggs, ſenior, died before his affair came before the houſe: however, they reſolved that he was a notorious accomplice with Robert Knight, and ſome of the directors, in carrying on their ſcandalous practices; and therefore, that all the eſtate of which he was poſſeſſed, from the firſt day of December, 1719, ſhould be applied towards the relief of the unhappy ſufferers in the South-ſea company. The ſum of two millions fourteen thouſand pounds was confiſcated out of the joint eſtates of the ſeveral directors, towards making good the damage ſuſtained by the company, after a certain allowance had been deducted from each, according to their conduct and circumſtances *. This was done by an act of parliament, which received the royal assent on July 29, 1721; and on August 10 his majesty passed the bill for restoring public credit †.

By these wise and vigorous resolutions of the parliament, the South-sea company was soon in a condition to fulfil their engagements with the public, and the calamities of the people, which had been carried to the most outrageous height, were in great measure appeased, and tranquility restored to the nation. Mr. Robert Walpole had shewed himself particularly assiduous in settling this distracted affair, and restoring the credit of the nation, which endeared him greatly to his sovereign, who now took him into full favour. Besides being appointed chancellor of the Exchequer and first lord of the Treasury, he was about two years after honoured with the order of the Bath, then of the Garter, and continued prime minister to the end of this reign, and fifteen years after.

The supplies in this session were voted very late; nor even at length were they granted with the usual chearfulness and alacrity: in order therefore to quicken their proceedings, his majesty thought proper, on the sixteenth day of June, to acquaint the commons that he had agreed to pay a subsidy to Sweden, and hoped they would enable him to make good his engagements. This intimation produced a violent debate: the leaders of the opposition desired to know whether this subsidy, amounting to seventy-two thousand pounds, was to be paid to Sweden, exclusive of the expence of maintaining a strong fleet in the Baltic? They alleged, that most of our treaties made with that crown had been inconsistent and contradictory: they acknowleged that hemp was a very necessary commodity; but then they thought it might be had from our American colonies, by giving a proper encouragement to the culture of it there, at a cheaper rate than we were now furnished with it either from Sweden or Norway. These and several other objections were answered by the court-party, who having the majority in the house, they carried the subsidy in the affirmative.

In less than three weeks after this demand, the patience of the commons was put to a second trial, by another message from the king, informing them that the debts of the civil list amounted to five hundred and fifty thousand pounds; and that his majesty hoped they would empower him to raise this sum upon the revenue, as he proposed it should be replaced on the civil list, and reimbursed by a deduction from the salaries and wages of all officers, and the pensions and other payments from the crown. The Tory members were greatly alarmed at this second message, which they considered as a very new and unusual method of acting, not only in regard to the manner in which it was done, but also the time, when, by reason of the advanced season of the year, so many members had retired into the country, on the conviction that no farther business of consequence remained to be transacted. Mr. Shippen, who on every occasion distinguished himself by his opposition to the measures of the court (sometimes with justice and reason on his side, but not unfrequently from the mere motives of rancour and animosity) remarked, that the ways and means of raising supplies had always been left to the direction of the commons; but that in this juncture, not only the sum, but the manner of raising it, was prescribed to them, which was reducing the house to the level of a parliament of Paris. All his arguments, or those of his party, however, though supported with all the power of rhetoric and popularity, were rendered of no effect by the decisive sentence of a MAJORITY: the king's request was granted, and at the same time an act passed for a general pardon; and on the tenth day of August his majesty closed the session with a speech, in which he declared, that he entertained a most sincere concern for the sufferings of the innocent, and a just indignation against the guilty, in the affair of the South-sea scheme: that he had readily given his assent to such bills as they had presented to him for punishing the authors of the late misfortunes, and for obtaining restitution and satisfaction to those who had been injured by them in such a notorious manner: that they could not fail to have observed the discontents occasioned by this unhappy event, which had been industriously fomented and inflamed by wicked and seditious libels; but he doubted not but by their prudent conduct in their several counties, all the enemies of this government, who flattered themselves with the prospect of blowing up the present complaints into popular disaffection, would be finally disappointed in their designs and expectations.

These professions were judged necessary at this time, to obviate the ill effects that had been produced in the minds of the people, by the insinuations of the discontented party, who had industriously whispered about that the king himself was not free from connections with the projectors of the South-sea scheme: that it was at his desire the demand of Knight's being surrendered had been rejected; and that he secretly favoured the directors and their accomplices. From the strictest review of the character of his majesty, however, it is but justice to acknowlege, that if ever he seemed to deviate from the principles of government, it ought to be attributed to the ſuggeſtions of a venal and corrupt miniſtry.

Some alterations were afterwards made in these allowances; Mr. Astell had 10,000 l. instead of 5,000 l. sir John Blount, 5,000 l. instead of 1,000 l. sir Lambert Blackwell, 15,000 l. instead of 10,000 l. and Mr. Hawes, 5,000 l. instead of 31 l. 2 d. A motion was made to reduce sir Theodore Janssen's allowance to 30,000 l. but it was rejected. Tindal.

† The whole capital stock at the end of the year 1720, amounted to about thirty-seven millions eight hundred thousand pounds. The stock allotted to all the proprietors did not exceed twenty-four millions five hundred thousand pounds: the remaining capital stock belonged to the company in their corporate capacity. It was the profit arising from the execution of the South-sea scheme; and out of this the bill enacted that seven millions should be paid to the public. The present act likewise directed several additions to be made to the stock of the proprietors, out of that possessed by the company in their own right: it made a particular distribution of stock, amounting to two millions two hundred thousand pounds; and upon remitting five millions of the seven to be paid to the public, annihilated two millions of their capital. It was enacted, that after these distributions, the remaining capital stock should be divided amongst all the proprietors: this dividend amounted to thirty-three pounds six shillings and eight-pence per cent. and deprived the company of eight millions nine hundred thousand pounds. They had lent above eleven millions on stock unredeemed, of which the par discharged all the debtors upon their paying ten per cent. Upon this article the company's loss exceeded six millions nine hundred thousand pounds; for many debtors refused to make any payment. The proprietors of the stock loudly complained of their being deprived of two millions, and the parliament in the sequel revived that sum, which had been annihilated.

I muſt not forget to mention, that in the courſe of this ſeſſion a remarkable bill was debated in the houſe of lords, for the more effectual ſuppreſſing of blaſphemy and prophaneneſs. There was certainly too much occaſion for ſuch a bill, the rapid circulation of money, the ſudden elevation of perſons of the meaneſt rank, and the almoſt total diſſolution of property, occaſioned by the infamous South-ſea ſcheme having introduced a ſurpriſing profligacy of life and manners: but as the bill chiefly tended to ſet up a ſort of inquiſition on mens conſciences, with regard to ſome ſpeculative points wherein good and ſober Chriſtians differ, it met with ſuch a rational oppoſition that it came to nothing.

Beſides the lords Townſhend and Carteret being appointed ſecretaries of ſtate, the earl of Ilay was conſtituted keeper of the privy-ſeal of Scotland, and the earl of Bute admitted a lord of the bed-chamber. On the fifteenth of April this year, the princeſs of Wales was happily delivered of a prince named William Auguſtus, the late illuſtrious duke of Cumberland. I ſhall obſerve here once for all, that his royal highneſs the prince of Wales had afterwards in this reign two daughters, the princeſs Mary and Louiſa. In the courſe of this year pope Clement XI. died. A dreadful plague raging at Marſeilles, a proclamation was publiſhed, forbidding any perſon to come into England from any part of France, between the Bay of Biſcay and Dunkirk, without certificates of health.

In June the treaty of peace between Great Britain and Spain was ſigned at Madrid. At the ſame time a defenſive alliance was concluded between Great Britain, France, and Spain. Peace was alſo reſtored to the North by a treaty concluded between Ruſſia and Sweden. To conclude, king George made a treaty this year with the Moors of Africa, which gave great umbrage to the Spaniards *.
